but in the form of glory as an impressed species, beyond the sensible form of the dove. The Hundred Gnostic Chapters are rich explorations of this experiential knowledge made fruitful by the Spirit. The ascetic integrates the movements of the flesh without extinguishing it; he exhorts us to rid ourselves of the mire of the body, by contemplation, to prepare it for the joy of incorruptibility (54.89). A Catechesis attributed to him shows some characteristics of his doctrine, but is not supported by many codices.

CPG 6106-6108; PG 65, 1148-1212; DSp 3, 817-834; DHGE 14, 374-378; F. Doerr, Diadochos von Photike und die Messalianer, Freiburg im Br. 1937; H.I. Marrou, Diadoque de Photiké et Victor de Vita: REA 45 (1943) 61-80; E. Des Places, Diadoque de Photicé, SC 5; V. Messana, Diadoco, Cento considerazioni sulla fede, Rome 1978 (It. tr.); V. Messana, Diadoco di Fotica e cultura cristiana in Epiro nel V secolo: Augustinianum 19 (1979) 151-166; V. Messana, La nudité d'Adam et Ève chez Diadoque: SP 17 (1982) I, 325-332; K.J. Fricke, Das Böse bei Diadochos von Photike, in W. Strothmann (ed.), Makarios-Symposion über das Böse, Wiesbaden 1983, 123-149; Ch. Joest, "Gott lieben in voller Empfindung des Herzens": Diadochos von Photike und seine Lehre der Unterscheidung: OS 41 (1992) 149-186; P. Argárate, La Luz de tu Rostro: teología de la "Gloria" en Diádoco de Fótice: OCP 65/2 (1999) 257-278.

C. Riggi

DIAKONIA - DIACONATE. The notion of diakonia or "service" is well attested in the New Testament; however, its precise connotations are difficult to determine therein, and become more precise later on. In the Pastoral Epistles, which are among the latest NT books, the deacons, both male and female deacons, appear as an established category in the church, for which specific requirements existed (1 Tim 3). In Acts 6:1-6 diakonia indicates not only table service, but also the ministry of the word and prayer. Paul's designation of Phoebe as diakonos, and not as diakonissa, in Rom 16:1 indicates that ancient references to diakonoi should not be regarded as necessarily referring only to male deacons.

The Letter of *Clement to the Corinthians (42) mentions diakonoi together with episkopoi and presbyteroi (44), even though the distinctions among the respective functions of these categories is unclear. The Shepherd of Hermas (Sim. 9,26-27) mentions diakonoi and episkopoi, but the hierarchy of deacons, presbyters and bishop seems to first appear in Ignatius, Tral. 3,1. According to *Irenaeus, the deacons are the successors of the seven deacons instituted by the twelve apostles in Acts 6:1-6. *Justin (Apol. 1,65) mentions diakonoi as distinct from the Christian community in general (adelphoi) and its leader (proestōs).

The Didache (15,1-2) mentions diakonoi chosen by the community and ordained by cheirotonia. In the Didascalia Apostolorum (early 3rd c.) women deacons constitute an ecclesiastical order along with male deacons and presbyters; their relation to the bishop is assimilated to that of Christ to the Father, and they are said to be worthy of honor as typos of the Holy Spirit. They are ordained by the bishop with cheirotonia, just as male deacons and presbyters, and are formally included in the clergy. Their office included the administration of baptism, esp. to women, postbaptismal instruction, pastoral visits to women, proclamation, travel, ministry, spiritual and material support of women. The Traditio Apostolica includes deacons (of both genders) in the clerical group together with presbyters and bishops.

Testimonies from the 4th c. onwards are numerous. The Apostolic Constitutions devote a whole section, VIII 17-18, to deacons. Likewise, Ambrose devotes a section of his De officiis ministrorum (II 28) to deacons. Pelagius, In Rom. 16,1, at the beginning of the 5th c. attests that in his day the ministry of diaconissae consisted in the administration of baptism and teaching, esp. women. The Acts of Philip (4th-5th c.) mention διακόνισσαι along with διάκονοι, and πρεσβύτιδες along with πρεσβύτεροι, among the clergy. Likewise, in the Martyrdom of Matthew 28, a converted king is ordained πρεσβύτερος, his wife πρεσβύτις, his son διάκονος, and his wife διακόνισσα: that the female titles cannot possibly be interpreted as "wife of the presbyter" and "wife of the deacon" here is proved by the ordination of all four of them and their inclusion in the priestly dignity or ἱεροσύνη.

Ps.-*Dionysius presents deacons, presbyters and bishops as the steps of the ecclesiastical hierarchy that imitate the celestial one in his De ecclesiastica hierarchia. Justinian's Novellae explicitly include deaconesses within the clergy and says that they are ordained though χειροτονία. These documents also attest that that they administered baptism to men as well, and partook in the arcane rites (ἀπόρρητοι) and the most holy and venerable mysteries (σεβασμιωτάτοις μυστηρίοις), i.e., the *Eucharistic consecration. Even at the end of the 7th c., the Trullan synod considered women deacons to be ordained (χειροτονεῖν) and to belong to the priestly order (ἱερατική) as well as male deacons and presbyters. Similarly, in the Testamentum Domini nostri, widows and women deacons and presbyters are all included in the clerus and located together with the bishop behind the veil at the moment of the Eucharistic sacrifice at *Mass. Their ordination is indicated by the same word that designates the ordination of male deacons, presbyters and bishops. Some wealthy deaconesses, such as Olympia in Constantinople, used their riches in support of the church and for charitable works.

Epigraphical as well as literary evidence of both men and women deacons in Late Antiquity is abundant, in the East and in the West. Atto, bishop of Vercelli in the 10th c., replying to a priest, Ambrose (who asked him how to understand the terms presbytera and diacona that he found in the canons), admitted that women were regularly ordained deacons and presbyters and president of churches in the early church. Atto also indicates with precision the respective ecclesiastical offices of deacons and presbyters: for the former, ministry and baptism; for the latter, preaching, leading and teaching. The rites for the ordination of male and female deacons were identical. In the Pontifical of Egbert of *York (8th c.) the ordination of a deaconess is included among those of male deacons. In the Roman-Germanic Pontifical (10th c.) the ordination of an abbess or deaconess is included among those of abbots and deacons, and "female deacons and female presbyters" are mentioned therein along with their male colleagues. Pope Zacharias's prohibition against anybody having intercourse with a presbytera, diacona, nonna or monacha (743) imposes celibacy on women presbyters, deaconesses, conventual women and nuns, not on wives of presbyters and deacons. The same is the case with the prohibitions of popes Leo VII and *Gregory II of marriage with a presbytera or a diacona, and again with the analogous prohibition ascribed to Pope Nicolas I (9th c.). These and many more testimonies show that the diaconate continued to be a ministry shared by both men and women for many centuries, with similar functions and identical requirements and ordination rites.

J. Mayer, Monumenta de viduis diaconissis virginibusque tractantia, Bonn 1938; G. Dix, Le ministère dans l'église ancienne, Neuchâtel 1955; R. Gryson, Le ministère des femmes dans l'église ancienne, Gembloux 1972; J.M. Barnett, The Diaconate: A Full and Equal Order, New York 1981; A.G. Martimort, Les diaconesses: essai historique, Rome 1982; U. Eisen, Amsträgerinnen in frühen Christentum, Göttingen 1996; A. Di Berardino, La chiesa antica: ecclesiologia e istituzioni, Rome 1984; J.N. Collins, Diakonia: Re-interpreting the Ancient Sources, New York - Oxford 1990; P. Sorci, Diaconato e altri ministeri liturgici della donna, in La donna nel pensiero cristiano antico, ed. U. Mattioli, Genoa 1992, 331-364; E. Cattaneo, I ministeri nella Chiesa antica, Milan 1997; G. Hamman, Storia del diaconato, Bose 2004; K. Madigan – C. Osiek, Ordained Women in the Early Church. A Documentary History, Baltimore - London 2005; E. Petrolino, Diaconato servizio missione, Città del Vaticano 2006; J. Murphy-O'Connor – C. Militello – M.L. Rigato, Paolo e le donne, Assisi 2006; I. Ramelli, Donne diacono: fonti e studi recenti sulla Chiesa dei primi secoli, Il Regno 15.III.2006, 171-175; Id., review of Madigan-Osiek, Orpheus 28 (2007) 338-346; G. Macy, The Hidden History of Women's Ordination, Oxford 2008; Id., review of Macy, SMSR 74,2 (2008) 347-353; Var. aus., Diaconia, Diaconie. XXXVIII Incontro di Studiosi di Antichità Cristiane, Augustinianum, 8-10 May 2009 [SEA], Rome 2010.

I. Ramelli

DIALOGI DE SANCTA TRINITATE IV-V. The two texts, which have been handed down in a pseudo-Athanasian corpus likely collected in the Byzantine age, are part of the anti-Apollinarian polemic, but belong to different authors and cultural environments. They are fictitious dialogues that pay no attention to the setting and the description of the characters, but aim at presenting the opposition of the two interlocutors' theses, and particularly the refutation of the Apollinarian ideas.

Dial. IV, of which there are two ancient versions (the Latin one, written by the end of the 5th c., and the Armenian one, probably produced in the 7th c.) and a few extracts in Syriac (Florilegium Edessenum anonymum, syriace ante 562), is a dialogue between an Apollinarist and an Orthodox. Some internal elements suggest that the text was written in the seventh decade of the 4th c. Attempts to identify the author of the dialogue have always encountered objective difficulties, so that it seems possible to define only the environment in which it was written. In this sense, Dial. IV contains several points of contact with the Alexandrian tradition, and in particular with the milieu influenced by Didymus's thought.

Dial. V refutes item by item Apollinaris of Laodicea's Ἀνακεφαλαίωσις, probably composed in the last years of the Laodicean's life. Although the author of the text cannot be identified in this case either, certain elements in Dial. V lead to post-Ephesus Antioch's ground, characterized by Theodoret of Cyrrhus's thinking.

CPG 2284; Ed.: Pseudo-Atanasio. Dialoghi IV e V sulla santa Trinità, testo greco con traduzione italiana, versione latina e armena, ed. A. Capone, Leuven 2011; Opere di Atanasio in una traduzione latina inedita, nota di I. Costa, in Atti della Accademia Pontaniana n.s. XLII, Naples 1993, pp. 221-265; Ch. Bizer, Studien zu pseudathanasianischen Dialogen der Orthodoxos und Aëtios, Bonn 1970; P. Jungmann, Die armenische Fassung des sog. Pseudo-athanasianischen Dialogus de Sancta Trinitate IV: Oriens Christianus 53 (1969) 159-201; Knikʻ Hawatoy, ed. Tēr Mkrtčʻean, 1914 (= Leuven 1974). Studi.: A. Capone, De sancta Trinitate Dialogus IV: note critiche alla versione latina"; Classica et Christiana 3 (2008) 69-81; P. Andrist, Les protagonistes égyptiens du débat apollinariste. Le Dialogue d'Athanase et Zachée et les dialogues pseudoathanasiens – intertextualité et polémique religieuse en Égypte vers la fin du IVe siècle: Recherches Augustiniennes 34 (2005)63-141; E. Mühlenberg, Apollinaris von Laodicea, Göttingen 1969.

A. Capone

DIALOGUE. The literary genre of dialogue, very common in classical literature, also enjoyed a certain success with the Christian authors of the first centuries. The origins of Christian dialogue are not completely clear. It probably took shape from the meeting of earlier subliterary forms of expression such as the Rabbinic debates over the interpretation of the Jewish Law, Cynic-Stoic diatribe and the controversies reported in the primitive Christian literature of the gospels and the Praxeis (cf. ps.-*Clementines).

1. The earliest Christian dialogue we know of, written by *Aristo of Pella (ca. 140), is the debate between Papiscus the Jew and Jason the Jewish Christian over the interpretation of the OT. The more famous Dialogue with Trypho the Jew by *Justin Martyr also employs this controversialist model, but gives it a higher literary dignity thanks to its evident references to Plato. The dialogue form would subsequently be used more than once in the ongoing polemic against the pagans. Antipagan apologetic dialogue, or apology in dialogue form, had its most famous example in *Minucius Felix's Octavius, where we feel the presence of Cicero's De natura deorum; we should also mention *Macarius of Magnesia's Apokritikos, and still later *Aeneas of Gaza's Theophrastus and *Zacharias of Mytilene's Ammonius. More complex cases of religious controversy, involving a variety of adversarial sources simultaneously (pagan cults, Judaism, heresies), are offered by the Consultationes Zacchaei et Apollonii and by the so-called Religionsgespräch held at the Sassanid court.

2. It is important to note that neither the rich dialogic output of the imperial age (Plutarch, *Lucian, Athenaeus, *Macrobius) nor the famous biblical precedent of the book of Job left much of a trace on Christian literary dialogue. Literate Christian authors went back exclusively to *Plato and Cicero, esp. when they sought to model themselves on classical philosophical dialogue in the creation of Christian philosophical dialogue. In this field the outstanding names are *Gregory of Nyssa with his Dialogue on the Soul and Resurrection (directly inspired by Plato's Phaedo) and, of course, *Augustine with the philosophical dialogues of his youth, the four Cassiciacum dialogues (Contra Academicos, De beata vita, De ordine and the Soliloquia, a novelty in the absolute sense) and, after his baptism, De quantitate animae, De magistro, De libero arbitrio and De musica. Other works must also be attributed to strictly philosophical Christian dialogue: *Bardesanes of Edessa's Book of the Laws of the Countries and *Gregory Thaumaturgus's To Theopompus, on the Impassibility and Passibility of God.

3. But philosophical dialogue in which the Christian author seeks to work out rational answers independent of revelation, though in harmony with it, is a mere parenthesis in the vaster output of the predominantly theological dialogues developed in the context of the innumerable doctrinal controversies between orthodox and heretics. The documentation on these controversies has been subjected to various forms of literary reelaboration, from protocol—limited to recording the progress of the controversy, pretending to report the dialogue as it actually occurred, not unlike the protocols of the judiciary interrogators in the Acta martyrum—to dialogue having a strong doctrinal component, vitally rooted in the great tradition of philosophical dialogue. To *Origen we owe two dialogues on the resurrection and a Dialogue with Heraclides and his fellow bishops on the Father, the Son and the soul. *Methodius of Olympus wrote several theological dialogues in which he managed to temper his polemical intent in the demanding literary forms of Platonic dialogue: the Symposium of the Ten Virgins, a work rich in anti-Encratite ideas; Aglaophon on the Resurrection, an antignostic, anti-Origenist dialogue; the antignostic dialogue On free will; and De lepra. After Methodius, controversial dialogue assumed everterser forms with the antignostic Dialogue of Adamantius and *Hegemonius's anti-Manichean Acta Archelai (the presence of an external judge in these disputes between Christians is interesting). Anti-Arian and anti-Macedonian dialogues multiplied in the 4th and 5th c., adhering to the form of oral debate as it actually happened (e.g., the 7 ps.-Athanasian dialogues). *Jerome wrote theological dialogues against *Luciferians and *Pelagians, *Cyril of *Alexandria against *Arians and *Nestorians; Nestorius wrote a self-defense in dialogue form, the Book of Heraclides, while *Theodoret of Cyrrhus opposed the *monophysites with the dialogue Eranistes, and *Arnobius the Younger defended Roman trinitarian and christological doctrine in Conflictus Arnobii et Serapionis. In a letter to *Diodore of Tarsus, *Basil of Caesarea clearly expressed his preference for that genre of dialogue in which, conceding nothing to the elegance of Platonic dialogue but following Aristotle and Theophrastus, the Christian author expounded his opponent's objections and the necessary replies in a simple and clear style, so as to create a work useful for building up the common faith (Ep. 135,1).

4. We can only mention in this setting the dialogue of "revelation" (Offenbarungsdialog), which shows some affinity with contemporary *hermetic formulations and themes (one thinks of the revelation in dialogue form on gnosis and salvation; this affinity, however, would be better studied and specified on the literary and historical-religious levels). In these texts, variously elaborated, the dialogue generally takes place between the heavenly being that reveals (the Redeemer-Savior) and the human recipients of the revelation. These are for the most part "gnostic" works from *Nag Hammadi, in which debates between the Lord's disciples and the questions they ask the Risen Christ during his post-Easter apparitions are invariably followed by the clarifying response in which teaching on salvation is imparted, resolving the debate. One notes in these gnostic texts, properly gospels in dialogue form (dialogue gospels - Dialogevangelien), a strong and capable feminine presence (many questions remain open: see now the updated treatment of the debate in Hartenstein's monograph). On the other hand, as examples of orthodox dialogue of revelation as early as the 2nd c., we can cite the Epistle of the Apostles and the Shepherd of Hermas (where the dialogue is between a single recipient of the revelation and various heavenly beings). The revelation (an explanatio somnii) of the Tiburtine Sibyl to the 100 judges begins with a dialogue (the Greek monophysite version is also known as the "Oracle of Baalbek"), and the revelation of Zoroaster to Hystaspes on the coming of the Messiah is transmitted in dialogue form (these last two prophetic texts of the Tiburtine Sibyl and Zoroaster were later brought together as books III and IV of the early 6th-c. Theosophia).

E. Bratke, Das sogenannte Religionsgespräch am Hof der Sasaniden (TU, NF IV/3), Leipzig 1899; A. Hermann - G. Bardy, Dialog: RAC 3 (1957) 928-955; H. Dörrie - H. Dörries, Erotapokriseis: RAC 4 (1966) 342-370; M. Hoffmann, Der Dialog bei den christlichen Schriftstellern der ersten vier Jahrhunderte (TU 96), Berlin 1966; M. Wacht, Aeneas von Gaza als Apologet. Seine Kosmologie im Verhältnis zum Platonismus (Theophaneia 21), Bonn 1969; B.R. Voss, Der Dialog in der frühchristlichen Literatur (Studia et Testimonia Antiqua 9), Munich 1970; P.L. Schmidt, Zur Typologie und Literarisierung des frühchristlichen lateinischen Dialogs, in Var. aus., Christianisme et formes littéraires de l'Antiquité Tardive en Occident (Entretiens sur l'Antiquité Classique 23), Vandoeuvres - Geneva 1977, 101-180; Ph. Perkins, The Gnostic Dialogue. The Early Church and the Crisis of Gnosticism, New York 1980; K. Berger, Hellenistische Gattungen im Neuen Testament: ANRW II.25,2, Berlin - New York 1984, 1031-1432, here 1301-1316; C. Apostolopoulos, Phaedo Christianus. Studien zur Verbindung und Abwägung des Verhältnisses zwischen dem platonischen 'Phaidon' und dem Dialog Gregors von Nyssa "Über die Seele und Auferstehung," Frankfurt - Bern - New York 1986; G.P. Luttikhuizen, The Evaluation of the Teaching of Jesus in Christian Gnostic Revelation Dialogues, in J.-M. Sevrin (ed.), The New Testament in Early Christianity (BETL 86), Louvain 1989, 363-372; J.-L. Feiertag, Les Consultationes Zacchaei et Apollonii. Étude d'histoire et de sotériologie (Paradosis 30), Fribourg (Switz.) 1990; H.M. Meissner, Rhetorik und Theologie. Der Dialog Gregors von Nyssa De anima et resurrectione (Patrologia I), Frankfurt a.M. 1991; J. Hartenstein, Die zweite Lehre. Erscheinungen des Auferstandenen als Rahmenerzählungen frühchristlicher Dialoge (TU 146), Berlin 2000; P.F. Beatrice, Anonymi Monophysitae Theosophia. An Attempt at Reconstruction (VChrS 56), Leiden - Boston - Cologne 2001.

P.F. Beatrice

DIALOGUE of a MONTANIST with an ORTHODOX. Written ca. the end of the 4th c., perhaps at *Antioch (Ficker), *Alexandria (de Labriolle) or, according to a recent hypothesis, in a *Cappadocian context (Cavalcanti), the Dialogue is a work of antiheretical propaganda in which two characters, identified only as an orthodox and a *Montanist, debate a series of problems that had emerged in the course of the controversy between the sect founded by *Montanus and the Catholic Church. Discussed in five sections—enriched with many Pauline and Johannine passages—are the pericope of 1 Cor 13 (I), the existence of prophecy after Christ (II), trinitarian doctrine (III), the Paraclete (IV) and the prophetic power of women (V). Its purpose is clearly polemical: the orthodox reduces his adversary to silence, basically accusing him of professing a monarchian doctrine, of believing that Montanus possessed the fullness of the Holy Spirit and of permitting women to dishonor the Lord by writing sacred books.

G. Ficker, Widerlegung eines Montanisten: ZKG 26 (1905) 447-463; A.M. Berruto, Dialogo di un montanista con un ortodosso, Bologna 1999; P. de Labriolle, Les sources de l'histoire du montanisme, Fribourg-Paris 1913, XCIII–CVIII; E. Cavalcanti (ed.), Pseudo-Atanasio. Dialoghi contro i Macedoniani, Turin 1983, 11; A. Jensen, Gottes selbstbewusste Töchter. Frauenemanzipation im frühen Christentum?, Freiburg - Basel - Vienna 1992, 254-362 (in particular 302-326).

P. Marone

DIALOGUES of JESUS (apocryphal). A group of apocrypha in dialogue form, often gnostic in tone. The dialogue usually occurs on the Mount of Olives, where Jesus reveals his mysteries to the apostles. These texts have a certain connection with the literary genre of Quaestiones et responsiones. These dialogues are found in (or constitute) the following texts: the Freer Logion, a text inserted between Mk 16:14 and 15 in the Freer codex; the Epistula Apostolorum (chs. 12-51); 5 *Coptic texts—4 of the *Nag Hammadi Library: Epistula Iacobi apocrypha (I cod.), Liber Thomae Atheltae (II cod.), Dialogus Salvatoris (III cod.), Epistula Petri ad Philippum (VIII cod.); also in Coptic is the Dialogus Ioannis cum Iesu, preserved fragmentarily. A dialogue with the apostles is also found in other texts, such as the Apoca- lypse of Peter, the Questiones Bartholomaei and the Interrogationes Ioannis, a Cathar-medieval text, but containing gnostic and *Manichean fragments. The lively dialogue between God and Esdras is found in various texts preserved under the name Esdras.

CANT 22-27 (editions); H. Köster, Dialog und Spruchüberlieferung: EvangTheol 39 (1979) 532-556; P. Perkins, The Gnostic Dialogue. The Early Church and the Crisis of Gnosticism, New York 1980; K. Rudolf, Der gnostische Dialog als litt. Genus, in Id., Gnosis und spätantike Religionsgeschichte, Leiden 1996, 103-122.

M. Starowieyski

DIALOGUS SUB NOMINE HIERONYMI ET AUGUSTINI. In all complete editions of the works of *Jerome, beginning from the 1468 princeps through that of Erasmus, an anonymous text, later than Jerome, is included, entitled Dialogus sub nomine Hieronymi et Augustini de origine animarum. The author lived in S Italy ca. the mid 5th c., perhaps a monk who fled *Africa at the time of *Genseric. Since the author shows sympathy for Jerome's thesis on the soul's creation directly by God and against Augustinian spiritual *traducianism, the Dialogus was inserted among his works. The author knows well the whole preceding discussion and the theological thought of the two Fathers, from whom he extracts the passages of the dialogue with a refined compilational technique, perfectly succeeding in presenting and maintaining the positions of the two protagonists. *Augustine, based on his discussion of original sin and the baptism of babies, seems more expert in the theological discussion, but Jerome wins. The author reinforces the creationist thesis with biblical citations, esp. from the Gospel of John: "My Father works always, and so do I" (Jn 5:17). There is another brief, later treatise on the same theme, Altercatio Ambrosii contra eos qui animam non confitentur (CPL 170).

CPL 633 (Ep. 37 of Jerome); CPPM II, A n. 886; PL 30, 261-271 (in the 1846 ed.), PL 30, 270-280 (ed. 1865). Text and It. tr.: I. Tolomio, L'anima dell'uomo. Trattati sull'anima dal V al IX secolo, Milan 1979, 110-134 (with bibl.); P. Courcelle, Littérature latine d'époque patristique, in Actes du premier Congrès de la Féd. Intern. des Ass. d'études classiques, Paris 1951, 287-307 (Altercatio 289); I. Tolomio, L'origine dell'anima nell'Alto Medioevo: Medioevo 13 (1987) 51-73 (Dialogus 60-62; Altercatio 62).

A. Di Berardino

DIATESSARON. Mathematical-musical term (the harmony of the fourth) applied by *Tatian—a native of the East and disciple of *Justin at *Rome—to his harmony of the four gospels. Tatian's was neither the only nor the first attempt to present the four distinct gospel accounts in a single unitary form, but it was certainly the most successful: due to its practical character it prevailed far and wide, both in the East, where it was the official gospel of the church of *Edessa and was continually in use in churches at least until the time of *Rabbula (early 5th c.), and in the West, though less so there. In some sense it was the first "Life of Jesus," composed on the basis of the four gospels.

The Greek term Διὰ τεσσάρων suggests an original Greek version: in fact, a Greek fragment of the Diatessaron was discovered at *Dura Europos in 1933 (ed. by Ch. Kraeling in Studies and Documents III, London 1935). In 1999, Parker and others denied that the fragment was part of the Diatessaron, but instead an independent effort to harmonize the gospels; this hypothesis was contested by Joosten (2003). It has also been asserted by some critics that this fragment is not the original, but a retranslation from Syriac (P. Kahle, The Cairo Geniza, Oxford [2]1959, 295), the language in which Tatian drew up the Diatessaron as a unified gospel, prepared with liturgical and missionary intent for his native people. Since the work is lost, the possibility of reconstructing the original Diatessaron—also very important for the earliest history of the gospel text—is conditioned by the possibility, as yet rather uncertain, of establishing a tree of dependence and mutual influence between the various forms of "gospel harmonies" that have been preserved.

Two essential problems must be taken into account: (1) The structure of the Diatessaron presumably closest to the original is certainly that given by *Ephrem the Syrian's Commentary (preserved entire in the Armenian version: ed. with Lat. tr. by L. Leloir, in CSCO arm. 137; 145, I-II, Louvain 1953–54; and about half in the original Syriac, recovered in the Chester-Beatty manuscripts, ed. L. Leloir, Dublin 1963; Leloir later published other recoveries in the original Syriac). (2) The structure itself of the work and the wide use made of it, for reasons of practicality, allowed both a number of transpositions within the general scheme, to adapt it to the needs of individual communities, and esp., in the redactions used in remote areas or among heterodox groups, the insertion of extracanonical or apocryphal logia with the elimination or substitution of passages. We know, for example, that the Diatessaron used among Encratite groups suppressed the genealogies of Jesus. Moreover, the Diatessaron being a gospel harmony that reduced the synoptic parallels to a unity, upon returning to the separate gospels, the conflated readings were reintroduced into one or other of the syn-optics through the Diatessaron's influence. The unresolved critical problems posed by a comparative study of the various forms of the Diatessaron are extremely complicated. The essential witnesses of this harmonizing tradition are (a) the cited commentary of Ephrem the Syrian (besides the Greek fragment); (b) the Arab Diatessaron known in various manuscripts (ed. A. Ciasca, Rome 1888; A.S. Marmardji, Beirut 1935); (c) the Persian Diatessaron translated from the Syriac, containing many apocryphal readings (ed. G. Messina, Rome 1951); (d) a series of old Eastern versions of the NT and various citations in the Eastern Fathers, dependent on some form of Diatessaron (Armenian, Georgian and Arab versions of the NT, citations of the *Manichean Kephalaia, and in the Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles); (e) the Codex Fuldensis of the NT copied by *Victor of Capua (shortly before 546), which contains an old Latin gospel harmony (which Victor called Diapente: see F. Bolgiani, Vittore di Capua e il Diatessaron, Mem. Accad. Sc. Turin, Cl. Sc. Mor., 4a, 2, Turin 1962); (f) a series of medieval Dutch gospel harmonies; (g) two 13th-14th-c. Italian gospel harmonies (Venetian and Tuscan); (h) an Early English harmony (the Pepysian Gospel Harmony); (i) a group of High German gospel harmonies; (j) the Heliand (a medieval Saxon poem on the life of Christ); (k) the Commentary of Zacharias of Chrysopolis, Concordia evangeliorum quattuor (PL 186, 11-620). The Diatessaron also strongly influenced the composition of subsequent lives of Jesus, of which the best-known and most widely circulated was Ludolf of Saxony's Life of Christ (Monotessaron).

CPG 1106 (ample bibl., see also the Suppl.); P.A. Ciasca, Tatiani evangeliorum harmonia, Rome [2]1934; V. Todesco - A. Vaccari - M. Vattasso, Il Diatessaron, Rome 1938; C. Peters, Das Diatessaron Tatians, Seine Überlieferung und sein Nachwirken in Morgen- und Abendland sowie der heutige Stand seiner Erforschung, Rome 1939; L. Leloir, Saint Éphrem. Commentaire de l'Évangile concordant. Texte syriaque (Manuscrit Chester Beatty 709). Folios additionels, Louvain/Paris 1990; A. Vööbus, Studies in the History of the Gospel Text in Syriac, Louvain 1951; L. Leloir, Le Diatessaron de Tatien: OrSyr 1 (1956) 208-231, 313-335; I. Ortiz de Urbina, Trama e carattere del D. di T.: OCP 24 (1959) 326-357; A. Vaccari, Le lezioni evangeliche di Eusebio e il Diatessaron di T. nella letteratura siriaca: Riv. di Studi Orient. (Scritti in onore di G. Furlani) 32 (1957) 433-452; G. Quispel, Tatian and the Gospel of Thomas, Leiden 1975; Id., A Diatessaron Reading in a Latin Manichean Codex: VChr 47 (1993) 374-378; L. Leloir, Le commentaire d'Ephrem sur le Diatessaron. Quarante et un folios retrouvés: RBi 94 (1987) 481-518; M.-É. Boismard, Le Diatessaron: de Tatien à Justin, Paris 1992; C. McCarthy, Saint Ephrem's Commentary on Tatian's Diatessaron, Oxford 1993; T. Baarda, Essays on the Diatessaron, Kampen 1994; W.L. Petersen, Tatian's Diatessaron: Its Creation, Dissemination, Significance and History in Scholarship, Leiden 1994; La más antigua vida de Jesús: Diatessaron / Taciano, tr. by J. Álvarez Maestro, Madrid 1999; J. Joosse, An Introduction to Arabic Diatessaron: OC 83 (1993) 72-129; D.C. Parker - D.G.K. Taylor - M.S. Goodacre, The Dura-Europos Gospel Harmony, in D.G.K. Taylor, Studies in the Early Text of the Gospels and Acts, Atlanta, GA 1999, 192-228; J. Joosten, Tatian's "Diatessaron" and the Old Testament Peshitta: JBL 120 (2001) 501-523; Id., The "Gospel of Barnabas" and the Diatessaron: HTR 95 (2002) 73-96; Id., The Dura Parchment and the Diatessaron: VCh 57 (2003) 159-175; U.B. Schmid, In Search of Tatian's Diatessaron in the West: VCh 57 (2003) 176-199; E.J. Hunt, Christianity in the Second Century, The Case of Tatian, London 2003.

F. Bolgiani

DICTINIUS. Son of *Symposius of Astorga, and later himself bishop of the same city, renounced the *Priscillianist doctrine at the first Council of *Toledo (400). Composed various treatises (Leo Gr., Ep. 15, 16), among them one entitled Libra, composed of twelve questions, in analogy with the twelve ounces of the Roman pound. In this work, which *Augustine's Contra mendacium gives us information about (3,5; 21,41), it seems that Dictinius, still in his Priscillianist phase, upheld the licitness of lying to hide one's religious doctrines, based on some scriptural texts.

]CPL 797; H. Chadwick, Priscillian of Avila. The Occult and the Charismatic in the Early Church, Oxford 1976.

S. Zincone

DIDACHE. The last great commentators on the Didache (J.-P. Audet, R.A. Kraft, S. Giet, K. Niederwimmer and G. Visonà) have rightly pointed out that it is not the homogeneous work of one author, but an anonymous compilation from various sources, derived from the living tradition of well-defined ecclesial communities. An unknown Jewish Christian author, addressing himself to communities in which there were also Christians who had come over from paganism, collected, in a manual, some texts derived from the tradition that seemed to him useful for the edification of converts. Thus he began with the teaching on the Two Ways, of Life and of Death (chs. 1,1–6,1), joining it to a block of liturgical traditions on baptism, fasting, prayer and the eucharistic supper (chs. 7–10); he also used sources in the disciplinary (chs. 11–13) and concluding (chs. 14–16) parts of the work.

The richness of the Didache derives from the various elements of the tradition it contains.

1. P. Audet has shown the literary affinities of the Two Ways with the Qumran Manual of Discipline; this is evident esp. in the Doctrina apostolorum (which is not a translation of our Greek Didache) and in chs. 18–20 of the Epistle of Barnabas. In fact, it must be stressed that the text of the Two Ways in our Didache does not maintain the dualistic framework of the Qumran teaching; in this it resembles, in certain points, Jewish wisdom literature. The text of the Two Ways is no further Christianized except in the addition, at the beginning, of the "evangelical section" (Did. 1,3b–2,1), which is missing in a good part of the textual tradition. This is an interesting illustration of the fact that Christian ethics could, in large part, be based on Jewish tradition.

2. The eucharistic prayers of chs. 9–10 are very archaic (it is enough to study their *Christology and eschatology to note this), and are inspired by Jewish table blessings. This kinship constitutes the main argument of those who say that these prayers accompanied a meal (Did. 10,1). This may be called a eucharistic supper not only because we find allusions to the Christian *Eucharist in the prayers, but also because, in all likelihood, verse 6 of ch. 10 introduced the communion.

3. Chs. 11–13, on the apostles, prophets and teachers, are of primary importance for determining the milieu in which the Didache originated. These give instruction on Christian hospitality toward itinerant ministers. The organization of the Christian mission reflected in these chapters recalls the situation that we find in W Syria, leading us to place the origin of the Didache in that region, despite other indications that could favor Egypt.

Since the Didache is a compilation from various sources, the question of its date in fact becomes the question of the age of the traditions of which it is composed and the question of the terminus ante quem of the final redaction of the work. For the latter, we align ourselves with A. Adam and J.-P. Audet, who maintain that the whole of the work goes back to the 1st c. With this, we rule out the late dating of the work to the 2nd c. or later, on account of a supposed use by the Didache of the NT writings and, eventually, of the Epistle of Barnabas and the Shepherd of Hermas; it also seems to us difficult to maintain the thesis that would spread the history of the redaction of the Didache over the first two centuries.

A. Harnack, Die Lehre der zwölf Apostel, TU 2,1-2, Leipzig 1884; J.-P. Audet, La Didachè. Instructions des apôtres, Paris 1958; H. Lietzmann, Die Didache mit kritischen Apparat, Berlin [6]1962; R.A. Kraft, Barnabas and the Didache (The Apostolic Fathers, A New Translation and Commentary, III), New York 1965; U. Mattioli, La "Didachè," dottrina dei dodici apostoli, Alba 1969; W. Rordorf - A. Tuilier, La doctrine des douze Apôtres (Didachè), SC 248bis, Paris [2]1998; A. Adam, Erwägungen zur Herkunft der Didache: ZKG 63 (1957) 1-47; A. Vööbus, Liturgical Traditions in the Didache, Stockholm 1968; F.E. Vokes, The Didache - Still Debated: ChQ 3 (1970) 57-62; S. Giet, L'énigme de la Didachè, Paris 1970; K. Niederwimmer, Die Didachè, Göttingen [3]1993; G. Schöllgen, Didachè: Zwölf-Apostel-Lehre, FCh 1, Freiburg 1991; G.N. Jefford (ed.), The Didache in Context, NovTSup 77, Leiden 1995; J.A. Diaper (ed.), The Didachè in Modern Research, AGSU 37, Leiden 1996; G. Visonà, Didachè. Insegnamento degli Apostoli, Milan 2000; H. van de Sanat - D. Flusser, The Didache. Its Jewish Sources and Its Places in Early Judaism and Christianity, Assen - Minneapolis, MN 2002; A. Milavec, The Didache, New York 2003.

W. Rordorf

DIDASCALIA APOSTOLORUM. Extant in its entirety in Syriac, Arabic and Ethiopic, partially in Latin, and in a few Greek fragments, this church order deals principally with the episcopate and with the duties of the bishop. It has been suggested that the overall purpose of the Didascalia is to impose episcopacy and to undermine other forms of leadership, in particular the authority exercised by widows. This may be an overstatement, but certainly part of the redactor's purpose is the consolidation of episcopal authority. In the first edition of this encyclopedia, Nautin suggested that the redactor had used a lost treatise on the threefold order, which was also employed by the redactor of the Apostolic Church Order. This is possible, though it is also possible that this treatise was transmitted to the redactor through the means of the Apostolic Church Order, as there are echoes of that document throughout the treatise.

Although the whole is addressed to the bishops, numerous topics, such as the Pascha, the importance of teaching trades to children and the origin of heresy are included in what is a rambling and contradictory document made up of numerous strata of tradition. Among the tensions within the treatise, we may note contradictory statements on penance and a chaotic chapter on the Pascha that attempts to combine different paschal chronologies, incorporating a document of *Quartodeciman provenance (though here the textual tradition is extremely complex, as there is a large omission in one manuscript, perhaps representing an attempt to rationalize the situation.)

Beyond directing the bishops, the Didascalist is much exercised by Judaizing tendencies within the communities addressed, leading to polemic against those who keep the Sabbath, and a view of the law of the Old Testament as secondary. This indicates a Syrian provenance; a citation by *Aphraates indicates a terminus ad quem of the mid-fourth century, though much of the material may be earlier.

J.V. Bartlet, Fragments of the Didascalia apostolorum in Greek: JTS 18 (1917) 301-309; S. Brock - M. Vasey, The Liturgical Portions of the Didascalia, Bramcote 1928 (bibl.); R.H. Connolly, Didascalia apostolorum, Oxford 1929; E. Tidner, Didascaliae apostolorum, canonum ecclesiasticorum, traditionis apostolicae versiones Latinae (TU 75), Berlin 1963; A. Vööbus, The Didasca- lia apostolorum in Syriac (CSCO 401-402, 407-408), Louvain 1979; C. Methuen, Widows, Bishops and the Struggle for Authority in the Didascalia apostolorum: JEH 46 (1995) 197-213; G. Schöllgen, Die Anfänge der Professionalisierung des Klerus und das kirchliche Amt in der Syrischen Didaskalia (JbAC Ergänzungsband 26), Münster 1998 (bibl.); M. Penn, Bold and Having No Shame: Ambiguous Widows, Controlling Clergy and Early Syrian Communities: Hugoye 4 (2001).

S. Stewart-Sykes

DIDASKALEION. The school we know best from classical antiquity is that of *Alexandria. It is likely that the teaching of *Pantaenus and *Clement did not have the official character attributed to it by *Eusebius (HE VI, 3,1-3 and 8,1-8), and that the real founder of the school, with *Demetrius, was *Origen. During the time of Origen the school was divided, leaving catechesis to *Heraclas and reserving to Origen the most advanced students (Euseb. HE VI, 15). Silent about the succeeding 35 years, Eusebius next mentions Achillas as scholarch (Euseb. HE VII, 32,30). *Philip of Side (PG 39, 229) mentions other scholarchs, but this information must be evaluated carefully: following Origen is Heraclas, then *Dionysius, *Pierius,*Theognostus, and others up to *Didymus. It is hard to say, however, whether the school had an official status. In any event, other independent facts suggest that the didaskaleion existed until the episcopate of *Theophilus, run by persons with ties to both the bishop and the monastic community.

Once Origen moved and settled at Caesarea, he resumed teaching (Euseb. HE VI, 30): *Gregory Thaumaturgus's Address of Thanks to Origen relates his teaching program. At the end of the 3rd c. the school in Caesarea was continued by Pamphilus (Euseb., Mart. Pal. IV, 6; V, 2).

G. Bardy, Aux origines de l'École d'Alexandrie: RecSR 27 (1937) 65-90; Pour l'histoire de l'Ecole d'Alexandrie: RBi 50 (1942) 80-109; E. Prinzivalli, Magister ecclesiae. Il dibattito su Origene fra III e IV secolo, Rome 2002, 33-64

E. Prinzivalli

DIDASKALOS. Teacher of catechumens in the early church. The title was customary in Judaism (Rabbi) for designating the teachers of the Law, interpreters of the Torah. In the gospels it is given to *John the Baptist and Jesus. In the NT and in the apostolic fathers the title is rarely used on its own; at times its use is discouraged (Mt 23:8, 10), and it thus fell rapidly into disuse. On the other hand, the trilogy apostles, prophets and teachers is frequent in Paul (1 Cor 12:29; Eph 4:11), and seems characteristic of the missionary center of *Antioch in the mid-1st c. (Acts 13:1: prophets and teachers, presented as itinerant teachers).

A. Lemaire, Les Ministères aux origines de l'Église, Paris 1971.

E. Prinzivalli

DIDYMUS the BLIND of Alexandria (313–398). Little is known of the life of this prolific 4th-c. writer. According to *Jerome, he was still alive in 393 (Jerome, De vir. ill. 109) and was "83 years old." Palladius says that he visited him "four times in 10 years, and he ended his days aged 85" (Hist. laus. IV, 1). Since Palladius went to *Alexandria in 388 (I, 1), this suggests that Didymus died in 398; he would therefore have been born between 310 (Jerome) and 313 (Palladius). He lost his vision at four (Pal. Hist. laus. IV, 1) or five (Jerome, Chron.); his knowledge thus gives evidence of a prodigious memory. *Rufinus of Aquileia presents him as "the teacher of the ecclesiastical school of Alexandria approved by *Athanasius" (HE II, 7). Rufinus's mention is confirmed by a fragment of Philip of Side, an independent source, which inserts Didymus in a succession of scholarchs of the Alexandrian didaskaleion: despite some plain errors in Philip's list, the convergence of his information with Rufinus's, and that of external verification with Didymus's own works—in particular with the Commentary on the Psalms and that on Ecclesiastes found at *Tura, in which Didymus shows himself to be a typical school teacher and reveals his attachment to the local bishop—favor the acceptance of a continuity of Didymus with the didaskaleion founded by *Origen and linked to episcopal institutions. The fact that Palladius, speaking of his "cell" (Hist. laus. IV,3), suggests that Didymus led a monastic life, does not in the least contradict his role as a teacher of the didaskaleion. Early monasticism, esp. in Egypt, took quite different forms from the literary mythology of withdrawal to the desert, and many monks lived in cities. Even granting that Didymus's audience was largely composed of monks (as was the case with Rufinus and Jerome), this in no way alters his teaching which, like Origen's in the great commentaries, is attentive to the rigorous application of proper exegetical method.

Surviving works. Until recently, only the following works of Didymus were known: (1) a treatise Against the Manichees, preserved in Greek (PG 39, 1088-1109; the preceding part, cols. 1085-1088, is a later addition); (2) a treatise On the Holy Spirit in a Latin translation made by Jerome (PG 39, 1031-1086); (3) fragments of commentaries in the catenae on the Octateuch and Kings (Devreesse, ST 201, 167-173), on Psalms (Devreesse, ST 264, 147-210; Mühlenberg, PTS 16, II), on Proverbs (PG 39), on Job (PG 39), on John (Reuss, TU 89, 177-186), on Paul's epistles to the Romans and to the Corinthians (Staab, Pauluskommen., Münster 1933, 1-44), on Acts (PG 39); (4) a brief commentary on the Catholic epistles, translated into Latin by *Epiphanius Scholasticus at *Cassiodorus's order; some fragments also remain in Greek (PG 39, or Zoepft, Neutestamentl. Abh. IV, 1); (5) many other fragments, esp. in *John of Damascus's Sacra Parallela (CPG 2544); (6) books 4 and 5 added to *Basil of Caesarea's Contra Eunomium (PG 29, 671-768); their attribution to Didymus, initially maintained by Spasskij and Funk, was confirmed in 1937 when J. Lebon found a fragment of them cited under Didymus's name (Muséon, [1937] 61-83). In 1941 an important find of papyri at Tura, near Cairo, gave us other commentaries by Didymus: on Genesis (Nautin-Doutreleau, SC 233 and 244); on Job (Heinrichs - Hagedorn - Koenen, PTA 1-4); on Zechariah (Doutreleau, SC 83, 84, 85); on Psalms (PTA 4,6,7,8,12); and on Ecclesiastes (PTA 9,13,16,22,25). In fact, all of the works found at Tura are anonymous. The attribution of the first three to Didymus does not present problems: attribution of the commentary on Genesis to him is suggested by a comparison with the catena of *Procopius; that on Job by a comparison with the Sacra Parallela and the catena of Nicetas; that on Zechariah by a comparison with Jerome's homonymous work, upon which Didymus's text significantly depends. Difficulties have arisen concerning the last two, however. Both are written in a sloppy style proper to oral address, and for both, comparison with the corresponding catenae, though showing conceptual affinities between the interpretations, contains no passages that can be superimposed linguistically. Further comparison, however, leads to the clear conclusion that both texts are from the same author; the linguistic affinities and the very numerous conceptual parallels, almost paraphrases, would be otherwise inexplicable. The text of the catenae is already polished for publication, whereas that of Tura was produced at a different time, transcribed by a tachygrapher without revision and later recopied; it reproduces Didymus's lectures, including students' questions.

A contested attribution. De Trinitate: In the 18th c. the Mingarelli brothers published under Didymus's name a work in three books on the Trinity, preserved in Greek in a manuscript of the Biblioteca Angelica, Rome; the beginning and end are missing, such that the author's name was lost (PG 39, 269-992). They made use of Socrates (HE IV, 25), who mentions a De Trinitate by Didymus in three books, but the text presents very clear differences of style and substance with respect to the commentaries on Genesis, Job and Zechariah found at Tura (L. Doutreleau: RecSR 45 [1957] 514-557); we must therefore be cautious in attributing this treatise to Didymus. The contrary argument adopted by L. Koenen: Archiv für Papyrusforschung 17 (1960) 83-105, is unconvincing.

Other works mentioned by ancient authors. Didymus himself, in De Spiritu Sancto and in the commentary on Zechariah, and later authors mention many other works composed by him (see Bardy, Didyme l'aveugle and L. Doutreleau, SC 83, 119-126). The most important are a commentary on Isaiah in 24 books (dedicated to Jerome); others on Matthew, John and the Apocalypse; the treatises on the Virtues, on Sects (or ?) on Opinions, on the Son (of God), on the death of children (requested by Rufinus) and an Apologia for Origen's De Principiis.

Didymus, both in his exegesis and his doctrine (the preexistence of souls and apokatastasis), depends closely on Origen, but knew how to rework the latter's thought in light of opponents' objections.

CPG 2544-2572 (see also Supp.); PG 39, 131-1818; L. Doutreleau, Didyme l'Aveugle, Sur Zacharie, SC 83-85, Paris 1962; Kommentar zum Ecclesiastes: PTA 9 (1969), 13 (1970), 16 (1972), 22 (1977); P. Nautin - L. Doutreleau, Sur la Genèse. Texte inédit d'après un papyrus de Toura, SC 233 and 244, Paris 1976 and 1978; E. Staimer, Die Schrift "De Spiritu Sancto" von Didymus dem Blinden von Alexandrien, Munich 1960; A. Gesché, La christologie du "Commentaire sur les Psaumes" découvert à Toura, Gembloux 1962; L. Béranger, Sur deux énigmes du "De Trinitate" de Didyme l'Aveugle: RecSR 51 (1963) 255-267; A. Kehl, Der Psalmenkommentar von Tura, Quaternion IX, Cologne 1964; W.A. Bienert, "Allegoria" und "Anagoge" bei Didymus dem Blinden von Alexandria, Berlin 1972; A. Heron, Studies in the Trinitarian Writings of Didymus the Blind, Diss. Tübingen 1972; J. Tigcheler, Didyme l'Aveugle et l'exégèse allégorique, Nijmegen 1977; M.-J. Rondeau, Les commentaires patristiques du Psautier (III-V siècles), I-II, Rome 1982-1985; M. Simonetti, Lettera e allegoria nell'esegesi veterotestamentaria di Didimo: VetChr 20 (1983) 341-389; Didymiana: VetChr 21 (1984) 129-155; E. Prinzivalli, Didimo il Cieco e l'interpretazione dei Salmi, Rome - L'Aquila 1988; Id., Magister ecclesiae, 33-64; M. Ghattas, Die Christologie Didymus' des Blinden von Alexandria in den Schriften von Tura, Münster 2002; Id., Didimo il Cieco, Lezioni sui Salmi: Il Commento ai Salmi scoperto a Tura, Alba 2005.

E. Prinzivalli

DIGAMY. This term—like trigamy, tetragamy, polygamy—was applied in the primitive church not to simultaneous marriages, but successive. In fact simultaneous marriages could not exist under Roman law, since to contract a new marriage, in itself a sign of the failure of the affectio maritalis, meant the automatic dissolution of the earlier marriage. The term thus indicated marriage after divorce or widowhood. In this sense the second, third or fourth marriage was not condemned, and indeed was rather common among the Romans, in certain cases even imposed (for celibate, widowed or divorced men between 25-60 and without children) by Augustus's matrimonial laws, which also applied to women between 20-50. This was the case until 320 (CTh 8,16,1; but also later under Majorian: Nov. Mai. 6,5), esp. in the case of a husband's death, after a period of mourning of at least ten or twelve months. Even so, in inscriptions the title univira ("woman with one husband") was highest praise. The fact that, except in *Justin, 1 Apol. 15, 3-4, and Athenagoras, Leg. 3, we do not know of cases in which "marriage" after divorce was effectual and certain, whereas a new marriage during widowhood is continually attested (see, e.g., Orig., Frr. 27 and 35 on 1 Cor.; Philosophumena 9,12), does not of itself mean that the practice did not exist in Christianity: there are passages in which the practice is uncertain, which new studies interpret in the sense of a genuine new marriage for divorced people. It is thus difficult to say with certainty who are the digamoi with whom, according to *Nicaea, can. 8, the *Novatianists must reestablish communion. According to Crouzel they would be only those "remarried during widowhood," based on Epiphanius's Panarion 59, without Holl's correction in GCS; accepting the correction, it could also include those "remarried after divorce."

While remarriage after divorce may therefore have been permitted, multiple marriages because of widowhood were punishable in Asia Minor: Laodicea, can. 1; Basil, Epist. 188,4, in which, even though there was a one-year punishment for digamy (two years, according to others), the second marriage was still accepted; the punishment for trigamy, on the other hand, was exclusion from the community for 3-5 years, since such unions could not be considered marriages, but only "limited fornications" (porneia kekolasmenē), in reference to the Lord's words (Jn 4:18); at the same time, they were not condemned more harshly because they were preferable to unlimited fornication (Basil, Epist. 199,50). Elsewhere polygamy was not punished, even if not encouraged: it was reproved as being opposed to the precepts of Gen 2:23-24, and was not justified by the impossibility of observing continence. Arguments advanced by digamists, such as being unable to administer their goods, control their slaves or represent their household in public, were rejected as invalid (Jer., Epist. 123,13; John Chrys., Reg. fem. 7; Non iter. coniug. 4). According to *John Chrysostom, those who have remarried are despised by all (Virg. 37,1). While not condemned without appeal, therefore, but tolerated based on Rom 7:2-3 and 1 Cor 7:39-40, in theory polygamists were absolutely excluded from the clergy, although according to *Jerome the number of remarried bishops in his day was greater than the number of participants at the Council of *Rimini (Epist. 69,2).

H. Crouzel, L'Église primitive face au divorce, Paris 1971; A. Metro, Binas nuptias constituere in D.3.2.1.: Iura 26 (1975) 101-108; G. Cereti, Divorzio, nuove nozze e penitenza nella Chiesa primitiva, Bologna 1977; H. Crouzel, Les digamoi visés par le concile de Nicée dans son canon 8: Augustinianum 18 (1978) 533-545; R. Macina, Pour éclairer le terme digamoi: RSR 61 (1987) 54-73; A. Arjava, Women and Law in Late Antiquity, Oxford 1996.

H. Crouzel - L. Odrobina

DIOCLETIAN, emperor (d. ca. 313). Of very humble Dalmatian origin, Diocletian fought as an officer in the emperor Numerian's army when the latter was killed in 284, at the end of an unfortunate Persian campaign. Diocletian publicly accused the praetorian prefect Aprus of the crime and had him executed, and the soldiers acclaimed him emperor at Chalcedon. The other emperor, Carinus, Numerian's brother, moved against him and defeated him in Pannonia, but was killed by his own soldiers after the battle. Diocletian, remaining sole lord, and appointed his companion-in-arms *Maximian as coemperor in the West, giving him the title of Caesar, in 286 conferring upon him the dignity of Augustus. The organization Diocletian gave to the state (tetrarchy) provided for the subdivision of the empire between four sovereigns (two with the higher rank of Augustus and two with the inferior rank of Caesar), and the introduction of an elective, rather than hereditary, principle of succession. This complex system, which maintained a hierarchy not only between the Augusti and the Caesars, but also between the two Augusti (with Diocletian at the summit of power), was reinforced by a religious aura and organized on the model of the Eastern monarchies: all that pertained to the person of the emperor (dominus noster) and all court institutions had a sacred character. In 287 Diocletian took the title of Iovius, descendent of Jupiter, giving his colleague that of Herculius (i.e., of the stock of Hercules). The two Caesars, Galerius and *Constantius Chlorus, appointed in 293, were each invested with the name of their own Augustus, as if to constitute two dynastic lines of divine descent. None of the sovereigns chose *Rome as a capital: Diocletian's seat was Nicomedia, Maximian's *Milan.

Diocletian's reforms involved nearly every area of state organization: administration, finance, the economy, the army. His notorious persecution was the last systematic sanguinary action against the Christians in Roman imperial history. It took place in the last years of his reign, beginning in 303: the four edicts condemning Christian worship, which were preceded by an anti-Manichean persecution, should be seen as part of an effort to restore the unity of the state, whose religious cohesion was threatened by the incessant progress of Christianity. Diocletian abdicated in 305, forcing his colleague Maximian to do the same. He spent the last years of life at *Salona (near today's Spalato, Split), where the remains of his palace still exist; he returned briefly to public life in 308 in an attempt to restore the tetrarchical order, already in crisis shortly after his abdication.

G. Costa, Diz. Ep. II, 3, Rome 1961, 1793-1908 (= Id., Il Dalmata fatale); W. Seston, Dioclétien et la tétrarchie I, Guerres et réformes, Paris 1946; W. Ensslin, PWK VII A 2, 1948, 2419-2495; S. Mazzarino, L'impero romano, Bari [2]1973, 586-599; on the Diocletianean fiscal reform, see A. Déléage, La capitation du bas-empire, Mâcon 1945; on the persecution, H. Grégoire, Les persécutions dans l'Empire Romain, Brussels [2]1964; T.D. Barnes, New Empire of Diocletian and Constantine, Cambridge 1982; S. Williams, Diocletian and the Roman Recovery, New York 1985; D. Kienast, Römische Kaisertabelle: Grundzüge einer römischen Kaiserchronologie, Darmstadt 1990, 266-271; S. Corcoran, The Empire of the Tetrarchs. Imperial Pronouncements and Government AD 284–324, Oxford 1996; W. Kuhoff, Diokletian und die Epoche der Tetrarchie: das römische Reich zwischen Krisenbewältigung und Neuaufbau (284-313 n. Chr.), Frankfurt am Main 2001.

M. Forlin Patrucco

DIODORE of Tarsus (d. before 394). A native of *Antioch and pupil of *Silvanus of Tarsus and *Eusebius of Emesa, Diodore completed his studies at Athens. A monk and then priest in his city, he had occasion to dispute with the emperor *Julian (362–363). In the Antiochene schism he sided with *Meletius, and with *Flavian he headed the Meletian community after Meletius was exiled—first by *Constantius II and then by *Valens—until he too was exiled to *Armenia (372). After Valens's death he was ordained bishop of Tarsus (378) and played a prominent part in the Council of *Constantinople of 381. He died before 394, when his fame as an exegete and theologian was great. At the time of the *Nestorian controversy, however, he was considered among Nestorius's precursors and was subjected to violent attacks, including some by *Cyril, until he too became involved, though only indirectly, in the condemnation of the *Three Chapters (553).

The condemnation led to the disappearance of all of his writings, which from various sources (*Jerome, Ebedjesu, *Suidas) we know to have been very numerous, and of which only fragments remain, with perhaps one exception (see below). Astronomy was the subject of Against the Astronomers, the Astrologers and Fate and other works (among them one against Aristotle's "fifth substance") against determinism and astral fatalism in defense of divine providence. A great many doctrinal works were directed against pagan philosophical doctrines on God, nature, matter (Against Plato on God and the Gods; On Nature and Matter; On God and the False Matter of the Greeks); against Arians and Macedonians (On the Unity of God; On the Holy Spirit); some addressed other theological problems (On the Resurrection of the Dead; On the Soul). Very important was his Against the Synousiasts, i.e., the Apollinarists, since it was in polemic with them that the Antiochenes most stressed the distinction between divinity and humanity in Christ, thus incurring the charge of Nestorianism ante litteram.

Diodore was the head of an important school of scriptural exegesis and can be considered the true founder of the Antiochene exegetical school. *Theodore of Mopsuestia and perhaps *John Chrysostom were his pupils. We know that he wrote commentaries on a good number of the books of the OT and NT, and a theoretical work On the Difference Between Theory and Allegory. He reacted against what he considered the excessive allegorism of the Alexandrians, proposing a predominantly literal appreciation of the sacred text, without however excluding theoria, i.e., the possibility of seeing some OT episodes as typological and prophetic anticipations of the events of Christ and the church. The few surviving fragments that were known until 1980 show him to be a convinced literalist, with a tendency to highlight the overall meaning of the books he interpreted and to harmonize the interpretation of individual details of the text with these general criteria.

In 1980 publication began of a complete Commentary on the Psalms (Psalms 1–50 and an introduction to Psalm 118), previously unpublished and of disputed attribution. Olivier, the editor, adduces good reasons for sustaining Diodore's authorship. The commentary on the biblical text is conducted according to the typical canons of Antiochene interpretation in a strict sense, which are expounded in detail in the general introduction to the Commentary on the Psalms and in the introduction to Psalm 118.

CPG II, 3815-3822; CCG 6 (Com. Ps. 1-50); Quasten II, 400-404 (bibl.); J. Deconinck, Essai sur la chaîne de l'Octateuque avec une édition des Commentaires de Diodore de Tarse, Paris 1912; K. Staab, Pauluskommentare aus der griechischen Kirche, Münster 1933, 83-112; R. Devreesse, Les anciens commentateurs grecs de l'Octateuque et des Rois (ST 201), Vatican City 1959, 155-167; E. Schweizer, Diodor von Tarsus als Exeget: ZNTW 40 (1941–1942) 33-75; R. Abramowski, Den theologische Nachlass des Diodor von Tarsus: ZNTW 42 (1949) 19-69; G. Bounoure, Eusèbe citateur de Diodore: REG 95 (1982) 433-439; M. Simonetti, Interpretazione delle rubriche e destinazione dei salmi nei "Commentarii in Psalmos" di Diodoro: ASE 2 (1985) 79-92; J.R. Pouchet, Les rapports de Basile de Césarée avec Diodore de Tarse: BLE 1986 (243-272); J.M. Olivier, Un fragment palimpseste du "Commentaire" de Diodore de Tarse sur les Psaumes ("Vindob. Theol. gr. 177," X^{e} s.): RHT 18 (1988), 233-241; S. Zincone, Studi sulla visione dell'Uomo in ambito antiocheno: Diodoro, Crisostomo, Teodoro, Teodoreto, L'Aquila-Rome 1988; J.J. O'Keefe, "A Letter that Killeth": Toward a Reassessment of Antiochene Exegesis, or Diodore, Theodore, and Theodoret on the Psalms: JECS 8 (2000).

M. SIMONETTI

DIOGNETUS, Letter to. A manuscript, conventionally known as MS F, was discovered by chance at *Constantinople ca. 1436. It contained various works, mostly apologetic, five of which were erroneously attributed to *Justin; the last of these erroneously attributed works was entitled To Diognetus. Stephanus, in his editio princeps (1592), was the first to describe it as a letter, probably because it was addressed to a person identified only as Diognetus; in fact the work fits—if only in the broadest sense—in the apologetic tradition, and develops and concludes with an exhortation to embrace the Christian faith.

After various wanderings, MS F—the only witness to To Diognetus—arrived at the Strasbourg Municipal Library, where it remained until it was destroyed in 1870 by a Prussian artillery bombardment. Before its destruction, however, two accurate recensions were made by Cunitz and Reuss, based on MS F.

Structurally, the text of To Diognetus—which has two lacunae, in ch. VII and after ch. X—opens with an introduction in which the author proposes to respond to some questions on Christianity posed to him by the pagan Diognetus; after a rapid and essential refutation of pagan idolatry and the ritualistic practices of Jewish worship (chs. II-IV), he goes on to a positive exposition of the Christian mystery, lived by the faithful in the concrete circumstances of daily life through the testimony of love toward all, even in imminent persecution (chs. V-VI). The author emphasizes the transcendence of revelation and the economy of salvation, which culminates in the incarnation of the Word and his redemptive sacrifice: acceptance of God's saving message is shown by returning his love, imitating his goodness by rejecting all selfishness, oppression and violence, and so establishing already on earth the eschatological atmosphere of the Kingdom of God (chs. VII-X). Ch. VI is deservedly famous: the author presents the life-giving action of Christians in the world, comparing it to the soul's function in the body. The final chapters, XI-XII, which develop a discourse on the Logos and stress the indissoluble unity between knowledge and life through a penetrating allegorical interpretation of Gen 2:9, are considered inauthentic by many scholars, even recent ones, who ascribe them to a later age and a different author; their arguments are neither decisive nor fully convincing, as Marrou validly asserted in his edition of To Diognetus (SC 33 bis, 219ff.). Attempts to identify the work's author or the probably fictitious recipient have been vain; its date of composition is thought to be late 2nd c. or at the latest early 3rd c., perhaps in *Alexandria; Asia Minor or *Rome have also been hypothesized (Norelli).

PG 2, 1168B-1185B. Of fundamental importance is the ed. of J.C.Th. von Otto (Corpus apologetarum christianorum III, Ienae ^{3}1879, 158-210). We also mention those of C.C.J. Bunsen (London 1854), O. von Gebhardt (Leipzig ^{2}1878), J.R. Harmer (London ^{2}1893), F.X. Funk (Tübingen ^{2}1901), J. Geffcken (Heidelberg 1928), E.H. Blakeney (London 1943), H.G. Meecham (Manchester 1949), H.-I. Marrou (Paris ^{2}1965, SC 33bis). Many translations into modern languages exist, e.g., the Eng. and Fr. of the cited eds. of Meecham and Marrou, the Ger. tr. of G. Rauschen (BKV2, 12, Kempten-Munich 1913, 159-173) and the Sp. tr. of D. Ruiz Bueno (BAC 65, Madrid ^{4}1979, 813-860). Italian translations include those of E. Buonaiuti (Rome 1921), G. Bosio (I Padri Apostolici, II, CPS, Turin 1942, 289-333), L. Leone (Lecce 1972), A. Quacquarelli (I Padri Apostolici, CTP 5, Rome ^{2}1978, 353-363), S. Zincone (Rome ^{2}1981), E. Norelli (Letture cristiane del primo millennio 11, Milan 1991). For the ample bibliography on To Diognetus, see in particular the editions of Meecham and of Marrou; we note here some studies more recent than the second edition of Marrou or not reported in it: J.B. Bauer, An Diognet VI: VChr 17 (1963) 207-210; M.G. Mara, Osservazioni sull'"Ad Diognetum": SMSR 35 (1964) 267-279; S. Pétrement, Valentin est-il l'auteur de l'Épître à Diognète?: RHPhR 46 (1966) 34-62; G. Jossa, Melitone e l'A Diogneto: AIIS 2 (1969-70) 89-109; W. Eltester, Das Mysterium des Christentums. Anmerkungen zum Diognetbrief: ZNTW 61 (1970) 278-293; J.T. Lienhard, The Christology of the Epistle to Diognetus: VChr 24 (1970) 280-289; V. Messana, Il topos dell'ironia platonica in Ad Diognetum 1-4: Augustinianum 14 (1974) 489-495; R. Brändle, Die Ethik den "Schrift an Diognet." Eine Wiederaufnahme paulinischer und johanneischer Theologie am Ausgang des zweiten Jahrhunderts, Zürich 1975; A.L. Townsley, Notes for an Interpretation of the Epistle to Diognetus: RSC 24 (1976) 5-20; M. Rizzi, La questione dell'unità dell'"Ad Diognetum," Studia Patristica Mediolanensia 16, Milan 1989; F. Blanchetière, Au cœur de la cité: le chrétien philosophe selon l'à Diognète 5-6, RSR 63 (1989) 183-194; A. Urbán, Concordantia in Epistulam ad Diognetum, Concordantia in Patres Apostolicos I, Alpha-Omega, Reihe A, CXXXV, Hildesheim - Zürich - New York 1993; K. Schneider, Die Stellung der Juden und Christen in der Welt nach dem Diognetbrief: JbAC 42 (1999) 20-41.

S. ZINCONE

DIONYSIUS, pope (259/260?–267/268?). Dionysius was a respected presbyter under *Sixtus II; *Dionysius of Alexandria wrote to him regarding the administration of baptism by heretics (Euseb., HE VII, 5,6). Under *Gallienus, who had restored to the Christians the churches expropriated by *Valerian, Dionysius, himself now a bishop, reorganized the Roman community. At the request of Libyan presbyters, he called a synod which condemned both *Sabellius and the tendency—called *Marcionite—to break the divine monarchy into three *hypostases; he communicated these decisions to Dionysius of Alexandria, accused by the presbyters of tritheism (DS 112-115). The Alexandrian bishop justified his trinitarian theology by further explaining the possible use of ὁμοούσιος, which he had previously rejected (see Athan., Sent. Dion.). According to *Basil (Ep. 70), Dionysius helped the communities of *Cappadocia, devastated by foreign invaders. He never received the letter of the Synod of *Antioch that had condemned *Paul of Samosata (Euseb., HE VII, 7). Not unjustly is he considered one of the most important popes of the 3rd c.

BS 4, 631f.; G.C. Stead, Divine Substance, Oxford 1977, 216-222; W.A. Bienert, Das vornicaenische homoousios als Ausdruck der Rechtgläubigkeit: ZKG 90 (1979) 151-175; Id., Dionysius von Alexandrien, Berlin 1978, esp. 220f.; M. Simonetti, Ancora su homoousios. A proposito di due recenti studi: VetChr 17 (1980) 85-98; L. Abramowski, Dionysius of Rome († 268) and Dionysius of Alexandria († 264/5), in Id., Formula and Context, London 1992, n. 11; G. Schaiger: LTK[3] 3, 246; RGG[4] 2, 863; U. Heil, Athanasius von Alexandrien, De sententia Dionysii: PTS 52, Berlin 1999; LACL (2002) 208. – See studies on Dionysius of Alexandria, such as TRE 8 (1981) 767-771 (bibl.).

B. Studer

DIONYSIUS EXIGUUS (d. ca. 545). A native of the Roman province of Scythia Minor (Dobrudja), Dionysius lived as a monk at *Rome from ca. 500–ca. 545; out of humility, he loved to call himself Exiguus ("the Little"). His friend *Cassiodorus eulogized him in Inst. 1, 23. With a consummate knowledge of Greek and Latin, he was one of the principal mediators of Greek ecclesiastical culture in the West; for his work as translator, canonist and *computist he must be considered one of the founders of medieval culture. Among his translations from Greek into Latin are the Vita Pachomii included in the Vitae Patrum (PL 73, 227-282), the Historia inventionis capitis S. Iohannis Baptistae; *Gregory of Nyssa's De creatione hominis, *Proclus of Constantinople's Tomus ad Armenos; the Epistola Synodica S. Cyrilli et Concilii Alexandrini contra Nestorium and two letters of *Cyril of Alexandria to Bishop *Succensus of Diocaesarea in Isauria, in support of his fellow Scythian monks living at Rome, who defended the *theopaschite formulae. Attribution to Dionysius of the Exempla Patrum, a florilegium of 99 sentences on the theopaschite question, is disputed.

Dionysius's fame in the Middle Ages was linked to his Codex canonum ecclesiasticorum, a collection of Greek and Latin canons, for which he can be considered the founder of Canon Law. According to *Cassiodorus, Inst. I, 23, the collection was made at the request of Bishop Stephen of Salona. In his dedicatory letter Dionysius explains its composition: at the beginning he put 50 apostolic canons, followed by the 165 canons universally recognized by the Greek church, i.e., those of the Councils of *Nicaea, *Ancyra, *Neocaesarea, *Gangra, *Antioch, *Laodicea and *Constantinople; then 27 canons of the Council of *Chalcedon; and finally 20 canons of the Council of *Serdica and 138 of the Council of *Carthage of 419. Under Pope *Symmachus (498–514)—as we deduce from his preface to Julian, presbyter of the church of St. Anastasia—Dionysius brought together "Praeteritorum Sedis Apostolicae praesulum constituta," i.e., the Decretals of popes *Siricius (384–399) and *Anastasius II (496–498). This collection of Decretals was later joined to a second edition of the Codex canonum ecclesiasticorum to form the collection known as the Dionysiana. Finally, commissioned by Pope *Hormisdas (514–523), Dionysius incorporated the Greek synodal canons into a Greek-Latin collection, of which only the preface remains.

Dionysius's work in the field of ecclesiastical computus also aroused great interest: the Libellus de cyclo magno Paschalae, the Argumenta paschalia, the Epistola ad Bonifatium primicerium et Bonum secundicerium de ratione Paschae, all of which effectively contributed to the acceptance of the Alexandrian 19-year Easter cycle in the West. Following Cyril of Alexandria's Easter Table from 532 to 626, he replaced the era of *Diocletian with the Christian era, taking as his starting-point the birth of Christ, which he placed on 25 December of the year 753 from the foundation of Rome; he thus postponed the real date of Christ's birth by at least four years.

Updated bibl. in Patrologia 4, 192; C. Gallagher, Church Law and Order in Rome and Byzantium. A Comparative Study, Brookfield, VT 2002; CPPM III/A 770-775.

V. Loi - B. Amata

DIONYSIUS of Alexandria (d. ca. 265). We know almost nothing of Dionysius's life prior to his election as bishop of *Alexandria in 248. A phrase from one of his letters seems to indicate that he was well off and had a brilliant civil career before entering the clergy (Euseb., HE 7, 11,18); his writings also show that he was educated. *Eusebius says (HE 6, 29,47) that he was a disciple of *Origen, and that before succeeding *Heraclas as bishop, he had succeeded him as head of the city's catechetical school. Whereas Eusebius artificially reconstructs a succession of teachers for the period before Origen, for the period after him, given the multiple attestations concerning the catechetical school and its teachers, a skepticism in principle does not seem to be warranted; the school therefore continued at least until Dionysius.

Events become clearer after his promotion to the episcopate. During the same year a persecution broke out against the Christians in the city, followed in 249 by a civil war and an epidemic; Dionysius, hidden within the city, described the events in various letters. *Decius became emperor shortly thereafter (September 249) and issued an edict ordering all citizens to sacrifice to the empire's gods. Dionysius then left Alexandria to hide in Mareotis, then in the Libyan desert. This flight would cost him—like *Cyprian—an attack by the martyrs, a fact which explains his position in the subsequent controversies. In March 251 two rival bishops were elected at *Rome: *Cornelius, accused of having bought a certificate of sacrifice (libellus) instead of confessing the faith, and *Novatian, who preached severity against those who had been weak in confessing the faith during the persecution; Dionysius declared at once for Cornelius. Another controversy broke out between Cornelius's second successor *Stephen (254–257) and Cyprian of Carthage over the way of readmitting Christians baptized by the *Novatianists to the church: Stephen, more benevolent toward the Novatianists, was content with the imposition of hands, whereas Cyprian considered their baptism null, rebaptizing them. Informed by Cyprian, Dionysius took his side in the many letters he sent to Rome under Stephen and his successor *Sixtus II (257–258).

At the same time as this controversy, another regarding the Trinity arose in the Libyan *Pentapolis, where the bishop of Ptolemais was accused by his colleagues of *Sabellianism. Dionysius's anti-Sabellian intervention led him to be accused by members of his own community of Alexandria to Sixtus's successor *Dionysius of Rome (259–268), who sent to the church of Alexandria a letter against their bishop. Dionysius of Alexandria vindicated himself in a Refutation and apologia in four books, fragments of which were cited by *Athanasius in his treatise De sententia Dionysii. Finally, ca. 265, Dionysius was asked to go to *Antioch to judge the bishop of that city, *Paul of Samosata; he declined the invitation, citing age and infirmity. He died shortly after, in 264 or 265. He is the author of an Easter canon (HE VII, 20) and some lost works, one of which, On the Promises, held that John's Apocalypse was not written by the apostle and evangelist of that name (HE VII, 24-26; III 28, 3-4).

CPG 1550-1610; Catena Hauniensis in Ecclesiasten in qua saepe exegesis seruatur Dionysii Alexandrini nunc primum edita ab Antonio Labate, Turnhout 1992. For Dionysius's life, see Eusebius, Hist. eccl. books VI and VII passim; P. Nautin, Lettres et écrivains chrétiens, Paris 1961, 143-165 (his correspondence with Rome); for his works, W.A. Bienert, Dionysius von Alexandrien (PTS 21), Berlin 1978; M. Sordi, Dionisio di Alessandria e le vicende della persecuzione di Valeriano in Egitto, in Paradoxos politeia, Studi Lazzati, Milan 1980, 288-295; H. Pietras, L'unità di Dio in Dionigi: Gregorianum 72 (1991) 459-490; Id., Il fondamento ecclesiologico della posizione di Dionigi di Alessandria nella controversia battesimale, in Recherches et tradition. Mél. H. Crouzel, Paris 1992, 199-210; A. Labate, Il recupero del Commentario all'Ecclesiaste di Dionigi Alessandrino attraverso le catene bizantine: Koinonia 16 (1992) 53-74; M. Simonetti, Studi sulla cristologia del II e III secolo, Rome 1993, 273-297; Y. Tissot, Le rapt de Denys d'Alexandrie et la chronologie de ses "Lettres festales": RHPhR 77 (1997) 51-65; LACL3 201-203; E. Prinzivalli, Magister Ecclesiae: il dibattito su Origene tra terzo e quarto secolo, Rome 2002, 33-64.

P. Nautin - E. Prinzivalli

DIONYSIUS of Corinth. Our only chronological certainty about this bishop of *Corinth is that he wrote to Bishop *Soter of Rome (166–175). *Eusebius had eight letters written by Dionysius and one addressed to him; he cites or summarizes them in HE 4, 23. They show that Dionysius was consulted by the bishops of *Pontus on the problem of whether converts from every kind of sin should be accepted into the church; Dionysius responded affirmatively. He was denounced to Pope Soter, who reproved him. He then wrote to Soter specifying and defending his positions, adding to his letter those he had written earlier on the same problem—thus these letters survive.

P. Nautin, Lettres et écrivains chrétiens, Paris 1961, 13-32.

P. Nautin

DIONYSIUS of Milan. Bishop of *Milan in 355, when the council was held there in which the anti-*Arian majority yielded to the pressure of the pro-Arians and that of Emperor *Constantius and subscribed *Athanasius's condemnation. Dionysius was among the very few who refused, for which he was deposed—and replaced by *Auxentius—and exiled to *Armenia, where he soon died. *Ambrose, shortly after his election as bishop of *Milan, obtained with *Basil's help the return of Dionysius's relics from *Armenia.

DHGE 14,263; PCBE II/1, 563-565.

M. SIMONETTI

DIONYSIUS (Denis or Denys) of Paris (d. 250?). According to the oldest passio (BHL 2171, ca. 250?) Dionysius was sent to *Gaul by Pope *Clement, St. Peter's successor, to evangelize the people there. He preached at Paris, where he was beheaded, as attested by *Venantius Fortunatus (carm. 11) and *Gregory of Tours (hist. 1,30); the latter, however, puts his martyrdom at the time of *Decius (249–250). The Gallican version of Mart. hier. puts his feast 9 October and makes Rusticus and *Eleutherus his companions in martyrdom. At St. *Geneviève's initiative, in the 5th c. a basilica was built over Dionysius's tomb, in which the Merovingian kings were later buried. A second Passion (BHL 2178), written ca. 800, identified Dionysius with *Dionysius the Areopagite, St. *Paul's disciple (At 17,34), making him a headless martyr—a very popular motif in iconography. In the life (BHL 2175) of Abbot Hilduin (814–840) he was identified with the author of mystical works known as the Areopagite. This life became canonical for the entire Middle Ages, though even then some scholars (e.g., Abelard) had doubts.

BHL 2172-2203; BS 4, 650-661; LMA 3, 1077-1079; BBKL 1, 1325-1326; R.J. Loenertz, La Légende parisienne de S. Denys l'Areopagite: AB 69 (1951) 217-237; M. Zender, Die Verehrung des hl. D. v. P. in Kirche und Volk: Festschrift F. Petri, Bonn 1970, 528-551.

S. SAMULOWITZ

DIONYSIUS of Tell-Mahre (d. 845). *Monophysite (*Jacobite) patriarch. He was a monk of the convent of Qenneshrin until it was burned down by the Muslims (815); he then moved to Kaisun. Ordained deacon, priest and bishop on three successive days, he succeeded Cyriac in 818. The monks of Gubba opposed him for his suppression from the *liturgy of the words "we break the heavenly bread," setting up first Abraham and then Simeon (837) as patriarchs in opposition to him. More than once—even traveling to Baghdad and Egypt—he had to plead the cause of Christians, brutally oppressed by the Muslims. He wrote a Chronicle (lost) in two parts (16 books), covering the years 582–843; we have some direct fragments, citations in Bar-Hebraeus and Michael the Syrian and extracts in the Chronicon of 1234. He died 22 August 845.

R. Duval, La littérature syriaque, Paris 1907 (repr. 1970), 388f.; EC 4, 1670; DHGE 14,310 (with ample bibliography); I. Ortiz de Urbina, Patrologia syriaca, Rome 1965, 220; LTK 3, 404f.

A. DE NICOLA

DIONYSIUS the AREOPAGITE (pseudo) (4th-5th c.).

I. The Dionysian question - II. Surviving works - III. Other writings - IV. Relation to the Platonic tradition and earlier patristics - V. Theology.

I. The Dionysian question. The identity of the author who, under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite—mentioned in Acts 17:34—composed the works known as the Corpus Areopagiticum (or Dionysiacum), is still a mystery. Dionysius the Areopagite was first officially mentioned by the Severian *monophysites and by Bishop *Hypatius of Ephesus at the meeting between *Chalcedonian *Catholics and *Severian *monophysites at *Constantinople in 532: while the Severians appealed to this author to prove the orthodoxy of their doctrine, Hypatius doubted the authenticity of his writings (E. Schwartz, ACO IV 2, 172-173).

Although throughout the Middle Ages the author of the Corpus was effectively venerated as St. Paul's disciple, Hypatius's position was not completely isolated: I. Hausherr has collected evidence of scholars who seem not to have believed that the Corpus belonged to the apostolic age: some unknown 6th-c. authors, along with *Photius, *Aretas, Peter of Damascus, *John of Antioch, *Joseph Hazzaia (8th-c. Syrian writer) and Simeon Petritsi (13th-c. Georgian monk: OCP 2 [1936] 484-490).

It was during the Renaissance, however, that the legend of Dionysius the Areopagite was decisively debunked by Lorenzo Valla and Erasmus. Although apologists for the authenticity of the Corpus have not been lacking from the Renaissance until our own time, esp. among the French (who were compelled to identify the Dionysius the Areopagite of Acts 17:34 not only with the author of the Corpus, but also with the first bishop of Paris), Valla and Erasmus's thesis was adopted and furthered by 17th-c. scholars such as Le Quien, Le Nourry and Daillé, and is now universally accepted. The parallel studies of H. Koch and J. Stiglmayr served, if not to give the author a face, at least to specify his chronology with sufficient approximation. They in fact showed how the part of the fourth chapter of De div. nom. dedicated to the problem of evil depended on Proclus's De malorum subsistentia; the author of the Corpus thus had to be either a contemporary of Proclus (d. 485) or shortly later than him. In another work, J. Stiglmayr further specified the chronology of the Corpus to between 482 (date of the Henotikon) and the early 6th c. (Das Aufkommen der Pseudo-Dionysischen . . . , Feldkirch 1895). It seems valid to conclude that the author of the Corpus was a Syrian Christian who lived long at Athens, where he enthusiastically followed—and was profoundly influenced by—the courses of *Proclus and *Damascius. An indication of his affective ties to Athens is his choice as a pseudonym, among the many options, of the Athenian Dionysius the Areopagite, and that in the titles of his works he calls himself the bishop of Athens. In the 5th c. the Athenian school was frequented by various Syrians: Damascius was from Damascus; Salustius, Odenathus, Uranius, Hilary and Mara were of Syrian origin; Marinus, Proclus's successor, was a Palestinian who abandoned Judaism for Hellenism (Vita Is. 141, p. 196). The author of the Corpus must have been part of this circle.

II. Surviving works. The Celestial Hierarchy, in fifteen chapters, organizes the various categories of angels named by the OT and by St. Paul into a rigid hierarchical system regulated by well-defined laws.

The Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, in seven chapters, describes and allegorically interprets the liturgical functions of initiation into the Christian religion (ch. 2), *Mass and the sacrament of the *Eucharist (ch. 3), the consecration of the unguent (ch. 4) and the various funeral rites (ch. 7); and examines the hierarchical structure of the church, image of the celestial hierarchy (Cael. hier. I, 3,121C2-4). The visible head of the ecclesiastical hierarchy is the bishop (ἱεράρχης), who transmits initiation to members of lower rank, who in turn transmit it to the lowest ranks: these can thus turn toward the higher, as happens in the celestial hierarchy (I, 2,372D-373A); but the true head of every hierarchy, celestial or human, is Jesus (372A, 373B), of whom the bishop is a symbol (V, 5,505B1-3). The church hierarchy occupies an intermediate position between the celestial hierarchy and the "legal" hierarchy of the OT (V, 2,501C-D), and like the celestial hierarchy (Cael. hier. III) carries out the three functions of purification, illumination and initiation; it is composed of three orders of initiators (bishops, priests, ministers) and three orders of initiates (which are, from lowest to highest, the purified, the enlightened and the perfect).

The Divine Names, the longest work of the Corpus, examines in 13 chapters the most important names attributed to the deity by Scripture. Ch. I insists on the absolute transcendence of the deity with respect to all beings, and hence its unknowability and ineffability: the most fitting way to approach it is the via negativa, which consists of depriving it of any possible attribute and thus of all names (I, 5,593C). Ch. II reminds us that the various names examined in the treatise must be referred to all three persons of the Trinity (636C, 652A), and illustrates the two basic concepts of "union" and "distinction." Ch. III emphasizes the importance of prayer (it is like a chain leading human beings to God), and then draws a portrait of ps.-Dionysius's venerated teacher Hierotheus. Ch. IV expounds the first principle as goodness, light, beauty and love, and goes on, closely following Proclus's De malorum subsistentia, to examine the problem of evil, which in an absolute sense does not exist and in a relative sense can only be understood as a partial absence of good. The subsequent chapters examine the other names of the divine emanations: being (ch. V), life (ch. VI), wisdom, intelligence, reason, truth (ch. VII), power, justice, salvation, inequality (ch. VIII), dissimilarity, quiet, movement, equality (ch. IX), omnipotence, "ancient of days," eternity and time (ch. X), peace, expressions such as autozōē, autoeinai, autodynamis, which refer to the first realities emanating from God (ch. XI), "holy of holies," "king of kings," "lord of lords," "God of gods" (ch. XII), and finally perfection and the "one," regarding which the "one" which is above being, identical with the first principle, must be distinguished from the "one being," identical with its emanation (ch. XIII). All these names, present in Scripture and in part in *Plato's Parmenides, are discussed and interpreted according to the canons of the latest stage of *Neoplatonist philosophy, i.e., that of Proclus and Damascius.

The Mystical Theology, in five chapters, is the shortest and, as the title implies, most "mystical" treatise of the Corpus. Ch. I reminds us that union with God is an experience that excludes any sensory or intellectual activity whatsoever (997B, cf. De div. nom. I, 1,588A) and celebrates the via negativa (1000B). Ch. II considers mystical darkness as an expression of ignorance of God, which is one with the highest knowledge of him, and goes on to specify the roles of positive and negative theology: while the former proceeds from the higher to the lower, the latter follows an ascending process from lower to higher (1025A-B). Ch. III interprets entry into darkness as absolute absence of word and thought, characteristic of union with God (1033 B-C). Chs. IV and V (1040D, 1045D, 1048A-B) stress the transcendence of the first principle with respect to every sensible object and intelligible concept.

Of the ten Letters, the first, like the Mystical Theology, makes knowledge of God coincide with ignorance of him; the second places the first principle above the deity and the good; the third specifies that Jesus' divine nature remained hidden even after his incarnation; the fourth says that Jesus incarnate was a real man (1072A), but at the same remained superessential, as his activity demonstrates (1072B): he was God made man; the fifth resumes the theme of divine darkness, into which one who wishes to attain knowledge of God must enter; the sixth exhorts us to remain firm in the truth, without being lost in the refutation of others' errors; the seventh says that demonstration of the truth is itself sufficient to refute contrary theses, and then speaks of the sophist Apollophanes—who seems not to have recognized the presence of the divine law in the universe—and of the eclipse of the sun that occurred at Jesus' death, observed by ps.-Dionysius at Heliopolis; the eighth praises meekness and rebukes the monk Demophilus who, criticizing a priest, failed to respect the church's hierarchical order, in which criticisms can only be leveled by higher members, not lower; the ninth speaks of scriptural symbolism and of the deity that remains transcendent, though manifesting itself to all beings; the tenth predicts the end of St. John the Evangelist's imprisonment at Patmos and his return to Asia.

III. Other writings. In the writings that have reached us, ps.-Dionysius cites other works of his—seven in all—which have not survived: (1) The Intelligible Things and the Things of the Senses (see Eccl. hier. I, 2 [373B], II, III, 2 [397C]); (2) Theological Institutions (see De div. nom. I, 1 [585B], I, 5 [593B], II, 1 [636C], II, 3 [640B], II, 7 [645A], XI, 5 [953B]; Myst. theol. III [1032D]); (3) Symbolic Theology (see Cael. hier. XV, 6 [336A]; De div. nom. I, 8 [597B], IV, 4 [700C], IX, 5 [913 B], XIII, 4 [984B]; Myst. theol. III [1033A-B], Ep. IX, 1 [1104B]); (4) Divine Hymns (see Cael. hier. VII, 4 [212B]); (5) The Angelic Properties and Orders (see De div. nom. IV, 2 [696B]); (6) On God's Judgment (see De div. nom. IV, 35 [736B]); (7) On the Soul (see De div. nom. IV, 2 [696C]). It is difficult to establish whether these are real or fictitious works.

IV. Relation to the Platonic tradition and earlier patristics. The author of the scholium on ps.-Dionysius edited in PG 4, 21D 1-3 was already aware of the very close correspondences, not only doctrinal but also terminological, between Proclus and the author of the Corpus—though he ended by asserting the dependence of the former on the latter. In the modern period, among the many scholars who from the early 19th c. until now have examined the dependency of ps.-Dionysius on the Platonic tradition (and esp. on Proclus's Neoplatonism) we should mention J.G.V. Engelhardt, A. Jahn, H. Koch, J. Stiglmayr, H. Weertz, H.F. Müller, G. della Volpe, R. Roques, M. Schiavone, B. Brons, H.D. Saffrey, S. Gersch, L.H. Grondijs, R.F. Hathaway (the last two have in particular shown the dependency of ps.-Dionysius on Damascius). E. von Ivánka and esp. E. Corsini called attention to the relations between ps.-Dionysius's theology and Plato's Parmenides. To E. Corsini—following up the suggestions of C. Pera—we also owe the discovery of various parallels between the treatment of evil by ps.-Dionysius and *Sallustius's De diis. Recently, S. Lilla revisited the relations between the theology of ps.-Dionysius and that of the author of the fragment of the commentary on the Parmenides edited by P. Hadot and attributed by him to *Porphyry, and also on those between ps.-Dionysius and Damascius (see the article in the volume edited by Y. de Andia, cited in the bibl.). No less important have been the inquiries into the relations between ps.-Dionysius and the Greek patristic tradition, represented by the studies of C. Pera, E.Ch. Puech, V. Lossky, E. von Ivánka and W. Völker, who in an important book examined in depth the dependency of the author of the Corpus esp. on the Alexandrian and Cappadocian Fathers. It is now clear that the Platonic and patristic traditions are equally important for understanding ps.-Dionysius: neither can be ignored or undervalued in favor of the other.

V. Theology.

A. The law of monē, proodos and epistrophē. Monē refers to the absolute transcendence of the first principle: motionless, detached from everything, unalterable and always the same (De div. nom. 9,8,916B), and practically identical with henōsis (De div. nom. 2,4,640D). Proodos indicates its emanation—or overflowing—due to the superabundance of its energy, both when it produces beings by multiplying itself and when it manifests its providence and love toward them: it is thus identified on the one hand with diakrisis, pollaplasiasmos and creative activity, and on the other with πρόνοια and ἔρως (De div. nom. 4,4,712C). Yet proodos in no way alters the stable unity of monē.

Finally, epistrophē means the return of proodos to its original source (De div. nom. 2,11,549B), as well as the conversion of beings—produced by proodos toward the first principle and their tendency to unite to it: well considered, this second aspect of epistrophē is nothing but a particular case of the first, since all beings emanate from the "one" and are thus part of the divine proodos.

While monē is the original source and the point from which emanation starts and to which it returns, proodos and epistrophē represent a genuine cyclical movement of the divine energy that emanates from the transcendent "one" and returns to it (De div. nom. 4,14,712D-713A). These three moments were already fundamental in Neoplatonism.

B. "Unions" and "distinctions." These two basic concepts are widely illustrated in the second chapter of the Divine Names. On a more general level, while union (henōsis) refers to the deity considered in his absolute transcendence (monē) distinction (diakrisis) regards his emanations (proodoi), manifestations (ekphanseis) and multiplications (pollaplasiasmoi), which produce the various real existents. Nevertheless, "union" and "distinction" in turn admit, each on its own account, other "unions" and "distinctions": in the "union" represented by the absolutely transcendent deity, while the "unions" are the common property of all three persons that compose the deity, the "distinctions" are grounded on the three persons of the Trinity, which admit no confusion either between themselves or between their roles.

C. Negative and positive theology in relation to the application to the deity of the first two hypotheses of Plato's Parmenides. Ps.-Dionysius uses both "negative theology"—denying the first principle every possible attribute (apophatic method)—and "positive theology," which attributes every property to the deity (cataphatic method). Negative theology appears in Cael. hier. II, 3,140D; De div. nom. I, 5,593C; I, 6,596A; XIII, 3,980D, 981A; Myst. theol. I, 1, 1000 A; II, 1025A; positive theology in De div. nom. I, 5,593D; I, 6,596B; both methods are used simultaneously in De div. nom. I, 5,593C-D; I, 6,596A-B and considered equally legitimate in Myst. theol. I, 2,1000 B. According to ps.-Dionysius, the two "ways" do not contradict one another: whereas negative theology considers the deity in his absolute transcendence (monē) and stresses his difference from beings, positive theology considers it as the cause of all beings, i.e., the principle from which all beings emanate by virtue of proodos and in which they are thus potentially contained. Whereas positive theology, through proodos considers the descending process from the deity to beings, negative theology rises from beings to the first principle, which remains always detached from them. These two methods also explain how the deity can be simultaneously nameless and the object of all possible names—a doctrine also found in the Corpus Herm. V, 10. Strictly connected to the adoption of the two "theologies" is the application to the deity of negative and positive concepts characteristic, respectively, of the "one" of the first and second hypotheses of Plato's Parmenides, which, first by the Neopythagoreans and then by the various exponents of Neoplatonism, was given a theological-metaphysical interpretation and thus became the basis of the theology of Neoplatonism. Apart from chs. IX and X of the Divine Names, in which the positive concepts are those that characterize the "one" of the second hypothesis of the Parmenides, ps.-Dionysius takes up the negative conclusions of the first hypothesis in De div. nom. I, 5,593A-B; II, 11,649C4-6; V, 4,817D; XIII, 3,981A (cf. Parm. 141e, 142 a); and the positive conclusions of the second hypothesis in De div. nom. V, 8,824A (cf. Parm. 155d); and makes simultaneous use of both hypotheses in De div. nom. V, 10,825B and VII, 3,872A.

D. The superiority of negative theology. Though recognizing the legitimacy of both theologies, ps.-Dionysius seems to consider "negative theology" more suited to the absolutely unknown nature of the first principle: in Cael. hier. II, 3, 140D 6-7, he says that it is a more appropriate method; and in De div. nom. XIII, 3,981D, he recalls with approval the preference accorded to the negative procedure by the "theologians" who taught him. Proclus too preferred this procedure and, like ps.-Dionysius, identified it with the ascending process (Th. plat. 2,5: II, 38,19-21). The via negativa is one of the main characteristics of the theology of the whole Platonic and patristic tradition. Ps.-Dionysius's words in Cael. hier. II, 3 140D 5-6, "which designate not what is, but what is not," should be compared with *Clement of Alexandria, Strom. V, 71,3 (CGS II, 374, 13-15) and with Plotinus, Enn. V, 3,14 (V, 68,6-7 Bréhier).

E. The absolute transcendence of the deity. The natural consequence of the application of the negative concepts of the first hypothesis of the Parmenides to the divine monē is the stress put on the transcendence of the first principle. The most characteristic motifs of the Pseudo-Dionysian doctrine of divine transcendence are these: God is formless and untouchable; he is above all beings; he is unlike any being; he is above being; he is a nonbeing; he is above mind; he is above thought and knowledge, and is thus absence of thought and unknowable; the knowledge that we can have of him is the same as ignorance; he is above words, and so ineffable, without names and above every name: he is above every state (including those of quiet and movement) and every affirmation and negation; he is above infinity and limit; he is at the same time identical to infinity in a threefold sense (because he includes everything potentially in himself, because he is provided with an infinite number of creative powers, and because he is unknown); he is above time and eternity. The listed doctrines go back—with the exception of the penultimate, which derives from Neoplatonism and from *Gregory of Nyssa (see S. Lilla, JTS n.s. 31 [1980] 98-103)—to some passages in certain Platonic dialogues (Festugière, La révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste, Paris 1954, IV, 79-81); the doctrine of God's unnameability has been influenced by certain passages of Scripture (Ex 6:3; Eph 1:21; Phil 2:9). The same doctrines, therefore, characterize the theology of the whole subsequent Platonic tradition—until the last, Neoplatonism—and that of Philo and the Greek patristic tradition.

F. The immanence of the deity in the universe. If, considered in its monē, the deity remains absolutely transcendent, considered in its emanation (proodos)—which is both providential and creative—it pervades everything, reaches all beings and is therefore immanent in the universe (see, e.g., Cael. hier. 1,1, 12B 4). This emanation—which becomes a genuine "transmission" (diadosis, chorēgia)—comes about as a result of the overflowing (ekblyzein, hyperblyzein) of the infinite power (dynamis) of which God is immeasurably full (Cael. hier. IV, 1,177 C 13-14; De div. nom. VIII, 8,892B1 etc.). The doctrine of the divine power that pervades (diēkei) the universe and holds it together (synēchei) is characteristic of Stoicism and is also found in *Hellenistic Judaism, *Middle Platonism, *Neoplatonism and *Gregory of Nyssa. The idea of the immeasurably full divine principle whose infinite power overflows of its own accord, originating the emanation that reaches everywhere, is typically Neoplatonic.

G. The characteristics of God's creative work. The first principle contains a priori, in its ineffable unity, the totality of beings. This idea is expressed by the terms proēchei, prolambanei prolēptikē, perilēptikē. This is equivalent to saying that all beings already exist a priori either in the first principle (prophestēkota; see, e.g., De div. nom. VII, 2,869B 13) or as ideas (logoi or thelēmata) in its most universal emanation, being (De div. nom. V, 8,824C 6-15). The deity produces (paragei) beings by making them proceed from its own essence, in which they are originally contained: this occurs because the activity that produces beings is one with the divine emanation (proodos), which for this reason is called ousiopoios (see, e.g., De div. nom. V, 9,825A 6). Despite, however, this infinite multiplication or subdivision of the divine proodos, the original source—corresponding to monē—suffers no alteration or diminution either in its superessential unity or in its superabundant energy, remaining always the same in its unmoving identity (e.g., De div. nom. II, 11,649B 6-7; 9-11; 12-14).

H. The three persons of the Trinity. The superessential unity of the first principle comprehends in itself, in a manner that surpasses human understanding, the persons of the Trinity who, as we have seen, represent the diakrisis at the heart of the transcendent deity's henōsis; while remaining clearly distinct and admitting no reciprocity or confusion between their roles (640C, 641A 12-13, 641D), the three persons nonetheless exist in one another in such a way as to form a higher unity, just as the lights of different lamps merge into one light. Other important themes of ps.-Dionysius are the laws that regulate the angelic hierarchy and, by reflection, that of the church; the doctrine of evil; symbolism; the language of mystery; mysticism. A specific treatment of these can be found in my essay in Augustinianum 22 (1982) 533-577.

CPG 6600-6635; PG 3, 119-1120; SC 58 bis, Paris [2]1970 (Coel. hier. with Fr. tr.); PTS 33 Berlin 1990 (Suchla), 36 Berlin 1991 (Heil, Ritter); S. Lilla, Il testo tachigrafico del De divinis nominibus (Vat. gr. 1809): ST 263, Vatican City 1970; Fr. tr.: M. de Gandillac, Paris 1943; Eng.: J. Parker, London - Oxford 1897; It.: E. Turolla, Padua 1956; S. Lilla, Rome 1986 (Ger. cel., Teol. mist., Lettere), Rome 2002 (Ger. eccl.); P. Scazzoso, Milan 1981; S. Lilla, Introduzione allo studio dello Ps. Dionigi Areopagita: Augustinianum 22 (1982) 533-577 (with ample bibliography); DSp 3,244-322; RAC 3,1075-1121; DHGE 14,265-310; H. Koch, Philologus 54 (1895) 438-454; Id., Ps. Dionysius Areopagita in seinen Beziehungen zum Neuplatonismus und Mysterienwesen, Mainz 1900; J. Stiglmayr, HJ 16 (1895) 253-273; C. Pera, Denys le mystique et la Théomachie: RSPhTh 25 (1936) 1-75; A. van den Daele, Indices pseudo-Dionysiani, Louvain 1941; R. Roques, L'univers dionysien, Paris 1954 (repr. Paris 1983); W. Völker, Kontemplation und Ekstase bei Pseudo-Dionysios Areopagita, Wiesbaden 1958; E. Corsini, La questione areopagita: Contributi alla cronologia dello Pseudo-Dionigi: AAT 93 (1958/59) 28-227; Id., Il trattato De divinis nominibus dello ps. Dionigi e i commenti neoplatonici al Parmenide, Turin 1962; P. Scazzoso, Ricerche sulla struttura del linguaggio dello Pseudo-Dionigi Areopagita, Milan 1967; R.F. Hathaway, Hierarchy and the Definition of Order in the Letters of pseudo-Dionysius, The Hague 1969; B. Brons, Gott und die Seienden. Untersuchungen zum Verhältnis von neuplatonischer Metaphysik und christlicher Tradition bei Dionysius Areopagita, Göttingen 1976; S. Lilla, Terminologia trinitaria nello Pseudo-Dionigi l'Areopagita. Suoi antecedenti e sua influenza sugli autori successivi: Augustinianum 13 (1973) 609-623; C.A. Bernard, Les formes de la théologie d'après le pseudo-Denys l'Aréopagite: Gregorianum 58 (1978) 39-69; S. Gersch, From Iamblichus to Eriugena. An Investigation of the Prehistory and Evolution of the Pseudo-Dionysius Tradition, Leiden 1978; C.A. Bernard, La doctrine mystique de Denys l'Aréopagite: Gregorianum 68 (1987) 523-566; A. Louth, Denys the Aréopagite, London 1989; S. Lilla, Denys l'Aréopagite (Pseudo), in Dictionnaire des philosophes antiques, II, Paris 1994, 727-742; Id., in G. Bosio - E. Dal Covolo - M. Maritano, Introduzione ai Padri della Chiesa (secoli V-VIII), Turin 1996, 177-222 (with bibl. updated to 1992); Y. de Andia, Henosis: l'union à Dieu chez Denys l'Aréopagite, Leiden 1996; Y. de Andia (ed.), Denys l'Aréopagite et sa postérité en Orient et en Occident, Actes du colloque international, Paris, 21-24 septembre 1994, Paris 1997; Patrologia V, 135-143; S. Lilla, Dionigi l'Areopagitae il Platonismo cristiano, Brescia 2005.

S. Lilla

DIONYSIUS the AREOPAGITE (pseudo), (apocryphal). In the corpus Dionysiacum are ten letters, including those addressed to *John the Theologian, to *Timothy and to *Polycarp. We also have the letters ascribed by Dionysius to Titus on the death of the apostles Peter and Paul (CANT 197), and another in Armenian to Titus on the transitus of Mary (CANT 164). In the 7th c. an autobiography of Dionysius was written in Greek; a clever child, he was miraculously saved from being sacrificed to the gods; after a great career, while traveling in Syria he had a vision at Heliopolis of the astronomical phenomena that accompanied Christ's passion; 14 years later he met Paul, who preached Christ, and Dionysius converted. The author seems only to have known ps.-Dionysius's letters and the spurious letter to Apollophani (PG 3, 1119-1122); his astronomical information was taken from an anonymous treatise preserved in *Coptic. The autobiography was very popular in the ancient world: the Greek original is lost, but Arabic, Armenian, Coptic, Georgian and Syriac versions exist; the work has no particular historical or literary value.

CPG 6633. Versions: Syriac (BHO 255.3) - M.A. Kugener, OrChr 7 (1907) 292-348; Arabic - P. Peeters, Al-Maʿšriq 12 (1909) 118-127; Lat. tr. from the Arabic text: AB 29 (1910) 302-322, esp. 306; Graf 1,268 n.; Coptic (fragments, BHO 255.2); E.O. von Lemm, Eine dem Dionysius Areopagita zugeschriebene Schrift in koptischer Sprache: Bulletin de l'Académie Imperiale des Sciences de St. Pétersbourg 5,12,3 (1900) 267-306; Georgian - P. Peeters: AB 39 (1921) 293-313.

M. Starowieyski

DIONYSIUS the ROMAN DEACON. Lived at *Rome between the 5th and 6th c. and practiced medicine without pay, even after being imprisoned by the *Goths (perhaps *Alaric's *Visigoths in 410 or *Totila's *Ostrogoths in 546).

ICR, II, 93, n. 63; 106, n. 49; PLRE II, 363; PCBE II/1, 570.

P. Marone

DIOSCORUS, martyr. Commemorated 18 May in Mart. hier., 13 October in Synax. Eccl. CP, the saint is the subject of a Passio that has reached us in Latin, Greek (4th c.) and Syriac (5th/6th c.) redactions; the latter two, both fragmentary, derive from a trustworthy contemporary document. From the acts we learn that Dioscorus, a councilor at Cynopolis, appeared before Culcianus, prefect of Egypt, and was beheaded in 305/307 at *Alexandria. Some have mistakenly tried to see in Dioscorus the interpretatio christiana of the pagan Dioscuri.

BHL 2203e-f; BS 4, 662-663; E. Tisserant, Une version syriaque de la Passion de S. Dioscore: AB 39 (1921) 333-344; Oxyrhynchus Papyri 50 (1983) 22-24.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

DIOSCORUS, pope (d. 530). Before his death Pope *Felix IV (526–530) nominated the deacon *Boniface as his successor, conferring upon him the episcopal pallium. The Byzantine party, however, succeeded in installing the Alexandrian deacon Dioscorus, who had previously been an effective diplomat, in his place. Most of the Roman clergy adhered to this new designation, although it was contrary to the will of the people: precisely for this reason Dioscorus is considered more of an antipope. His pontificate remains historically irrelevant, however, because of its brevity: only 22 days, from 22 September to 14 October 530, the date of his death.

LP I, XL, 46, 100-102, 106, 270, 281, 287 and 542; Collectio Avellana, O. Guenther (ed.), Pragae . . . 1898, CSEL 35/2, 594-599, 607-610, 618-621, 627-632, 636f., 641f., 649f., 652-654, 671-673, 675-692 and 694; E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums, II, Tübingen 1933, 116, 119, 151, 155f., 159, 161f., 164, 167f., 170, 177f., 195ff. and 200; E. Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire, II, Paris . . . 1949, 139, 227, 232, 330 and 342; DHGE 14, 507-508; K. Khella, Dioskoros I. von Alexandrien (444-454). Theologie und Kirchenpolitik, I-III, Hamburg 1981–1983; II, 9-282; III, 13-111; LTK[3] 3, 250 (G. Schwaiger); EPapi I, 495-499 (G. Braga).

M. Spinelli

DIOSCORUS of Alexandria (d. 454). As archdeacon of the church of *Alexandria he accompanied his bishop, St. *Cyril, to the Council of *Ephesus. He succeeded Cyril in 444, striking harshly at his closest collaborators. Invited by *Theodosius II to preside over the other Council of Ephesus (449), he supported the *archimandrite *Eutyches against *Flavian of Constantinople, provoking the violence that earned the assembly the name of latrocinium. After Theodosius's death, *Pulcheria and *Marcian assembled at *Chalcedon the fourth ecumenical council (451) which, in its third session, anathematized Dioscorus. Exiled to Asia Minor, Dioscorus died at *Gangra 4 September 454, venerated as a saint by the non-Chalcedonian churches. A year later the deacon *Theognostus composed his *panegyric.

CPG 5441-5473; EC 4,1681f.; LTK 3,409-410; CE 4,879; DHGE 14, 508-514; RGG[4] 2, 864-865; F. Hasse, Patriarch Dioskur von Alexandria nach monophysitischen Quellen (Kirchengeschichtliche Abhandlungen 6), Breslau 1908, 141-233; J. Lebon, Le monophysisme sévérien, Louvain 1909, 84-93; J. Lebon, Autour du cas de Dioscore d'Alexandrie: Muséon 59 (1946) 515-528; Grillmeier 1, 523-529.

D. Stiernon

DIOSPOLIS, Council of. At Diospolis, a city in *Palestine identified with Lydda, Bishop *John of Jerusalem presided over a council in 415 at which *Pelagius and the deacon Anianus were present. Bishop Eros of *Arles and Bishop Lazarus of Aix, both expelled from their sees, were in Palestine and had compiled a summary of Pelagius's errors, adding to it those of his disciple *Celestius, but could not be present at the council for health reasons. The charges, drawn up in Latin by the Gallic bishops, were read at the Synod, not in full, but translated and summarized in Greek. After discussing marginal points of Pelagius's doctrine (knowledge of the law; the promise of the kingdom of heaven to the OT righteous; holiness present in the church), they confronted the main theses of freedom and impeccantia, which required a deeper investigation. With regard to the proposition omnes voluntate propria regi ("we are all led by our own will"), Pelagius specified that he did not deny God's help when human beings chose good, or God's abandonment when they chose evil. He made Celestius responsible for certain propositions attributed to him, e.g., that God gives grace in proportion to human merits. On impeccability, Pelagius said that holiness was attainable through grace and accessible to human efforts. Finally, with the council fathers, Pelagius condemned the theses already marked out by the church of *Africa and was thus declared to be in communion with the church. *Jerome considered the council "miserable."

Augustine, De gestis Pel.; C. Iulian. I, 32; De pecc. origin.; Orosius, Liber apol. 6; Mansi IV, cols. 311-315; Hfl-Lecl II, 1, 178f. and 183; G. de Plinval, Pélage. Ses écrits, sa vie et sa réforme, Lausanne 1943, 284-292; Palazzini 2, 265-267; de Plinval, Le lotte del pelagianesimo, in Fliche-Martin, IV, 123-125.

C. Nardi

DIPTYCH

I. Archaeology - II. Ecclesiastical use.

I. Archaeology. Etymology reveals its form: δὶς πτύσσειν, to fold twice. A diptych is essentially two tablets or valves joined so as to fold together. From the start it was a deluxe variant on the ordinary wax tablet; the inner faces, smooth and wax-covered, were used for writing, the outer were often decorated in relief or embossed. Wide diffusion is attested in the later imperial age, when it became more and more common for ordinary consuls to give writing tablets as gifts to illustrious persons; the custom should also be referred to the more restricted circle of the emperor. This characteristic, in this particular period, made the diptych a useful vehicle for understanding court art, heavily influenced by the classicism (and hence conservatism) expressed by and for the ruling class. Having become an instrument of political propaganda, its use was limited by a regulation of 384 (CTh XV, 9,1), which allowed the right to possess diptychs only to those of consular rank; this is indirect evidence of their wide diffusion in the course of the 4th c.

Generally speaking, we can divide diptychs into consular and private: the former are easily recognizable, since the consul appears on the outside of the valves, shown with the attributes of his dignity (dress, insignia, sella curulis, pose, etc.); the latter, with various subjects on the valves, were often shown to belong to great private familiae by inscriptions on a scroll. Both these types might pass into the third category, that of ecclesiastical diptychs, which could either be given to the church or made expressly by or for it. One of the most celebrated examples is that of Nicomachi and the Symmachi, dated late 4th c.: it is classicizing in the profiles of the images depicted, and simultaneously pictorial—following contemporary taste—in the details of the subsidiary decoration, informed by meticulous style and negative relief. More precisely datable are those of Anicius Probus, consul in 406, and Felix, consul in 420, where the pictorial aims of contemporary plastic art, very evident in the diptychs of Basil (480) and Boethius (487), are more clearly seen. In the 6th c. output does not seem to decline in relation to the augmented prestige of certain familiae of noble rank. Numerous replicas of the diptychs of Areobindus (506), scattered in various collections, reveal—behind the formal aspect linked to the artistic milieu of *Constantinople—the vehicles of Byzantine propaganda in the West.

The diptych of Anastasius Paulus Probus Sabinianus (517) is part of the same cultural trend as that of Flavius Strategius Apion (539) in the *Justinian period. This output, which keeps in mind the official iconography, is accompanied from the end of the 4th c. by diptychs with more properly Christian scenes. Chronological definition is more difficult for these latter, since we often have to refer to stylistic and iconographical criteria rather than to objective data. Jesus Christ, the apostles, figures of saints or esp. venerated persons, OT and NT scenes, represent the privatization of the sacred images that accompanied the consular images on the ivory valves; they document the religious culture, as well as the superstitions, of the new ruling class. After the great flowering of the 4th–6th c., it cannot be said that the use of the diptych declined; indeed, it lasted far into the Dark and Middle Ages, though conceptually far removed from the motifs that marked its greatest period.

G. Bovini, s.v. Dittico: EC 1, 1760–1761; W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters, Mainz 1952; RAC 3,1138-1149; R. Bianchi Bandinelli, Roma, la fine dell'arte antica, Milan [2]1976; for the diptych's particular value as a vehicle of propaganda, in general, E.A. Havelock - J.P. Hershbell, Arte e comunicazione nel mondo antico. Guida storica e critica, Rome-Bari 1981; A. Cameron, Pagan ivories, in Symmaque à l'occasion du mille-six-centième anniversaire du conflit de l'autel de la Victoire, F. Paschoud (ed.), Paris 1986, 41-72; C. Bertelli, Gli avori tardoantichi, in 387 d.C.: Ambrogio e Agostino. Le sorgenti dell'Europa, Milan 2003, 173-178.

U. Broccoli

II. Ecclesiastical use. Diptychs also entered the sphere of the church as catalogs of dead and living persons, who were remembered during the celebration of the *liturgy, esp. in the eucharistic synaxis (Cyr. of Jer., Cath. myst. 5,8-10; Epiph., Panarion 75,3: PG 43, 508A; Liturg. of St. Jas.: PO 26,212.12, and in general almost all the citations in this article). They were indicated by various terms, the most common being tabellae, codices, and esp. diptyca, which became a technical term.

Included in such catalogs were the names of martyrs, founders of churches, benefactors, bishops who succeeded one another in a see, other bishops of the province or bishops with whom they were in communion (esp. the pope), and the name of the emperor. So, some names were fixed according to the various churches, while others changed with the times (i.e., those of living people). The diptychs were subject to continual growth: e.g., the list of the bishops of a see. The lists of baptizands or of the newly baptized, however, should not be considered true diptychs (see Cyr. of Jer., Procath. 1; Catech. 3,2; Greg. of Nys., Bapt.: PG 46, 417; Ambr., In Lc. IV, 76; Counc. of Arles I, can. 13).

*Cyprian already attests a tradition of praying for the dead (Ep. 1,2), and in particular took great care to draw up lists of those who had died for the faith, to commemorate them (Ep. 12,2), since there was a firm conviction that "the prayer of that holy and awesome sacrifice is of great benefit to those for whom it is offered" (Cyr. of Jer., Cath. myst. 5,8).

The inclusion of the names of living persons arose from the same conviction that prayer benefited them too, but it acquired another, deeper meaning: it expressed the communion that existed in the Christian community, even among persons far away from each another. *Dionysius the Areopagite observed: "We exchange the holy kiss, and we make the mysterious and superterrestrial recitation of the names written on the tablets. Nor indeed is it possible for those divided from one another to be united with the One and participate in the pacific unity of the One" (Ecc. hier. III, 3,8: PG 3, 437A). The scholiast on Dionysius's text notes that "at that time they read only the tables of the dead; not, as now, those of the living too" (PG 4, 145A).

For this reason, for the living or the dead to have their nomen in sacris diptycis scriptum (Facundus of Her., Defens. 4,1: PL 67, 608) was a sign of communion with the persons named and a judgment of their orthodoxy (hence it was sometimes called the liber vitae). When communion was entered with the bishops of another episcopal see, the act of nomen in diptyca recipere was performed (Rusticus, ACO I, 4 p. 90.2; cf. Theodoret, HE 5,34,12; Atticus, Ep. 75 [among Cyril's letters]: PG 77, 352B; Coll. cum don. 230: SC 224, 1170; Counc. of Chal., Acta 13, ACO II, 1.3, 49.36). Conversely, the removal of a name from the diptychs was a sign of condemnation (Justinian, Conf.: PG 86, 1027C; Theodore Lect., fr.: PG 86, 220B; Evagr., HE 3,34: PG 86, 2674AB). This inclusion or removal could also be effected retrospectively, so that bishops judged to be heretics were removed and in some cases no longer read in later centuries (Facundus of Her., Defens. 4,1: PL 67, 609; Mansi 8,1044 and 1051f.; cf. DACL 4, 1054).

During the 5th- and 6th-c. christological disputes, the inclusion or exclusion of names in the diptychs gave rise to conflicts. The exclusion of a bishop's name from the diptychs was an indication of the separation of churches and also of the excommunication of a prelate. Indeed, it was assumed that even the names of the ecumenical councils were included as a sign of their acceptance, as in the case of John of Constantinople, who was requested to include in the diptychs the names of his predecessors *Euphemius and *Macedonius, of Pope *Leo I and of the four ecumenical councils (Mansi 8,1044 and 1051f.; cf. JTS 12 [1911] 386f.).

The moment and the manner of reading the diptychs by the deacon during the liturgical celebration were different in the various churches and within the same church, changing over time in some cases; *Jerome, for the 4th c., writes that publice diaconus in ecclesia recitat offerentium nomina (In Ezech. 4,18: PL 25, 175).

A.F. Gori, Thesaurus Veterum Diptychorum Consularium et Ecclesiasticorum, 3 vols., Florence 1759; E. Bishop, Liturgical Comments and Memoranda: JTS 11 (1910) 67-73; 12 (1911) 384-413; DACL 4,1045-1094; EC 1, 1760-1761; RAC 3,1138-1148; Du Cange, Glossarium mediae et infimae latinitatis, s.v.; ODB 1,636-638; LMA 3,1101-1103; RBK 1,1068-1975; S. Salaville, Une mention de Saint Augustin dans les diptyques de la liturgie grecque de Saint Jacques: L'année théologique 11 (1950) 52-56; M. McCormick, A Liturgical Diptych from Coptic Egypt in the Museum of Fine Arts: Muséon 94 (1981) 47-54; J.M. Sansterre, Où le diptyche consulaire de Clementinus fut-il remployé à une fin liturgique?: Byzantion 54 (1984) 641-647; R.F. Taft, A History of the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom, IV: The Diptychs, OCA 238, Rome 1991; D. Kinney, The Iconography of the Ivory Diptych Nichomachorum-Symmachorum: JbAC 37 (1994) 64-96; J.-C. Picard, Le souvenir des évêques. Sépultures, listes épiscopales et culte des évêques en Italie du Nord des origines au Xᵉ siècle, Rome 1988; A. Camplani - A. Martin, Lettres festales et listes épiscopales dans l'église d'Alexandrie et d'Egypte. A propos de la liste épiscopale accompagnant la première lettre festale de Cyrille d'Alexandrie conservée en copte: JJP 30 (2000) 7-20.

A. Di Berardino

DISCIPLESHIP. See *CATECHUMENATE — DISCIPLESHIP

DISCIPLINA ARCANI (Discipline of the Secret). The term refers to elements of certain Christian rituals and the teaching about them that are deliberately shrouded in *mystery: this esp. regards *baptism and the *Eucharist and the formulas associated with them, such as the Our Father (see *Lord's Prayer) and the creed (traditio and redditio Symboli). The discipline is considered an aspect of Christian *catechesis, proposed for pedagogical reasons to safeguard the sublimity and venerable nature of the doctrine conveyed against a devaluation due to its being too widely known or its being confused with other, competing, *pagan rituals. This explains the development of this discipline esp. during—and not beyond—the 4th c., contemporaneously with the growing spread of Christianity and the institutionalization and ritualization of the catechumenate. In fact, traces of a teaching for initiates, influenced by *Judaism, are already present in certain sayings of Jesus (e.g., Mt 13:11; Lk 8:10), of Paul (e.g., 1 Cor 2:6ff. and 3:1-2), and esp. in the Apocalypse and apocrypha.

Reserve regarding certain notions concerning the Christian mysteries is also attested in the Apostolic Tradition* (21, 3rd c.?). In the *Alexandrian tradition and elsewhere an ascent to Christian knowledge by degrees is theorized. *Clement of Alexandria, referring to 1 Cor 3, distinguishes common faith from perfect knowledge (or "gnostic perfection"), not immediately accessible (e.g., Strom. V 26,1.5). *Origen also refers to Paul (1 Cor 2:6) to justify the transmission of the divine mysteries exclusively to those advanced in the faith, and he thus refutes *Celsus, for whom an initiation only for the pure should be the case only in the pagan mystery cults, whereas sinners of every kind are called to Christian worship (Cels. III 59-62).

The disciplina arcani was in fact influenced by the *Hellenistic mystery cults, the principal medium through which the vocabulary and practice of secrecy in religious ritual reached Christianity, as a protection from profane external intrusions. Traces of esotericism were frequent in the *Late Antique Greco-Roman religious world and were often seen as a means of attraction. Thus in the Christian setting we find the insistence on the duty to maintain secrecy concerning the ritual and meaning of baptism and the Eucharist, which seem to have been celebrated behind closed doors in the evening or at night (Cyril Hier., Catech. 1,1; Ambr., Myst. 2, 5; Chrys., Hom. in Mt 23, 3). *Basil of Caesarea emphasized both the value of the truths of the faith and that the rites be conveyed orally, and thus to be reserved in a halo of mystery and hiddenness (e.g., the sign of the *cross, the words of the *epiclesis in the consecration of the eucharstic *bread and *chalice, the blessing of the baptismal *water and *oil, and various details of the administration of that sacrament; see Spir. 27,66). A *mystagogy is needed for the penetration of these *mysteries, like that in the baptismal catecheses of *John Chrysostom (e.g. Ad Illum. 1,4) and in those of John/*Cyril of Jerusalem, who, e.g., says that he wanted to wait for the baptism of his interlocutors before revealing to them its deeper meaning (Catech. 1,11; 2,1).

*Ambrose also reserves his teaching on the mysteries only to the baptized, admonishing them not to divulge what has been told them regarding the Eucharist (Myst. 1,2 and 9,55). *Augustine, in preparing to illustrate the creed, the summary of the Christian faith, considers it easily grasped by neophytes but at the same time completely understandable only by spiritual people, those most advanced in divine knowledge; his explanation is therefore intended to defend it from the aberrant interpretations of *heretics (Fid. et symb. 1).

Practices linked to the disciplina tended to diminish from the 5th c., though an echo is still heard, e.g., in *Gregory of Tours (Franc. II 29), and a vague hint in *Gregory the Great (Dial. II 23, 4-5). The writings of ps.-*Dionysius (Eccl. hier. I 1) and *Maximus the Confessor (Mystag., esp. proem.; 15; 24) nonetheless testify how the disciplina would persist even later in the Christian *mystical tradition.

P. Batiffol, Arcane: DThC 1/2, 1738-1758; E. Vacandard, Arcane: DHGE 3, 1497-1513; O. Perler, Arcandisziplin: RAC 1, 667-676; H. Clasen, Die Arkandisziplin in der Alten Kirche, Heidelberg 1956; V. Recchia, L'arcano nell'iniziazione cristiana: Annali della Facoltà di Magistero dell'Università di Bari 4 (1965) 243-273; D. Powell, Arcandisziplin: TRE 4, 1-8; K.W. Bolle, Secrecy in Religions, Leiden 1987; C. Jacob, "Arkandisziplin," Allegorese, Mystagogie. Ein neuer Zugang zur Theologie des Ambrosius von Mailand, Frankfurt 1990; G.G. Stroumsa, Hidden Wisdom: Esoteric Traditions and the Roots of Christian Mysticism, Leiden 1996; F. Graf - W. Wischmeyer, Arcandisziplin: RGG[4] 1, 743-746.

C. Ricci

DISCIPLINE. The term discipline, which today evokes laws and related concepts, in antiquity indicated everything that a disciple could receive from a teacher. In this sense we find it used of Christians with respect to Jesus Christ and, more precisely, esp. in *Tertullian's abundant use of it in reference to what the apostles transmitted to the churches founded by them. In ancient Christianity, therefore, the term referred not just to the legal order, but (a) to Christianity in its totality consigned by Christ to the apostles and by these to the churches (Tertull., De praescr. 6,4 and 19,2-3); (b) as doctrine of a philosophy, of magic, etc. (7,4; 33,12; 35,1); (c) as a way of living according to the doctrine held (43,2: doctrinae index disciplina est; 44,1: apud nos testimonia disciplinae ad probationem veritatis); and (d) as order in theological research, i.e., done according to reason or logic (9,6; 41,1 and 3).

H.I. Marrou, Doctrina et disciplina dans la langue des Pères de l'Église: ALMA 9 (1931) 5-25; TLL V, 1316-1326; V. Morel, Le développement de la disciplina sous l'action du Saint-Esprit chez Tertullien: RHE 35 (1939) 243-265; Id., Disciplina. Le mot et l'idée représentée par lui dans les œuvres de Tertullien: RHE 40 (1944–45) 5-46 (45-46 chronological table of passages with the word disciplina in Tertullian's works); O. Mauch, Der lateinische Begriff disciplina. Eine Wortuntersuchung, Freibourg i.B. 1941; W. Dürig, Disciplina. Eine Studie zum Bedeutungsumfang des Wortes in der Sprache der Liturgie und der Väter: SE 4 (1952) 245-279; S. Hübner, Disciplina: ZKTh 84 (1962) 58ff.; G. Juessen - G. Schrimp, Disciplina, doctrina: HWP 2 (1972) 256-261.

V. Grossi

DIVINIZATION. It is clear that the divinization of human beings was a fundamental theme of patristics, esp. the Greek. Unfortunately, its consideration by Ritschl and his followers as, along with sacramentalism, a typical case of the Hellenization of the gospel, means that to this day its study has been compromised by more or less partial debates on certain unilateral premises, such as Christ's assumption of universal human nature, salvation by means of a physical contact between divinity and humanity in Christ, and the absorption of human beings into God. But research on divinization has also been greatly complicated by the historical data itself. The relevant vocabulary, for example, underwent a considerable evolution. Theopoiein and its various forms appear only from *Clement of *Alexandria on (Lampe 630f.). Under the influence of ps.-Dionysius, theōsis assumed more importance than theopoiēsis (Lampe 649f.). The equivalent Latin terms, deificare and deificatio, obtained a rather modest importance only in the 5th c. (Blaise 250; ThLL 5,403f.). The reality itself, however, was expressed by many other words, both Greek and Latin, such as aphtharsia, methexis, koinōnia, henōsis, glorificatio, profectus ad Deum, etc.

The anthropological premises, moreover, vary according to author, since they don't all evaluate Adam's intimacy with God and hence the injurious consequences of his sin in the same way. The theological and christological premises were equally diverse: the way they were conceived corresponded to how the divine transcendence was understood. This problem includes a not unimportant tension between divinization understood as a work carried out by Christ the savior, and divinization seen as a divine action carried out in souls, i.e., between Jesus' assumption of humanity and the union of Christ with the church.

Even the biblical basis of the patristic doctrine of human divinization seems, at first sight, far from solid. There are few explicit texts, all of a clearly Hellenistic stamp, such as Wisd 2:23 (ὁ θεὸς ἔκτισεν τὸν ἄνθρωπον ἐπ' ἀφθαρσίᾳ) and 6:18ff. (aphtharsia); Acts 17:28 (citation of ps.-Epimenides and Aratus), 2 Pet 1:4 (koinōnoi). The biblical foundation is much more solid than it appears, however, as long as one makes use of the Scriptural evidence without forcing it. Texts concerning human beings as God's image (Gen 1:26-27), divine sonship (Gal 4:5ff.; Rom 8:15), imitation of God (Mt 5:44-48) and of Christ (Phil 2:5-11), and texts presenting the new life of Christians as a pledge and anticipation of future glory (1 Cor 13:12; 2 Cor 3:18; 1 Jn 3:1-3), must all be considered in this light.

Reinterpreting, in particularly open milieus, this rich heritage of the biblical tradition, esp. the Johannine, Pauline and Wisdom literature, Christian authors soon began to develop the theology of divinization. Early on, the apostolic fathers and the Greek apologists saw the intimate union of human beings with God in an eschatological perspective, stressing the divine gift of immortality (aphtharsia), assured by Jesus' resurrection and by the *Eucharist, and conferred in the Lord's parousia (Ign., Eph. 4,2; Polyc. 2,2f.; 6,1; Eph. 20,2; 1 Clem. 36,2: immortal gnosis; 2 Clem. 6,6-9; Hermas, Sim. V, 6,5ff.; Just., Apol. 10,3; 52,3). While *Justin mentions this Christian hope in the context of true philosophy (Dial. 1), his disciple *Tatian presents the human being's destined immortality as an assimilation to God to be attained in gnosis (Orat. 12f.). It is in *Theophilus, however, that the technical vocabulary of divinization first appears (Autol. 2,24; 27). All these references to immortality, divine privilege to be conceded to those who live by faith in Christ, were not limited only to eschatological hope, but they were nevertheless only somewhat occasional.

The situation changed under the decisive influence of 2nd-c. *gnosticism which, taking up the myth of the primordial man dispersed in matter and illustrating it by, among other things, the parable of the lost sheep (see Hübner, Einheit, 290-311), was not per se interested in a divinization in the sense of a transformation to divine life, but taught rather a return to the divine sphere of those who were akin to God per naturam. Against this religious movement, esp. in its *Valentinian form, *Irenaeus worked out the first authentically Christian synthesis on human divinization (Tremblay). Integrating elements of gnosticism into his history of the saving incarnation of the Word, he shows how God, manifesting himself in his goodness through the Son in the power of the Holy Spirit, leads back the whole person (created in the image and likeness, i.e., destined to resemble the immortal God, but fallen through sin into corruption), by knowledge of the Son in the Spirit, to the eternal vision of and thus union with him in immortality (Iren., Adv. haer. III, 19,1; IV, 20; V, 36). Irenaeus's line, at once gnostic and historical, would be followed by later Greek, esp. Alexandrian, authors, though they put the accent elsewhere, insisting more on assimilative knowledge, or perhaps preferring impassibility (apatheia) to incorruptibility (aphtharsia), according to the stronger or weaker influence of Greek philosophy. Thus Clement of Alexandria, the first to make full use of the technical and religious language of the philosophy of his time, further defined the divine pedagogy spoken of by Irenaeus as a process of divinization that made human beings rise from incredulity, through faith and gnosis, to charity, source of impassibility, though not forgetting the illuminative role of baptism (Strom. 2, 22; 7, 10; Paed. 1,6,26).

*Origen, for his part, placed divinization within the vast framework in which he explained the relationship between God and the world through the mystery of the Logos. To a greater extent than his predecessors, he sought to base himself on the biblical data (Comm. in Jo.), and insisted on the human freedom that is the consequence of growing union with the Logos, God's image. Above all he stressed the incarnation, as the supreme mystery of the Word. For him, the union of the Word with the ever-faithful soul of Jesus, likened to the interpenetration of iron and fire, is the model of all divinization (Princ. 11,6). On the other hand, Jesus' kenōsis in death was not just the highest expression of his love for God (Comm. in Jo. V, 284), but also the prelude of the glorious resurrection which, begun in Christ, would be fulfilled for the whole church (Comm. in Jo. X, 228f.). This doctrine of divinization, while distinguished by its synthetic strength, like all of Origen's theology, is defective in two points: the preexistence of Jesus' soul and the excessively spiritualistic tendency.

The enormous progress made by theology in the 4th c., however, made itself felt in the question of divinization. *Athanasius, the great defender of Nicene faith, managed to reduce Irenaeus's heritage to an impressive simplicity, asserting that the incarnation of the Word has definitively restored the human being's primordial resemblance to God on two levels: that of the incorruptibility of the body and that, impossible without the first, of gnosis (Incarn. 9). He also used the doctrine of human divinization, by now a firmly established theological doctrine, to demonstrate, against the Arians, the divinity both of Christ (Ar. II, 70; III, 33) and of the Holy Spirit (Ep. Serap. 1,24). *Gregory of Nyssa, expounding his ideas on divinization esp. in his Oratio catechetica magna, dedicated to teachers "who need system in their instruction" (Or. catech. prol.), considers this doctrine an essential part of Christian teaching. Aware of the risks of pantheism inherent in the ideas he and his predecessors had taken over from *Platonism, he stressed the distance that exists between God's image in human beings and its eternal model (Or. catech. 5,6), i.e., the mutability of the former and the immutability of the latter (ibid., 21,1f.). To overcome the mutability, the cause of the loss of Adam's likeness to God, the immutable Word was made man (ibid., 32,3), a saving work that is fulfilled, however, for each person in baptism (ibid., 33-36) and the Eucharist (ibid., 37). This doctrine could be easily deepened on particular points with texts of *Basil and *Cyril of Alexandria on the role of the Holy Spirit, of *Theodore of Mopsuestia on baptism or of *John Chrysostom and *Cyril of Jerusalem on the Eucharist. As a whole, however, Gregory's remains the most substantial synthesis prior to the theology of ps.-*Dionysius and *Maximus the Confessor.

Under the influence of *Proclus, ps.-Dionysius integrated human divinization into his grandiose vision of the emanation of all things from God and their return to him (Cael. hier. 1,3f.); Maximus, in line with Chalcedonian *Christology, maintained the christological indivise-inconfuse in his explanation of divinization (Quaest. ad Thal. 59), and opposed divine love, the motive of the incarnation, to human love, the measure of divinization (Ambig.: PG 91, 1113B). This broad vision of human restoration to the primordial state (kinship with God, freely given him from the beginning), founded on the incarnation of the Word, eternal image of God, including his kenōsis unto death, and fulfilled in individuals esp. by means of the sacraments, is characteristic of Greek theology.

The Latins, more interested in moral holiness and therefore insisting more on the elimination of sin as culpa than on liberation from mortal corruption, seem to have been less open to it. Yet divinization is not absent from Latin theology, itself indebted to the Greek and dependent on the same philosophical influences. *Tertullian took from Irenaeus the idea of the admirabile commercium between God and humanity (Adv. Marc. 11,27); Hilary, influenced by Origen, developed a theology of the glorification of the human being that is a doctrine of divinization, based on the communio naturalis with the incarnate Word and realized in a special way in the Eucharist (Fierro); *Ambrose attached importance to transformation to divine life (Myst. 7,37-42; Incarn. 4,23). *Augustine, while seeing grace primarily as medicina and adiutorium, and giving great importance to the church as Christus totus, did not neglect the communion in which the individual, thanks to Christ's mediation, is united with God (Serm. 47,21; 192,1). For him, the baptized person is just with the only Just One, and thus he is a child of God like Christ, though not yet in the perfect state, since he hopes, by the Spirit diffused in him, to see God as he is in the resurrection (Ep. 140 and 147). Leo the Great expressed the same thought with formulae that were perhaps even more precise (Serm. 21,3; 23,5; 26,4). For him also, the Word was made flesh so that human beings could be raised, in the grace of the Spirit, to become children of God (Serm. 22,5).

DSp 3,1370-1398; RAC 6,54-219; J. Gross, La divinisation du chrétien d'après les Pères grecs, Paris 1938; E. von Ivánka, Platonismo e neoplatonismo: Dizion. Teol. II, Brescia 1967, 659-670; A. Fierro, Sobre la gloria en san Hilario, Rome 1964; H.E. Turner, Jésus le Sauveur, Paris 1965, 75-100; R.M. Hübner, Die Einheit des Leibes Christi bei Gregor von Nyssa. Untersuchungen zum Ursprung der "physischen" Erlösungslehre, Leiden 1974; B. Studer, Soteriologie der Kirchenväter: HDG III/2a, Freiburg 1978; R. Tremblay, La manifestation et la vision de Dieu selon s. Irénée de Lyon, Münster 1978; B. Studer, Le Christ, notre justice, selon s. Augustin: RecAug 15 (1980) 99-143; R. Flogaus, Vergöttlichung, III. Theologiegeschichtlich: LTK³ 10, 665f.

B. Studer

DIVORCE. In Roman law, divorce was equally available to both the husband and the wife, even without the other party's consent, at least until 331 (CTh 3,16,1), when the possibility of unilateral divorce was limited to particular cases. The wife could be repudiated only for adultery, witchcraft or acting as a procuress; the husband for murder, witchcraft or grave-robbing. Those convicted of these crimes were already subject to capital punishment; therefore, if a unilateral divorce was not initiated for one of these reasons, the initiating party incurred a penalty on the dowry, and the woman was sent away. This law was revoked under *Julian, but revived from the mid-5th c. This notwithstanding, unilateral divorce remained valid, whereas divorce with the consent of both parties continued to be freely available.

This was the context in which the bishops and theologians began their great fight against the practice of divorce. If, theoretically, they did not recognize unilateral divorce—nor consensual divorce either, based on the NT—there were two cases in which separation was permitted: adultery (Mt 5:32; 19:9), and the difference of religion (1 Cor 7:12-16) of one party, this latter in the case where a person, married when both spouses were pagan, converts, and the other spouse is unable to live in peace with him or her. The validity of each reason had different force: with a partner's adultery, for most Fathers beginning from *Hermas, separation was obligatory; for others, it was merely a concession. According to Hermas, *Basil of Ancyra, *Theodoret and *Augustine, the guilty party who accepts correction must be taken back; this could not be done according to *John Chrysostom, *Basil of Caesarea, *Cyril of Alexandria and *Jerome, based on Dt 24:1-4. In the case of the conversion of one of the two pagan parties, Augustine requires that the initiative in separating not come from the believer, and he exhorts the Christian spouse to do everything possible to avoid it. Despite the polemic of *Clement of Alexandria and *Origen against heretics who dissolved marriages for religious reasons, Basil of Caesarea (Mor. 73,1; Great Asketicon 12) admitted separation in order to enter religious life.

When considering divorce, however, one must distinguish between the separation of the spouses and the possibility of contracting a new marriage: this latter problem, posed to moderns by Mt 19:9, didn't trouble the ancients at all, except for a few 4th-5th-c. Latin authors, because they read that text in the form of Mt 5:32 (which may have been the original form), where a new marriage of the initiator is not spoken of. The situation is different in the case of the other reason for separation: the passage clearly says that the converted partner may remarry. Paradoxically, a second marriage contracted after a separation that has occurred because of an unbelieving spouse is admitted only by *Ambrosiaster (with the same conditions for both sexes). Conversely, along with other Fathers, Augustine formally opposed it (Con. adult. 1,13-24): according to him, the unbeliever was also bound not to remarry, based on Gen 2:24: thus in antiquity the "Pauline privilege" meant nothing more than the possibility of separation, but without permission for a new marriage. Given, on the other hand, that in the case of the adultery of the partner the gospel passages say nothing about prohibition of a second marriage, the passages were interpreted differently even from the earliest Fathers. Many condemned remarriage explicitly, one (Ambrosiaster, Comm. 1 Cor. ad 7,10-11) allowed it for the husband, others didn't address the problem directly, and still others, though condemning it in theory, would accept it as pastors. Thus Origen (Com. Mt. XIV, 23-24) mentions that some bishops had allowed the second marriage of a woman whose first husband was alive: they acted against Scripture, but not entirely without reason. Nevertheless at the end of § 24 he specifies that the new marriage is merely a façade and is not valid; Basil (Epist. 199, can. 26) offers, as a principle, that "fornication" can never become marriage: nevertheless, if it is not possible to separate the false spouses they should be made to do penance and left in peace "in the fear that something worse might not happen." The Council of *Arles (314, can. 11) judged that if a young husband caught his wife in flagrant adultery, he must not remarry, but that this was more advice than an ecclesiastical sanction: see also Augustine (De fide et oper. 19,35) and the letter of Leo the Great to Nicetas of Aquileia, and perhaps Epiphanius (Panarion 59, 4), if he is not treating only of remarried widows. Nautin favors this interpretation, while Crouzel opposes it.

Given the extreme variety of doctrinal positions, some modern scholars, wanting to find a general practice followed by the Fathers, argue for the thesis that the Fathers, while accepting separation after adultery, would not permit a second marriage. Others argue that the acceptance of separation for adultery would also include permission to remarry. It seems that the problem can begin to find a proper balance if we consider that there could have been a difference in the practice and/or in the doctrine of the Fathers, in the sense that while certain authors excluded the theoretical possibility of a second marriage after divorce due to a partner's adultery, they could accept the idea that some bishops would allow it for pastoral reasons: at the same time many authors were silent on the matter, and one even explicitly allows it, as we saw above. One notes a certain inequality in the treatment of the problem, in that whereas wives who had been betrayed were severely prohibited from remarrying, prescriptions and obligations for husbands were defined only very rarely. Some interpreted the lack of prescriptions as a tacit consent given to divorced men. In any case this disparity was later eliminated, but in a different manner in the West than in the East. In the West, under the influence esp. of Jerome and Augustine, both parties were bound to remain single, whereas in the East both parties were allowed to remarry.

H. Crouzel, L'Église primitive face au divorce, Paris 1971; Id., Le texte patristique de Mt 5,32 et 19,9: NTS 19 (1972–1973) 98-119; Id., Divorce et mariage dans l'Église primitive: Quelques réflexions de méthodologie historique: NRTh 98 (1976) 891-917; P. Mattei, Le divorce chez Tertullien. Examen de la question à la lumière des développements que le De monogamia consacre à ce sujet: RSR 60 (1986) 207-234; Ch. Munier, La sollicitude pastorale de l'Église ancienne en matière de divorce et de remariage: LThPh 54 (1988) 19-30; P. Mattei, Du divorce, de Tertullien, et de quelques autres sujets: perspectives nouvelles et idées reçues: REAug 39 (1993) 23-35; Id., Deux notes sur mariage (divorce) et virginité dans Novatien: RSLR 29 (1993) 357-365.

H. Crouzel - L. Odrobina

DOCETISM. By the term docetism we understand the various attempts to explain Christ's incarnation and passion in a dualistic and spiritualistic way, excluding all that would seem unworthy of the Son of God, a man born of a virgin and without sin. This does not refer to a specific sect, as some heresiological texts might suggest (Lampe 379: δοκηταί, and esp. Tertull., Carn. res. 1), but to a tendency to undervalue the historical reality of God's saving work; it is understandable primarily in *Platonic contexts, in which the true realities of the intelligible world were opposed to the apparent realities of the sensible world. In any case, there was a great variety among the so-called Docetists. Those spoken of by 1 and 2 Jn and *Ignatius (Smyrn. 13; Trall. 9f.) disregarded the true humanity of Jesus, the basis of salvation. *Marcion, to exclude any connection between the demiurge and the savior, admitted a "heavenly" flesh. For similar reasons, *Apelles imagined a body like that taken by the angels in their appearances. Strictly speaking, only the *Valentinians should be considered Docetists. According to them the Savior assumed only what was to be saved, hence no corporeal substance. Although docetism in the sense explained was characteristic esp. of the heresies opposed by *Tertullian (Carn. res.) and *Hippolytus (Ref. 8,8-11; 10,16), the temptation to minimize the salvific value of the *incarnation, including the inner weaknesses of the man Jesus, would never be absent from Christian theology—to say nothing of the risk of exaggerated practical conclusions for the Christian life (devaluation of the corporeal values of sexuality and marriage).

DSp 3,1461-1468; A. Orbe, Cristología gnóstica, Madrid 1976; A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche, I, Freiburg 1979, 187ff. (summarized by Orbe; other studies); E. Rose, Die manichäische Christologie, Wiesbaden 1979; U.B. Müller, Die Menschwerdung Gottes. Frühchristliche Inkarnationsvorstellungen und die Anfänge des Doketismus, Stuttgart 1990; T. Hainthaler, Doketismus: LTK³ 3, 301f. (bibl.); W. Löhr, Doketismus, I/1: Alte Kirche: RGG⁴ 2, 925ff. (bibl.).

B. Studer

DOCTRINA PATRUM (λόγοι ἁγίων πατέρων): a voluminous Greek christological *florilegium, whose original redaction (approx. chs. 1-30) was composed in the second half of the 7th c. It seems less an original work than a compilation made from other similar collections, some still existing (*Maximus the Confessor's Ep. 15; the florilegium of the Lateran Synod of 649), some lost (the florilegium on which *Leontius of Byzantium and *Leontius of Jerusalem depend, etc.).

F. Diekamp, Doctrina Patrum de incarnatione Verbi. Ein griechisches Florilegium aus der Wende des siebenten und achten Jahrhunderts, Münster i. W. 1907, ²1981.

S.J. Voicu

DOGMA, History of. 1. Premises. It is helpful to begin by making a somewhat practical distinction (see RGG⁴ 2, 915f.). On the one hand, the history of dogma is defined as the process of the origin and reception of normative doctrinal consensuses. On the other hand, scholars see the history of dogma as a discipline that studies the history of dogma in the first sense, but as part of the history of Christian theology. The history of dogma as a theme of scientific research began in the 18th-c. Enlightenment, receiving significant impetus from G.W.F. Hegel's philosophy of history (1831) and reaching its culmination in A. von Harnack's (d. 1930) Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte (1886–1890). The elaboration of the history of dogma is essentially linked to the history of German Protestantism, although there was also interest in it in Catholic circles, for example in the Tübingen school, in J.H. Newman, in the modernist controversy in the early 20th century and in the recent Catholic theology whose representatives, such as M. Schmaus and A. Grillmeier, concerned themselves mainly with the hermeneutics of ancient Christian doctrines. There is no need to present here in detail the history of the historical-theological discipline (see TRE 9,116-123; LTK³ 3,298-201; RGG⁴ 2,915ff.). We must, however, call attention to the arguments behind the various approaches—that is, the question of in what sense the apostolic tradition has arrived at the conviction that the Christian churches proclaim, still today, the good news of Christ. In terms less intellectual than personalistic, the question arises of how the original testimony of the encounter with Jesus Christ is capable of leading to an experience of Christ today, and to a contemporary witness to his presence. This personalistic approach seeks to avoid a reduction of the history of Christian doctrine to a historiography of ideas, instead of also considering the daily attitudes and spiritual ideals of our fathers and mothers in faith (see LTK³ 3,284ff.). The common reception of the basic truths of the gospel goes back to the time when the churches were not yet divided as in the second millennium.

Whatever the exact explanation might be of the passage from the apostolic tradition to the testimony of the churches of today, it is interesting to investigate in what sense the authors of the ancient churches might have seen this problem, and in what way modern research might help in evaluating the development of faith and of theology in the ancient church. Before addressing this twofold question, however, it is worth specifying what is commonly meant by dogma and history (see LTK³ 3,284f.). Regarding dogma, a fairly wide consensus exists today in the Christian communities: it is ordinarily defined as the doctrine of faith, proposed as such by the churches. Opinions differ, however, on the exact way and the authority by which the churches define what all Christians are called to accept by faith. Nevertheless, even Catholic dogmatic historiography adopts in practice a broad concept of dogma, not limiting it to doctrines defined as such by the ecclesiastical magisterium, but understanding it as including all preaching of the faith, and indeed as the faith of the church (Lehmann, MystSal, 799). Nor is the church's infallible authority stressed, since, on the one hand, there is an acknowledgment of the practical impossibility of indicating for each Christian doctrine the degree of authority with which it is taught in the church, and on the other hand, in the study of the development of the history of dogmas the opinions of theologians are also taken into account, since without these, historians would be unable to fully evaluate the church's official doctrines themselves.

Likewise, today there is agreement on two fundamental aspects of the historicity of dogma: a historical passage is admitted from the initial faith in Christ to that of today—that is, from the apostolic tradition, passed down essentially in the writings that the church itself considers to be Sacred Scripture, to the contemporary proclamation of the gospel of Christ. The "dogmatic" decisions of synods clearly play a key role in this process, but they do not explain the whole reception of the apostolic tradition. It is also accepted that the continual elucidation of the primitive message is part of the historicity of the church itself, and thus occurs under the influence of a variety of factors: internally, first worship, then the faithful and scientific reading of the Bible, intellectual research into a deeper understanding of the faith, care to exclude from this study all erroneous interpretations, and Christian spirituality; externally, the more-developed organization of the Christian communities, the encounter with new cultures, and the political and social conditions of Christians.

Given that the concepts of dogma and history of dogma go back only to the end of the 18th c., and since then have evolved considerably under the influence of the historical sciences, in particular in the discussions of the positions of liberal Protestantism (von Harnack and others) and of modernism (see Söll; Lehmann), two approaches are possible for a patristic consideration of dogma in history. One could examine to what extent the ancient churches have in some way contributed to modern reflections on the history of dogma; or, departing from the modern conception of the history of Christian doctrines—a conception certainly unknown to the Fathers—one can try to show how the historical phenomena of the patristic era should be evaluated in light of modern research.

2. The patristic contribution. Taking up the first perspective, we will start from the fact that the patristic use of the term dogma reflects that of classical Hellenism. In it the fundamental idea, "that which seems (δοκεῖ) to be right," is applied both in a somewhat theoretical sense—opinion, doctrine, philosophical principle—and in a practical sense, i.e., a decision taken and promulgated by an authority (never religious), i.e., edict, decree. In the NT (esp. Acts 16:4) and the apostolic fathers we find only the latter use, but this had no influence on the immediate development of the concept (Elze, Begriff, 423f.). Under the influence of Stoicism, the apologists, esp. *Justin and *Tatian, but also *Clement and *Origen, who see Christianity as the true philosophy, take up the first sense, which is also connected with the idea of hairesis, i.e., distinguishing between the dogma or dogmas of philosophers, heretics and Christians (see Orig., C. Cels. 3,39). *Eusebius of Caesarea understands dogma not just in the sense of doctrine, identifying it with pistis, but he also refers it to synodal authority (Elze, Begriff, 429f.). We would thus expect dogma in this sense to appear in the acts of the councils. This is not the case, however, perhaps because it includes too much of the idea of something "subjective," "human" (Elze, Begriff, 430f.). *Sozomen (Elze, Begriff, 432) and *Justinian (Mirbt, n. 484) are exceptions. Moreover, it is remarkable that *Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat. 4,2) and *Gregory of Nyssa contrast fidelity to dogma (doctrine) with good moral conduct, and that *Basil distinguishes dogma, doctrine still to be considered secret, and kerygma, public teaching (Spir. Sanct. 27,66: SC 17 bis, 89ff.).

Among the Latins use of the term dogma was somewhat rare. Obviously it became more frequent under the influence of Origen's works, translated into Latin by *Jerome and *Rufinus (Elze, Begriff, 434). While for these and others it can mean either the false doctrines of philosophers or heretics, or Catholic doctrine, *Augustine uses it exclusively in a negative sense (dogmata nefaria, also in Mendac. 4; C. duas ep. pelag. II, 3,5. Gest. Pel. 6,16.18, with negative overtones). Entirely different is the use of dogma in *Vincent of Lérins's Commonitorium (only 7 of 28 instances have a negative sense; see Becker, Dogma, 339). For him, while the Arian error is a dogma novum, the true doctrine guaranteed by the consensio Ecclesiae catholicae universitatis et antiquitatis (Comm. 38; see Sieben, Konzilsidee, 154) is called dogma Ecclesiae (Comm. 120), dogma caeleste (Comm. 122), even prisca illa caelestis philosophiae (!) dogmata (Comm. 135).

Although the patristic use of dogma is thus quite removed from modern use—except for Vincent of Lérins, who exercised a great influence from 1500 on (Elze, Begriff, 438, with reference to Kremser), esp. on Vatican I (Lehmann, MystSal, 652)—the idea of a doctrine of faith, presented by church authorities as a condition of communion of faith, is far from absent. We need only consider the concepts of apostolic tradition and depositum fidei, the liturgical custom of requiring of baptizands faith in the Trinity, the synodal practice of formulating confessions of faith (ekthesis), the satisfactio that new bishops or heretics had to provide in order to be admitted to the communion of faith, and the theological method based on the regula fidei (see Kelly). During the 4th and 5th c. four particular elements were added to the subject matter of Catholic doctrine: the Nicene

Creed, considered to be God's word, the basis of Christian orthodoxy and model for further synodal decisions; the integration of conciliar decisions into imperial legislation; dogmatic formalism, imposed after 400 (Hanson); and the popes' claims of the integrity in faith of the church of *Rome.

As for the historicity of dogma, Christians very soon made a clear distinction between the church's apostolic origins and its later circumstances, thus assuming a historical transition from the primitive preaching to the later preaching of the gospel, to which they nonetheless extended the revealing and inspiring activity of the Holy Spirit in the sense of Jn 14:26 (Congar). Also, defending from the 2nd c. on the unity of the two Testaments, they developed the idea of a certain progress of revelation, i.e., of a divine pedagogy, of God's adaptation to humanity and an ever-increasing enlightenment. Though they saw innovation almost exclusively in the relationship of the NT to the OT, there were those who admitted deeper clarification of apostolic intent even during the time of the church, such as *Gregory of Nazianzus regarding the doctrine on the divinity of the Holy Spirit (Or. 31,25ff.). Also noteworthy is Augustine's theory on the emendatio of councils (Sieben, Konzilsidee, 92f.).

The most explicit teaching on development of dogma is undoubtedly found in Vincent of Lérins. While insisting on the depositum custodi (Comm. 22), he could not avoid the question of whether there existed a profectus religionis in the church. He certainly admits it, but not in the sense of a permutatio fidei (Comm. 23); rather, there is only a better knowledge and a more devout veneration of what has been believed semper, ubique, ab omnibus (Comm. 2). In the same sense Leo considers the event of Chalcedon (451), not as the promulgation of a new faith, but as a clearer manifestation of the truth always believed (Ep. 104,1). Also noteworthy is the fact that the catalogs of heresies, despite their lack of a historical spirit, include an idea of a succession of heresies, and in part even a connection between them.

Finally we may consider the reflections of the early Christian authors, esp. Origen and Augustine, on the relation between history in the ancient sense of an account, and faith with the meaning of the reception of authoritative witnesses. To recognize that the Christian faith is not possible without the narratio rerum gestarum requires an attention to the historicity of the recounted fact, of the testimonies concerning them and of the ever-new inculturated reception of these testimonies (see Studer, Cognitio historialis and Historia).

3. Retrospective evaluation. In the second perspective the following aspects must be borne in mind. The starting point of the history of dogma must be located in the religious movement started by Jesus of Nazareth. Prepared by the experience of the people of Israel (monotheism of the law and the prophets) and confronted with the experiences of contemporary Judaism, Jesus had the experience of intimacy with the Father and of his Messianic vocation. The primitive community, on the other hand, guided by familiarity with Jesus himself, experienced the Easter mystery as the confirmation given by God, in the power of the Holy Spirit, to the proclamation of the coming of the kingdom, which appeared to have been compromised by the *cross. This basic experience was passed on in preaching to later generations, calling them to the same experience of faith. In this context, therefore, it makes sense to speak of the history of faith in Christ.

Postapostolic Christianity experienced the presence of the glorious Christ in the church, thanks to the apostolic memories handed down in scriptis in the gospels and apostolic letters. They, however, reinterpreted the primitive preaching that resulted from faith in Christ in the light of their own experience in new religious and cultural conditions, thus leading not just to new reflections on faith, but also new formulations of faith. This complex process continued over the centuries, nourished and protected not only by Scripture, but also by the later consensual writings that illuminated the ever-living apostolic preaching in light of the church's ever-changing circumstances.

This explanation of the history of faith, and thus also of dogma, is well-illustrated by a consideration of baptismal faith. For the first Christians, the encounter with the Lord in baptism, conversion to him, was undoubtedly a privileged experience of faith. The Epistle to the Romans (5–8) is the most eloquent attestation of this. This baptismal experience found dogmatic expression in the mandate, attributed to the risen Christ, to baptize all in the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit (Mt 28:19; Did. 7). The baptismal formula would thus be the light in which new converts would see their baptism. Those, on the other hand, who were baptized in other historical and religious circumstances—the 4th c.—would reinterpret the formula to the point of arriving, at the end of that century, at a universal acceptance of faith in the Trinity. The main steps toward this goal, which were not the last, were (1) Justin presents the baptismal creed to the pagans as an expression of Christian religiosity (Apol. 6; 61-67); (2) *Irenaeus frames his catechesis within the three articles of the baptismal creed (Epid. 3-6; 100); (3) the Traditio Apostolica mentions it in its defense of the traditional *liturgy (ch. 21); (4) Origen makes it the basis of his vision of the world (Princ. praef.); (5) the Council of Nicaea rules out any graduality of the three persons; (6) anti-Sabellian theologians, like Eusebius of Caesarea, see it as the main evidence of the true distinction of the divine persons (Hahn, 188); (7) Basil derives homotimia, the equal adoration of the Father, Son and Spirit, from the baptismal consecration in the triple name; (8) he also insists on the necessity of understanding Jesus' baptismal command starting precisely from baptismal experience. Thus baptismal faith, experienced and further elucidated on both a theological and a dogmatic level, became during the first centuries the explicit confession that the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, really distinct but without distinction of degree, are nonetheless one God.

The example of baptismal faith, which is clearly fundamental, helps us to understand better the complexity of the history of Christian dogma. It demonstrates that the ongoing elucidation of the primitive faith took place mainly in the liturgy, the primary place of encounter with Christ, Son of God and source of the Spirit (Lehmann, MystSal, 634f.). In it we see too the influences of the encounter with rhetoric (concept of persona) and philosophy, as well as the role of the magisterium which ruled out false explanations and whose most solemn decision, that of Nicaea, was likened to the divine word; and the function of theology, which sought to justify the interpretation of baptismal faith by looking at it in the context of the Bible, the basic witness of the fundamental baptismal experience. Finally, this explanation of the history of dogma includes the requirements of a complete historiography. We cannot content ourselves with synodal decisions or the canonical letters of bishops, and neither is it enough to explain these undoubtedly decisive documents merely by the heresies they opposed; we must refer to the theology that brought to maturity those situations in which church authorities could no longer avoid taking a position. Also to be considered are preaching, liturgical texts, the testimony of Christian devotion, hagiography and Christian art, since all of this evidence expresses the consciousness of faith that lies behind the synodal confessions, decrees and canons, to say nothing of doctrines, like soteriology, that were never directly the object of the ancient magisterium.

Finally we must point out, to the extent possible, the homogeneous transition from Scripture, in which the apostolic experience of the risen Christ remains in some way still accessible to us, to the theological and dogmatic expressions of the ever-renewed recovery of that original experience of the faith of the people of God.

Besides articles in dictionaries and in manuals of history of dogma, see esp.: A. Hahn, Bibliothek der Symbole und Glaubensregeln der Alten Kirche, Breslau 1897; Y. Congar, La Tradition et les traditions, Paris 1960 (Eng. tr. Needham, MA [2]1998); M. Elze, Der Begriff des Dogmas in der Alten Kirche: ZThK 61 (1964) 421-438; K. Lehmann, in Mysterium Salutis I, Einsiedeln 1965, 622-787 (It. tr. Brescia 1968); G. Söll, Dogma und Dogmenentwicklung: HDG I/5, Freiburg 1971; J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds, London 1972; R.P.C. Hanson, Dogma and Formula in the Fathers, SP 13, Berlin 1975, 169-184; K.J. Becker, Dogma: Gregorianum 57 (1976) 307-350; 658-701 (Latin part up to 1500); H.J. Sieben, Die Konzilsidee der Alten Kirche, Paderborn 1979; TRE 9 (1982) 26-35. 116-125; J.B. Studer, Gott und unsere Erlösung im Glauben der Alten Kirche, Paderborn 1985; J. Drumm, Doxologia und Dogma, Paderborn 1991; B. Studer, La cognitio historialis nel De civitate Dei di Agostino: SEA 50, Rome 1995, 520-553; LTK[3] 3, 283-288; 295-301; RGG[4] 2, 895-899; 915-920; B. Studer, Der Begriff der Geschichte in Schriftum des Origenes von Alexandrien, in Origeniana Octava, L. Perrone (ed.), Louvain 2003, 757-777.

B. Studer

DOMITIAN, emperor (51–96). Titus Flavius Domitian, Vespasian's second son, emperor of *Rome from 81 (the year of his brother Titus's death) to 96. He adopted a popular policy, in contrast to the strictly conservative policy of the first two Flavii. A devotee of the cults of Isis, he gave Eastern characteristics to his monarchy. The emphasis in the last years of his reign on the cult of his person (he had himself called Dominus et Deus) led to a persecution against Jews and Christians, at that time not clearly distinguished for the purposes of police surveillance. Its illustrious victims included *Flavius Clemens, Flavia Domitilla and *Acilius Glabrio (killed in exile). Under Domitian the martyrs of Asia Minor cited in Rev 2:13 and 20:4 were killed; the apostle *John was exiled to Patmos; *Hegesippus (Euseb., HE III, 19-20) relates how some of Jesus' relatives were called to Rome for an inquiry. Domitian's persecution is attested in the first Letter of Clement to the Corinthians (VII, 1 and LIX, 4) and in the Shepherd of Hermas (passim). *Tertullian (Apol. 5,4) and *Melito of Sardis (Euseb., HE IV, 26,9 and III, 17-18) attribute to Domitian a generally anti-Christian activity. A political motive for the persecution can be found in the wide penetration of Christianity into the ruling class of imperial society (esp. in the senatorial class among Domitian's opposition), as evidenced by the victims recorded by pagan authors (Suet., Dom. 15,1).

S. Rossi, La cosiddetta persecuzione di Domiziano: GIF 15 (1962)

302-341; L.W. Barnard, Clement of Rome and the Persecution of Domitian: NTS 10 (1963) 251-260; M. Sordi, Il cristianesimo e Roma, Bologna 1965, 105-117; Id., I cristiani e l'impero romano, Milan ²1990; G. Jossa, I cristiani e l'impero romano da Tiberio a Marco Aurelio, Naples 1991; F. Jacques - J. Sheid, Roma e il suo impero, It. tr., Rome - Bari 1992; S. Roda, Profilo di storia romana. Dalle origini alla caduta dell'Impero d'Occidente, Rome 2001.

L. Navarra

DOMITIAN of Ancyra (5th c.). *Hegumen of the Palestinian *cenobium of *Martyrius, he and *Theodore Askidas led the *Origenists of *Palestine in the first decades of the 6th c. Thanks to the influence of *Leontius of Byzantium, Domitian was designated by *Justinian as bishop of Ancyra (ca. 540). When *Ephrem of Antioch condemned Palestinian Origenism (ca. 542), Domitian and Theodore put pressure on *Peter of Jerusalem to break off communion with the patriarch of *Antioch, but without result. Later Domitian and Theodore were behind the condemnation of the *Three Chapters. *Facundus of Hermiane cites (IV, 4,15) a very explicit passage of Domitian on the matter.

L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980, 204-207; F. Carcione, La politica religiosa di Giustiniano nella fase iniziale della "seconda controversia origenista": Studi and Ricerche sull'Oriente Cristiano 8 (1985) 6-7, 14.

M. Simonetti

DOMITILLA. Gave her name to a Roman catacomb. Once identified with Flavia Domitilla, niece of the emperor Titus Flavius Vespasian and wife of the consul Titus Flavius Clemens, she was accused of atheism in 96 under Titus Flavius Domitian and exiled to the island of Pandataria near Ischia, now Ventotene (Dio Cass., Hist. rom. 67,14,1-2; Suet., Dom. 15). She should rather be identified with another Domitilla, mentioned by *Eusebius (HE 3,18,4), a niece of Titus Flavius Clemens and exiled in 96 to the island of Ponza for being a Christian; in the 4th c. her cell became a pilgrimage destination (Jer., Ep. 108,7). There was no cult of Domitilla in ancient *Rome; her name is not in the Mart. hier. According to the 6th-c. Passio SS. Nerei et Achillei, originally written in Greek, this second Domitilla was a martyr of Terracina. The name cymiterium domitillae, from the 7th c., refers instead to a Roman noblewoman named Domitilla who owned the land where the catacomb developed (CIL 6, 948, 8942, 16246). Florus includes her in his martyrology 7 May.

BHG 1327; BHL 2257, 6058-6066; AB 102 (1984) 180; BS 5, 878-879; LCI 6, 81; BBKL 1, 1359-1360; RAC 4, 104-106; F. Lanzoni, Le diocesi d'Italia, Faenza 1927, 147-148; Ph. Pergola, Le catacombe romane, Rome ²1999, 211-217; P. Lampe, Die stadtrömischen Christen in den ersten beiden Jahrhunderten, Tübingen ²1989, 166-172; J. Ulrich, Euseb, Hist. Eccl. III,14-20 und die Frage nach der Christenverfolgung unter Domitian: ZNTW 87 (1996) 269-289.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

DOMNUS (d. 271/272), bishop of *Antioch and son of Bishop *Demetrian, *Paul of Samosata's predecessor. Domnus was elected by the Council of Antioch of 268 following Paul's excommunication and deposition. Paul, however, with *Zenobia's support, kept possession of the see until late 271 or early 272, when *Aurelian, having reconquered Antioch, decided the dispute in favor of the orthodox (Euseb., HE VII, 30,17-19). Domnus died in 271 or 272 and was succeeded by Timaeus.

DHGE 14,644.

E. Prinzivalli

DONATION of CONSTANTINE. The Liber pontificalis contains, in the section dedicated to Pope *Sylvester, the so-called Donation of Constantine. The Constitutum Constantini is actually an apocryphal letter, addressed by Constantine to Pope Sylvester, his successors to the see of *Rome and all Catholic bishops of the world, who with this imperial constitution were subordinated to the authority of the bishop of Rome. The letter has two parts: a profession of faith and the donation itself. The emperor concedes power, dignity and imperial insignia to the pope and to his successors, along with perpetual sovereignty "over Rome, the provinces and the cities of all of Italy or of the Western provinces." A later version of the text replaced or with and, with obvious expansionist motives.

The text attributes primacy over the other patriarchates—*Antioch, *Alexandria, *Constantinople and *Jerusalem—to *Rome. The success of the spurious Donation of Constantine, the intent of which was to legitimize the freedom and ecclesiastical independence of the Roman see with respect to the civil power, was immense; it was not only inserted in various legal texts, but was also appealed to in the controversy of the two powers (Arnold of Brescia, William of Ockham, Marsilius of Padua) as an argument in support of papist theses. There are still serious doubts regarding the date of composition of this document (ca. 850 it was already known and considered trustworthy in *Gaul; thus, either shortly before or contemporaneous with the Decretales Pseudo-Isidorianae, which include it) and on the place of composition (perhaps Rome, perhaps the abbey of Saint-Denis near Paris). The question of the letter's authenticity was already raised in the 15th c. by Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini (the future Pius II), followed by various humanists (Reginald Pecock, Nicholas of Cusa and Lorenzo Valla), who demonstrated the Donation of Constantine's falsity through textual and literary criticism and numerous historical testimonies.

Il Constitutum Constantini, P. Ciprotti (ed.), Milan 1966; L. Duchesne, Le Liber pontificalis, I, Paris 1886, CIX-CXX; E. Griffe, various articles on the Donation of Constantine in BLE 52 (1952) 224-226, 58 (1957) 238-241, 59 (1958) 193-221; I.P. Kirsch, La "Donatio Constantini": La Scuola Cattolica 41 (1913) 198-213; P. De Leo, Il "Constitutum Constantini," Reggio Calabria 1974; M. Edwards (ed.), Constantine and Christendom: The Orations to the Saints; The Greek and Latin Accounts of the Discovery of the Cross; The Edict of Constantine to Pope Silvester, Liverpool 2003 (bibl.).

J.A. Cabrera Montero

DONATIONS to the Church. From the peace of Constantine, imperial donations were a significant source of property for the church: land, Roman buildings, confiscated pagan temples, judicial fines given to the church to help the poor, etc. In the 5th c., however, esp. in West, as the public treasury gradually emptied, this relationship became rarer. The church was thus forced to rely on private generosity, which took various forms, esp. manual offerings in money or in kind during liturgical assemblies. Here we will deal only with donations in life (A) and donations in death (B).

A. Donations in life consisted of sums of money or real estate intended for worship or charitable purposes, and could be immediate or with right of usufruct. A constitution of *Zeno (ca. 470), valid for the eastern part of the empire, established that donations had to be made according to legal forms approved by the imperial chancellery; this both bound the promiser and obliged the beneficiary, the church, to respect the resulting burdens, and esp. to observe scrupulously the allocation of donations: CI 1,12,15. Endowment (dos) was a particular form of donation: the allotted sum had to yield an income in support of a pious work, ordinarily a church building, in this way guaranteeing religious services and the chaplain's needs. Pope *Gelasius introduced strict control over foundations in territories where his authority extended; to avoid the inconveniences rising from the systems adopted by private churches, he prescribed that the founder should renounce, for himself and his descendants, any special claims over the new church and over receipt of the income of the endowment (Ep. XIV: Thiel, 364).

B. From 312/313 Constantine had recognized the right of Christian communities to own property. In 321 he accorded private citizens the right to make provision for the church at their death (CTh 16,2,4). The church itself encouraged this type of donation, esp. from bishops and clergy (see Reg. Ecc. Carth. ca. 81). In a sermon, *Augustine invites the faithful to include "God's part" among their successors, counting the church as one of their heirs (Serm. 355; cf. Ambr., Expl. evang. sec. Luc. 8,77). *Basil too suggests leaving half of one's inheritance to the church.

O. Schilling, Reichtum und Eigentum in der altchristlichen Literatur, Freiburg i. B. 1908; E. Lesne, Histoire de la propriété ecclésiastique en Gaule, I, Lille-Paris 1910, 13-25; J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'Empire romain, Paris 1958, 291-299; P. Landau, Kirchengut: TRE 18, 560-575; J.L. Murga Gener, Donaciones y testamentos "in bonum animae" en el derecho romano tardío, Pamplona 1968; L. De Salvo, Nolo munera ista (Aug. Serm. 355,3): eredità e donazioni in Agostino: AARC 9 (1993) 299-323; J. Kunderewicz, Disposizioni testamentarie e donazioni a scopo di beneficenza nel diritto giustinianeo: SDHI 47 (1981) 47-92; Ch. Pietri, Christiana respublica, Rome 1997 (various articles); R. Soraci, Il "Privilegium christianitatis" e i "Fisci commoda" durante il regno di Valentiniano I: Quaderni Catanesi 2 (1990) 217-285.

Ch. Munier

DONATISM

I. Origins and history - II. Doctrine - III. A protest movement - IV. Donatism outside Africa.

Donatism was a schism that affected the church of N *Africa in the 4th and early 5th c., but lasted at least up to the turn of the 7th c. It reflected socioeconomic and religious divisions among N African Christians. In refuting the *Donatists, *Augustine worked out his theology of the church and the *sacraments, as well as his ideas on the coercion of religious dissidents by the state.

I. Origins and history. The immediate cause of the schism was linked with events in N Africa during the "great" persecution of 303–305. Many members of the clergy, bishops included, obeyed the authorities and handed over the books of the Scriptures. In the eyes of those who had resisted, they were considered traditores, "traitors" and apostates, unworthy of the clerical state. The persecution in N Africa was brief but violent (Euseb., HE VIII, 6,10), produced "many martyrs" and, when it ended in early spring 305, people recalled the admirable conduct of the confessors, esp. those of *Abitina (near Membressa, in W Tunisia). These Christians had continued to meet after the fall of their bishop and were arrested and imprisoned at *Carthage. Even in prison, they solemnly condemned traditores and those who received the sacraments from traditores. These, they declared, would have no part with them in the kingdom of heaven (Acta Saturnini 18: PL 8, 701). Further, the archdeacon of Carthage, *Caecilian, was accused of having brutally prevented Christians from bringing food to the imprisoned confessors (ibid., ch. 17).

In 311–12, *Mensurius, bishop of Carthage, died, and Caecilian was elected in his place (Opt., De schismate donatistarum I, 18: CSEL 26,20). Opposition was immediate, even if partially motivated by factionalism (Opt., ibid.). Caecilian had evidently been consecrated in great haste, and in particular without the presence of the bishops of *Numidia, whose primate had obtained the privilege of consecrating every new bishop of Carthage (see Aug., Psalmus contra partem Donati 11,44-46: PL 43, 26); moreover, one of the consecrating bishops, *Felix of Aptunga, was suspected of being a traditor. In 312, after the murder of the interventor (temporary administrator) he had appointed for the see of Carthage (Aug., Ep. 44,4,8), the primate of Numidia, *Secundus of Tigisis, called a council of 70 bishops and declared Caecilian deposed (Opt., 1,19; Aug., Ad catholicos Epist. 18,46: CSEL 52,291; Anon., Contra Fulgentium donatistam 26: PL 43, 774 and CSEL 53,309). A lector named *Maiorinus, chaplain to Lucilla, a rich Spanish matron whom Caecilian had once deeply offended (Opt., I, 16), was elected in his place.

"One altar was erected against another" (Opt., I, 15 and 19): this was the situation that faced Constantine in late autumn 312 when N Africa came over to him without a blow being struck. Perhaps at the suggestion of his adviser Bishop *Ossius of Cordoba (Aug., Contra Ep. Parmeniani I, 4,6 and 5,10), Constantine supported Caecilian from the start and threatened his opponents with punishment (Euseb., HE X, 6; von Soden, Urkunden, 8). But when the emperor showed his intention of freeing clergy in communion with Caecilian from municipal financial burdens (munera; Euseb., HE X, 7; von Soden, Urkunden, 9), his opponents appealed to him (15 April 313) to allow the bishops of *Gaul, who had not been affected by the persecution, to judge the question (Opt., I, 22: Aug., Ep. 88,2: CSEL 24,2, 408, and von Soden, Urkunden, 11). Not long after, Maiorinus died and was succeeded by the much more formidable *Donatus of Casae Nigrae (Gesta apud Zenophilum 1; Opt., De schismate, app. 1: CSEL 26,185).

Constantine delegated the case to Bishop *Miltiades of Rome, himself an African, whose council of 2-5 October 313 pronounced in favor of Caecilian (Opt., I, 23-24). On 1 August 314 a fuller council, meeting at *Arles by order of the emperor, also absolved Caecilian and showed horror at the violent attitudes of his opponents (Opt., app. 4; von Soden, Urkunden, 16). On 15 February 315, Felix of Aptunga too was formally acquitted of the charge of traditio, in an audience at Carthage before the proconsul Aelianus (Acta Purgationis Felicis: Opt., app. 2; von Soden, Urkunden, 19; cf. Aug., Ep. 88,4 and C. Cresc. III, 70,81). After another appeal to Constantine and a reexamination of the whole case, the emperor himself gave a final judgment in Caecilian's favor, 10 November 316 (C. Cresc. III, 56,67 and 71,82. For the sequence of events, see Frend, Donatist Church, 141-159). After this, Constantine promulgated "a very severe law" against the Donatists (Aug., Ep. 105,2,9; cf. von Soden, Urkunden, 26). There were attacks on Donatist assemblies at Carthage (Passio Donati: PL 8, 753ff.). In December 320 the Donatist cause found itself in a potentially even more difficult position when Nundinarius, a deacon of the church of Constantine-Cirta, capital of Numidia, accused his bishop Sylvanus and other Numidian Donatist leaders of themselves being traditores and guilty of other grave crimes (Gesta apud Zenophilum: Opt., app. 1; cf. von Soden, Urkunden, 28). The case was submitted to Zenophilus, consularis of Numidia, and proven, but apparently the Donatists were not disadvantaged by it, and in May 321 Constantine desisted from his attempts at coercion (Euseb., Vita Constantini I, 45; Aug., Ad Donat. post Collat. 31,54 and 33,56; von Soden, Urkunden, 30).

For the rest of Constantine's reign, the Donatists gained ground. Around 320 they established their own episcopal see at *Rome (Opt., II,4; R.B. Eno, The Significance of the Lists of Roman Bishops in the Anti-Donatist Polemic: VChr 47 [1993] 158-169), in February 330 they took over the main church at Constantine (Opt., app. 10: CTh XVI, 2,7) and in 336 Donatus gathered a council of 270 bishops at Carthage (Aug., Ep. 93,43). At this time, *Jerome admits (De vir. ill. 93: PL 23, 734) that Donatus had made his the religion of "nearly all of Africa."

The situation stayed like this for the next sixty years. Despite Donatus's exile in 347, the severe repression of the Donatists by the imperial commissioners Paul and Macarius and the consequent Catholic influence from 347–361 (Opt., III, 3 and 12; VII, 6; cf. Frend, Donatist Church, 176-187), support for the Donatists hardly wavered. The Donatist leaders returned in triumph under *Julian (Opt., II, 16-18). Donatus's successor *Parmenian provided firm government and ensured the stability of the Donatist church.

On his death in 391/392, however, a major schism broke out. His successor *Primian was a rough, ignorant man who represented the Numidians and the more extreme elements of the church; his opponent *Maximian was a relative of Donatus and reflected the more moderate opinions of the Donatists of Proconsular Africa and Byzacena. The advantage was initially with the Maximianists: 100 bishops, mainly from Byzacena, condemned Primian for various disciplinary infractions at the Council of Cebarsussa (24 June 393; Aug., Ep. 43,9,26 and Enarr. 2 in Ps. 36 19-20; cf. Frend, Donatist Church, 213-220). But it was at the Council of Bagai, in S Numidia (24 April 394), attended by 310 Primianist bishops, that the schism was consummated (Aug., C. Cresc. III, 56,62 and IV, 4,5; 7,9). In the next three years, Primian's supporters won a series of legal actions against the Maximianists and were at the same time able to reduce the antiheretical legislation of *Theodosius (C. Cresc. III, 56,62; IV, 47,57; 48,58), which might have been applied against them. Despite the Maximianist schism, the year 390 saw the Donatist church at the height of its power and prosperity.

The support of some Donatists, such as Bishop *Optatus of Thamugadi (Timgad), for Gildo's revolt in 393 provided the Catholics with a unique occasion to turn the tables on their opponents. In *Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, they had an able organizer and leader who strengthened the church's discipline and increased its security through the annual councils that met at Carthage. In St. Augustine, bishop of Hippo, they found a pastor and theologian capable of defeating the Donatists in debate. From summer 403, the Catholics felt sufficiently strong to force their opponents to take part in a conference aimed at deciding which of the two parties had the most valid claim to be the "Catholic" church of N Africa (for the text, see PL 11, 1200-1201; for the debate, see P. Monceaux, Histoire littéraire, IV, 263-264 and S. Lancel, Actes, I, 14-16). Primian refused, but the following year the Catholics managed to appeal to the antiheretical legislation against the Donatists and, between 12 February and 5 March 405, the Emperor *Honorius sent to Africa edicts and supplementary decreta aimed at banning the Donatist church and confiscating its property (CTh XVI, 5,37 and 38; 6,3-4 and 5).

In the next six years the Donatists lost ground, esp. among the better-off classes, who found it prudent to conform to the emperor's will (see P. Brown, Augustine of Hippo, 240–241, the example of Celer). When in May 411 the conference of Carthage took place, presided over by the imperial representative, the tribune and notarius *Marcellinus Flavius, the Donatists could still summon up 285 bishops, just one fewer than their opponents (see Lancel, Actes, I, 117-118). The Catholics emerged victorious, however, and Donatism was again banned by an edict (CTh XVI, 5,52: 30 January 412), this time more effectively. Though some 30 Numidian bishops succeeded in meeting in Council at *Cirta, ca. 414 (Aug., C. Gaudentium I, 37,47), and though Bishop *Gaudentius of Thamugadi refused to hand his cathedral over to the authorities in 420/21 (Aug., C. Gaudentium), the Catholics clearly gained the ascendancy. Quite a few Donatist communities reunited with them (ibid. I, 12,13) in conformity with the 4th-5th-c. conciliar deliberations (P. Marone, Le deliberazioni conciliari della chiesa occidentale del IV e V secolo relative ai donatisti convertiti al cattolicesimo, in I concili occidentali secoli III-V. XXX Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Roma 3-5 maggio: SEA 78 [2001] 269-287). The last known dated Donatist inscription comes from the garrison town of Ala Milaria (Benian) in *Mauretania, but it commemorates the building of a church from 434–439 in honor of a Donatist martyr, the sanctimonialis Robba (CIL VIII, 21570-4; cf. S. Gsell, Les fouilles de Benian, Alger 1901).

Apart from the final edition of the Liber genealogus, dated between 455–463 (MGH AA, IX, 196; see P. Monceaux, Histoire littéraire, IV, 102 and VI, 247-248), the Vandal occupation and Byzantine restoration furnish but little solid information on the Donatists. In Numidia, however (e.g., at Ain Fakroun: CIL VIII 18742), Donatist-type inscriptions of the Byzantine period have been found, and there are in that province rural churches that show signs of uninterrupted occupation from the 4th to the 6th c. Donatism unexpectedly renewed its vigor in S Numidia during the pontificate of *Gregory I (Greg., Ep. I, 33; III, 32; IV, 35; VI, 34): this was not on the whole surprising, but the causes remain obscure (on the question of whether there was a Donatist revival at this time, see R.A. Markus, The Problem of "Donatism" in the Sixth Century, in Gregorio Magno e il suo tempo, XIX Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità Christian, Rome 9-12 May 1990, SEA 33 [1991] 159-166). In the 7th c. and at the time of the Arab invasion, obscurity descends once more.

II. Doctrine. The debate between Donatists and Catholics turned on the nature of the church as a society and its relations with the world and its institutions.

The Donatists considered themselves the authentic heirs of the church of N Africa as it had been before the great persecution, and in particular as it had been at *Cyprian's time. They were therefore conservative in their *liturgy, celebrated the agape as well as the *Eucharist, and ignored the new feasts accepted by the Catholics, such as *Epiphany (Aug., Sermo 202,2). They opposed *monasticism (Aug., C. litt. Petiliani III, 40,48 and Enarr. in Ps. 132,3) and kept the African Bible, while the Catholics used the Vulgate. They remained a fraternitas dedicated to fighting the devil, and they aspired to martyrdom as their forebears had done before Constantine's conversion.

From the beginning of its history, ca. 180, the N African church had rejoiced in martyrs and martyrdom and boasted of its tight-knit constitution and exclusive character (see Tertull., De spect. 1 and Apol. 50, 13, "community" = secta). "We are a society (corpus) with a common religious feeling, a uniform discipline and a common bond of hope," proclaims *Tertullian (Apol. 39,1). This conception of the church implies the complete rejection of Greco-Roman culture and philosophy (De praescr. 7), the acceptance of the church as the living dwelling of the Holy Spirit and of martyrdom as the death most pleasing to the Spirit (De Fug. 5), capable of wiping out the stain of every postbaptismal sin (Apol. 50,16; De An. 55,5). Tertullian always stresses the spiritual nature of the church (De Pud. 21) and the need for the holiness of its members, in anticipation of the imminent end. The sacraments, esp. baptism, must be administered by "a minister free from the blame of sin" (De Exhort. Cast. 10 and Bapt. 15), and the distinctive mark of the church itself was purity and integrity (De Pud. 18, "nec habentem maculam aut rugam").

With Cyprian, between 248–258, these same ideas received an institutional character. Confessors and martyrs deserved commemoration by the church, but Cyprian considered the greater glory (martyrdom) as pertaining to the bishop (Ep. 13,1: CSEL 3,2, 504-505). Only the church, represented by its bishops, could remit sins. Confessors, however illustrious, had no such right (Ep. 27,3), and voluntary martyrdom (i.e., not regulated by the church) was disapproved of (Ep. 81). At the same time, Cyprian insisted on the church's integrity and purity. "Closed garden," "sealed fountain" (Ep. 69,2; 74,11), Noah's ark: these were the main OT images he used to describe the church's exclusive nature. Moreover, in his dispute with Pope *Stephen in 254–56, Cyprian found the African bishops ready to agree that, first, no priest in mortal sin could validly administer a sacrament, and that it was the duty of the community to separate itself from a sinful priest under the pain of risking contamination by sin (Ep. 67,4); second, there could be no valid baptism administrated outside of the church, and whoever received baptism from heretics or schismatics had to be rebaptized upon entering the Catholic church (Cypr., Ep. 69-74 and Sent. epis., passim).

Donatist ecclesiology combined aspects of both Tertullian and Cyprian. The Donatists shared Cyprian's opinions on the absolute importance of the church's integrity, and appealed to his authority to support their baptismal theology (Aug., Bapt. I, 1, "de beatissimi martyris Cypriani auctoritate": PL 43, 109). At the conference of Carthage of 411 their Mandatum (Coll. Carth. III, 258: SC 224,1196) stated: "We show rather that in the Sacred Scriptures the church of God is everywhere proclaimed to be holy and immaculate" (Magis ostendimus Ecclesiam Domini in scripturis divinis sanctam et immaculatam fore ubique nuntiatam). But integrity came first. Only the pure church must be proclaimed to the outside world. The churches outside of Africa, being in communion with Caecilian, had apostatized. Christianity survived only in Africa (Aug., Ad Cathol. Epist. 9,23). Following Cyprian, Parmenian claimed that the Donatist church was truly the "closed garden and sealed fountain" (hortum conclusum et fontem signatum: Opt., I, 10), and possessed the requisite gifts (dotes: ibid.). From this it followed that only sacraments administered by a "holy minister," i.e., a Donatist, were valid (*Petilian, cited by Aug., C. litt. Petiliani II, 2,4; 7,14: CSEL 52,24,25). Baptism received from someone outside of the church was as if received "from a dead person" (ibid. II, 7,14 and cf. Cypr., Ep. 71,1). Consequently, baptism and the other sacraments dispensed by traditor clergy (i.e., by Catholics) were invalid, and Catholics who entered the Donatist church had to be rebaptized, a requirement that seemed particularly scandalous to Augustine.

From Cyprian the Donatists likewise received a solid episcopal tradition, giving great authority to whatever their bishops taught ("Quod volumus sanctum est," cit. by Aug., C. Ep. Parmeniani II, 13,30 and confirmed by Crispinus of Calama, who spoke with "patriarchali sermone," Aug., C. Cresc. III, 46,50). Parmenian, like Cyprian, taught that the bishop was an intermediary between the Christian people and God (Aug., C. Ep. Parmen. II, 8,15: PL 43, 59-60). In the Donatist conception, the bishop was a biblical man "who always had the gospel on his lips and martyrdom in his heart" (Passio Marculi: PL 8, 762). Still following Cyprian, communion with Rome was maintained through a succession of "true bishops" (Opt., II, 4), which lasted until the conference of Carthage. The Donatist bishop of Rome, though, came after the primates of Carthage and Numidia in importance. Finally, the Donatists rejected the heresies condemned by the church in the past.

From another important perspective, however, the roots of the Donatist doctrinal tradition went beyond Cyprian to the original ideas of N African Christianity. Like Tertullian, Donatists considered separation from lapsi and persecution by the state as distinctive signs of rectitude. To cite again the Donatist Mandatum of 411, they claimed above all that they were "bishops of the Catholic truth, which suffers persecution, but does not persecute" (Januarianus et caeteri, episcopi veritatis catholicae quae persecutionem patitur, non quae facit: SC 224,1194; PL 11, 1408 B). They did not acknowledge the "Christian times" resulting from the conversion of the emperors to Christianity. Petilian of Constantine, like Donatus himself (Quid est imperatori cum ecclesia?: Opt., III, 73), considered secular magistrates irrevocably hostile to the church, and the Donatist church as continuing the tradition of the just sufferer, traceable back to the time of Cain and Abel (Petilian of Constantine, cit. by Aug., C. litt. Petiliani II, 92,202).

The role of the suffering people of God implied the ideal of martyrdom, including voluntary martyrdom, which Cyprian deprecated (Ep. 81). As with other themes, the matter is clear in Petilian: "So I say that he [Christ] has ordained that we must undergo death for the faith that each must keep in order to be in communion with the church. In fact Christianity progresses through the death of its followers" (Aug., C. litt. Petiliani II, 89,196; cf. Tertull., Apol. 50,13: "the blood of Christians is seed"). In rural Numidia, Donatist chapels invariably had the body of a martyr (real or presumed) under the altar and, close by, a sealed vase or an urn containing relics (for many examples, see A. Berthier et al., Les Vestiges du Christianisme). It was the "succession of martyrs" that mattered (Acta Saturnini 20: PL 8, 703) and, as in Tertullian's time, martyrdom was willingly accepted as a sign of the Holy Spirit's continuing work in the church. "In our church," claimed the author of the Acta Saturnini (ch. 20) "the virtues of the people are multiplied by the presence of the Spirit. The joy of the Spirit is to conquer in the martyrs and triumph in the confessors" (Tertull., De Spect. 29, "ad tubam angeli erigere, ad martyrum palmas gloriare"). For this reason the Donatist liturgy seems to have left room for ecstatic or enthusiastic songs of praise, along with the celebration of the Eucharist.

"Praise the Lord and exalt him, you just, let us glory in the Lord and rejoice"; this inscription in a church at Thamallula in Mauretania sums up the conviction of many ordinary Donatists in the 4th c. (S. Gsell, Bull. arch. du Comité des travaux historiques et archéologiques [1908] CCXVI); "praise God," Deo laudes*, was the password and war cry of the Donatists, immediately recognizable as such (Aug., Ep. 108,5,14; C. litt. Petiliani II, 65,146; 84,188; Enarr. in Ps. 132,6; cf. Monceaux, Histoire littéraire, IV, 439-443 and Berthier et al., Vestiges, 77). At the same time the Donatists produced intellectual and well-educated laymen (see Aug., Ep. 43 and 44) like *Cresconius, in reply to whose treatise in defense of Petilian Augustine dedicated four books, and able theologians like Vitellius Afer (Gennad., De Script. Eccles. 4: PL 59, 1059) and *Tyconius. Tyconius developed the doctrine that God's people had been divided from time immemorial into true and false brothers, and that Donatus had rightly insisted on this separation, in a grand theory of human society. The two churches represented two types of humanity, defined less by external obedience than by the will of individuals toward justice or toward evil. These ideas, though repudiated by the Donatists, influenced the Augustinian conception of the "two cities" (see A. Pincherle, Da Ticonio a Sant'Agostino: Ricerche Religiose 1 [1925] 443-466). Tyconius's biblical exegesis, summarized in his Regulae, had a great influence on Augustine's literary works (P. Marone, L'uso delle "Regole" di Ticonio nella produzione letteraria di Agostino: SMSR 24/2 [2000] 241-254), and on later medieval exegesis, esp. that of *Beatus of Liébana and *Bede (P.C. Bori, La ricezione delle Regole di Ticonio, da Agostino a Erasmo: AnSE 5 [1988] 125-142).

III. A protest movement. Though originally and principally a religious movement that considered Donatus a reformer and purifier of the church (Aug., C. Cresc. III, 56,62) and drew its adherents from every class within the N African church, Donatism had a strong social and cultural appeal. The recovery of the martyr psychology and of the apocalyptic tradition of N African Christianity appealed particularly to Christians in rural communities, for whom the administrative and fiscal reforms of *Diocletian and *Constantine meant heavier taxes and a greater burden of debt.

"It was not modern historians who invented Donatist Numidia" (Lancel, Actes, I, 155). Contemporary witnesses all admit that Donatism originated in Numidia and Mauretania Sitifensis, esp. in the rural areas (thus Aug., Ep. 58,1 and 129,6; Enarr. in Ps. 36,11,19: "Adtende nunc Caecilianum: tu servasti Numidiam, ille orbem terrarum"; Ep. ad Cathol. 19,51: "Numidia ubi vos praepolletis"; see Petilian, Coll. Carth. I, 165, and Alypius, ibid., I, 181 [Donatist rural dioceses]; Praedestinatus, De Haeres. 69, on the *circumcellions, "in partibus Numidiae superioris et Mauretaniae"). Numidia's ecclesiastical identity, going back to the end of the 3rd c., reflected its economic and geographical differences from Proconsular Africa. The S slope of the Atlas range and the river valleys are set in a high plateau which the Romans, in the 2nd c., had managed to transform into a zone of dry cultivation, esp. of olives and barley. From the 4th c. this region was densely populated with villages (see S. Gsell, Atlas archéologique de l'Algérie, Paris 1911, esp. feuille, Constantine, and Berthier et al., Vestiges, 23-31). The remaining buildings and the excavations in central Numidia, esp. those of André Berthier and his colleagues from 1930 on, have revealed a uniform Christian population. Churches and chapels dedicated to the martyrs were, with private olive presses, the most important buildings in the villages (ibid., 166-171). Despite the insufficiency of dating criteria, it seems that many of these chapels were in use contemporaneously, between 380–450 (ibid., 170).

Before the "great persecution," Christianity in Numidia tended to be uncompromising in its attitudes (see Acta Maximiliani, ed. H. Musurillo, Oxford 1972, 244). Support for the Donatism represented by Donatus of Casae Nigrae himself was to be expected. Augustine held that the schism had originated in Numidia (Serm. 46, 15,39: PL 38, 293). When the *circumcellions first made their appearance, ca. 340 (Opt., III, 4), they showed that the social and economic burdens (debts, sense of social injustice) had found their outlet through Donatism. And yet antagonism toward the landed proprietors was expressed in religious terms. The leaders of the circumcellions called themselves duces sanctorum, while the others were agonistici (Opt., III, 4, 81). The emperors who tried to suppress the Donatists were called "precursors of the Antichrist," representatives of the saeculum (Passio Maximiani et Isaaci: PL 8, 768 A; Passio Marculi, ibid., 761 D), whom Christians had the duty to eternally oppose. In the 5th c. the same hostility to the secular authorities was manifested against *Genseric and the *Vandal rulers (Liber genealogus, 627: MGH, AA, IX, 196).

Some Donatist leaders supported Firmus, the rebel leader of the Kabyles, in 372–375 (Aug., Ep. 87,10 and C. Ep. Parmen. I, 10,16 and 11,17), and it has been established that exorbitant taxes were one cause of the revolt (Zos., Hist. nova IV, 16). *Gildo's revolt was also supported in Numidia (Aug., C. Ep. Parmen. II, 2,4 and C. litt. Petiliani II, 23,53; 83,184; and 92,209), but it would be anachronistic to consider Donatism a political revolt against the empire or even a fruit of N African particularism. In terms of the cultural life of N Africa, Numidian Donatism marked a vigorous renaissance of traditional indigenous N African art, esp. that of wood sculpture (see Frend, The Revival of Berber Art: Antiquity 16 [1942] 342-352). The language of the Donatist church's liturgy and preaching was Latin. The Donatist leaders, such as *Petilian or *Emeritus, came from the class that spoke Latin and had been brought up on the classics, just like their Catholic opponents. Nevertheless, the circumcellion movement itself would not have appeared credible without a real, though not fully articulated, connection between the rigorist tradition of Christianity in N Africa, reflected by the Donatists, and political and economic discontent. The Donatist bishops, like *Macrobius, Augustine's rival at Hippo, were ready to identify themselves with the circumcellion movement, despite the differences of culture or even of language (see Aug., Ep. 108, 5,14 and Ep. 111,1). Augustine, on the other hand, was more at ease with the wealthy or ruling classes of his diocese (see Frend, The Donatist Church, ch. 20).

Conclusion: Donatism began as a revolt against what many Christians in N Africa considered a betrayal of the faith by their own leaders, and continued as a protest against the effects of the christiana tempora initiated by Constantine; it drew its strength from the puritan and apocalyptic traditions of N African theology. Educated laymen and clergy, as well as rural circumcellions, could find their identity in the Donatist church. Moreover, Donatism was sustained by strong popular memories of the dies traditionis/ thurificationis (see CIL VIII, 6700) and of the "persecution of Paul and Macarius" (the tempora macariana). The fact that Donatism did not become the religion of the N African people—as monophysitism became that of the Copts—depended on an adverse combination of circumstances. At the crucial moment of the failure of Gildo's revolt in 398, the Donatists found themselves faced by a revived and reorganized Catholic church, ably guided by Augustine and his friends and supported by the coercive power of the imperial authorities. After 429, the prevalence of new religious, political and military factors under the *Vandals and the *Byzantines prevented any effective revival of Donatism, until N African Christianity itself went into irremediable decline. However, the Donatist heritage of puritan nonconformity, which associated concern for Christian integrity with social justice, survived and has continued to influence Christian thought and action in the West into the present.

P. Monceaux, Histore littéraire de l'Afrique chrétienne, IV-VII, Paris 1912–23 (repr. Brussels 1966); H. von Soden, Urkunden zur Entstehungsgeschichte des Donatismus, Bonn 1913 (repr. Berlin 1950) (Kleine Texte für Vorlesungen und Übungen 122); A. Berthier - F. Logeart - M. Martin, Les Vestiges du christian- isme antique dans la Numidie Centrale, Algiers 1942; G.G. Willis, St. Augustine and the Donatist Controversy, London 1950; J.P. Brisson, Autonomisme et christianisme dans l'Afrique romaine de Septime Sévère à l'invasion arabe, Paris 1958; H.J. Diesner, Kirche und Staat in spätrömischen Reich, Berlin 1963; E.L. Grasmück, Coercitio, Staat und Kirche im Donatistenstreit, Bonn 1964; E. Tengström, Donatisten und Katholiken: Soziale, wirtschaftliche und politische Aspekte einer nordafrikanischen Kirchenspaltung, Göteborg 1964; R. Crespin, Ministère et sainteté, pastorale du clergé et solution de la crise donatiste dans la vie et doctrine de Saint Augustin, Paris 1965; P. Brown, Augustine of Hippo. A Biography, London 1967; W.H.C. Frend, The Donatist Church, a Movement of Protest in Roman North Africa, Oxford [2]1971; S. Lancel, Actes de la Conférence de Carthage en 411, Paris 1972–75 (SC 194-195, 224), 3 vols., esp. vol. I; B. Kriegbaum, Kirche der Traditoren oder Kirche der Märtyrer? Die Vorgeschichte des Donatismus, Innsbruck - Vienna 1986; M.A. Tilley, Donatist Martyr Stories: The Church in Conflict in Roman North Africa, Liverpool 1996; Id., The Bible in Christian North Africa: The Donatist World, Minneapolis 1997; S. Lancel - J.S. Alexander, Donatistae: AugL, II/3-4, Basel 1999, 606-638; M. Edwards, tr. and ed., Optatus: Against the Donatists, TTH 27, Liverpool 1997.

W.H.C. Frend

IV. Donatism outside Africa. We know of Donatist groups in Italy, Spain and Gaul, small in number and hardly active. In *Rome they reorganized the community of the montenses, the name deriving perhaps from the place of their meetings, also called campitae and campenses. According to *Optatus (II, 4), the Roman group was founded in 320; it was led at first by a temporary administrator (interventor), then by a bishop. Augustine (Contra litt. Petiliani II, 108,246; Ep. ad. cath. secta donat. 3,6) attests that the Donatists sent bishops to Rome and to Spain. The Coll. Cartag. cites the names of these bishops: Victorinus, *Boniface, Eucolpius, *Macrobius, *Lucian, Claudian and *Felix. Claudian, Lucian's successor as leader of the Donatist community, set himself up as the pope of the Donatists and was supported by the partisans of the antipope *Ursinus; he opposed *Damasus, pope of the Catholica, who, with the help of the secular arm, sought to exile him. Claudian managed to remain at Rome until 378 when, on the occasion of the Council of Rome, he was expelled and went to Africa, where he created the group of the Claudianenses. At the Council of Rome of 386, Donatists and Catholics were reconciled and the few existing Donatists joined the Catholics. In Spain, we do not know where they settled. It was probably here, or in Gaul, that Donatus the Great died and Parmenian was ordained (Opt., II, 7). It is traditionally said (the Maurists, Monceaux) that Lucilla, the promoter of the schism, was Spanish, despite the divergent information given by Optatus, Augustine and the trial of Sylvanus. The Donatists' links with Spain left traces among the Priscillianists. In Gaul, they began to live in groups during the Vandal domination and persecution, and during the emigration of the schismatics. It was at the Council of *Arles (314) that the contest between Caecilian and Donatus was clarified. The bishop to whom Augustine refers (C. Cresc. III, 63,70) must certainly have lived in Gaul. *Leo the Great and *Avitus tell us that in 458 and 502 there were still Donatists at *Narbonne and *Lyons, who ended, perhaps, by being absorbed by the Catholics.

Monceaux IV, 47-49; 122-124; V. Monachino, Il primato nello scisma donatista: AHP 2 (1964) 7-44; M. Sotomayor y Muro, Historia de la Iglesia en España, BAC, Madrid 1979, 1, 193-195; PCBE 1, 210; 1, 646; 1, 666.

E. Romero Pose

DONATISTS

I. Anonymous - II. Martyrs.

I. Anonymous. The followers of Donatus wrote many treatises, libelli and chronicles. We only have simple descriptions of the famous anonymous libelli mentioned by *Augustine. Donatist defamatory literature against Catholic bishops nearly always hid behind anonymity, until efforts were made to identify the authors so as to punish them (CTh IX, 34,1-9). But it was never possible to bring to an end the systematic search for anonymous Donatist literature, which in the end mingled with Catholic writings.

CPL 722: Ep. Pseudocypriani ad plebem Carthaginensem: PL 4, 433 - CSEL 3/3, 273-274; CPL 723: Ep. Hieronymi ad Damasum papam: PLS 1, 303; CPL 84: Prophetiae ex omnibus libris collectae: PLS 1, 177, 1738-1741; CPL 2254: Liber genealogus: PL 49, 523-543; MGH AA, 9, 154-196; CPL 2055: P.D. et Saturnini: ST 65 (1935) 3-71; 387-402; PL 8, 688-703; CPL 2063: P. Max., Sec. et Donatillae: AB 9 (1890) 110-116; ST 65 (1935) 75-97; Monceaux IV, Paris 1912; E. Romero Pose, Ticonio y el sermón "in nat. sanct. innoc.": Gregorianum 60 (1979) 513-544.

E. Romero Pose

II. Martyrs. The Donatists liked to call themselves a church of martyrs, "advocates with God." Their desire for martyrdom went as far as suicide (Aug., Ep. 173,4; C. Gaud. I, 1; Retract. II, 85; C. litt. Pet. II, 20,46; C. Cresc. III, 49,54). They appropriated martyrs from before the schism (312), and added to them those who perished during the conflicts with the Catholics (Opt., III, 4.6.8), whom *Optatus calls dubii martyres (III. 8). Provincial councils were called to settle the question of claimed Donatist martyrs. From epigraphs of martyrs in *Africa—"Africa is full of the bodies of martyrs" (Aug., Ep. 78)—it is difficult to distinguish a Catholic from a Donatist martyr; but half of the martyrs' inscriptions of 4th- to 5th-c. *Numidia belong to the martyrs of Donatus. They have Punic or Libyan names, and are not cited by *Augustine, the martyrologies or the calendar of *Carthage. Donatist literature on martyrs comprises sermons, letters and booklets, which can be classified as follows: (a) common martyrs, prior to the split of 312, with adaptations of acts and passions in use in Africa; they are the precursors of the schism; (b) proper martyrs. The lists of Donatist martyrs are very long, esp. those pertaining to the persecution of Macarius (347), the Edict of Union (405–412) and the Decimations of the *Circumcellions (340–347).

CPL 719-721, 2049a, 2055, 2063. Acta Crispinae: ed. P. Franchi de' Cavalieri: ST 9 (1902) 23-35, 78-79 (= H. Musurillo, The Acts of the Christian Martyrs, Oxford 1972, 302-309); P. Maximae, Secundae et Donatillae: ed. De Smedt: AB 9 (1890) 110-116; ed. P. Franchi de' Cavalieri: ST 65 (1935) 75-97; Acta Saturnini: ed. P. Franchi de' Cavalieri: ST 65 (1935) 3-71.387-402; PL 8, 688-703; P. Advocati et Donati: PL 8, 752-758; P. Marculi: PL 8, 760-766: AB 53 (1935) 81-89; P. Maximiani et Isaaci: PL 8, 767-774; Sermo de P. Cypriani: R. Reitzenstein, Die Nachrichten über den Tod Cyprians: SHAW 14 (1913) 46-69; ed. H. Musurillo, Acts of the Christian Martyrs, 169-175; G. Lanata, Gli atti dei Martiri come documenti processuali, Milan 1973, 184-193, 242-247; P. Monceaux, Histoire littéraire de l'Afrique chrétienne, Paris 1912, III, 93-187; IV, 461-484; V, 35-98; V. Saxer, Morts Martyrs Reliques en Afrique chrétienne aux premiers siècles, Paris 1980, 235-244; E. Romero Pose, A proposito de las Actas y Pasiones donatistas: SSR 4 (1980) 59-76; W. Lazewski, La sentenza agostiniana: Martyrem non facit poena sed causa, Rome 1986; J.-L. Maier, Le dossier donatiste, Berlin 1987; V. Saxer, L'Afrique latine: Hagiographies 1 (1994) 25-95.

E. Romero Pose

DONATUS AELIUS, grammarian (4th c.). A prominent figure in 4th-c. Roman culture, at his school of rhetoric he taught the young *Jerome, who remembered his celebrated teacher with affection (Chron. ad ann. 353). We have from Donatus a scholastic manual of particular importance: divided into a part dedicated to beginners (Ars minor or prima) and one directed to upper-level students (Ars maior or secunda), the text would become an authoritative tool for the study of Latin throughout the Middle Ages. We have some parts of a commentary on Virgil, including a dedication and a biography of the poet, followed by an introduction to the Bucolics, to which can be added some fragments cited in Servius, Priscian and the Scholia Bernensia. Donatus presents the poet Virgil as a master of every doctrine, a model that would be widely exploited in medieval literature until Dante. Finally, we have larger portions of Donatus's commentary on the comedies of Terence.

DNP 3, Aelius D. 3, 775; N. Marinone, Elio Donato, Macrobio e Servio commentatori di Virgilio, Vercelli 1946; L. Holtz, A l'école de Donat, de saint Augustin à Bède: Latomus 36 (1977) 522-538; L. Holtz, Donat et la tradition de l'enseignement grammatical: étude sur l'Ars Donati et sa diffusion (IV-IX siècle), Paris 1981.

G. Pilara

DONATUS of Besançon (ca. 590–ca. 660). Saint, feast 7 August. Born in Upper Burgundy, he embraced monastic life at a very young age, entering the monastery of Luxeuil under the guidance of St. *Columbanus. He became bishop of Besançon in 624 and founded a men's monastery (St. Paul), to which he gave a rule that combined those of St. *Columbanus and St. *Benedict, and a woman's monastery (Joussa-Moutier), whose rule he wrote himself, basing it on those of Saints Columbanus, Benedict and *Caesarius of *Arles. Upon his death he was buried in the monastery of St. Paul.

CPL 1860; ASS Aug. II, Venice 1751, 197-200; BS 4, 785f.; DSp 3, 1573-1577; Lex des Mitt 3, 1237-1238; LTK 3, 334; R. Hanslik, Regula Donati, SP 10 (TU 107), Berlin 1970, 100-104; A. de Vogüé, La Règle de Donat pour l'abbesse Gauthstrude: Benedictina 25 (1978) 219-313.

G. Pilara

DONATUS of Carthage (d. 355)
I. First period - II. Conflict with Caecilian - III. Donatus's government, 317–347 - IV. Fall and exile, 347–355 - V. Theology.

A native of Casae Nigrae, he was bishop of *Carthage. From 315–355 he inspired and led the *Donatist schism in N Africa.

I. First period. Born ca. 270 at Casae Nigrae, in S *Numidia some 100 km (62 mi) S of *Tebessa, he may have been bishop at the time of the "great persecution" (303–305). He firmly opposed any collaboration with the pagan authorities and later, on 5 October 313, was declared guilty by a council and by Pope *Miltiades of having rebaptized lapsi among the clergy (Opt., De schismate donat. I, 24). In *Augustine's time he was considered responsible for the schism at the time of Bishop *Mensurius of Carthage (before 303–311/12) (Brev. Collationis cum Donatistis III, 12,24). When *Caecilian was elected to succeed Mensurius, Donatus seems to have worked to coordinate the opposition, but became its leader only after the death of Caecilian's main rival, Lucilla's chaplain *Maiorinus (Gesta apud Zenophilum: Opt., De schismate, app. I: CSEL 26,185).

II. Conflict with Caecilian. Caecilian's opponents appealed to *Constantine to arbitrate between Caecilian and themselves (April 313). Constantine delegated the case to Pope Miltiades (311–314), whose council of 19 Italian and Gallic bishops pronounced against Donatus and in favor of Caecilian (5 October 313). On 1 August 314, a larger council meeting at *Arles and representing the prefectures of *Gaul cleared Caecilian of all charges. Moreover, in February 315 the proconsular tribunal acquitted Bishop *Felix of Aptunga, one of Caecilian's consecrators, of the charge of being a traditor during the persecution. Some N African Christians were not prepared to accept the beginning of a new era in relations between church and empire and aligned themselves with Donatus, seeing him as representing the ideal of a complete separation between the church and the world. Donatus, imprisoned in Italy, received from Constantine another opportunity to confront Caecilian (Opt., De schismate, app. VI), but took advantage of the occasion to escape from prison and return to N Africa (Opt., I, 26). Despite Constantine's final verdict in favor of Caecilian (10 November 316; Aug., C. Cresc. III, 71,82, and Ad Donatistas post collationem 33,56), and a direct persecution of the adherents to Donatism at Carthage in spring 317 (Aug., Ep. 105,9, "severissima lex"), from then on Donatus was accepted as bishop of Carthage by the majority of N African Christians (Jerome, De vir. ill. 93: "paene totam Africam decepit").

III. Donatus's government, 317–347. The details of Donatus's long government are scarce and reach us only through the writings of his opponents. He spared no effort to ensure recognition and acceptance of his cause throughout N Africa (Opt., III, 3). His personal prestige among his followers was immense. Like *Cyprian before him, he united the priestly and prophetic functions (ibid., and Aug., In Joannis Ev. tract. XIII, 17). People swore "on his white hair," as they might today "on the beard of the Prophet" (Aug., In Ps. 10,5). During his lifetime he was known simply as "Donatus of Carthage" (Opt., III, 3: CSEL 26,76). More prosaic admirers at the end of the century saw in him "the man who purified the church of Carthage of error" (Aug., C. Cresc. III, 56,62). In 336 he successfully defied the efforts of Gregory, Constantine's praefectus praetorio in Africa, to remove him (Opt., III, 3); indeed, during the same period he gathered a council at Carthage of not less than 270 bishops (Aug., Ep. 93,43). On this occasion he showed sufficient flexibility over ecclesiastical problems in distant *Mauretania, and allowed some exceptions to the rule that baptism given by a minister not in communion with his church had to be repeated when an individual or a community became Donatists.

IV. Fall and exile, 347–355. In 346, Caecilian having left the scene (and perhaps encouraged by *Athanasius of Alexandria's restoration, 21 October 346), Donatus asked the emperor *Constans to recognize him as sole bishop of Carthage (Opt., III, 1). Constans sent a commission to Carthage composed of two imperial notarii, Paul and Macarius, who came with gifts for the poor (ibid., III, 3) and some instructions to deliver. They soon made it clear, however, that they were siding with Donatus's rival, *Gratus. When they finally contacted Donatus, they got a rude answer from him: at their meeting Donatus made his famous remark, "Quid est imperatori cum ecclesia?" (ibid., III, 3). Riots broke out at Carthage (Passio Maximiani et Isaaci), while in the countryside the commissioners were attacked by *circumcellions (Opt., III, 4). Unity was then proclaimed, with Gratus as bishop of Carthage (ibid., III, 1). Donatus was arrested and exiled, probably in Gaul. He had misjudged the situation, and died ca. 355 (Jerome, Chron. ad ann. 355) without setting foot in Africa again.

V. Theology. No theological work of Donatus's has survived. We can gather something of his opinions, however, from the few citations used by Augustine in Contra epistolam Parmeniani, while *Jerome mentions a work, De Spiritu Sancto, characterizing it as "Arian" (De vir. ill. 93). Donatus's ideas recall those of Cyprian and are centered on a Christian version of the doctrine of the "remnant." Without abandoning the idea that the church should be universal, he thought that at present it was a small body of the saved, surrounded by false Christians. The parable of the tares could be applied to these latter, whose number had been increased by the fact that the church outside Africa maintained communion with Caecilian. Only the African church remained "God's field" (see Aug., Contra ep. Parmen. II, 2,5), although the idea of a final universality was not abandoned. Donatus, ca. 314, sent *Victor of Garba to *Rome to maintain the "true succession" to the apostles there (Opt., II, 4), and after 343 put the Donatist church in contact with the Eastern party at the Council of *Serdica (Aug., Ep. 44,3,6 and C. Cresc. III, 34,38 and IV, 44,52). But for him, as for other Donatist leaders, the criterion of integrity was prior to that of universality as a proof of Catholicism. According to a fleeting hint of Jerome, the Holy Spirit played a considerable role for Donatus, as it had in Tertullian's doctrine of the church. There is not doubt that Donatus was an important Christian leader in his time. Augustine was prepared to associate him with Cyprian among the "precious stones" of the N African church ("Lapis pretiosus erat Cyprianus, sed mansit in huius ornamento: lapis pretiosus erat Donatus": Serm.* 37,3: PL 38, 223). Like Athanasius in the East, he represented the new forces of popular Christianity that emerged with the triumph of the church under Constantine.

Augustine, Contra epistulam Parmeniani II, 2,5; Monceaux V, 104ff.; W.H.C. Frend, The Donatist Church, Oxford [2]1971, 153-171, 177-182; on the question of whether Donatus of Casae Nigrae was Donatus of Carthage, see J.S. Alexander, Donatus of Carthage and Donatus of Casae Nigrae: JTS 31 (1980) 540-547; PCBE 1, 292-303; W.H.C. Frend, Donatus "paene totam Africam decepit": How?: Journal of Ecclesiastical History 48 (1997) 611-627; J.S. Alexander, Donatus 1, AugL, II/5-6, 644-646.

W.H.C. Frend

DONUS, pope (676–678). Native of *Rome and son of Mauricius, he succeeded *Adeodatus II (672–676). Donus (or Domnus) brought an end to the brief schism of *Ravenna, whose archbishop had expressed autocephalous tendencies. He dispersed the monks of a Roman monastery inclined to *Nestorian positions. From a letter sent him by the emperor Constantine IV (but arriving at Rome after the pope's death) we deduce with certainty that Donus did not differ from his predecessors on the monothelite question, holding firmly against this heresy. The LP attests Donus's intense building activity: he built the church of S. Eufemia on the via Appia and had the great atrium of St. Peter's basilica paved with large slabs of white marble. He died 11 June 678 and was buried in St. Peter's.

Mansi 11, 195-202; LP I, 348-349; II, 255-256, n. 4; Jaffé I, 479; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941, 365-367; DHGE 14, 671f. (H. Marot); LTK[3] 3, 336 (G. Schwaiger); EPapi I, 610-612 (S. Gasparri).

M. Spinelli

DOORKEEPER (Porter). The letter of Pope *Cornelius (d. 253) sent to *Fabius of Antioch mentions the existence at Rome of doorkeepers (ostiarius, ianitor; in Greek pylōros or thyrōros); it does not indicate the number, but probably there would have been seven. The Liber pontificalis* presents two lists of the cursus clericalis: the first, at the time of Pope *Caius (283-296), places the ostiarius at the first level (p. 161, ed. Duchesne); the second, at the time of Pope *Sylvester (314-335), omits it (p. 171), but names a custos martyrum. The ministry of doorkeeping is recorded in the Constitutum Silvestri (cap. 11: PL 8,838) and in the Apostolic Constitutions (2,36,3; 2,28,5) and by ps.-*Ignatius (Ad Antioch. 12: PG 5,908). It was not an obligatory degree in the ecclesiastical cursus; this began with the other orders. *Paulinus of Nola counted doorkeepers among the clergy (Carm. 1,10; 19,447). The so-called council of 275 bishops celebrated under Pope Sylvester (actually, a ps.-council ca. 500) prescribed that Si quis ad clericatum promoveri desiderat, hoc iustum est ut sit ostiarius annum unum (can 5: PL 8,826; Liber pont., ed. Duschesne, p. 303). Doorkeepers were also named in the *Theodosian Code in a law of *Gratian of 377 (CTh 16,12,24), destined for the vicarius of Italy, Catafronius, to exempt him from the munera personalia. In 258 at Rome, a doorkeeper Romanus was killed at the same time as the deacon *Lawrence (Liber pont. 1,155, ed. Duchesne). In the Didascalia apostolorum* (2,57,6; 2,58,1) deacons perform the functions of a doorkeeper. While according to the so-called council of Laodicea the *subdeacons must monitor the doors (can. 43), according to the Apostolic Constitutions, the subdeacons monitored the doors where men entered, while the deaconesses those where women entered (2,25,26) (see PL 20,671 note d); these were listed among the clerical offices (2,26,3; 2,28,5; 3,11,1-3; 6,17,2). The anonymous De septem ordinibus puts the ministry of doorkeeper in second place, after the fossor (gravedigger), with the duty of guarding everything that was inside and outside of the church and even in omnibus fideles recipiant, respuant infideles (2: PL 30,152; ed. A. W. Kalff, Würzburg 1935, p. 35).

At Milan, the doorkeeper prevents *Monica from "bringing to the tombs of the saints porridge, bread and wine" (*Augustine, Conf. 6,2). Doorkeepers are mentioned by Pope *Gelasius (Ep. 14,2: Thiel 363). For Pope *Pelagius (d. 561) the ministries of the doorkeeper and the bishop are at two extremes, the former the lowest and the latter the highest, in the ecclesiastical hierarchy (Liber pont. 1,303; cfr. 1,309). The office of doorkeeper in the Roman church was replaced, accordng to Duchesne, by the mansionarii (sacristans) (Origines du culte chrétien, Paris [5]1925, p. 365, n. 3; for the mansionarii cf. Diehl 1290 and 1290A). There are testimonies of doorkeepers at *Trier (13, 789; Diehl 1288) and *Salona (CIL 3, 13142; Diehl 1289; see index of Diehl, vol. III, p. 374), at *Jerusalem (DACL 14,1532f.), and at *Hippo, where Augustine named a needy ostiarius of the church of St. Theogenes (Ep. 26, Divjak). According to the Statuta ecclesiae antiqua, written in *Gaul in the second half of the 5th c., we have the ordination of a doorkeeper: "When a doorkeeper is ordained, at the beginning it falls to the archdeacon to explain to him how he must comport himself in the house of God. Then at the signal of the *archdeacon, the bishop will give him the keys of the church and will say to him: 'Be attentive,' alluding to the fact that he will have to give an account to God of the things he guarded with these keys" (can 97). *Isidore of Seville writes that the doorkeeper had authority to allow only the faithful to enter church and to reject the unworthy (De off. 2,15: PL 83,974). The Council of *Narbonne (589) joins the office of doorkeeper with attending to the doors (can. 13). The Council of *Toledo (597) established that, in the absence of a priest or deacon, the bishop "chooses a doorkeeper, who maintains the cleaning of the church, and who, every evening, lights all the candles of the holy relics" (can. 2); the Council of Toledo of 633 ordered that "the doorkeepers watch over the only door by which the bishops should enter" (can. 4) on the occasion of a council.

In antiquity there were penitents who could not have access to orders; they were permitted, in some places, to become doorkeepers (see Council of Toledo in 397/400: can. 2; Braga in 572: can. 23); the subdeacon widower, if he remarried, was demoted to the rank of doorkeeper (Council of Toledo in 397/400: can. 4; Braga in 572: can. 44). The office of doorkeeper was abolished in 1972 by Pope Paul VI, after the Vatican II Council (Ministeria quaedam, in Enchiridion Vaticanum 4,1749-1770).

DACL 14,1525-1533; DTC 12,2600-2602; EC 9,435-437; M. Andrieu, Les ordres mineurs dans l'ancien rituel romain: RevSR 5 (1925) 232-274, esp. 253ff.; Ph. Oppenheim, De antiquissima quoad ostiarios documentatione: Ephem. Liturgicae 52 (1938) 179-186; J. Lungkofler, Die Vorstufen zu den höheren Weihen nach dem Liber Pontificalis: ZKTh 66 (1942) 1-19; W. Croce, Die niederen Weihen und ihre hierarchische Wertung: ZKTh 70 (1948) 257-314; C. De Beaucourt, E. Mura, Les degrès du Sacerdoce: I, Ordres mineurs, II, Ordres sacrés, Paris 1947; V. Monachino, La cura pastorale a Milano, Cartagine e Roma, Rome 1947, 17-18; 154; 325; B. Fischer, Esquisse historique sur les ordres mineurs: Maison-Dieu 61(1960) 58-69; J.G. Davies, Deacons, Diaconesses and Minor Orders in the Patristic Period: JEH 14 (1963) 1-15; B. Botte, Le problème des ordres mineurs: QLP 46(1965)26-31; J. Lecuyer, Les ordres mineurs en questions: Maison-Dieu 102 (1970) 97-107; R. E. Reynolds, The Ordinals of Christ from Their Origins to the Twelfth Century, Berlin-New York 1978; A. Faivre, Naissance d'une hierarchie, Paris, 1977, pp. 229, 236, 287; R. E. Reynolds, Clerical Orders in the Early Middle Ages: Duties and Ordination, Ashgate 1999; P. Pellegrini, Militia clericatus, monachici ordines. Istituzioni ecclesiastiche e società in Gregorio Magno, Catania 2008, p. 83.

A. Di Berardino

DOROTHEA (early 4th c.). *Eusebius tells how *Maximinus Daia was in love with a Christian noblewoman of *Alexandria, whom he condemned to exile because she rejected him (HE 8,14,15). This woman, whose name Eusebius does not know, is called Dorothea by *Rufinus in his translation of Eusebius's ecclesiastical history. Baronius wrongly identified her with *Catherine of Alexandria; she has also been confused with a legendary Dorothea of Caesarea in *Cappadocia, executed under *Diocletian (BHL 2321-2325; K. Wolf, The Legend of Saint Dorothy: AB 114 [1996] 41-72; BHL 3981 and 9000 are plagiarisms of 2323) and mentioned by Mart. hier. on 6 February.

Also, there was a Dorothea among the 40 women executed at Heraclea in Thrace under Licinius (BHG 2281).

Díaz 429; BS 4, 816, 820-826; LCI 6, 89-92.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

DOROTHEUS (d. after 380). Antiochene presbyter, follower of *Meletius, entrusted by *Basil the Great with some delicate diplomatic missions. In 372, while still a deacon, he was sent by Basil to *Alexandria to ask *Athanasius's mediation in the relations with the Western church; the mission was unsuccessful. In 374 and 377 he went to *Damasus to ask him to send a Western delegation to the East, also unsuccessfully. He again went to *Rome with a letter of Basil denouncing *Eustathius of Sebaste, *Apollinaris and *Paulinus (Basil., Ep. 263).

M. Richard, Saint Basile et la mission du diacre Sabinus: AB 67 (1949) 178-202; Simonetti, passim; R. Pouchet, Basile le Grand et son univers d'amis d'après sa correspondance: une stratégie de communion, Rome 1992.

E. Prinzivalli

DOROTHEUS, Vision of. The editio princeps of a previously unknown Greek text contained in the Pap. Bodmer 29, the Vision of Dorotheus, was published in 1984. A poem in 343 hexameters, it presents itself as the autobiographical account of a visionary dream had by a certain Dorotheus, son of the poet Quintus (v. 300 and explicit). The papyrus text, heavily damaged and with gaps, and therefore extremely difficult to read and interpret, has led in the years since then to various critical interventions, often contrasting. The Pap. Bodmer 29 is part of the so-called Codex of Visions (written ca. AD 400), in which are also preserved the first three visions of the Shepherd of Hermas (in prose) and eight other minor poetical compositions closely related to the Vision of Dorotheus (To Abraham; To the Just; Eulogy of the Lord Jesus; Words of Cain; The Lord to Those Who Suffer; Words of Abel; Poem with Mutilated Title; Hymn).

Dorotheus commits various transgressions and disobeys the order to guard the door of the palace of God. For this behavior he is severely punished, at the order of Christ and Gabriel. He is again stationed as the palace guard and, baptized with the name Andrew (brave man), finally decides to fearlessly proclaim his faith. This, in broad strokes, is the content of the vision that tells of repentance for past sins and conversion from spiritual laziness to a newly discovered courage in giving witness. The recent publication of the poem To the Just confirms the historical existence of this person, Dorotheus son of Quintus (v. 160), and sheds new light on his high social position, "ascetical" conversion and final glorification through martyrdom.

Among the various proposals advanced thus far for identifying the author, context and date of the Vision, none can yet claim a consensus. Elements upon which a coherent explanation might be based are the following: first, the author is a person with a good literary education, though he does take certain morphological, syntactic, metrical and lexical freedoms; he shows a substantial confidence with the models of the epic genre (Homer, Hesiod, Apollonius of Rhodes) and with the centonaria compositional techniques common at his time. He might have gained this knowledge from his father, if one admits that the poet Quintus is none other than Quintus Smyrnaeus, the author of the Posthomerica. Moreover, the technical terminology used to designate the celestial palace officials who appear in the vision reveal the author's frequentation and detailed knowledge of the highly placed politico-military circles of the second half of the 4th c. (Bremmer). The megaron in which the vision occurs (v. 4), however, is not necessarily to be identified with the palace of the emperor, as is often asserted without adequate justification; it could be the see of an imperial prefect, such as the Augustales of Egypt with its see at *Alexandria. All of this keeps us from placing our Dorotheus at the time of the persecution of *Diocletian, as the Swiss and Dutch editors propose (also as simple conjecture) on the basis of information found in *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE 7, 32,2-4 and 8, 1,4; 6,5). Finally, the religious ideas in the vision's text, far from echoing properly "gnostic" motifs (as Livrea and Maccoull assert), point rather, as is confirmed in the additional poems, to an essentially orthodox ecclesiastical context, which confesses Jesus as the only God (v. 293 and explicit) and is deeply involved in the experience of ascetic renunciation and martyrdom. Indeed the ideas of conversion and martyrdom seem to be the main thread that connects the various components of the entire Codex of Visions.

Prosopographical research into different persons named Dorotheus who lived between the 3rd and 4th c. has brought to light the existence of a (Macarius) Dorotheus, martyred in AD 371 at Alexandria of Egypt under the Augustales *Tatian, i.e., at the time of the persecution against the Egyptian monks initiated by the pro-*Arian emperor *Valens. This information is reported exclusively in the so-called Excerpta Latina Barbari, a Merovingian translation of an Alexandrian Chronicle composed in the early 5th c., and later updated and reproduced as an appendix to the Theosophia in the early 6th c. (see P.F. Beatrice, Anonymi Monophysitae Theosophia, Leiden 2001, 133, ll. 122ff., and what I have written in Kernos 14 [2001] 322-325).

It would seem entirely plausible, therefore, to attribute the Vision to this Dorotheus, who is twice called makar (Vision, v. 302; To the Just, v. 135); he was very probably a high imperial official of a tepid, cowardly Nicene faith who, following a radical ascetical conversion, at a certain point found the courage to expose himself even to martyrdom. The other brief poems come from the circle of the "Just," companions and spiritual heirs of the martyr. Despite the obscurity in which he remains shrouded, we must conclude that Dorotheus, precisely because he left conspicuous traces of his martyrdom in the Alexandrian Chronicle, as well as in the two contemporary poems of the Bodmer papyri, was a very important person in orthodox Egyptian Christianity.

Editio princeps: A. Hurst - O. Reverdin - J. Rudhardt, Papyrus Bodmer XXIX. Vision de Dorothéos, Cologny-Genève 1984; A.H.M. Kessels - P.W. Van der Horst, The Vision of Dorotheus (Pap. Bodmer 29) Edited with Introduction, Translation and Notes: VChr 41 (1987) 313-359; J.N. Bremmer, An Imperial Palace Guard in Heaven: The Date of the Vision of Dorotheus: ZPE 75 (1988) 82-88; Id., The Vision of Dorotheus: J. Den Boeft - A. Hilhorst (eds.), Early Christian Poetry. A Collection of Essays (VChrS 22), Leiden - New York - Cologne 1993, 253-261 (bibl.); A. Hurst - J. Rudhardt, Papyri Bodmer XXX-XXXVII. "Codex des Visions." Poèmes divers, Munich 1999.

P.F. Beatrice

DOROTHEUS of Antioch (3rd c.). Antiochene presbyter of the second half of the 3rd c., ordained by *Cyril of Antioch in 290 (Jerome, Chron. ad annum). Well versed in Greek culture, he also learned Hebrew so as to pursue his study of Sacred Scripture (Eusebius, HE VII, 32,2-4). *Eusebius attended some of his lectures and greatly esteemed him for both his doctrine and his life. Eusebius also tells us that the emperor put Dorotheus in charge of the administration of the Tyre purple works.

DHGE 14,685-686; DCB 1,899.

M. Simonetti

DOROTHEUS of Antioch (d. 407). From ca. 365 bishop of Heraclea (Thrace), a moderate *Arian and supporter of *Demophilus of *Constantinople. On the death of *Euzoius, ca. 375, he was elected bishop of the Arian community of *Antioch, but *Theodosius's anti-Arian edict of 381 forced him to abandon the see. He returned to his native *Thrace, but then went to Constantinople to take the place of the elected *Marinus, considered unsuited by his party. He also had some followers of his theological positions (Socrates, HE 4,35; 5,33; Sozomen, HE 7,17).

EC 4,1888; DHGE 14,685; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IVe siècle (328–373), Rome 1996, 801 and 807.

M. Simonetti

DOROTHEUS of Gaza (6th c.). Disciple, ca. 525, of the recluses *Barsanuphius and John in Abbot Seridos's monastery, he received a precious group of letters of direction from them. He later became head of a monastery and left some Instructions to his monks, Letters and Sentences. The Life of his disciple Dositheus mentions him. Dorotheus made a fine synthesis of the Apophthegmata*, the Cappadocians, *Evagrius of Pontus, *John Chrysostom, *Mark the Hermit and Isaiah: in short, the traditions of Palestinian *monasticism. In his surviving works he steers clear of the christological controversies. Through Theodore the Studite, he would enjoy a great ascendancy over Greek, Russian and Arab monasticism.

CPG 7352-7360; CPG/S 7352; PG 88, 1612-1841; DSp 3,1651-1664; Patrologia V, 279-280; L. Regnault, Dorothée de Gaza, Œuvres spirituelles (SC 92), Paris 1963 (with the orig. Greek text); M. Paparozzi, Doroteo di Gaza, Insegnamenti spirituali, Rome 1979; L. Cremaschi, Doroteo di Gaza. Scritti e insegnamenti spirituali, Rome 1980; J. Pauli, Menschsein und Menschwerden nach der geistlichen Lehre des Dorotheus von Gaza, St. Ottilien 1998; Dorotheus von Gaza, Doctrinae Diversae. Die geistliche Lehre. Griechisch-deutsch, ed. J. Pauli, 2 vols., Freiburg 2000.

J. Gribomont

DOROTHEUS of Marcianopolis (Moesia, 5th c.). Partisan of *Nestorius, it is said that in a liturgical function he condemned anyone who proclaimed *Mary to be mother of God. At Ephesus (431) he sided with the Eastern bishops against *Cyril. Sometime later, Nestorius's successor *Maximian had him condemned by a local synod, but his community would not accept his successor. The emperor *Theodosius exiled him to *Cappadocia. Some of his letters on the controversy survive.

CPG 5781-5786; DHGE 14, 688; Patrologia V, 37-38.

M. Simonetti

DOROTHEUS of Thessalonica (d. ca. 535). Bishop of *Thessalonica from at least 514 to 535, by which year he had died. He declared himself a partisan of Patriarch *Timothy of Constantinople, and refused to remove from the diptychs the names of the bishops who had occupied the see under *Zeno and *Anastasius. This prolongation of the *Acacian schism into the reign of *Justin and *Justinian procured his excommunication by *Hormisdas of Rome. Unfortunately he was among those who reestablished contact with Hormisdas in 514. It is worth noting that Theophanes the Chronicler was amazed to see him called "patriarch" by *Theodore the Lector, whose censured work survives in fragments.

E. Schwartz, Publizistische Sammlungen zum Acacianischen Schisma, Munich 1939, 250-252.

M. van Esbroeck

DOSITHEUS of Samaria (1st c.). Our knowledge of Dositheus (from patristic, Jewish and Arab sources) is confused, contradictory and in some cases manifestly legendary. The practical impossibility of reconciling all the sources has led some authors (given in McL. Wilson) to postulate more than one person of this name. Given these difficulties, the facts must be treated with particular caution and accepted with reserve. Dositheus was a native of Samaria and lived probably in the 1st c. AD. *Hegesippus (in Euseb., HE IV, 22,5) makes him the founder and leader of one of the seven heresies that disturbed the church's peace as early as the 1st c. Ps.-*Tertullian (Adv. omnes haer. 1) puts him among the Jewish heretics, saying that he denied the inspiration of the prophets. The ps.-*Clementines (Hom. II, 24; Rec. I, 54; II, 8) connect him with *John the Baptist and make him the predecessor and teacher of *Simon Magus. Dositheus claimed to be Taeb, the Messiah of the Samaritans, and his disciples referred the prophecies of Dt 18:15 and Num 24:17 to him (see Orig., C. Cels. 1,57; VI, 11; In Ioh. XIII, 27). He was the author of various works that circulated among his followers. His teachings inspired the sect known as the Dositheans, whom we know, e.g., through the (rather contradictory) evidence of *Epiphanius (Pan. XIII) and *Eulogius of Alexandria (6th c.; in Photius, Bibl., cod. 230), and whom Arab sources document as still active in the 10th c. AD. On the doctrines of Dositheus and his sectaries our sources provide conflicting information, hard to organize into a single coherent picture. In any case, from the available documentation it seems that Dositheus's teachings were *Encratite in character: great value was attributed to continence and virginity; in particular, he insisted on rigorous observance of the Mosaic Law, esp. regarding the Sabbath and prescriptions of ritual purity.

One of the texts of the Coptic library of Nag Hammadi calls itself the "Apocalypse of Dositheus" (Three Stelae of Seth—NHC VII, 5: 118,10). This reference to the obscure heresiarch of Samaria probably responds to the need to relate the work to someone traditionally linked with the origins of the gnostic movement, and may reflect the existence of relations between the so-called *Sethian groups and the Samaritan tradition. According to Goulet, the heretic Dositheus of Cilicia, known only through the work of *Macarius of Magnesia, should be distinguished from Dositheus of Samaria.

A. Hilgenfeld, Die Ketzergeschichte des Urchristentums urkundlich dargestellt, Leipzig 1884 (= Hildesheim 1963), 155-161; S. Krauss, Dosithée et les Dosithéens: Rev. Et. Juives 42 (1901) 27-42; K. Kohler, Dositheus, the Samaritan Heresiarch, and his Relations to Jewish and Christian Doctrines and Sects: Am. Journ. of Theol. 15 (1911) 404-435; R. McL. Wilson, Simon, Dositheus and the Dead Sea Scrolls: ZRGG 9 (1957) 21-30; K. Beyschlag, Simon Magus und die christliche Gnosis: WUNT 16, Tübingen 1974; R.J. Coggins, The Samaritans and Acts: NTS 28 (1982) 423-434; J.E. Fossum, Samaritan Sects and Movements, in A.D. Crown (ed.), The Samaritans, Tübingen 1989; F. Dexinger and R. Pummer, eds., Die Samaritaner, WdF 604, Darmstadt 1992; S. Haar, Simon Magus: The First Gnostic?, Berlin 2003; R. Goulet, Dosithée de Cilicie: Apocryphæ 14 (2003) 55-72.

C. Gianotto

DOVE. The significance of the dove in Christian antiquity is linked to biblical symbolism. The Jewish tradition of the OT attests a particular and rich symbolism regarding the dove, emphasizing faithfulness as the animal's main characteristic, a quality well illustrated in the story of the dove sent out by Noah, which returns to the ark to announce the end of the flood (Gen 8:8-12). Another notable motif is the fact that the dove, returning out of fidelity, brought an olive branch, symbolizing peace and security. The rereading of this text highlights the messianic function of Christ, the peace of God, come to reconcile, in the Holy Spirit, a world separated by sin. In this perspective Christians attentively reread the gospel texts on Jesus' baptism, to shed light on the presence of the Holy Spirit in the life of Christians (Mt 3:16; Mk 1:10; Lk 3:22; Jn 1:32). To this end it is useful to recall that, besides the literal interpretation, there is a prominent symbolic interpretation: the Spirit manifests itself in the form of a dove, but is not the dove (Origen, Hom. in Lucam evangelium 27, 49).

In the light of this exegetical orientation, the church fathers created a link between the gospel and some OT texts, such as that in the *Song of Songs (1:14; 4:1; 5:12), so as to exalt the characteristics and qualities of the dove, with an exhortation to Christians to follow its virtues, e.g., faithfulness, chastity, goodness, simplicity. To the dove's simplicity *Origen adds purity, to characterize the Holy Spirit that Christians must imitate (Hom. in Lucam evangelium 27, 49). In reference to Ps 67, *Didymus of Alexandria speaks of the "wings of the dove," like those of the Holy Spirit in the episode of Jesus' baptism, showing its loftiness and heavenly greatness (In Gen. 46). St. *Cyprian reminds the Christians of his time of the connection between the qualities of the dove and those of the Holy Spirit: "For this reason the Holy Spirit also comes under the form of a dove, which is a simple and happy animal, not embittered by rancor; it doesn't bite ferociously, or tear to pieces with its claws; it loves human company and frequents just one house" (Unit. Eccl. 9). According to the African father these qualities of the Holy Spirit, expressed through the image of the dove, should shine in the church. He adds that the dove, as a symbol of goodness, is opposed to the serpent who poisons and destroys the Lord's sheep, united in the church. In *Jerome too we find the exhortation to imitate the dove's simplicity (Com. Osea). Clearly emerging in *Ambrose is the relationship between the dove and the Holy Spirit, who brings peace of heart and tranquility of soul (De mysteriis 11). In the Expositio evangelii secundum Lucam 2,92, using christological and pneumatological interpretation, Ambrose invites Christians to live as the dove: "Why as the dove? Because the grace of baptism requires simplicity, that we be as simple as doves. The grace of baptism requires peace, which the dove, in the ancient prefiguration, brought to the ark which alone remained immune from the flood. But the one who has now been marked out to descend in the form of a dove, has taught me that in that branch, in that ark, were the symbols of peace and of the church, since precisely in the midst of the flood of the world the Holy Spirit brings a fruitful peace to the church." *Augustine, who uses the word dove at least 181 times in his writings, shows a strong dependence on Ambrose, not only in moral interpretation, encouraging the virtues in the life of Christians, but esp. dogmatically. In fact Augustine, following his teacher, brings into full light the significance of the dove in relation to trinitarian theology, starting from the narrative of Jesus' baptism, which concludes with the descent of the Holy Spirit in the form of a dove (in specie columbae). The identification of the dove with the Holy Spirit is so strong that at times Augustine calls it a dove. In this sense the dove is invoked to teach the faithful openness of heart, and to accept true peace (in columba vera pax), unity (in columba unitas) and simplicity (simplex ut columba).

From this perspective comes the connection between pneumatology and ecclesiology, which brings out the theology of the indwelling of the Holy Spirit: the dove lives not only in the hearts of each of the faithful, but also in the church as a community of believers, wanted and founded by Christ. For this reason the church is identified with the dove (columba autem ecclesia est), since it manifests true peace. In this line of thought St. *Paulinus of Nola (Ep. ad Severum 32, 10), explaining the Trinity in the light of the episode of Jesus' baptism, highlights the identification of the Holy Spirit with the dove. In the same sense *Maximus of Turin writes: "As then, the flood over, the dove brought to the ark of Noah the sign of peace, so, after the judgment, Christ also will bring to the church of Peter the joy of peace, since he is the dove or peace" (Serm. 49, 3).

Against this background, the influence of this double symbolic meaning on Christian archaeology is not surprising. The symbolism of the dove bringing the olive branch refers to the messenger of heavenly peace, who manifests himself with gentleness, innocence and simplicity of heart. From the 3rd c. on, Christian art fixed the dove as the favorite image for indicating the presence of the Holy Spirit in the faithful departed. Thus we have in funerary monuments of every kind, esp. in the catacombs of St. *Callistus in the 4th c., the depiction of the dove bearing an olive branch in its mouth or feet, signifying the peace of those who rest in the Lord. Besides these funerary depictions, also notable in the early church is the use of a vase in the form of a dove to preserve the *Eucharist (columba eucharistica; Tert., Liber adv. Valentinianos 3).

H. Lesètre, Colombe: DTC 2, 846-851; J.P. Kirsch, Colombe: DACL, 3, 2198-2231; AL 1, 1069-1078; H. Leclercq, Colombe eucharistique: DACL 3, 2231-2234; F. Suehlig, Die Taube als religiöses Symbol in christlichen Altertum, Freiburg i. B. 1930; M.P. Ciccarese, Animali: simbolici. Alle origini del bestiario cristiano, I, Bologna 2002.

M.W. Libambu

DOXOLOGY. Doxology is an acknowledgment of the glory of God (doxa), a glory that consists in the confession and proclamation of God's nature and mystery, revealed in his works and, in a special way, in his only-begotten Son Jesus Christ (Jn 1:14).

The earliest Christian communities inherited from Judaism the practice of closing their prayers with a doxology (Origen, De or. 33, 6). There are examples of this in numerous NT passages, esp. in the letters of Paul, Peter and Jude, and in Revelation. These NT doxologies refer only to the Father or the Son, never to the Holy Spirit—the usual case in the first centuries. The apostolic fathers address the Father or the Son in the and with the Holy Spirit (Didache 9, 4); *Justin, rather, the Father through the Son and through the Holy Spirit (1 Apol. 67). *Origen says that prayer should begin and end with praise to God the Father through Christ in the Holy Spirit (De or. 33).

The doxology that has reached us, Glory to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit, originates from the baptismal formula of Mt 28:19. It became the normal form beginning in the 4th c., specifically to refute *Arianism. From then on there was an effort to avoid any type of *subordinationist interpretation.

The Eastern Church distinguishes two doxologies: great (gloria in excelsis Deo . . .) and small (gloria patri . . .).

While doxology is essentially a trinitarian acclamation, it also touches on other realities: at times ecclesiological (tibi gloria patri et filio cum sancto spiritu in sancta ecclesia: Trad. Ap. 6; 4; 7) in line with Eph 3:21; others eschatological (in saecula saeculorum, o nunc et semper, in saecula saeculorum). This latter part, sicut erat, originated in Western communities and is never found in the East.

The use of doxology transcends the liturgical sphere and extends to patristic literature, esp. in letters. Among numerous examples, we can cite 1 Clem.; 2 Clem.; Clement of Alexandria, Quis dives, Pedagogo; Origen; *Tertullian, De orat. etc.

The various doxologies, in going beyond the liturgical and euchological spheres, constitute a privileged window for understanding the evolution of Christian theology. They reflect the evolution of trinitarian doctrine and, with it, christological and pneumatological doctrine, the object of numerous debates and controversies in the course of the first centuries. They sought, therefore, as *Basil maintains in his Treatise on the Holy Spirit, to safeguard the equal dignity of each of the Persons of the Trinity (homotimia).

B. Botte, In unitate Spiritus Sancti: L'ordinaire de la messe, Paris 1953; D.B. Capelle, Le texte du "Gloria in excelsis": RHE 44 (1949) 439-457; H. Crouzel, Les doxologies finales des homélies d'Origène selon le texte grec et les versions latines: Augustinianum 20 (1980) 98-107; A. Hamman, La prière, I, Letournai 1959; II, 1962; V. Pavan, La dossologia nella comunicazione cristologica dei primi due secoli (I e II Clem., Iust.): VetChr 12 (1975) 391-415; A. Stuiber, Doxologie, RAC 4, 210-226; C. Renoux, Le Gloria in excelsis Deo de l'Église arménienne, in Crossroad of Cultures: Studies in Liturgy and Patristics in Honor of Gabriele Winkler, ed. H.-J. Feulner - E. Velkovska - R.F. Taft, Rome 2000, 603-618.

J.A. Cabrera Montero

DRACONTIUS, Blossius Aemilius (d. after 496). 5th-c. Latin poet, born ca. 450–460 under the reign of *Genseric, of a senatorial family originally from Campania but transplanted to *Africa. At *Carthage the young Dracontius frequented (474–475) the school of Felicianus, a Carthaginian grammaticus to whom he was indebted for an education based on the reading of the classics. In the following years, until 484, he successfully dedicated himself to the law as togatus fori proconsulis. Falling suddenly into disgrace, he was imprisoned on Gunthamund's orders for having written a carmen ignotum praising an equally unknown recipient, sometimes identified with *Theodoric, sometimes with *Zeno. After Gunthamund's death he was freed, ca. 496, by his successor Thrasamund, and resumed his legal work. He died at an unspecified date, apparently after having recovered the state of well-being he had enjoyed before his imprisonment.

The young Dracontius's early poetic work, closely linked to the teaching of the rhetor Felicianus, consists of the Hylas and the Laus Herculis, two poems of pagan and scholastic intonation. To the period of his legal work belong the Controversia de statua viri fortis and the Deliberativa Achillis, an corpus Hectoris vendat, oratorical in tone. In the same period he composed other poems, also handed down in the collection of so-called Romulea, among them the epylls De raptu Helenae, Medea and the Orestis tragoedia, compositions of mythological content, which however reveal a new ethical-religious intention of the condemnation of pagan myth.

But it was the dramatic and painful experience of prison which brought to maturity Dracontius's more consciously Christian vision of life and the world, as revealed in the Satisfactio and still more in the Laudes Dei. The tone of the Satisfactio, addressed between 484 and 490 to King Gunthamund to solicit his pardon and grace, is oratorical and *panegyrical; even the scriptural citations on divine clemency and the exempla pietatis taken from history are used to the end of obtaining freedom from the sovereign. The prisoner's emotion in invoking the king's clemency appears again in the three books of the Laudes Dei, composed in the last years of his imprisonment, between 490–496. The biblical motif of God iratus and placidus in his pietas is the dominant theme of the work, in which arguments drawn from the OT and NT are developed with lyrical élan, in a free exemplificatory paraphrase. Finally, still captivus, Dracontius composed the Epithalamium Ioannis et Vitulae, whose counterpart, the Epithalamium in fratribus dictum, was written not long after he regained his freedom. In thanksgiving, he addressed to Thrasamund a Panegyricus (lost) and dedicated to him two epigrams of Alexandrine stamp, De mensibus and De origine rosarum, the last known literary evidence of this poet, whose last years of life remain shrouded in mystery.

Arevalus PL 60; F. Baehrens, Poetae lat. min., V, Leipzig 1883 (Carmina profana; Orestis tragoedia); F. Vollmer, Fl. Merobaudis reliquiae, Blossii Aemilii Dracontii Carmina, Berlin 1905; Id., Poetae lat. min. post Baehrens iterum rec., V, Leipzig 1914; F. Corsaro, Bl. Aem. Dracontii De Laudibus Dei ed. italice vertit, Catania 1962; S. Gennaro, Satisfactio (tr. comm.), Catania 1952; Dracontius, Œuvres, Les Belles Lettres, t. I (Louanges de Dieu I-II, ed. C. Camus - C. Moussy); t. II (Louanges de Dieu III, Réparation, ed. C. Moussy); t. III (La tragédie d'Oreste, Poèmes profanes I-V, ed. J. Bouquet); t. IV (Poèmes profanes VIX, fragments, ed. É. Wolff), Paris 1985. 1988. 1995. 1996; A.M. Quartiroli, Gli epilli di Draconzio: Athenaeum 24 (1946) 160-87; Id., Gli epilli di Draconzio: ibid. 25 (1947) 17-34; C. Arena, Rapporti fra Reposiano e Draconzio: MSLC 3 (1951) 110-123; F. Migneco, Draconzio: Romalea IV, V, IX: MSLC 7 (1955) 43-65; E. Rapisarda, Il poeta della misericordia divina: Orpheus 2 (1955) 1-9; L. Alfonsi, Dracontiana: Aevum 34 (1960) 100-103; Id., Sulla Satisfactio di Draconzio: GIF 13 (1960) 356; D. Romano, Studi Draconziani, Palermo 1960; F. Corsaro, Problemi storico-letterari del cristianesimo africano del V sec.: MSLC 11 (1961) 5-32; C. Gnilka, Zu Iuvenal und Dracontius: JbAC 8-9 (1965) 177-183; S. Blomgren, In Dracontii carmina adnotationes criticae: Eranos 64 (1966) 46-66; F. Bertini, Autori latini in Africa, Genoa 1974, 81-97; I. Gualandri, Problemi draconziani: RIL (1974) 872-890; E. Clerici, Due poeti: Emilio Blossio Draconzio e Venanzio Fortunato: RIL 107 (1973) 108-150; K. Smolak, Die Stellung der Hexamerondichtung des Dracontius: Festsch. Kraus, Vienna 1972, 381-387; G. Aricò, Mito e tecnica narrativa nell'Orestis tragoedia: Atti Acc. Sc. Lett. Palermo 37 (1977-78) 7-104; J.M. Díaz de Bustamante, Draconcio y sus Carmina profana, Santiago de Compostela 1978; R.M. Agudo Cubas, Dos epilios de Draconcio: CFL 14 (1978) 263-328; R. Speranza, Draconzio, Sat. 272: MPhL 3 (1978) 213-218; R. Marino, Concordanze della Orestis tragoedia di Draconzio, Pisa 1981; J. Fontaine, Naissance de la poésie dans l'Occident Chrétien, Paris 1981, 252; A. Grillone, "Purgandus Orestes": bravura avvocatizia e cammino spirituale di Draconzio nell'"Orestis tragoedia," Quaderni Catanesi 9 (1987) 77-102; B. Weber, Der Hylas des Dracontius: Romulea 2, Stuttgart 1995; W. Speyer, Der Bibeldichter Dracontius als Exeget des Sechstagewerkes Gottes, in G. Schöllgen - C. Scholten (eds.), Stimuli. Exegese und ihre Hermeneutik in Antike und Christentum. Festschrift für E. Dassman, Münster 1996, 464-484; L. Castagna (ed.), Studi draconziani, Naples 1997; A. Grillone, Sul testo dell'"Orestis Tragoedia" di Draconzio: Res publica Litterarum 3 (2000) 185-206; M. Mülke, Interpolationen in Dracontius, in W. Blumer - R. Henke - M. Mulke (eds.), Alvarium. Festschrift für Ch. Gnilka, JbAC (Ergänzungsband 33), Münster 2002, 279-291.

S. Costanza

DREAMS and the FATHERS. The mystery of dream life, which is simultaneously so close to and so different from daily life, the history of its influence on the individual, just as the causes and the meaning of certain extraordinary dreams, have fascinated people of all ages and, among these, even the first Christians. At the time in which Christianity was spreading, divination through dreams had an important role, perhaps because the traditional divinities saw their popularity diminishing. Ancient Christianity did not deny that dreams could bear messages, but they rejected oneiromancy (i.e., the prediction of the future by means of the interpretation of dreams) along with all forms of divination. The Apostolic Tradition* (ch. 16) bears witness that Christianity refused to confer baptism on the interpreters of dreams, and the Emperor *Constantius II took measures against the oneiromancers. Although at times God conceded to dreams (to good as well as bad people), it was God himself who supplied their interpretations, and there was no longer any place for specialists of interpretation; this was also the reading taken from the book of *Daniel (see Pseudo-Clementine homilies 17,15-18).

As in the case of the Bible and the Jews and pagans of their time, Christians believed that dreams could be the vehicle for a divine revelation, and *Luke openly states this in the Acts of the Apostles when he affirmed that after *Pentecost Joel's prophecy was fulfilled: "your sons and daughters will prophesy, your young men will have visions and your old men dreams" (2:16-18). Patristic literature, therefore, abounds with reports of dreams. But not all a bird's flights speak of what is to come, Homer said in ancient times; excessive attention to the revelations by some individuals or groups of Christians quickly led to a wise skepticism and a reflection on criteria for discernment.

Patristic reflections on dreams. The Pythagoreans, the *Platonists and the *Stoics allowed without difficulty that a dream could be a bearer of a higher knowledge, because everyone thought in one way or another that the *soul was of the divine nature and that the dream freed the bonds that united it to the body: in some way freeing the soul from the body, the dream allowed it to penetrate the world of the divine powers, or at least it rendered it open to a revelation when its attention was no longer concentrated on earthly realities. But all the Fathers also recognized that dreams do not always have the same importance; for this reason the ancients had a system of classification for various types of dreams. Within the patristic world, one finds classifications of dreams in the writings of *Tertullian, under the influence of the Stoics (De Anima 47), and in *Augustine, perhaps under the influence of the *Neoplatonist *Porphyry of Tyre or Chalcidius (De Genesi ad litteram 12,18,39; see also, for a different classification, *Gregory the Great, Moralia in Iob 8,24,42).

Tertullian recognized two types of natural dreams, those that are a reflection of the tasks of the day, and those that the soul created by itself, animated by a perpetual and innate movement; and two types of supernatural dreams, those sent by God and those sent by demons (De Anima 47). Augustine, in turn, divided dreams into (1) phantasiae or trite dreams, that have their source in the reproductive or the creative imagination, and (2) ostensiones (i.e., showings, manifestations), inspired dreams, in turn divided into clear and symbolic dreams, which can be attributed to God, the angels or the demons (De Genesi ad litteram 12,18,39-23,49). The great difference between his system and Tertullian's was in that he saw in the dream a lower form of revelation. For Augustine, in fact, there existed three types of dreams: the vision of the corporeal eyes; the imaginative ("spiritual") vision, through which one sees "the images of things that are perceived through the body"; the intellectual vision, which is the eye of the understanding (De Genesi ad litteram 12,6,15). Dreams pertain to the imaginary vision, and therefore do not derive from the higher part of the soul: for this reason, even the demons can make use of them (Trin. 11,4,7).

Augustine could not accept, as did the ancient philosophers, that the dream freed the soul from the body and rendered it more suited for participating in truth, because certain powers of the soul, just as judgment, reason or the will, are much less asleep in the course of the dream: there are dreams "certainly suggested in a certain sense by the body to the soul," and the dream is characteristic of the soul within the body (De Genesi ad litteram 12,30,58). The mechanism of the inspired dream was not, in Augustine's eyes, substantially different from that of the ordinary dream: once sleep has broken the bonds of the senses with reality, "the soul is forced to direct its intentional force toward the images that are presented, be they emitted from the memory or caused from another mysterious force" (Trin. 11,4,7). The Bishop of Hippo acknowledged that the angels or the demons could intervene in dreams, but he was very reserved when it came to affirming that a particular dream was attributable to them.

Scripture abounds with visions and true dreams, but the ancient church often showed itself reticent with respect to new visions. Tertullian and the *Montanists believed that dreams and visions, the work of the *Paraclete, must complete the revelation of the NT; they practiced fasting and prayer and even incubation in order to obtain them (Tertullian, De Anima 48,7; Epiphanius, Panarion 49,1-2). The *Donatists seem to have partly shared these beliefs. Following revelations in dreams, some bishops such as *Ambrose and *Cyril of Alexandria, some priests and monks, or pious women, who are usually called "Lucina," were able to find the relics of forgotten martyrs; but in *Africa, the ecclesiastical authorities showed themselves to be prudent before approving the construction of altars requested following a dream, or to support the cult of the saints discovered in this manner.

It was believed that all such actions required discernment, as did the prophecies in the OT (see Dt 18; Jer 29:8-9). Against the *Donatists, Augustine vociferously affirmed that a thing cannot simply be true "because one of our brothers or sisters has had a certain vision while awake or a certain dream during sleep" (Ep. ad Catholicos 19,49). One must be "attentive to the more secure way of the *Scriptures," or rather, in a more certain way "one can receive warnings when one is not in a state of sleep, but in an awake state" (De cat. rud. 6,10).

Dreams and Christian life. What are the criteria that allow one to say that a dream is a revelation? For Tertullian, dreams that lead us to God are divine, and those that disturb us are demonic (De Anima 47,2). Such criteria are nothing more than a rough outline when compared to those that such monks as *Evagrius and *Cassian would use. The content of the dream is decisive, just as the positive or negative influence is upon the dreamer.

A dream has led more than one person to convert to Christianity: *Origen attests to this fact (C. Cels. 1,46) and Augustine confirms it (De cat. rud. 6,10; see Ep. 159,3 and 227: conversion of *Gennadius and *Dioscorus). They could also strengthen and comfort the believer in a moment of trial, as the dreams describing the authentic Passions of the martyrs attest, such as those of *Felicity and *Perpetua; and in the subsequent hagiographic literature it would become a true and proper topos. Dreams can help the Christian see clearly in moments of difficulty, as shown by the correspondence of the Life and the Acts of *Cyprian, who granted them great importance in his personal conduct and the governance of his church (Ep. 11,4-7; 66,10). They can also put the faithful on the road to healing: the miracles of St. Stephen (miraculis S. Stephani*) and the 17th book of the City of God recount the story of sick people healed following the night apparitions of St. Stephen. These dreams allowed people to touch with their hands the fact that God is close and that he takes care of them personally. In Augustine's Confessions, one of the functions of *Monica's dreams, which appear to announce the conversion of her son, is that of emphasizing the constant work of divine providence in Augustine's life (Conf. 3,11,18-20).

Although all were agreed in maintaining that a dream of religious content could be an instrument of God—the decisive criteria was given by the beneficent influence that it had on the dreamer, as was seen in the case of Monica's dream—there was less agreement among those who discerned in ordinary dreams a means for knowing themselves. Tertullian maintained that the good or bad acts that were carried out in dreams were indifferent (De Anima 45,4). Augustine, who reflected much upon the phenomenon of dreams and their mechanisms, thought to the contrary that they could clarify the deep ego and indicate what was not yet sufficiently converted in it (Conf. 10,30,41-42), and that allowed one to perceive the greatness of the wound caused by original sin (City of God 22,22,3). According to *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 4,139,4) or *John Cassian (Coll. 22,6), the purification of the passions includes also those of dreams, which are therefore a mirror of the soul. For *Evagrius of Pontus our dreams and also our reactions to these dreams can reveal our hidden thoughts (Pract. 64). And in the eyes of *Synesius of Cyrene it is vain to hope to reach the knowledge of oneself without knowing one's own dreams.

Beyond its role in the conduct of the individual's life, in what measure can the dream be a source of revelation? *Origen did not at all exclude this possibility (C. Cels. 2,60), although Augustine often combated such an idea: if one sees the dead in dreams, they appear in the same way as the living, and it is none other than dreamy images of the same nature (De cura pro mortuis 11,13; Ep. 158,8); only the martyrs and the angels were capable of truly appearing to men. The ancients were fascinated by visions of the afterlife, accounts of which already abounded in the apocryphal literature. Augustine himself, who knew that the beneficiaries of such visions saw some dreamy images and not the realities of the other world, did not fail to use such accounts for the edification of the faithful, as is proven by the accounts that he gave of the dreams of Curma or Tutulismeni (De cura pro mortuis 12,15; Serm. 308,5). With respect to the vision of God, it is reserved for the higher part of the soul and the "intellectual" vision, and it is therefore impossible for it to occur in the course of a dream. This opinion was also shared by *Diadocus of Photice (On vision: SC 5b,172).

The subsequent mystical tradition valued daily vision higher than the dream. In antiquity, the hierarchy of values appeared at times to be ruined because the dream was an entirely normal phenomenon in the human being, although the vision could be the result of a psychological disturbance (Origen, C. Cels. 2,60). Some authors went to the point of appealing to the dreamy experience of their listeners to help them overcome an overly literal reading of the biblical visions (Origen, C. Cels. 1,48; Augustine, Ep. 169,11; *Eusebius of Emesa, Hom. 25,25-28). The great interest attributed by the ancients to dreams of a religious content was similar to that of certain contemporary psychoanalysts who, without attributing to dreams a supernatural origin, acknowledge their impact upon the patient and their importance in the healing process.

F. Refoulé, Rêves et vie spirituelle chez Évagre le Pontique: Vie Spirituelle, Suppl. 59 (1961) 470-516; J. Le Goff, Les rêves dans la culture et la psychologie de l'Occident, in Pour un autre Moyen-Âge, Paris 1975, 299-306; L.Ch. Ferrari, The Dreams of Monica in Augustine's Confessions: Augustinian Studies 10 (1979) 3-17; R.G.A. Van Lieshout, Greeks on Dreams, Utrecht 1980; J. Amat, Songes et visions: l'au-delà dans la littérature latine tardive, Paris 1985; C. Mertens, Les premiers martyrs et leurs rêves: RHE 81 (1986) 5-46; M. Dulaey, Le Rêve dans la vie et la pensée de saint Augustin, Paris 1973; Id., Songe et prophétie dans les Confessions d'Augustin: Augustinianum 29 (1989) 379-391; Sogni, visioni e profezie nell'antico cristianesimo, XVII Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana: Augustinianum 29 (1989); DSp 14, 1990, 1054-1066: Songes, rêves, 1. Écriture Sainte (S. Légasse); 2. Époque patristique (M. Dulaey); B. Feichtinger, Der Traum des Hieronymus—Ein Psychogramm: VChr 45 (1991) 54-77; Id.: REAug 43 (1997) 41-61; S.F. Kruger, Dreaming in the Middle Ages, Cambridge 1992; P. Cox Miller, Dreams in Late Antiquity. Studies in the Imagination of a Culture, Princeton, NJ 1994; C. Moreschini, Sogni e filosofia nella tardà antichità, in Paideia, Studi in onore di M. Naldini, Roma 1994, 511-522; G. Stroumsa, Dreams and Visions in Early Christian Discourses, in D. Schulman - G. Stroumsa, Cultures: Explorations in the Comparative History of Dreaming, Oxford 1999, 189-212; M. Burger (éd.), Rêves: visions révélatrices, Studia Religiosa Helvetica, Bern 2003; P. Lory, Le rêve et ses interprétations en Islam, Paris 2003; M.A. Monaca, Il sogno nelle Confessioni di Agostino, in Le Confessioni di Agostino (402-2002): Bilancio e prospettive, SEA 85, Roma 2003, 191-213; B. Näf, Traum und Traumdeutung im Altertum, Berlin 2004.

M. Dulaey

DROPSY (iconography). The only example in iconography in Christian antiquity which in all probability refers to the episode in the gospel of the man suffering dropsy (Lk 14:2-5 . . . Et ecce homo quidam hydropicus erat ante illum . . . sanavit eum ac dimisit) is documented on the ivory diptych of Erevan, datable to the 6th c. (Volbach-Hirmer, no. 142, pl. 75). The artistic representation of this NT account occupies one of the panels on the perimeter of the left panel of the diptych. The scene shows Christ, making the gesture of speech and carrying a *cross with his right hand, and a man having a very swollen stomach which is exposed to view; this last detail is clearly the element characterizing the composition. Only in a much later period are other representations of this episode found: in the decoration in fresco in the church of S. Angelo in Formis (11th c.) and in the mosaics in S. Marco in Venice (11th c.), in which the image of Christ is accompanied by the explicit inscription hydropicum curat.

L. Réau, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, II, 2, Paris 1957, 374.

C. Carletti

DRUNKENNESS. "Inebriation in spirit" is the joy of one immersed in the love of God. The history of ecstatic manifestations in antiquity includes, in the sanctuaries, priests and priestesses inspired by Apollo, and in the forests, men and women invaded by Dionysius. *Plato, who admired poetry, says that "the poet is a light, lofty, sacred being, who cannot write his poems if he has not first been inspired by the god, entering a state of ecstasy and unconsciousness" (Ione 534, a-d). The Bible, symbolically exalting the wine of wisdom, recommends sobriety to those who await the outpouring of the Spirit (Pr 9:1-6; Eph 5:18; 1 Th 5:6; 1 Pet 4:7; cf. Acts 2:15-18 and Cyr. of Jer., Cat. 17, 18-19). *Philo of Alexandria, inebriated by God's word proclaimed by the prophets, defines the ecstasy of inspiration as a "sober and divine inebriation"; when God sends a prophet "he uses his vocal cords, his mouth and his tongue, to reveal what he wants to . . . with an invisible and melodious art" (Rer. div. 266; cf. Opif. 71; Leg. All. 1,84 and 3,82; Mos. 1,187; Ebr. 147). In the gnostic vision, inebriation is the light of the "knowledge of God" (Od. Sal. 11, 6-8; Ev. Th. 12). The extraordinary ecstasy of the *Montanists does not appear to have been genuine.

Christians, illuminated by the *Psalms and the *Song of Songs (Ps 23:5 and 36:8; Song 2:4 and 5:1), find the encounter with Christ in the word and in the *Eucharist inebriating (Orig., In Jo. I 30, 206; In Mt. comm. ser. 85; Cypr., Ep. 63, 11; Hil., In Ps. 64, 13-15; John Chrys., Adv. ebriosos). The church-bride, inflamed with joy by the nuptial celebration of *Baptism, feels in the Eucharist the elation of the embrace of the divine bridegroom. *Origen says that the Christian lives perennially in God, going out of himself and ascending to the heights of love in a progressive mystical intoxication that allays the bitterness of life: "The Word manifests his beauty . . . in making glad with the sober drink those who are able to dedicate themselves to the joy of the banquet" (In Jo. X 10, 66; cf. Co. Ct. III, 184, 21-186, 12; In Lev. 7, 1-2; In Jo. X 12, 66; Euseb., In Ps. 35, 9-10; Greg. Gt., In Ez. I 10, 7). *Gregory of Nyssa, in the language of Song 2:13, shows that the word of Christ leads "to the good and sober inebriation, that inebriation in which human beings experience the ecstasy that transports them from material realities to divine realities" (In Ct. V; cf. In Ct. X and In Asc., PG 46, 692). *Ambrose considers "sober inebriation" a guide to virtue, and in the eucharistic elation gains a foretaste of the heavenly banquet: "Good is that spiritual inebriation which does not make the body stagger, but strengthens the steps of the heart. Good is the inebriation of the chalice of salvation, which banishes the sadness of a guilty conscience and infuses the joy of eternal life" (In Ps. 118,21,4; cf. Cain I 5, 19; Noe 29, 111; Isaac 5, 49; Bon. mort. 5, 20; Hel. 10,33; In Ps. 1, 33; 118, 15, 28 and 21, 4; Sacr. 5, 17; also Jerome, In Jer. VI 17,10-11). Ambrose exclaims in the hymn for Matins: laeti bibamus sobriam ebrietatem Spiritus (2,6). *Augustine discerns in the human heart the thirst for eternal inebriation (In Ps. 35, 14 and 62, 6).

H. Lewy, Sobria ebrietas. Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der antiken Mystik, Giessen 1929; J. Daniélou, Platonisme et théologie mystique, Paris 1944, 274-302; J. Leclercq, Jour d'ivresse: VieSp 76 (1947) 574-591; J. Quasten, Sobria ebrietas in Ambrosius' De Sacramentis: Misc. L.C. Mohlberg I, Rome 1948, 117-125; R. Johanny, L'eucharistie centre de l'histoire du salut chez Saint Ambroise de Milan, Paris 1968, 205-236; H.J. Sieben - A. Solignac, Ivresse spirituelle: DSp 7, 2312-2337; P. Meloni, L'ebbrezza dell'eucaristia nella spiritualità sponsale dei Padri: Parola, Spirito and Vita 7 (1983) 215-231.

P. Meloni

DUALISM. In the historical-religious meaning of the term, dualism may be defined as that doctrine, formulated systematically or expressed in mythical form, which holds to the existence of two principles that, in different ways, have given rise to everything that exists and manifests itself in this world. This historical-religious notion of dualism thus concerns the ontological level of the creation and differs from the philosophical meaning of the term (dualism as opposed to monism and equivalent to the affirmation of transcendence) and from its use in an ethical sense (the opposition between good and evil).

A distinction is made between an "absolute" dualism, when the two principles are coeternal and mutually independent, and a "mitigated" or "monarchian" dualism, when the second principle derives from the first, but constitutes a principle by giving rise in turn to a creation of its own. An example of absolute dualism would be Iranian Zoroastrianism, esp. in the later formulations of the Middle Persian treatises, which oppose Ohrmazd (old Avestic Ahura Mazda), the good creator god, to Ahriman (= Angra Manyu, "Destroying Spirit"), the antigod, associated with lying and corruption and who, with his demons, penetrates the world to bring it death and destruction. Moreover, he operates a malevolent "counter-creation" of his own (noxious animals, etc.). Iranian dualism is thus procosmic (creation is a divine work) and eschatological, affirming the final destruction of the evil principle and its death-dealing activity.

Examples of mitigated dualistic doctrines could be some systems of gnosticism of the first centuries which, starting from a supreme deity, show the origin, via a process of successive emanations and degeneration, of one or more persons (the Demiurge, Archons) of malevolent nature, who become creators of the world and of the human body, molding a matter held to be ontologically negative. The gnostic systems were happy to identify the inferior Demiurge with the God of the OT, opposing him to Jesus' Father, who is totally unrelated to matter and the highest expression of that spiritual, divine world from which the human spiritual component, which the Savior came to redeem, is derived. The Fathers argued at great length against gnostic dualism, affirming the unicity of God, the good and just creator and savior of humanity, and the unity of revelation of the OT and NT.

Gnostic dualism, besides being theological (two "gods") and cosmological (divine world opposed to material cosmos), was also anthropological, since it affirmed the human being's dual origin and substance (body molded by the inferior Demiurge, soul or divine intellect consubstantial with the supreme Deity). It was thus anticosmic and antisomatic, since the cosmos and the human body were considered negative realities. Even in the gnostic perspective, the opposition will come to an end with the destruction of matter and its rulers.

One expression of the absolute type of gnostic dualism, with its own characteristics and broad speculative developments, was *Manicheism. Forms of mitigated dualism, anticosmic and antisomatic, were those medieval heresies that, like the Bulgar Bogomils and the European Cathars, claimed that Satan, the first angel of God, rebelled against him and became the creator of the world and the human body.

U. Bianchi, Il dualismo religioso. Saggio storico ed etnologico, Rome 1958; U. Bianchi (ed.), Le origini dello gnosticismo, Leiden 1967; G. Sfameni Gasparro, I dualismi medievali, in G. Filoramo (ed.), Storia delle Religioni, vol. III, Religioni dualiste e Islam, Bari 1995, 69-98; F. Zambon, La cena segreta. Trattati e rituali catari, Milan 1997.

G. Sfameni Gasparro

DUMIUM. A monastery near *Braga (province of *Gallaecia). Its presence dates from shortly after 550, the date of the arrival in those lands of its founder and first abbot St. Martin of Dumium (or Braga), at the same time as the conversion of the Suevi to Catholicism. In 556, in order to have St. Martin as bishop, it was raised to an episcopal see; from then on its abbots were all bishops. The monastery was always a suffragan see of Braga. It had a rich library. Among its monks we know *Paschasius, whom St. Martin charged with translating the Vitae Patrum (PL 73, 1025-1062). The Dumium episcopate coexisted with that of Braga until the time of the Arab invasion, although sometimes the two dioceses had the same man as bishop, as the lists of prelates show. Bishops: St. Martin (556–at least 572); John (589); Germanus (633); Ricimir (ca. 638–654: mentioned at the 10th Council of *Toledo); Fructuosus (d. 654); Leodegisius Julianus (d. 675); Benjamin (d. 681); Liuva (d. 683); Vincent (d. 688); Felix (d. 693).

Mansilla, Geografía I, 208-209; A. de J. da Costa, São Martinho de Dume, Braga 1950; ES 18, 27ff.; I. Pereira Lamelas, Os primeiros passos do cristianismo no território português: Itinerarium 46 (2000) 67-69.

P. De Luis

DURA EUROPOS. The double name of this great caravan station on the Euphrates river, while recalling its pre-Hellenistic founding (in Akkadian duru = wall), also evokes its acquisition by the Macedonian Seleucus I Nicator who, "founding" the city no later than 312 BC, gave to it the name of his native town, "Europos." The project of the Seleucid sovereigns to Hellenize their reign is reflected in the layout of Dura Europos, which is similar to that of *Antioch, *Apamea and Laodicea.

Falling into the hands of the Parthians shortly after 128 BC, the city, an outpost on the border of the Parthian kingdom, was increasingly militarized, though it continued to be an important commercial center. When Mesopotamia became a Roman province, Dura Europos became the object of dispute between the Parthian kingdom and the Roman Empire. It was only in AD 165 under the emperor Lucius Verus that it came into Roman possession, who stationed there the 20th cohort of the Palmyran auxiliaries. With the emergence of the neo-Persian *Sassanid kingdom (AD 227), Dura Europos grew in importance as a Roman fortification. Nevertheless, in 256 it fell to the Persian Sapor I, who besieged and destroyed it. In 272 the city was definitively abandoned until nearly three centuries later, when *Justinian, fighting against the Persians, fortified it.

Whereas written sources tell us very little about the Christian history of Dura Europos, we are learning much of primary importance from the archaeological evidence. Extremely significant was the finding, in an urban center as reduced as it was, of 20 different churches, with altars, reliefs, paintings and inscriptions—evidence of religious fervor, and of the different faiths that coexisted in the city. The first traces of the Christian presence at Dura Europos go back to the first decades of the 3rd c. During these years (ca. 232) a private house was used as a church (domus ecclesiae), which accords with the climate of religious tolerance promoted by *Alexander Severus (222–235). This site in Dura Europos is the oldest place of Christian worship, and the only one we know of set up in a private house. It consisted of a large meeting room and a baptistery. The baptistery room was embellished by frescoes that have been transferred to the Yale Gallery in New Haven (USA). They are the oldest known Christian paintings, and depict the salvation of the neophytes through baptism.

Also datable to 232 is the inscription that—after that of *Palmyra (136)—is the oldest monument containing a Christian *cross. Archaeology also reveals the friendly relations that existed at Dura Europos between Christians and Jews. A graffito of the Christian Siseos testifies that he, though a Christian, participated in the construction of the synagogue, built in AD 235 and embellished with precious frescoes with biblical scenes, preserved in the museum of Damascus. Near the synagogue have been found Hebrew parchments containing eucharistic prayers similar to those in the Didache. Of notable importance for the history of Christian literature has been the finding of a fragment of 14 lines of *Tatian's Diatesseron, transcribed certainly before 254. Regarding the city's history, we know that at the time of the Sassanid king Sapor II (310–380), a hermit named Benjamin suffered martyrdom at Dura Europos. With the Islamic domination, the traces of life of this small but flourishing commercial city disappeared—but the excavations begun in the 1920s by Yale University (USA) and those still underway are restoring to us, piece by piece, the wonder of this city on the Euphrates.

P. Lériche (ed.), Doura Europos, Beyrouth 1997; J. Balty, La peinture en Syrie, in Archéologie et histoire de la Syrie, II, Saarbrücken 1989, 525-531; L. Padovese, Guida alla Siria, Casale Monf. 1994, 85-88; RAC 4, 358-370; T. Gnoli, Roma, Edessa e Palmira nel III sec. d.C., Pisa-Rome 2000.

L. Padovese

DVIN (Greek Δούβιος). Founded 4th c. BC, located on a hill in the valley Arart Marz of the river Arax, 35 km (22 mi) S of Yerevan not far from Mt. Ararat. The Arsacid king Chosroes II (330–338) refounded the city, moving his residence there from Artaxata. A Persian marzban was killed there in the Armenian uprising of 572; on this occasion the cathedral of St. Gregory, which had been used as a depot, was burned down. In 640 Dvin was conquered by the Muslims and was made the seat of the governor Dabil. The capital of *Armenia from the 4th–9th c., Dvin was a prosperous commercial city and was destroyed by Turkish invaders in the 13th c. It was an episcopal see from the 4th c., and from the 5th c. a see of the Armenian catholicos—not from the time of Giwt (461–471/478), but from that of catholicos *John I Mandakuni (ca. 484/485), when Armenia obtained religious autonomy within the Persian empire.

Dvin then became the ecclesiastical and administrative capital, hosting numerous synods: the city boasts numerous and significant Christian buildings. The phases of construction have been identified for the "cathedral" dedicated to St. *Gregory the Illuminator: the building of Vahan Mamikonian (late 5th c.), who rebuilt the churches destroyed in the mid-5th c. by the Zoroastrians; the reconstruction of Smbat Bagratuni (606–621), when the earlier plan of three aisles divided by pillars was modified by adding two apses on the sides, after a "fashion" peculiar to the 6th c. (cf. *Constantinople and *Bethlehem; see M. D'Onofrio, Le chiese di Dvin, 13-48). Near this building arose the palace of the catholicos of Armenia, who resided at Dvin for about five centuries, and the one-aisled church of St. Yzbuzit (6th c.). Another church, now vanished, was the church of St. Sergius, built by Narses III (641–661), probably extra moenia: to it D'Onofrio attributes a pendentive preserved in the museum of Dvin, whose resemblance to those of Zvart'noc includes its bearing functions, factors that have led to a hypothetical identification of the so-called ghost building of Dvin with the church of St. Sergius, which was probably similar to Zvart'noc in iconography and architectural decoration. After the Turkish destruction (13th c.), the site was forgotten until the early 20th c., when excavations began.

A. Khatchatrian, Dvin: RBK, II, Stuttgart 1971; M. D'Onofrio, Le chiese di Dvin, Rome 1973; A. Khatchatrian, Inscriptions et histoire des églises arméniennes, Milan 1974, 38-39; EC 4, 2016; CE 3, 1129-30; DHGE 14, 1243-1244; EAM 4 759-760.; N. Garsoïan, L'église armenienne et le grand schisme d'Orient, Louvain 1999 (passim).

M. Falla Castelfranchi

DYNAMIS - ENERGEIA. Δύναμις and ἐνέργεια are pivotal concepts in Aristotle's metaphysics and were taken up by patristic authors. However, the Fathers' use of these terms did not always also imply the acceptance of the Aristotelian dialectic of potentiality and actuality. The most important use of these concepts in patristic authors is related to the theme of the knowledge of God, apophaticism, and the relationship between theologia and oikonomia. *Philo had developed the doctrine of the powers of God, the dynameis, as expressions of the unknowable divinity, and surely at least *Clement, *Origen and *Gregory of Nyssa were indebted to him in their reflections on apophaticism. But the notion of dynamis plays an important role in the doctrine of creation as well, esp. in *Justin, *Bardesanes, Clement, Origen, Gregory of Nyssa and some other patristic thinkers.

According to Bardesanes, the Christian philosopher of Edessa who was a contemporary of Clement of Alexandria, Christ-Logos, who created this world, is (as he puts it in a fragment preserved by *Ephrem) "the power of the primordial Logos." "Power" corresponds to Greek dynamis. The Logos's being primordial and original is related to his divinity. Precisely because he is God, the Logos was "in the beginning" (Jn 1:1, echoing Gen 1:1), and the dynamis to which Bardesanes's formula alludes is nothing but an aspect of Christ-Logos. Indeed, in Origen too, dynamis is one of the main epinoiai of Christ, besides Logos and Sophia/Wisdom, and plays a core role in the doctrine of creation.

This conception is already clear in Justin, one of the very first patristic philosophers, and influenced by *Platonism as well. In his Dialogue with Trypho, written when Bardesanes was a child or shortly earlier, Justin calls Christ precisely Dynamis, Logos and Sophia: "God begot him from himself in the beginning, before all creatures, Power of Logos [δύναμις λογική] . . . Son, Wisdom [Σοφία] . . . God, Lord, and Logos" (61.1). Most remarkably, Justin's expression, "Power of Logos begotten in the beginning," in reference to Christ, exactly corresponds to Bardesanes's designation of Christ in the aforementioned fragment preserved by Ephrem: "Power of the primordial Logos." I wonder whether this impressive correspondence might indicate that Bardesanes knew Justin's work and thought. It is worthwhile to report Justin's subsequent statement concerning the divinity and eternity of the Logos and its action in creation: "The Logos of Wisdom is itself God, begotten by the Father of the universe, Logos, Wisdom, Power, and glory of the Father"; it is he who said: "The Lord established me as the principle . . . before the world . . . while God prepared the heavens I was there." Notably, Clement of Alexandria also connected the Logos of God with the δυνάμεις, and more precisely with the spiritual powers (see Ramelli, Clement's Notion of the Logos). For Justin, Clement, Bardesanes and Origen, Christ-Logos is God's Power and Wisdom, by means of which God created the world.

*Gregory of Nyssa further developed this train of thought. He describes Christ-Logos-Wisdom as the seat of all Ideas of realities before creation (De Perf. 260B); through God's dynamis, who is Christ-Logos, these Ideas became creatures. This is the creation of the world performed by Christ-Logos, which is also described by Gregory in In Hex. 72B. Here he observes that the Ideas of all realities were contemplated by God, in the divine Mind-Logos, before their creation as realities, and it was "the Logos of dynamis" that brought these Ideas to reality. The "divine dynamis" is again said to have created all things in De hom. op. 3: "The creation [κτίσις] was made impromptu, so to say, by the divine dynamis, in that it was constituted at the same time as the order was given."

The role of divine dynamis in creation, which explicates itself in God's operations or ἐνέργειαι, also forms the basis for a distinction on the gnoseological plane, the import of which affects the whole doctrine of apophaticism. Once again, it is in Origen and in Gregory of Nyssa, with important parallels in *Neoplatonism and developments in ps.-*Dionysius and *Maximus the Confessor, that this conception is best delineated. Gregory of Nyssa maintained that we cannot know or say anything about God's nature (οὐσία), but we can only know God's operations (ἐνέργειαι), which in turn are distinct from, and originated by, divine power (δύναμις), which we can know, not in itself, but only by inference from its operations and creatures. That God's nature and substance is ineffable is insisted upon by Gregory esp. in Ad Ablabium, in his polemic against *Eunomius, and in his homilies on the Song of Songs. The Godhead, who is "invisible in its nature," becomes "visible in his operations" (De beat. GNO VII/2, 141) and is thus grasped by human intellect in some of its aspects, τινα περὶ αὐτήν, or τὰ περὶ τὸν Θεόν (GNO I, 256).

Gregory is relying on Origen, e.g., in C. Cels. VI, 65, who also knows the expression τὰ περί, which was already employed by Clement, Strom. V 11,71,3 (a passage concerning the abstractive process in our knowledge of God). This expression, and the underlying concept, was also used by *Plotinus Enn. V 3,14, and was taken up by *Basil in the second book of his C. Eun. and by another Origenian author, ps.-Dionysius (Cael. Hier. II 3). The ineffability of the divinity in its nature and the possibility only of saying something of what concerns it (τι περὶ αὐτοῦ) was also held by Plotinus (Enn. V 3,13-14), who displays the οὐσία-ἐνέργεια-δύναμις triad as well. Apophaticism in Plotinus, however, seems to be more radical than in Origen, Gregory of Nyssa and other patristic authors, due to a precise ontological basis: Plotinus's One completely transcends Being itself, whereas Origen and Gregory partially maintain the identification of God with Being, as they felt bound by Ex 3:14.

God's οὐσία, which is accessible to our knowledge only through God's ἐνέργειαι, is common to all three Persons of the Trinity, according to Gregory. Indeed, he also considers the δύναμις to be one and the same for all three Persons of the Trinity, and identifies this δύναμις with the divine will (θέλημα, βούλησις), which is also regarded by him as common to the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. This is also why Christ's epinoiai (such as Physician, Rock, Spring, Way, Life, Resurrection and so on) are ascribed by Gregory to the whole Trinity, which, per se, transcends every name, but quoad nos "becomes πολυώνυμος thanks to the variety of its beneficial operations" (Ad Abl. GNO III/1, 56). From the fact that the οὐσία is one and the same for the whole Trinity also derives the unicity of the δύναμις and of the ἐνέργεια, but this on the ontological plane. On the gnoseological one, according to the order of our knowledge, which starts from what we can realize, if the three Persons have one and the same activity (ἐνέργεια), then they must have also one and the same power (δύναμις); now, if they have the same activity and the same power, they will necessarily have also the same nature and substance (φύσις, οὐσία; De orat. dom. GNO VII/2,41,6-10).

This idea was already present in *Irenaeus, A.H. IV 20, in a great admirer of Origen such as *Athanasius (Ep. ad Serap. 28) and in *Didymus the Blind, Origen's faithful follower (Spir. Sanct. 17,32,36); among the Cappadocians, it also appears in Basil (De Spir. Sanct. 16,38). On the Neoplatonic side, the necessity of considering οὐσία, δύναμις and ἐνέργεια in a unitary way is also found in *Iamblichus (Myst. I 5,18). Athanasius, Didymus, Basil and Gregory of Nyssa probably depended on Origen, who insisted on the supreme unity of God, described by him as monad and henad and absolutely simple in Princ. I 1,6. In this passage, *Rufinus's mens obviously corresponds to Greek νοῦς, which Origen here identifies with God, even though in C. Cels. VII 38 he affirms that God is either Νοῦς or even beyond Νοῦς and οὐσία. In Protr. ad mart. 46 Origen affirms that God transcends the νοητά, and in Comm. Io. XIX 6,1 he states that the nature and power of God are beyond οὐσία. Such an oscillation was present in *Middle Platonism, in Philo and in Clement of Alexandria; while *Numenius identified God with the One and the Nous, in Plotinus the Nous is subordinate to the One. Likewise, another patristic philosopher, *Marius Victorinus, says that God is sine exsistentia sine substantia sine intellegentia sine vita . . . non per privationem sed per supralationem . . . praeexsistens (Adv. Ar. IV 23;26), supra omnem exsistentiam, supra omne ὄν, supra omnem cognoscentiam (Ad Cand. 13). Therefore, God is beyond or before substantia, knowledge and operatio (inoperans operatio; actio inactuosa: Adv. Ar. IA, 12-13; ineffabiles res et investigabilia mysteria Dei voluntatum aut operationum: Ad Cand. 1). Indeed, in Victorinus the substantia-virtus-operatio triad closely corresponds to the οὐσία-ἐνέργεια-δύναμις triad in Origen and Gregory of Nyssa. The Father, for Victorinus, is the pole of esse/substantia, while the Son and the Spirit represent that of agere/operatio (see esp. Adv. Arium IV).

Both Victorinus and Gregory of Nyssa had behind them an already Christianized Platonic system, that of Origen, in which the reflection on οὐσία, δύναμις and ἐνέργεια specifically in reference to the Christian God was already well defined. Indeed, Origen inspired Gregory and other patristic thinkers such as *Gregory of Nazianzus (Or. 28,13) with the notion of the incomprehensibility of God's substance as opposed to our possibility of knowing the Godhead through its operations or energeiai (Princ. II 6,1).

The Son himself has become the will of the Father (C. Eun. II, GNO I,288), for "immediately, without any interval, along with God's will [βουλή] there also appeared the work [ἔργον]. God's will is, at the same time, power [δύναμις]" (De an. 69A). The creation performed by God's power is nothing else but God's will that is transformed into substance (οὐσιοῦται, ibid. 124B). "God's will became the matter and substance of creatures" (In Illud: Tunc et Ipse Filius, GNO III/2, 11,4-7); "it turned itself into the matter, structure, and power of the world" (Vit. Greg. Thaum. p. 24,11-12). The implication of God's dynamis in creation also results from Hex. PG 44,77D, in which Gregory of Nyssa affirms that God created τῇ δυνάμει, at the beginning, the οὐσία of all things. He follows the Stoic and Neoplatonic (Plot. Enn. III 2,2) positive conception of δύναμις, which is not tantamount to lack and imperfection, as it was in Aristotle, but indicates ontological force, richness and resource.

It is thanks to his dynamis that God, after the creation, remains present to the world in the same way as the soul is present to the human body, thanks to its dynamis, which allows the world to endure in existence, even though it is utterly transcendent, just as the soul operates in the body through its vital ἐνέργεια, although it maintains all the pureness and simplicity of its essence (De an. 24C, 44BC). Now, already Origen, in Philoc. 2 (cf. 1,7), insists on God's providence and δύναμις, which is present everywhere in creation. At the same time, in Comm. in Io. XIX 6,37-38, he observes that God's φύσις and δύναμις are both beyond the οὐσία and cannot be grasped by human comprehension. God is impossible to know for human knowledge (C. Cels. VI 65); however, God is intelligible: πάντων ἐπέκεινα ὤν, ἀρρήτῳ τινὶ δυνάμει νοητὸς (ibid. VII 45). God is beyond Being and Intellect (ἐπέκεινα οὐσίας ἐστι πρεσβείᾳ καὶ δυνάμει ὁ θεός; ibid. VI 64; ἐπέκεινα νοῦ καὶ οὐσίας, VII 38), and yet is also Being in the fullest sense (ἣ καὶ αὐτός ἐστιν οὐσία, ibid. and Princ. I 3,5). Only the invisible and incorporeal nature is οὐσία proper (κυρίως οὐσία, Comm. in Io. XX 18,159), and "invisible and incorporeal οὐσία" is said of God in C. Cels. VI, 71. All the rest is οὐσία only insofar as it participates in God's οὐσία (C. Cels. VI 64). But the Son, who is God, has the οὐσία not by participation but by essence (Sel. in Ps. PG 12, 1656,13; C. Cels. VI 64: οὐδ' οὐσίας μετέχει ὁ θεός· μετέχεται γὰρ μᾶλλον ἢ μετέχει . . . ὁ σωτὴρ ἡμῶν οὐ μετέχει μὲν δικαιοσύνης, δικαιοσύνη δὲ ὢν μετέχεται ὑπὸ τῶν δικαίων). Origen, like *Evagrius of Pontus, Gregory of Nyssa and all of his patristic followers, maintains the identity of God with the supreme Being because of the aforementioned formula in Ex 3:14, but also in order to identify the Being, who is God, with the Good (along Plato's lines), and thus reduce evil to nonbeing: οὐκ ἔσονται οὐσίαι τὰ κακά (Philoc. 24,4). God's δύναμις is good, positively and absolutely good, and its ἐνέργεια explicates itself in creation and providence (Princ. II 9,1; III 5,2; IV 4,8).

G. Isaye, L'unité de l'opération divine dans les écrits trinitaires de Grégoire de Nysse, RSR 27 (1937) 422-439; J. Whittaker, ΕΠΕΚΕΙΝΑ ΝΟΥ ΚΑΙ ΟΥΣΙΑΣ, VChr 23 (1969) 91-104; L. Cignelli, Il tema Logos-Dynamis in Origene, in LA 34 (1984) 239-272; J.C.M. van Winden, Notiz über Dynamis bei Gregor von Nyssa, in ΕΡΜΗΝΕΥΜΑΤΑ. Festschrift für Hadwiga Hörner, Frankfurt 1991, 147-150 = Id., Arché. A Collection of Patristic Studies, Leiden 1997, 146-150; S. Coakley, Re-thinking Gregory of Nyssa: Introduction – Gender, Trinitarian Analogies, and the Pedagogy of the Song, in Re-thinking Gregory of Nyssa, ed. Id., Malden 2003 (= Modern Theology 18, 2002) 1-13; R. Somos, The Divine Power in Origen's Theory of Salvation, in Pagani e cristiani alla ricerca della salvezza (secoli I-III). XXXIV Incontro di studiosi dell'Antichità Cristiana, Roma, Augustinianum, 5-7 maggio 2005 [SEA 96], Rome 2006, 711-724; A. Ojell, The Constitutive Elements of the Apophatic System of Gregory of Nyssa, in Studia Patristica, Leuven 2006, 397-402, reprinted in Id., One Word, One Body, One Voice, Helsinki 2007, section II, article 3; I. Ramelli, Bardaisan of Edessa: A Reassessment of the Evidence and a Reinterpretation, Piscataway 2009; C. Köckert, Christliche Kosmologie und kaiserzeitliche Philosophie, Tübingen 2009; I. Ramelli, Clement's Notion of the Logos "All Things As One." Its Alexandrian Background in Philo and Its Developments in Origen and Nyssen, in Alexandrian Personae: Scholarly Culture and Religious Traditions in Ancient Alexandria, ed. Z. Plese - R. Hirsch-Luipold, Tübingen 2010; Id., La triade ousia - energeia - dynamis in Gregorio di Nissa: ascendenze origeniane e alcuni sviluppi, in Ousia - dynamis - energeia. La triade ontologica neoplatonica e la sua fortuna, prefaced by G. D'Onofrio, forthcoming in Salerno, Schola Salernitana series.

I. Ramelli

DYNAMIUS PATRICIUS (d. 601). It is probable that this person, was the Dynamius rector Provinciae spoken of by *Gregory of Tours (HF VI, 7.11; IX, 11; cf. also Ven. Fort., Carm. VI, 9-10). We have two of Dynamius Patricius's letters and his Vita S. Maximi episcopi Reiensis, whereas the Vita S. Marini, attributed to him, is from a later period. A poem of Dynamius Patricius in elegiac distichs, De Lerine insula, is in the Anthologia Latina (I, 2, Leipzig 1906, 265-266).

CPL 1058,2125; PL 80, 25-26 and 31-40; MGH Epist. III, 127,130-131; CCL 117, 430-431 and 435-436.

S. Zincone

DYOPHYSITISM - DYOPHYSITES. By dyophysitism, whose adherents are called dyophysites, we understand the doctrine of two natures, divine and human, in Christ. This *christological position, defended esp. by the Antiochenes against *Apollinaris of Laodicea and *Cyril of Alexandria, and then by adherents to *Chalcedonian faith against the so-called *monophysites, had its roots in the first Christian writings, which in some way distinguish between a divine element (πνεῦμα - λόγος) and a human element (σάρξ) in Christ (Rom 1:3-4; Jn 1:14; Ign., Eph. 7,2). This tendency to distinguish was reinforced in the struggle against the pagans and heretics of the 2nd and 3rd c. Some spoke of two ousiae (*Melito), others of two φύσεις to which correspond two series of attributes, divine and human (*Origen), or others of two substantiae (*Tertullian). It was only the *Arian controversy, however, in which the concept of divine generation as distinct from human was developed, which led to the bolder elaboration of the two natures, based on the two births, eternal (from God) and temporal (from Mary), also corresponding to two consubstantialities (DS 271f.; 298f.; 301f.). This evolution, though in some sense clarifying, nevertheless provoked the christological problem, i.e., the question of how the two natures constitute a single Christ. Though the question was resolved terminologically at the Council of Chalcedon (451), to this day the monophysites are unreconciled with those who accept the creed of Chalcedon, whom they call dyophysites. Apart from cultural reasons, the difficulty of obtaining agreement comes mainly from differing concepts of nature, i.e., a somewhat static concept for the dyophysites and a dynamic concept (ἐνέργεια) for the monophysites (see a good example of discussion of the two positions in John of Damascus, Jacob. 78: ed. Kotter IV, 135ff.).

A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche, I, Freiburg 1979, passim, esp. 494; Id., II/1, Freiburg 1986; B. Studer, Dio Salvatore, It. ed. Rome 1986, esp. 311-318 (Eng. tr.: Trinity and Incarnation: The Faith of the Early Church, Edinburgh 1993; T. Hainthaler, Monophysitismus: LTK[3] 7, 418-421 (bibl.).

B. Studer

E

EADBURGA. English nun, known as *Boniface's correspondent, not to be confused with Eadburga, daughter of Centwine, king of Wessex (676–685). Between 719 and 722 she sent two letters to Boniface: one to tell him that she had not yet been able to find the copy of a text she had been trying to send him and to ask him for some extracts from *Scripture and for some *Masses to be said for a deceased relative; the other, written with the abbess Eangyth, to tell him that she wanted to make a pilgrimage to Rome to receive absolution.

PL 96, 837; M. Tangl, ed., MGH, Ep. I, Berlin 1916, 26-28 (n. 15); Id., Studien zur Neuausgabe der Bonifatius-Briefe: Neues Archiv 40 (1914–1915) 639-790 and 41 (1916–1917) 23-101; Patrologia IV, 411.

P. Marone

EAST - ORIENTATION
For the early Christians and for ourselves, the content of these terms could have two meanings: (A) the everyday one (geographical, linguistic and political), (B) the theological and metaphorical one.

A. Geographically, East generally had three meanings: (1) within the Roman Empire, it indicated the provinces of Greek culture in which Greek was the predominant language. The frontier between regions of Greek and Latin culture followed more or less this line of demarcation: Syrtis Maior, Scupi, Serdica*, Odessos, Tomi, Istros—at the time of *Diocletian, the European administrative borders deviated from this imaginary line, passing through Scodra and Singidunum*; (2) for a citizen of the empire, the East meant the whole of the lands beyond the imperial frontier in Asia, in the modern sense, esp. the neighboring lands: *Arabia, *Mesopotamia, Assyria, Media, *Armenia; (3) after the division of the empire into 15 dioceses, from Diocletian to the 6th c., in political administration orientalis meant one of these dioceses, the one containing the ten Near Eastern provinces in the form of a triangle: Mt. *Sinai—Isauria—Mesopotamia.

The linguistic meaning of East was similar to the geographic meaning: for a Roman from the Latin countries, it meant the peoples of Greek culture; for a citizen of the empire, Easterners were the peoples outside the sphere of Hellenism, in Asia.

In the history of Christianity, the adjective oriental/Eastern indicates literature in the *Syriac, *Georgian, *Coptic, *Armenian and *Palaeoslavonic languages, etc. In the sphere of liturgy, however, it means all types of divine worship derived from the rites of the most ancient Eastern patriarchates, *Alexandria and *Antioch.

B. In a theological sense, East indicated the attitudes, problems, mentality, special tendencies and characteristics of the Greek church, when Greek theology definitively detached itself from Latin.

Ancient religions gave much importance to orientation: in prayer, in the construction of tombs, in the laying out of cities and of temples. Vitruvius writes that the temple should be oriented west-east, so that the statue of the god would look ad vespertinam caeli regionem, and the believers who look upon the statue would make sacrifices ad partem caeli orientis (IV, 5,1-2). The metaphorical meaning of the term east is closely connected with the symbolism of the sun. Some cults worshiped the sun, and spread throughout the Roman Empire (F. Cumont, Les religions orientales dans le paganisme romain, Brussels 1929, 125-150). For Christians, the sun is Christ. "The Holy Spirit loves the East, figure of Christ," writes *Tertullian (Adv. Val. 3); similarly *Gregory of Nyssa (De vita S. Macr.: PG 46, 984A; Or. in laud. Bas.: PG 46, 798C). The idea recurs in the Roman liturgy in the antiphon of the third day before Christmas: "O Oriens, splendor lucis aeternae et sol iustitiae. . . ." It was a very widespread custom to turn to the East, both in private prayer (Basil, De Sp. s. 27; Meth. Ol., Symp. 11,2) and in the liturgy: baptismal (Ambr., De myst. 7; Cyr. of Jer., Catech. 19,11) or eucharistic (Apos. Con. II, 57). The Acts of Paul attest that Paul "turned toward the east, raised his hands to heaven and prayed at length" (Martyrdom of Paul 5). Already in the 3rd c., *Origen wrote: "Who would not admit that the East clearly indicates that we must pray turned to that region to indicate that the soul looks toward the rising of the true light" (On Prayer 32,1). Because of this gesture, observes Tertullian, the pagans think that Christians worship the sun, since they pray turned toward the East and celebrate their liturgy on Sunday, the dies solis (Ad nationes 1,13). *Clement of Alexandria also testifies to the practice of praying turned to the East (Stromata 7,43,6), as does the Didascalia Apostolorum (2,57).

The structure of *church buildings was generally influenced by this custom. Even in the funeral rite, the East frequently played an important role, showing the last position the Christian had to assume, both dying and dead. In the 1st centuries, the meaning of this gesture was linked to eschatological expectation (Mt 24:27; Didasc. Addai 2,1). Origen writes, "Redemption comes from the East; from there in fact man had his origin, hence the name 'East' . . . for this reason you are always invited to turn your gaze toward the East from whence arises the sun of justice and from where, for you, arises the light . . ." (Hom. in Lev. 9,10). Later, prayer toward the East was related to the theme of *paradise, following the Genesis account, which placed the ancient homeland in the East (Gen 2:8); according to the Apocalypse of Moses (ch. 29), Adam often returned to the barred frontier of the earthly paradise to ask pardon. The Christian, like his forefather Adam, wishes to return to his lost homeland, and so, like him, he turns in private prayer to the East (Greg. Nyss., Or. in laud. Bas.: PG 44, 1184D). In the following century, at *Rome, *Leo the Great criticizes as a vestige of paganism those who, influenced by sun worship, upon entering St. Peter's first turned toward the sun to make a superstitious gesture (Serm. 22,6; 27,4).

DACL 12, 1610-1657 (Orient, Occident); 12, 2658-2665 (Orientales); 12, 2665-2669 (Orientation); A. Podossinov, Himmelsrichtung: RAC 15, 233-286; E. Peterson, La croce e la preghiera verso Oriente: EphLit 59 (1945) 52-62; J. Daniélou, Bible et liturgie, Paris 1951; C. Vogel, L'orientation vers l'est du célébrant et des fidèles pendant la célébration eucharistique: OrSyr 9 (1964) 3-37; Id., Sol aequinotialis. Problèmes et techniques de l'orientation dans le culte chrétien: RSR 36 (1962) 175-211; Id., La croix eschatologique, in Noël, Épiphanie, retour du Christ, Paris 1967, 85-108; M.J. Moreton, Eis anatolas blepsate: Orientation as Liturgical Principle, SP 17, Oxford 1982, 575-590; G. Tosi, La città antica e la Religio nel De Architectura di Vitruvio, in Religione e città nel mondo antico, Rome 1984, 425-439; M. Righetti, Storia liturgica, I, Milan [3]1998, 278-313; F.M. Pace, Dall'oriente la salvezza. Osservazioni sull'orientazione nel cristianesimo antico: Humanitas 38 (1983) 358-375; Th.K. Carrol - Th. Halton, Liturgical Practice in the Fathers, Wilmington 1988 (58ff.; 51; 60; Apos. Con.); G. Bissoli, Il tempio nella letteratura giudaica e neotestamentaria, Jerusalem 1994; M. Wallraff, Christus verus Sol: Sonnenverehrung und Christentum in der Spätantike, Münster 2001; U.M. Lang, Rivolti al Signore. L'orientamento nella preghiera liturgica, Siena 2006.

G. Ladocsi

EASTER

I. The theological content of the feast - II. The celebration of the feast - III. The Easter controversy.

I. The theological content of the feast. R. Cantalamessa demonstrated how one must distinguish the two understandings of Easter within the Christian tradition, both of which go back to Judaism.

1. The Jewish tradition. At the beginning, the Passover was a nomadic feast (probably in relation to transhumance); the rite of the blood of the Lamb sprinkled on the lintels and the two doorposts had an apotropaic meaning: one must protect against the Destroyer. In the religion of Israel, the one who "passes over" was God, who spared the homes of his people (Ex 12:27). To this first understanding, a second was added: the Passover stood in relation to the memory of the Exodus from Egypt, which reminded the Israelites of human deliverance from slavery (Ex 13:8, 14; Dt 16:1); in Hellenistic Judaism (see Philo, Leg. Spec. II, 147) and in Judaism after the structure of the Second Temple, this anthropological understanding of the feast prevailed over the primitive understanding.

2. The Christian tradition. Jesus died during the Jewish Passover (whether it was on the 14th of Nisan, according to *John's chronology, or the 15th of Nisan, according to the chronology of the Synoptic Gospels). This coincidence could not but exert influence on the Christian tradition. One perceives a progressive "paschalization" of the events of Holy Friday, on the basis of the typological interpretation of the OT. It is typical that, from the beginning, the two Jewish understandings about the Passover were present in the Christian tradition (see 1 Cor 5:7-8). Nevertheless, one can distinguish two types of paschal theology:

a. In the Asiatic type, the Passover is placed in relation to πάσχειν/passio and takes on an almost exclusively christological meaning (the content of the feast is a commemoration of the past and the fervent expectation of eschatological events). And this *Quartodeciman Passover appears in *Melito of Sardis's homily On the Passover. Nevertheless, we know that the Roman Easter was not different from the Asiatic feast in its content but only in its date (the origin of the Roman Easter, however, could also date back to the primitive church).

b. In the Alexandrian type, Easter is placed in relation to the idea of transitus/passage and takes on an almost exclusively anthropological meaning (one has passed from the shadow to the reality, one lives in the present anticipating the eschatological and heavenly truth; the tendency of "dehistoricizing" the feast and the *sacraments is apparent here). Later Greek patristic authors would confuse this paschal theology of the Alexandrians such as *Clement and *Origen with the Asiatic tradition.

c. Among Latin patristic authors, who based themselves primarily upon the Asiatic tradition, the Alexandrian tradition would be introduced beginning with *Ambrose (De sacr. 1,4,12; De Cain et Abel 1,8,31; Ep. 1,10) and *Jerome (Comm. in Evang. Matth. IV, 26,2). *Augustine would have the credit of reaching a christological synthesis of the two traditions on the basis of Jn 13:1 (Tract. in Evang. Joh. 55,1). "It is through his passion that the Lord 'passed' from death into life and has opened to us believers the way to the *resurrection so that even we might pass from death to life" (Enarr. in Psalm. 120,6; see Civ. Dei XVI, 43). This synthesis allows him—and his successors—to combine the historical, sacramental, mystical and eschatological aspects of the Easter feast.

II. The celebration of the feast. For the origins (which are difficult to trace) and the various forms of the celebration of Easter, during the first centuries, see the section below on the Easter controversy. In the 4th c., the organization and celebration of the Paschal cycle began to become uniform in various ecclesiastical regions.

1. The date. The ecumenical Council of Nicaea (325) required all the churches to celebrate Easter in accordance with the Roman and Alexandrian practice, that is, the first *Sunday after the first full moon following the equinox of spring; each year the bishop of *Alexandria would send an encyclical letter to the other churches announcing the date of Easter. But differences of calendar between the East and West made this desire to celebrate Easter everywhere on the same day to be nothing more than wishful thinking, even up to our own times (see the recent ecumenical meetings that have attempted to set Easter day for the Sunday following the second Saturday of April).

2. The liturgy. Lent is mentioned for the first time in 334 by *Athanasius (Ep. fest. 6,13; cf. 13,8; then Itin. Egeriae 27-29).

a. Holy Week seems to be an institution that reflects the devotion of the first Christian pilgrims who traveled to the Holy Land to live out the various moments of Christ's passion. The first detailed report of the events scheduled for this week has been preserved in the Itinerarium Egereiae (The Travels of Egeria) from the end of the 4th c. (30–38). *Egeria left the following information about Holy Week: Palm Sunday took place on the Mount of Olives; one was to descend upon the city of *Jerusalem in procession with olive and palm branches in hand (see Mk 11:1-10 and parallel texts; Jn 12:1, 12-19); it seems that on the same day the redditio symboli (recitation of the Creed) took place (46) by the *catechumens, as in the West. On Tuesday, texts were read from Christ's eschatological discourse (Mk 13:5-57 and parallel texts) on the Mount of Olives; on Wednesday the story of Judas's betrayal was read at the Holy Sepulcher (Mk 14:10-11 and parallel texts).

b. The Easter triduum began Thursday evening. At Jerusalem, the faithful spent the night from Thursday through Friday in vigil on the Mount of Olives and Gethsemane (Mk 14:32-52 and parallel texts); in *Syria, during this vigil, the institution of the *Eucharist was commemorated (see Aphraates, Demonstr. 12). Holy Friday—likewise from Egeria's account—Christians spent the time reflecting upon Jesus' morning appearance before Pilate (Mk 15:2-15 and parallel texts) and the flagellation (Mk 15:16-20 and parallel texts). At noon, the wood of the cross found by *Helena was shown to the faithful; then, for three hours, the people read the account of the passion, along with OT prophecies about Christ. Holy Saturday had no official services; in all the churches a *fast was observed in memory of "the absence of the bridegroom" (Mk 2:20 and parallel texts) and Christ's "rest" (Apos. Con. VII, 23,4; VIII, 47,67), but his *descent into hell was recalled, which, for the Byzantine tradition, would become the first sign of his victory over the kingdom of *death (see Amphil. of Iconium, Or. in diem sabbatis 1). The Paschal vigil on Saturday evening was the climax of the feast: "the mother of all holy vigils, during which the entire world stands vigil" (Aug., Serm. 219). The development of the vigil has its roots in the tradition of the primitive Paschal celebration, which is still reflected in the Didascalia siriaca* of the 3rd c.: "stay together in the same place, persevering in vigil all night long, making supplication and prayers, reading the prophets, the Gospel and the Psalms with fear and trembling, with fervent supplication until the third hour of the night following the Saturday, then eat, rejoice, be glad and exalt because Christ, the pledge of our resurrection, has arisen" (V, 19). During the 4th c. (and probably already in the Apostolic Tradition* of the 3rd c.; see Tertull., Bapt. 19,1), the Paschal vigil was also the solemn moment of *baptism; the catechetical homilies of both East and West describe for us in detail the baptismal rites and symbols. With the decline of the catechumenate of the ancient church (with the increase of the practice of infant baptism), the Easter vigil would lose its importance along with the entire Easter triduum; fortunately, this "mother of the vigils" is being recovered in all the churches.

c. The Octave of Easter. During the eight days following Easter, church leaders imparted to the newly baptized the mystagogical catechesis on the sacraments recently received, that is, baptism, *anointing and Eucharist, as well as an explanation of the *Lord's Prayer. For the Dominica in albis also known as Quasimodo geniti, which follows the end of the octave, the catechumens wore their white garments for the last time.

*Pentecost: the 50 days separating Easter from Pentecost established Eastertide, qui est propri dies festus (Tertull., Bapt. 19.2). From the 4th c. on there is also evidence of the Feast of the *Ascension on the 40th day after Easter (Itin. Egeriae 42).

P. Maraval, Égérie, Journal de voyage, SC 296, Paris 1982; P. Nautin, Homélies pascales, I, SC 27, Paris 1950; II, SC 36, Paris 1953; B. Lohse, Das Passafest der Quartadecimaner (Beitr. z. Förd. christl. Theol. 2, 54), Gütersloh 1953; Var. aus., Paschatis Sollemnia: Mélanges Jungmann, Freiburg-Wien 1959; B. Botte, Ambroise de Milan, Des sacrements. Des mystères. Explication du Symbole, SC 25 bis, Paris 1961; W. Rordorf, Zur Ursprung des Osterfestes am Sonntag: ThZ 18 (1962) 167-189; O. Casel, La fête de Pâque dans l'Église des Pères (Lex Orandi 37), Paris 1963; R. Le Déaut, La Nuit Pascale, Rome 1963; O. Perler, Méliton de Sardes, Sur la Pâque, SC 123, Paris 1966; A. Piédagnel - P. Paris, Cyrille de Jérusalem, Catécheses mystagogiques, SC 126, Paris 1966; S. Poque, Augustin d'Hippone, Sermons pour la Pâque, SC 116, Paris 1966; H. Auf der Maur, Die Osterhomillien des Asterios Sophistes als Quelle für die Geschichte der Osterfeier, Trier 1967; R. Cantalamessa, L'omelia "In S. Pascha" dello Pseudo Ippolito di Roma. Ricerche sulla teologia dell'Asia Minore nella seconda metà del II secolo, Milan 1967; J. van Goudoever, Biblical Calendars, Leiden [2]1961; W. Huber, Passa und Ostern. Untersuchungen zur Osterfeier der alten Kirche, Berlin 1969; R. Cantalamessa, La Pasqua della nostra salvezza. Le tradizioni pasquali della Bibbia e della primitiva Chiesa, Casale Monf. 1984 (repr.); M. Aubineau, Homélies pascales, SC 187, Paris 1972; G. Kretschmar, Christliches Passa im 2. Jahrhundert and die Ausbildung der christlichen Theologie: RecSR 60 (1972) 287-323; R. Martin Achard, Essai biblique sur les fêtes d'Israël, Geneva 1974, 29-72; A. Strobel, Ursprung und Geschichte des frühchristlichen Osterkalenders: TU 121, Berlin 1977; M. Aubineau, Hésychius de Jérusalem, Les homélies festales, I-II, Bruxelles 1978–1980; R. Cantalamessa, La Pasqua nella Chiesa antica, Turin 1978 (Fr. tr. Bern 1980); P. Nautin, Origène, Sur la Pâque, Paris 1979; H. Auf den Maur, Feiern im Rhythmus der Zeit, I: Herrenfeste in Woche and Jahr, Regensburg 1983, 56-153; G. Visonà, Ostern: TRE 25, 517-530 (bibl.); Id., Pseudo Ippolito. In sanctum Pascha, Milan 1988; K. Gerlach, The Antenicene Pascha, Leuven 1998.

W. Rordorf

III. The Easter controversy. In the second century, the churches of *Rome and *Alexandria and numerous other Eastern and Western churches were celebrating the Easter celebration of Christ's *resurrection on the *Sunday immediately following the full moon of spring; the churches of Asia Minor, however, the premier of which was *Ephesus, celebrated Easter on the 14th day of the full moon of spring (14th of Nisan according to the Hebrew calendar). This practice drew inspiration from the Johannine tradition, according to which Jesus, who was the true Paschal Lamb, was sacrificed the same day on which the Jews were celebrating the Passover. The diversity of opinions also had doctrinal and disciplinary implications because, in the interpretation of the Easter liturgy, the churches that observed the *Quartodeciman custom emphasized the soteriological meaning of Jesus' passion and during the Easter celebration on the date established for the 14th of Nisan there was an immediate cessation of preparatory penitential fasting for Easter, thus even distinguishing the liturgical practice of the churches of Asia Minor with respect to the observance of Easter on a Sunday (see Euseb., HE V, 23,1).

*Eusebius (HE V, 23,2) mentions numerous synods in both East and West over the course of the 2nd c. that decreed that "the mystery of the Lord's resurrection from the dead should not be on any other day than Sunday and only on that day should the Easter fasts come to an end." Eusebius also reports the testimony of *Irenaeus of Lyons (HE IV, 14, 1 to be interpreted in light of V, 24, 16) of a first effort to resolve the conflict between the two liturgical practices during the time of the bishop of Rome *Anicetus and the bishop of *Ephesus *Polycarp (ca. 154) that proved ineffective because Anicetus was unable to persuade Polycarp not to observe the Quartodeciman practice, nor was Polycarp able to persuade Anicetus to observe it. Nevertheless, they remained in peace and ecclesial communion because neither Anicetus nor his successor *Soter broke communion with the bishops of Asia Minor (see Euseb., HE V, 24, 14).

Toward the end of the 2nd c., however, during the pontificate of Pope *Victor, a dramatic conflict arose over the Quartodeciman observance, almost certainly because the presbyter *Blastus set forth much propaganda in favor of that observance at Rome (see Euseb., HE V, 15, compare with V, 20, 1 and ps.-Tertullian, Adv. omn. haer. 8, 1). After having convoked a synod (see Euseb., HE V, 23, 3), Victor the bishop of Rome wrote a letter to *Polycrates of Ephesus telling him to observe Easter on Sunday and threatening him with excommunication if he continued to celebrate Easter on the 14th of Nisan;

Victor's letter has been lost, but its content can be deduced from Polycrates's reply, fragments of which have been preserved by Eusebius (HE V, 24, 2-8). With unbending determination Polycrates defended the apostolicity of the Quartodeciman tradition and upheld the desire of the Eastern churches to remain faithful to *tradition. To reconcile the parties involved and to preserve ecclesiastical communion, *Irenaeus of Lyons intervened in this crisis "in the name of the brothers from *Gaul" (see Euseb., HE V, 24,12-17): he openly agreed with the principle that Easter should be celebrated on Sunday but maintained that it was more opportune not to oppose harshly the Quartodeciman practice of the Eastern bishops, which he believed was established on the authority of *John, the disciple of the Lord, and allowed by Victor's predecessors. The documents that have come down to us do not allow us to determine what Victor's final position on the matter was, but it seems that the parties involved did not break ecclesial communion. However, the Church of Rome considered the Quartodeciman followers of Blastus to be heretics, and it is significant that even the Philos. VIII, 18, written around 235, lists the Quartodecimans among other heretical groups, and the anonymous author of the Adv. omn. haer., transmitted under the name of *Tertullian, almost certainly inspired by *Hippolytus's Syntagma, mentions Blastus's Quartodeciman followers among other heretical groups (8, 1).

In the 2nd c., the Easter controversy made itself known through other historical-exegetical expressions: within the very Quartodeciman observance, John's chronology of Christ's passion must have been fiercely debated, which placed the death of Jesus on the 14th of Nisan, the day of the Jewish Passover, in contradistinction to the chronology of the Synoptic Gospels, according to which Jesus completed the celebration of the Passover on the 14th of Nisan and was crucified the following day, that is, the 15th of Nisan. Eusebius informs us of this disagreement which took place primarily at *Laodicea (HE IV, 26,3): *Melito of Sardis and *Apollinaris of Hierapolis must have been directly involved in this matter; but one also detects an echo of this debate in Clement of Alexandria's work on Easter and in the writings of Hippolytus of Rome (see the texts of the Chronicon Paschale, ed. Dindorf, Bonn 1832, 13-15). In subsequent ages, Easter controversies would return, but these were centered primarily on the specific problem of the date of Easter Sunday, which at that time was set for different days, according to the various ecclesiastical *computi that had been adopted such as the controversy against the churches of *Syria and *Cilicia after the Council of *Nicaea (see *Protopaschites) and the arguments between the Celtic and the Roman observance of Easter in Ireland during St. *Columbanus's time.

B. Lohse, Das Passafest der Quartadecimaner, Gütersloh 1953 (Beitr. z. Förder, christl. Theol., 2. Reihe, 54); P. Nautin, Lettres et écrivains chrétiens des II^e et III^e siècles, Paris 1961; R. Cantalamessa, L'omelia "In S. Pascha" dello Pseudo-Ippolito di Roma, Milan 1967, 67-108; Id., La Pasqua della nostra salvezza, Casale Monf. 1984 (repr.), 116-137; Id., La Pasqua nella Chiesa antica, Turin 1981; J. Rist, s.v. Viktor: BBKL 12 (1997) 1334-1337; L. Duchesne, La question pascale au concile de Nicée: RevQuest Hist 28 (1880) 5-42; M. Richard, La question pascale au second siècle: OrSyr 6 (1961) 179-212; Ch. Mohrmann, Le conflit pascal au II^e siècle. Note philologique: VChr 16 (1962) 154-171; V. Loi, Il 25 Marzo data pasquale e la cronologia giovannea della Passione in età patristica: EphLit 85 (1971) 48-69; A. Di Berardino, L'imperatore Costantino e la celebrazione della Pasqua, in Costantino il Grande, Macerata 1992, 363-384; R.V. Peri, La data comune della Pasqua: Riv. lit. 1-2/88 (2001) 103-124 (cf. XI.2003: http://www.rivistaliturgica.it/numero.asp?codice=1201).

V. Loi - B. Amata

EASTER HOMILIES. The Easter homilies of the *Fathers occupy a place of special importance in the ancient corpus of homilies for two reasons: (1) After the week-long celebration of the Lord's death and *resurrection, from the beginning of Christianity, Easter was not only the most ancient annual feast of the liturgical calendar, but also Christianity's fundamental, highest and, including *Pentecost, longest feast. (2) Easter theology includes the entire mystery of salvation, beginning from the creation of the world, through original sin, the preparation for the coming of the Savior in the OT, his *incarnation, death and resurrection until his return at the end of time. Consequently, the Fathers' Easter homilies are the richest and most developed for the entire *liturgical year.

The two most ancient and sole extant Easter homilies from the first three centuries are dated to the same period of the oldest information that has survived about an annual feast of the Christian Easter: *Melito of Sardis, Peri Pascha (ca. 160–170) and pseudo-*Hippolytus, In sanctum Pascha (between 164/166 and the end of the 2nd c.). Both are inserted within the *Quartodeciman tradition of celebrating Easter "with the Jews," that is, on the 14th of Nisan, regardless of the day of the week, which, at the same time, caused the Easter controversy. Consequently, the homilies insist upon the typology of Christ as the new Paschal Lamb (1 Cor 5:7) and his prefiguration in the OT Passover (Ex 12) such as the fulfillment of all the prophecies/figures of the OT, especially the sacrifice of Isaac (Gen 22:1-8) and the persecutions of the prophets (Is 53:7, "he was like a lamb led to the slaughter"; Jer 11:19, "I will be like a gentle lamb"; cf. Mt 5:12). At the same time, the Easter homilies take this interrelation as a point of departure for limiting the novelty of Christianity in comparison to Judaism, which has now been superseded, including the argument that the Jews rejected and killed the Messiah.

Moreover, the discoveries of Melito's homilies in 1940 caused a fundamental change in the way scholars evaluated the development of homilies in the ancient church; this homily presents itself as a large hymn containing all the elements of "Asiatic" rhetoric: alliterations, anaphora, antitheses, chiasma, epiphora, parallelisms etc. Up until that time, scholars presupposed that the use of classical *rhetoric in the homilies of the Fathers began only after "the Constantinian turning point" in the 4th c.; this change was seen as one of the causes for the church's decline. The hymn-like style also continued in the following centuries, always provoked by the paradox of the mystery of the salvation, death and resurrection, the old and the new, and the inability to explain the mystery apart from a song of awe and praise.

In the 4th c., the Easter homilies naturally followed the development of the Easter cycle beginning from ca. 380 and the institution of the catechumenate, which required the catechesis of the competentes (i.e., the ones qualified) in preparation for *baptism during the Easter vigil or *Pentecost and the ancillary instruction of the newly baptized during Pentecost. Therefore, the themes of the Easter homilies shifted. The various elements of the entire mystery of the faith, up until that time, were celebrated in a single moment or redistributed among various occasions: Palm Sunday, Holy Friday, Holy Saturday, Easter evening, Easter day, Easter time, Mesopentecost, *Ascension, the Pentecost vigil and Pentecost, even if there never was an absolute division. The Lenten homilies were dedicated to, among other things, the teaching of the *Creed and the *Lord's prayer to the *catechumens, while the holy days of Easter and the time thereafter was primarily dedicated to explaining the *Eucharist and the other elements of the faith and the moral life to show the way to the most perfect Christian life.

Among others, the Easter homilies of the following authors have survived: *Augustine, *Alexander of Alexandria, *Apollinaris, *Asterius the Sophist, *Gaudentius of Brescia, *John Chrysostom, *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Gregory of Nyssa, *Leo the Great, *Maximus of Turin, *Peter Chrysologus, pseudo-Chrysostom, pseudo-Epiphanius, pseudo-Gregory of Nyssa, *Zeno of Verona.

In addition to the fact that the Easter homilies treated all the aspects of the history of salvation, two themes enjoyed special attention from the very beginning: (1) the question of where and how Christ spent his time between death and resurrection: as well as in the "heart of the earth" (Mt 12:40), in *paradise with the thief (Lk 23:43) and in the hands of the Father (Lk 23:46), to explain the method of salvation; (2) the reason for this *descent into hell, based on the preaching "to the spirits," according to 1 Pet 3:19, to explain how the righteous who lived before Christ were saved. This theme achieved greatest success in the form of Christ's great fight and victory over Hades, the conquest over the infernal city, the liberation of men and women from the snares of *death and a great victory procession toward heaven. Pseudo-Epiphanius's homily In sabbato magno (CPG 3768) marks the high point of this development and exerted a vast amount of influence during the Middle Ages. Today it is still cited in the breviary. Psalm 24:7-10 "lift up your heads, O gates! That the King of glory may come in," cited in this context, however, has a twofold function in the Easter homilies. Until the very end of the 4th c. it referred to Christ's entry into the heavenly city—the angels who guarded the doors did not want to open them because they did not recognize Christ who was returning with a humanity united to his divinity—and only after was it used for the arrival of the Savior standing before the abode of hell.

P. Nautin, Le dossier d'Hippolyte et de Méliton, Paris 1953; Ph.T. Weller, The Easter Sermons of St. Augustine, Washington, D.C. 1955; W. Schneemelcher, Der Sermo "De anima et corpore" ein Werk Alexanders von Alexandrien? in Festschrift G. Dehn, Neukirchen 1957, 119-143; O. Perler, Ein Hymnus zur Ostervigil von Meliton? Fribourg 1961; St. Czerwik, Homilia paschalis apud patres usque ad saeculum quintum, Rome 1961; H. Auf der Maur, Die Osterhomilien des Asterios Sophistes als Quelle für die Geschichte der Osterfeier, Trier 1967; R. Cantalamessa, L'omelia "In S. Pascha" dello Pseudo-Ippolito di Roma, Milan 1967; J. Bernardi, La prédication des Pères Cappadociens, Paris 1968; L. Vanyó, L'Omelia Anatolica sulla Pasqua nell'anno 387: Augustinianum 15 (1975) 225-228; V. Loi, L'omelia "In sanctum Pascha" di Ippolito di Roma: Augustinianum 16 (1976) 461-484; E. Cattaneo, Trois homélies pseudo-chrysostomiennes sur la pâque comme oeuvre d'Apollinaire de Laodicée, Paris 1981; A. Spira - Ch. Klock (eds.), The Easter Sermons of Gregory of Nyssa, Cambridge, MA 1981; H.R. Drobner, Gregor von Nyssa. Die drei Tage zwischen Tod und Auferstehung unseres Herrn Jesus Christus, Leiden 1982; Id., Die Deutung des alttestamentlichen Pascha (Ex 12) bei Gregor von Nyssa im Lichte der Auslegungstradition der griechischen Kirche, in H.R. Drobner - Ch. Klock (eds.), Studien zu Gregor von Nyssa und der christlichen Spätantike, Leiden 1990, 273-296; Id., Die Himmelfahrtspredigt Gregors von Nyssa, in H. Eisenberger (ed.), ERMHNEUMATA, Heidelberg 1990, 95-115; Id., Die Karsamstagspredigt des Amphilochius von Ikonium, in Greek and Latin Studies in Memory of C. Fabricius, Göteborg 1990, 1-23; Id., Eine pseudo-athanasianische Osterpre- digt (CPG II 2247) über die Wahrheit Gottes und ihre Erfüllung, in L.R. Wickham - C.P. Bammel (eds.), Christian Faith and Greek Philosophy in Late Antiquity, Leiden 1993, 43-51; A. Stewart-Sykes, The Lamb's High Feast. Melito, Peri Pascha and the Quartodeciman Paschal Liturgy at Sardis, Leiden 1998; L.H. Cohick, The Peri Pascha Attributed to Melito of Sardis, Providence 2000.

H.R. Drobner

EBIONITES. Grouped under the name of Ebionites in ancient Christian literature are an indefinite number of Jewish Christian sects with some common characteristics, the most important of which are that they accepted Jesus as a "a mere man" (nudus homo, Tertull., De carne Christi 14), lived according to the Jewish law and rejected St. *Paul. *Irenaeus is the first to mention them as a heretical group (Adv. haer. I, 26, 2); according to him, they used the gospel of *Matthew. *Origen knows Jewish Christians in *Egypt whom he calls Ebionites, who emphasized the unique position of Israel (De princ. IV, 3, 5) and celebrated the *Eucharist with unleavened bread (in Matth. comm. ser. 79). He knows that the word Ebionite is derived from the Hebrew word for "poor," but explains it as proof of their "poverty of understanding" (De princ. IV, 3, 8). The proper name Ebion, the sect's supposed founder, is false (Tertull., De praescr. haer. IV, 8). Origen also knows a Jewish Christian gospel according to the Ebionites which he cites several times (in Joh. II, 12). *Eusebius, who knows little about Jewish Christian groups, but is the first to connect them with the Christians who left *Jerusalem and fled to *Pella before AD 70 (Onomasticon, p. 138, 24-25, ed. De Lagarde).

*Epiphanius (Pan. 30) knew a number of Jewish Christian writings, whose contents he uses to describe the Ebionites. He cites a gospel according to the Ebionites of which he gives several citations (30, 3, 7), a book called the Periodoi of Peter (30, 15, 1) and the Anabathmoi of James, all anonymous works (30, 16, 6-7). The latter two were used by the author of the ps.-*Clementine Homiliae and Recognitiones. From these sources, Epiphanius deduced that Christ appeared on earth periodically over the ages, that contact with *Gentiles was avoided, ritual purifications accepted and the prophets rejected. Since he met some of these ideas in sources on the *Elkesaites and noted that they were not present in the old traditions on the Ebionites, e.g., in Irenaeus, he held that the Ebionites showed signs of a development influenced by Elkesaite doctrines. This supposition must be rejected. It is obvious that the Elkesaite movement, coming from the region of Parthia, was influenced by Jewish Christian ideas present, e.g., in the writings known to Epiphanius. These writings clearly show a branch of Jewish Christianity different from that known either to Irenaeus or to Origen.

A. Schmidtke, Neue Fragmente zu den judenchristlichen Evangelien: TU 37 (1911); H.J. Schoeps, Theologie und Geschichte des Judenchristentums, Tübingen 1949; G. Strecker, Das Judenchristentum der Pseudoklementinen: TU 70 (1958); B. Bagatti, L'Église de la circoncision, Jerusalem 1965; A.F.J. Klijn - G.J. Reinink, Patristic Evidence for Jewish-Christian Sects, Leiden 1973, 19-43; D.A. Bertrand, L'évangile des Ebionites: Une harmonie évangélique antérieure au Diatessaron: NTS 26 (1980) 548-563; A. Orbe, Cristología gnóstica, 2 vols., Madrid 1976 (see index); G. Howard, The Gospel of the Ebionites: ANRW II, 25, 5 (1988) 4030-4053; R.A. Pritz, Nazarene Jewish Christianity. From the End of the New Testament Period Until Its Disappearance in the Fourth Century, Leiden 1988; F. Manns, L'Israel de Dieu. Essais sur le christianisme primitif, Jerusalem 1996; S.C. Mimouni, Le judéo-christianisme, Paris 1998, 287-334; S. Légasse, L'antipaulinisme sectaire au temps des Pères de l'Église, Paris 2000.

A.F.J. Klijn

ECCLESIASTICAL CANONS of the APOSTLES. This work, still called by various names by moderns, including "Ecclesiastical Ordinance (or Constitution) of the Apostles" (Faivre), has nothing in common with the "85 *Apostolic Canons." It is preserved in the original Greek text—with the Didache, the only surviving text of this literary genre—in a 12th-c. MS of Vienna and in many translations into Eastern languages, and in Latin fragments in the Verona palimpsest (chs. 18-30). It comprises, after an introduction (I-III), two very different parts.

The first part (IV-XIV) consists of chs. 1-4 of the Didache with some additions. In a first phase, this first part had an independent life in a slightly shorter form, of which a summary preserved in three late manuscripts has been published by Th. Schermann (Eine Elfapostelmoral, Munich 1903). The second part (XV), artificially linked to the first, deals with ordinations. In its present state, the text mentions the bishop, the presbyters, the lector, deacons, widows and the laity, and expounds the reasons ministries cannot be conferred upon women, except that of assisting sick women. The text has some incoherencies, however, which allow us to identify two layers; the oldest mentions only the bishop, deacons and widows. This ancient treatise on the three orders was the starting point of the Didascalia Apostolorum, which preserves vestigial traces of it; it was also used by the author of the Apostolic Tradition*. Chronologically, it is from the period between the Didache and the letters of *Ignatius of Antioch, i.e., in the first years of the 2nd c. The present text is the work of a 4th- or 5th-c. compiler, in *Syria or more probably in *Egypt, who had come across the separate edition of chs. 1-4 of the Didache and the old treatise on the three orders; he joined the two texts, adding a preamble, numerous additions and some modifications.

CPG 1739. J.W. Bickell, Geschichte des Kirchenrechts, I, Giessen 1843, 107-132 (editio princeps); J.B. Pitra, Iuris ecclesiastici Graecorum historia et monumenta, I, Rome 1864, 75-88; F.X. Funk, Doctrina duodecim Apostolorum, Tübingen 1887, 50-72; Th. Schermann, Die allgemeine Kirchenordnung frühchristlichen Liturgien und kirchliche Überlieferung, Paderborn 1914 (repr. New York 1968), 12-34. Latin fragments: E. Tidner, Didascaliae apostolorum, Canonum ecclesiasticorum, Berlin 1963, 107-113. New Syriac evidence: A Vööbus, Die Entdeckung der ältesten Urkunde für die syrische Übersetzung der Apostolische Kirchenordnung: OrChr 63 (1979) 37-40. Translations: J.P. Arendzen: JTS 3 (1902) 59-80 (Syriac text and Eng. tr.); G. Horner, The Statutes of the Apostles or Canones Ecclesiastici, London 1904, 295-306; Ger.: J.W. Bickell, ibid., 87-97; Schermann, ibid.

Studies: A. Harnack, Die Lehre der zwölf Apostel, TU 2,5, Leipzig 1884, 193-241; A. Harnack, Die Quellen der Sogennanten Apostolischen Kirchenordnung nebst einer Untersuchung über einer Ursprung des Lectorats und der anderen niederen Weihen, TU, 5, Leipzig 1886 (recension of L. Duchesne: Bulletin critique 7 [1886] 316-370), Eng. tr.: Sources of the Apostolic Canons with a Treatise on the Origin of Readership and Other Lower Orders, London 1895; H. Leclercq: DACL 2, 1923-1931; J.-M. Hanssens, La liturgie d'Hippolyte, Rome 1959, [2]1965; R.A. Kraft, Some Notes on Sabbath Observance on Early Christianity: Andrews Seminary Studies 3 (1965) 18-33; P. Bradshaw: TRE 18, 666-667; R.-G. Coquin: Coptic Encyclopedia 2, 453-456, esp. p. 454; A. Faivre, Naissance d'une hiérarchie, Paris 1977, 143-153; Id., Le texte grec de la "Constitution ecclésiastique des apôtres": RevSR 55 (1981) 31-42; Id., Apostolicité et pseudo-apostolicité dans la Constitution ecclésiastique des apôtres. L'art de faire parler les origines: RevSR 66 (1992) 19-67; B. Steimer, Vertex traditionis. Die Gattung der altchristlichen Kirchenordnungen, Berlin 1992, 60-71; H. König - J. Lössl, Erweiterung der Zweiweglehre in der Apostolischen Kirchenordnung: ZKG 107 (1996) 291-299; B. Lemoine, L'évêque dans la C.E.A.: QuLi 80 (1999) 5-23.

P. Nautin

ECCLESIASTICAL ORGANIZATION

I. Dioceses - II. Parishes - III. Ecclesiastical provinces - IV. Patriarchates.

I. Dioceses. The term diocese is derived from Roman public law: a dioecesis was a vast area of several provinces, ruled by a vicarius. In the ecclesiastical sphere the term "diocese" (διοίκησις) was reached by a transition, in Christian antiquity, from the term "church" (ἐκκλησία)—which referred to the universal church, the particular church and the church building—to that of parish (παροικία), and only later exclusively to that of diocese. In the West, besides paroecia, the terms ecclesia, territorium, fines episcopatus and dioecesis were also used. In 417 Pope *Zosimus referred to rural communities, previously called dioceses, as paroeciae. From the end of the 6th c., with *Sidonius Apollinaris, the two terms were used equivalently. From the 7th c., a bishop's territory was called dioecesis and the particular community led by him was the paroecia.

The origin of the dioceses coincided with the beginnings of Christian preaching and is visible in the context of St. Paul's journeys. In the territories of the Greco-Roman world (the Palestinian Jewish sphere was ruled by the apostolic college), Paul founded Christian communities in the great cities, to each of which he appointed a college of presbyters, supported by deacons. Paul is seen assisted by other hierarchical members with subordinate powers, whom community members obey (1 Cor 16:15-16; 1 Th 5:12; Rom 12:6ff.). They are called elders, presbyters (Acts 14:23); they are overseers (ἐπίσκοποι) to rule God's church as pastors (Acts 20:17, 28): at this point, presbyters and bishops designate holders of the same functions. Deacons have different tasks from those of presbyters-bishops (1 Tim 1:1-10; 5:17-19; Tit 1:5-11). Alongside the hierarchical members, there are the charismatics with gifts, such as prophecy and tongues, aimed at keeping the new faith alive. As for Paul, his having been directly called as an apostle to the Gentiles justifies his unique place in the ordering of his communities (2 Cor 10:8; 13:10; 1 Cor 4:21), where he appears as teacher, judge and legislator (1 Cor 7:17; Tit 1:5). Likewise with Peter, beginning from *Antioch. The disciples, sent into these territories, inherited the task of government from their respective apostles, establishing an uninterrupted apostolic succession. Bishops were installed in the urban centers, which were more populated by Christians and were strategic missionary centers. Following the propagation of Christianity in various cities, a presbyter was put with the bishop. Each of these bishops was equal in authority to the other bishops, but any could excel in personal gifts. The setting-up of a diocese was more and more linked to the number of believers and to the rise of new cities (Council of *Serdica, can. 6; Council of *Chalcedon, can. 17).

Territories with many cities usually had small but numerous bishoprics, as in N Africa and S-central Italy, while territories with few cities had vast bishoprics, as in N Italy, Gaul, Spain, the Danubian and Balkan provinces. The diocesan area usually coincided with the urban-administrative area and, through an intrinsic mechanism, the lesser dioceses usually gravitated toward the dioceses corresponding to the provincial capitals, with which they already had economic and political links. Residence was obligatory for bishops, though often disregarded, esp. in the 4th c., by Eastern courtier-bishops (Council of *Nicaea, can. 16; Council of Antioch, can. 3; Council of Serdica, cans. 7-8, 11-12; Council of *Carthage [390], can. 7; [397], can. 56). In the East, the care of the rural population of a local church was entrusted to a χωρεπίσκοπος or chorbishop, who was completely dependent on the urban bishop: thus the synods of *Ancyra, *Neocaesarea, Nicaea (4th c.). They later tended to be replaced by periodeuti (visitatores, circuitores), i.e., simple itinerant priests (Synod of *Laodicea [ca. 380], can. 57). The West, all civil order having been overturned by the barbarian invasions, turned to the pope for the founding of dioceses and the setting-up of the church hierarchy. Otherwise, the bishop of Rome did not as a rule intervene in the setting-up of new local churches. While the bishops of Africa, in the West, moved rather autonomously in bringing local *Donatist churches within the orbit of the Catholic churches, in the East the state authority intervened or was drawn into the matter in cases of conflict. For Italy, 16 dioceses are documented at the end of the 3rd c.; 55 more arose in the 4th c.; another 155 in the 5th c.; in the 6th c., 57 more; and at the start of the 7th c., another 13. In all, at the start of the 7th c., peninsular and insular Italy counted 258 dioceses. The reasons for this increase include the freedom of the church (*Edict of Milan, 313), eminent episcopal figures such as St. *Ambrose at Milan, St. *Eusebius at Vercelli and St. *Maximus at Turin, and the decisive role of the bishop of Rome.

EC 4, 1651-1653; F. Lanzoni, Le diocesi d'Italia dalle origini al principio del secolo VII, Faenza 1927; S. Mochi Onory, Vescovi e città, Bologna 1933; A. Schürmann, Diözese: RAC 3, 1053-1063; J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'Empire Romain (IVe-Ve siècles), Paris 1958, 322-377; Fr.S. Pericoli-Ridolfini, Le origini della Chiesa di Alessandria d'Egitto e la cronologia dei vescovi alessandrini dei secoli I e II: Rend. Acc. Lincei, VIII serie, 17 (1962) 308-343; Id., Vescovi antiocheni dei primi due secoli e la questione dell'episcopato antiocheno di Pietro, in Comunione interecclesiale, Collegialità, Primato, Ecumenismo, "Communio" 12, Rome 1972, 339-360 (the first bishop was not Peter, but Ennodius, from 44); J. Mazzini, La terminologia della ripartizione territoriale ecclesiastica nei testi conciliari latini dei secoli IV e V: Studi Urbinati 43 (1974–1975) 233-266; K. Baus - E. Ewig, Storia della Chiesa. I. Le origini (I-IV sec.), Milan 1977, 132-135; Id., Storia della Chiesa. II. L'epoca dei concili (IV-V sec.), Milan 1977, 253-255; Fliche-Martin, III/2, 639-650; L. Scipioni, Vescovo e popolo. L'esercizio dell'autorità nella Chiesa primitiva (sec. III), Milan 1977; Ch. Munier, Autorité épiscopale et sollicitude pastorale IIe-VIe siècle, Aldershot 1991; Ch. Pietri, La nuova geografia (organizzazione ecclesiastica). A. L'Oriente, in Storia del cristianesimo, 2 (250–430), Rome 2000 (Fr. orig. 1995), 86-130; B. L'Occidente e i suoi confini danubiani e balcanici: I. La Chiesa d'Africa, Storia del crist. 2, 131-137; II. L. Pietri, Roma e l'Italia, in Storia del crist. 2, 137-141; P. Maraval, Alessandria e l'Egitto, in Storia del crist. 2, 822-838; Id., Antiochia e l'Oriente, in Storia del crist. 2, 839-854; Id., Costantinopoli, l'Illirico e l'Asia minore, in Storia del crist. 2, 855-869; V. Saxer, I progressi dell'organizzazione ecclesiastica dalla fine del II secolo alla metà del III secolo (18–250), in Storia del cristianesimo, 1, Rome 2003 (Fr. orig. 2000), 730-765.

O. Pasquato

II. Parishes. In the first centuries the bishop was at the center of both the Christian *liturgy and church administration. The *Eucharist and *baptism were normally administered only by him; in cases of necessity, also by presbyters. From the point when Christianity also reached the villages, for liturgical services in those places the figure of the periodeuta, an itinerant presbyter, spread. In the great cities, with the growth of the Christian community, it became impossible to meet just at the city center, both because of distance and because of the capacity of the meeting hall. Thus liturgical decentralization, with the parochial system, became necessary. Trustworthy historical information on communities subject to the bishop, but not directly led by him, comes from the councils of *Antioch (341) for the East and *Serdica (343) for the West. The bishop led not just the urban community, but also that of the village (chōra). If there were bishops in the villages (chōrepiskopoi), they should only administer the churches dependent on them (Council of Antioch, can. 10). From this we deduce that not all the country churches had their own bishop, and that country parishes existed. At Serdica, bishops were forbidden to interfere in the parishes of another bishop (can. 18). Pope Innocent (402–417) said that all his churches were inside the city walls; but he supposed that the other bishops administered more distant parishes. Rome seems to have had no country parishes. Only those presbyters in charge of the cemeteries outside the city walls were comparable to the country parish priests of other episcopal areas. Innocent calls the churches in Rome Tituli (Ep. ad Decen. 5). The Roman parishes must have arisen long before Innocent, but the accounts of them in the LP were written after his time, at the end of the 5th c. By the mid 3rd c., Cornelius lists 46 presbyters, 7 deacons (*Diakonia - Diaconate), 7 *subdeacons, 42 acolytes, 52 *exorcists, lectors and *doorkeepers in the Roman community, as well as 1500 widows and needy people fed by the community (Euseb., HE VI, 43,11). The Roman community must have numbered tens of thousands, who could not all have come together at once to celebrate the Eucharist. According to the LP, Cletus (ca. 80–90) ordained 25 presbyters and *Evaristus (after 100) allotted the Roman Tituli to the presbyters (and ordained 7 deacons). *Urban (d. 230) acquired 25 silver patenae

(probably for 25 Tituli). *Fabian (236–250) allotted the municipal regions to the deacons and installed 7 subdeacons (the areas of the diaconiae were not identical to those of the Tituli).

That Pope *Dionysius (260–268) entrusted the churches to the presbyters is something that we must certainly put at an earlier time; he also raised cemeteries (and their parish churches) to the status of dioceses, i.e., he elevated the cemetery churches outside the walls into parish churches. *Marcellus (ca. 300) elevated the 25 Tituli into dioceses, for the numerous baptisms (neophytes) and penitents.

The author of the LP, then, gives the name dioceses to autonomous presbyterial communities with the right to confer baptism. This linguistic use is first attested by *Sulpicius Severus who relates of *Martin of Tours (Dial. II, 9,6; Ep. 1,10; 3,6) that in the vast region of his episcopal city he founded about 10 country parishes (dioceses). In the 5th and 6th c. the parochial organization of the countryside was completed everywhere: as we see esp. in *Gaul, where only in ca. 600 did diocesis become the common term for an episcopal community, while presbyterial communities were now called parishes. The urban parishes may have been developed in the other great cities, as they were in Rome, by the 3rd c. In *Augustine's time in *Numidia we find presbyters in the small centers who perform liturgical functions (Ep. 83; Ep. 139,1); some presbyters were killed by the *Donatists (Ep. 133,1; Ep. 134,1).

Duchesne LP 4, 1923, 1212-1219; DACL 13, 1938, 2197-2199; K. Müller, Parochie and Diözese im Abendland in spätrömischer und merowingischer Zeit: ZNTW 32 (1933) 149-185; E. Griffe, Les premières paroisses de la Gaule: BLE 50 (1949) 229-239; Id., À travers les paroisses rurales de la Gaule au VI^{e} siècle: BLE 75 (1975) 3-26; W. Geerlings, Augustinus und sein Bistum: ThQ 158 (1978) 27-35; A. Martin, Topographie et liturgie: le problème des "paroisses" d'Alexandrie, in Actes du XIe Congrès international d'archéologie chrétienne, Rome 1989, 113-114; V. Bo, Storia della parrocchia: I secoli delle origini (sec. IVV), Rome ²1992, II: I secoli dell'infanzia (sec. VI-XI), Rome 1990; M. Colardelle, Les paroisses rurales, in Atlas archéologique de la France, Paris 1992; Pastoral Care before the Parish, ed. J. Blair - R. Sharpe, Leicester, NY 1992; Ch. Pietri, Régions ecclésiastiques et paroisses romaines, in Christiana respublica, Rome 1997, 173-200; Alle origini della parrocchia rurale, IV-VIII sec., ed. Ph. Pergola, Vatican City 1999; G. Gantino Wataghin, Christianisation et organisation ecclésiastique de campagne, L'Italie du Nord aux IV^{e}-VIII^{e} siècles, in Towns and Their Territories between Late Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages, ed. G.B. Brogiolo et al., Leiden 2000, 209-234.

H.J. Vogt

III. Ecclesiastical provinces (with metropolitan center). From the 4th c. a coordination appeared, which gave rise to a more complex and hierarchical structure: the ecclesiastical province (ἐπαρχία). The fact is explained along the lines of missionary practice that, spreading from the capital to other centers of the province, generated communities which were filiations of the central episcopal or mother church. The bishop of the mother church (μητρόπολις) was, from the 4th c., called the metropolitan (ἐπίσκοπος μητροπολίτης), later ἀρχιεπίσκοπος, and had jurisdiction over the other bishops (ἐπαρχιῶται), who from the 8th c. were also called "suffragans." Another factor in the formation and cohesion of ecclesiastical provinces, from the end of the 2nd c., was the synods, set up with the aim of bringing together the bishops, not just of one political province, but also of a wider territory (Euseb., HE 5,23,25), to debate important ecclesiastical affairs going beyond the local sphere of the churches. The provincial council was called and presided over by the metropolitan (Council of *Antioch [341], cans. 14, 16, 20). It had competence over all questions of the province (Council of *Constantinople I [381], can. 2).

The ecclesiastical provinces, increasing in number, continued to conform to the boundaries of the political provinces, which were multiplied by *Diocletian and his successors until, at the start of the 5th c., there were 120 of them. All of the bishops of a province, with the metropolitan's confirmation, could install a bishop in their own diocese (Council of *Nicaea [325], can. 4).

The frequent imprecision of the territorial boundaries was at the root of jurisdictional problems, later regulated by conciliar canons. But bishops' interventions outside their own territory were more properly "the consequence of a universal ecclesial sense that the bishops of previous centuries had exercised. The most typical example of this universal interest is provided by the correspondence the bishops held with many other sees for the purpose of resolving questions and difficulties" (J-R. Palanque, in Fliche-Martin III, 2, Turin ³1977, 640). But in the West a more complex type of grouping later arose: the episcopal sees of Roman N Africa came under *Carthage and those of S-central Italy under Rome, whose prestige and power went beyond the metropolitan sphere. There was a similar configuration in the East: for Antioch, with respect to Syria and the eastern provinces of Asia Minor regarding participation in the synods of Antioch (Euseb., HE 6,46,3; 7,5,1-2), and with respect to *Cilicia and *Osroene regarding missionary activity (HE 6,12,2); and for the see of *Alexandria, on which all the sees of *Egypt, *Libya and *Pentapolis depended (Council of Nicaea, can. 6). The sees of Antioch and Alexandria appeared as supermetropolises: the path to the patriarchates was already in evidence. The ecclesiastical province had its own metropolitan center in the civil capital of the province, where the metropolitan resided, i.e., close to the civil governor and more able to help his colleagues in their relations with him. Synods (4th-5th c.) established his power: besides the presidency of the provincial synod, he had a certain role watching over the religious-ecclesiastical life of the province and over the bishops themselves. The bishop, though autonomous in his own territory, had to obtain approval from the metropolitan and the other bishops for extraterritorial undertakings.

The metropolitan institution prevailed first in the Greek East, except for Egypt (and its dependants Libya and Pentapolis), where the bishops depended on the bishop of Alexandria. In the Latin West there was marked heterogeneity. The bishops of suburbicarian Italy depended directly on the bishop of Rome. The bishop of Milan, residence of the emperor and the vicarius annonarius, one of the few large cities of N Italy, was the main metropolitan of an ecclesiastical territory comprising several provinces. From ca. 425, the see of *Aquileia was metropolis of the provinces of Venice, Istria, *Rhaetia and *Noricum, as was *Sirmium of Pannonia. Aquileia and *Ravenna were preeminent at the time of the co-emperors *Honorius (395–423) and *Arcadius (395–408). In the provinces of N Africa the metropolitan (primate) was the oldest bishop, who did not necessarily reside in the metropolis. In Proconsularis, however, the metropolitan was the bishop of Carthage, who also had a certain influence in the other provinces. In Gaul, from the 4th c. the metropolitan sees coincided with the provincial capitals. The popes set up the apostolic vicariate of *Arles, a see founded by St. *Trophimus, a disciple of St. Peter. For *Spain, we have no evidence of the existence of the metropolitan institution until after the mid 5th c.; only in the 6th c. do we see the great provincial synods there. Everywhere, in general, ecclesiastical provinces corresponded to civil administrative units, but the church reserved the right to keep their own areas despite the changeability of the civil ones (Innocent I, Ep. 24,2; Council of Chalcedon, can. 12). For individual metropolises, Eastern and Western, see J-R. Palanque, in Fliche-Martin III/2, 650-695.

DACL, 9, 786-790; EC 8, 914-915; J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'Empire Romain (IVe-Ve siècles), Paris 1958, 380-407; Fliche-Martin III/2, 639-650; K. Baus - E. Ewig, Storia della Chiesa, II, Milan 1977, 450-452.

IV. Patriarchates. The legal bases for their foundation were laid at the Council of Nicaea ([325], can. 6), which made the bishops of Egypt, Libya and Pentapolis dependent on the bishop of Alexandria and recognized the privileged situation of Antioch, whose bishop had metropolitan powers over the 22 bishops of Coele-Syria as well as those of Cilicia, Mesopotamia, Palestine and *Cyprus. These positions were also recognized by the councils of *Constantinople ([381], can. 2) and *Ephesus (431). Can. 2 of Constantinople also named the political dioceses of the Eastern part of the empire: Oriens, *Asia, *Pontus and *Thrace, without alluding to a church to whose bishop the government of their respective dioceses belonged: we can already foresee the institution of the Eastern patriarchate, the more so if we take into account can. 3: "The bishop of Constantinople will have primacy of honor (τὰ πρεσβεῖα τῆς τιμῆς) immediately after the bishop of Rome, since that is a new Rome (νέαν Ῥώμην)": the thronos of Alexandria, the principal one in the East, had to take second place. Ambitions of prelates and imperial *caesaropapism, as well as the fact of having been founded by *Constantine (330) and made capital of the empire (so that its bishop had to be raised in dignity), took Constantinople in just 70 years from a suffragan diocese of Heraclea to first patriarchate of the whole East (Council of Chalcedon [451], can. 28). Its effective power was consolidated through the appeals of the Eastern clergy to the emperors, transmitted from them to the bishop of Constantinople, who presided over the permanent synod (σύνοδος ἐνδημοῦσα) composed of visiting bishops. As for *Jerusalem, the Council of Constantinople (can. 7) recognized its bishop's "traditional honorific position" (ἀκουλουθία τῆς τιμῆς), but was mindful of the metropolitan rights of Caesarea.

The primary factor in the origin of the three patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch and Rome was their geopolitical and economic role, a factor that had partly guided the Christian missionaries. This same rationale, though considered completely inadequate by popes *Damasus, *Boniface I, *Leo I and *Gelasius I, was the only reason for the institution of the patriarchate of Constantinople. Then there was the linguistic-cultural factor of the inhabitants of the areas where they arose: there was, in fact, a patriarchate respectively in the territories of Egyptian culture (Alexandria), Syrian culture (Antioch), Greek culture (Constantinople), Latin culture (Rome, although in this area, with Carthage, there was a certain independence of N Africa) and Jewish culture (Jerusalem). But above all there was the element of the apostolic origin of the leading episcopal sees, which acquired more and more weight, partly through Roman pressure. Only at the Council of Chalcedon (451) was Jerusalem recognized as a patriarchal see with jurisdiction over Palestine, through the good offices of its bishop *Juvenal (422–458), and made independent of Antioch. Following the finding of the presumed tomb of the apostle Barnabas (488) in Cyprus, the Cypriot church attained equality with that of Antioch; from definitive independence, obtained for it by the emperor *Zeno, it then passed to "autocephaly." As for Rome, popes Leo I (440-461) and Gelasius I (492-496) added to the Petrine principle the peculiar link between Peter and the Roman church, claiming that this was to be considered the apostolic see par excellence, with the popes as heirs of Peter's primatial powers.

Having addressed the origin of the dioceses and seen that a group of them constituted an ecclesiastical province and several provinces a patriarchate, we must now follow the development of the five patriarchates: Alexandria, Antioch, Rome, Constantinople and Jerusalem. In the patriarchate of Alexandria, many, rejecting Leo I's dogmatic "tome" and the decisions of the Council of Chalcedon, detached themselves from the Catholic Church and formed a new "Coptic" church, calling the Catholics "*Melkites" or emperor's men. The Greek patriarchate, its numbers greatly reduced, remained faithful to the Council of Chalcedon. The Melkite patriarchs include three saints: St. *Proterius (452–457), St. *Eulogius (580–607) and St. *John III, the Almsgiver (609–619). *Maximus the Confessor and *Sophronius defended Catholic orthodoxy at the time of the Arab invasion (638), on whose eve the Greek church of Alexandria counted only 200,000 faithful, mostly foreigners, against the 5/6,000,000 of the indigenous Coptic church.

The patriarchate of Antioch was displeased by the rise of the patriarchate of Constantinople, at the Council of Chalcedon (451), to first see of the East. Meanwhile it was infiltrated by heresy, so much so that the patriarchal see alternated between heretics and orthodox until, under the *monophysite patriarch *Severus (512–518), *Jacob Baradeus organized the "*Jacobite" church: by the mid 6th c., about half of the inhabitants of Syria adhered to this. The situation deteriorated during the Arab occupation (638–969). The patriarchate of Jerusalem, to defend itself from Antioch and Alexandria, sought help from Constantinople, whose faith it followed. The Persian invasion (614) put an end to a brief period of splendor. The histories of the patriarchates of Constantinople and Rome are interwoven. The bishops of Constantinople aimed at "second place in the hierarchy after the pope and [at] privileges equal to his, though without demanding universal primacy, still acknowledged by them to the Roman see, though passed over in silence as far as possible" (M. Jugie, Le schisme byzantin. Aperçu historique et doctrinal, Paris 1941, 37).

The matter appeared more logical on the death of *Theodosius I (395) and the division of the Roman Empire into two parts. Now, in can. 28 of the Council of Chalcedon (CoeD, pp. 99-100), which modified can. 3 of Constantinople (381) (CoeD, p. 32), the privileges of the see of Constantinople were made equal to those of Rome, while conceding first place to the latter; the bishop of Constantinople had the right to ordain the metropolitans of the (civil) dioceses of Pontus, Asia and Thrace. The patriarchate of Constantinople, comprising these three exarchates, was now founded de jure.

Can. 28 served the bishop of Constantinople for his patriarchal jurisdiction. In the mid 7th c., the patriarchate counted 33 metropolises with 352 suffragan bishoprics and 24 autocephalous archbishoprics. From the 7th c. the see of Constantinople was also called apostolic; indeed in the 9th c. it was declared to be of apostolic origin (heir of Ephesus, therefore of St. John the apostle; linked to the legend of St. Andrew the apostle, evangelizer of Byzantium): we thus arrive at the theory of the "pentarchy," installed by the Holy Spirit, of apostolic succession and composed of superior leaders of identical dignity. The Roman see was agreeable to the pluralistic structure as long as the patriarchates were shown to be based on apostolic origin. Conflicts arose through Rome's vaunting her preeminent apostolic origin, claiming to be the universal leader of the church. The Decretum Gelasianum*, the case of *John Chrysostom under Innocent I (402–417), Leo I's (440–461) opposition to can. 28 of Chalcedon, the patriarch of Constantinople's assumption, against Roman protest, of the title "ecumenical" (= imperial) patriarch (6th c.), etc., are so many steps in a gradual tension and distancing between Rome and Constantinople. But the primacy of the bishops of Constantinople among the churches of the East was uncontested, all the more so since the Eastern patriarchates went over either to the Nestorian (Antioch) or the monophysite (Alexandria) heresy, and ended up under Muslim rule (7th c.). Relationships with the emperor were regulated by mutual exchanges of synodal letters with a profession of faith by the pope or the patriarch elect; with the insertion of the patriarch's name or that of the pope into the diptychs and its commemoration during the canon of the mass, read by the deacon from the ambo; and with the diplomatic representation of the pope or patriarch to the emperor through permanent ambassadors or special nuncios (apocrisiarii). This diplomatic network, though necessary, failed to prevent the rift between the sees of Constantinople and Rome from widening further and further and culminating in the schism of 1054.

EC 6, 759-763: patriarchate of Al.; EC 6, 1461-1463: patr. of Ant.; EC 4, 732-737: patr. of Const.; EC 6, 201-202: patr. of Jer.; J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'Empire Romain (IVe-Ve siècles), Paris 1958, 389-407; P.P. Joannou, Pape, Concile et patriarches dans la tradition de l'Église orientale jusqu'au IXe siècle, Grottaferrata 1962; W. de Vries, Rom und die Patriarchate des Ostens, Freiburg i. Br. 1963; K. Baus - E. Ewig, Storia della Chiesa. II. L'epoca dei concili (IV-V sec.), Milan 1977, 258-263; Var. aus., I Patriarcati orientali nel primo millennio, OCA 181, Rome 1968; V. Monachino, Il canone 28 di Calcedonia. Genesi storica, Aquila 1979; F. Feghali, Perspectives sur l'histoire et l'institution des patriarcats orientaux, in Mél. Dauvillier, Toulouse 1979, 269-292; G. Lerner, The Creation of Patriarchy, Oxford 1986; G. Fedalto, Le Chiese d'Oriente. Da Giustiniano alla caduta di Costantinopoli, Milan 1991, 14-27 (ecclesiastical organization of the Church of Constantinople and of the other patriarchates at the time of Justinian); J. Gaudemet, Storia del diritto canonico. Ecclesia et Civitas, Cinisello Balsamo 1998 (Fr. orig. 1994), 144-147; B. Flusin, Vescovi e patriarchi. Le strutture della Chiesa imperiale, in Storia del cristianesimo, 3 (432–610), Rome 2002 (Fr. orig. 1998), 459-512. Roman see: A. Fransen, Papstgeschichte. Das Petrusamt, Freiburg i. Br. [2]1979; J. Gaudemet, Storia del diritto canonico, 153-166.

O. Pasquato

ECCLESIOLOGY. According to 1 Clement, the churches of Rome and Corinth sojourn in a foreign land, having their full citizenship only in heaven. The church is identified with those "called (elect), sanctified by the will of God through our Lord Jesus Christ" (preface). All who are part of the church must and can stand in God's presence (29, 1), but not all are on the same level. God himself has willed a ranked order: "Some liturgies are assigned to the High Priest; a leading place belongs to the priests, the Levites have their own services, while the layperson is bound by the regulations for laypeople" (40, 5). God sent Christ, who entrusted the good news to the apostles (42, 1); they in turn appointed their first proselytes as bishops and deacons (*Diakonia) for those who came to accept the faith (42, 4). So their office preceded the community (ekklēsia), whereas later generations of officeholders were commissioned with the consent of the whole community. The exercise of the function of these "presbyteroi" consists of "leiturgia" and "episcopē," i.e., they "offer the oblations." Though *Clement speaks of bishops, deacons (42, 4.5) and presbyters (surely in the sense of specific offices 44, 5; 47, 6; 54, 2; 57, 1), he does not make clear whether these are three grades of the hierarchy; it seems rather that the "established presbyters" (54, 2) occupied the office of bishop collegially; but in the way Clement stresses the role of the high priest (40, 5), we may possibly see a reference to a single bishop.

The martyr-bishop Ignatius of Antioch clearly cites the triple distinction of the office of deacons, presbyters (together forming the presbyterate) and sole bishop (Eph. 1, 3; 2, 2; 4, 1; 20, 2; Magn. 2; 6, 1ff.). For him as for Clement (59, 3), the Father of Jesus Christ is the bishop of all (Magn. 3, 1); the bishop is God's vicar (Magn. 6, 1), the image (typos) of the Father (Trall. 3, 1). The presbyters stand in the place of the council of the apostles united before God (Magn. 6, 1; Trall. 2, 2; 3, 1; Smyrn. 8, 1). The deacons must be respected as Christ himself (Trall. 3, 1), or as a commandment of God (Smyrn. 8, 1); to them is entrusted the service of Christ Jesus (Magn. 6, 1). The repeated insistence on subordination to the bishop and to the presbyterate does not seem to be an end in itself—as in Clement, for whom degree confers beauty on the world and on the church—but to serve the purpose of unity. The unity of the church (Eph. 4, 2; 5, 1; Phld. 2, 2; 7, 2; Pol. 2, 1) must correspond to God's unicity (Phil. 8, 1; 9, 1; Smyrn. 12, 2; Pol. 8, 3; Trall. 11, 2); whoever has left her and turned elsewhere must return (Phld. 3, 2) to God's unity (ibid. 8, 1). The church's prayers will be heard only when unity reigns (Eph. 4, 2). A community must not censure its bishop to silence him, "since he whom the Master of the house sends as his administrator must be welcomed as the sender himself" (Eph. 6, 1). So the community does not share in the appointment of the bishop, but it is not clear who confers the office. He who believes in the *incarnation, passion and *resurrection (Magn. 11) is like a branch of the *cross and produces fruits of immortality. Christ calls his members to himself and to his life, since the head cannot be born without the members (Trall. 11, 2). In this way the passion belongs to the essence of the church, which comes after the prophecies, the law of Moses and the gospel proclaimed until now; the sufferings of each of us witness to the faith (Smyrn. 5, 1).

To the Roman *Hermas (ca. 150), the church appears (Vis. I) as an old woman splendidly dressed, since "she is first among all and the world was created for her sake" (Vis. II, 4, 1). Moreover, the church is identified with its members; at first she appears old, since the spirit of Christians is old and exhausted, and has no strength left because of their weaknesses and uncertainties (Vis. III, 11, 2). In the third vision, the church is young, beautiful and gay, because "you have welcomed the renewal of your spirit" (Vis. III, 9, 1 and 2). But the church is also mother of the "presidents of the community" (Vis. III, 9, 1 and 7). The seer's focus on the universal church is shown by the construction of the tower "which seems to rise as from a single stone" (Vis. III, 2, 6).

*Theophilus of Antioch (ca. 185) stressed the missionary effectiveness of the many communities taken individually: "as in the sea there are islands . . . havens for voyagers in the storm . . . in this guise God has given to the world, shaken and lashed by the billows of sin, the assemblies (synagōgai) called holy churches, where the doctrines of truth are found, where those who want to be saved take refuge, since they are lovers of truth and want to flee from God's wrath and judgment" (Autol. 2, 14). Certainly, whoever considers the actual communities cannot be unaware that "as there are rocky islands . . . where sailors are smashed to bits, so there are doctrines of error, heresies that lead those who turn to them to perdition; these are not led by the Logos of truth" (ibid.). In dispute with heretics, esp. with *gnosticism, the custody and transmission of the truth became the church's badge and title of dignity.

For *Irenaeus, the church is the one "worthy vessel" in which the *Holy Spirit has deposited the faith as a "precious good," a faith which remains forever young and keeps its vessel young and healthy (Adv. haer. 3, 24, 1). An effect of the Spirit, which guarantees the church's possession of the truth, are the holders of ministry (Adv. haer. 3, 24, 1), in the first place the bishops appointed by the apostles and their successors up to this day (Adv. haer. 3, 3, 1-3). Whoever rejects the bishops rejects the church and with it God's Spirit; and the Spirit is truth (Adv. haer. 3, 24, 1), always and everywhere the same (Adv. haer. 1, 10, 2). The church possesses truth, the same truth announced by the prophets, brought to fulfillment by Christ, handed down by the apostles: having accepted it, she preserves it faithfully, communicates it to her children (Adv. haer. 2, 30, 11) and acts as a link between the apostles and later generations. For Irenaeus as for Hermas, the believers are the church (Adv. haer. 3, 6, 1). Its different members are closely united to one another, since "all recognize one God and Father, believe in the same economy of the incarnation of the Son of God, know the same outpouring of the Spirit, observe the same precepts and the same system of church government, await one same coming of the Lord and hope for the same salvation of the whole person, soul and body" (Adv. haer. 5, 20, 1). As content of the church's true knowledge, Irenaeus lists "(1) the doctrine of the apostles; (2) the ancient organization of the church throughout the world; (3) the mark of Christ's body according to the succession of bishops, to whom they (the apostles) entrusted each local church; (4) the faithful preservation of the *Scriptures which have come down to us; (5) the complete collection of them without addition or subtraction; (6) a reading of them containing no deception; (7) a correct, harmonious exposition of them, exempt from danger and blasphemy; (8) finally the supreme gift of charity. . . ." (Adv. haer. 4, 33, 8). For Irenaeus, the church as an institution is an argument for faith; the character of the body of Christ is impressed on it through the succession of bishops, something that almost no other Father of the church brings out more convincingly or penetratingly. Though the church is one throughout the world, the local communities are also churches. Those founded by the apostles serve as a canon in controversies of lesser importance (Adv. haer. 3, 5, 1), but because of the more excellent origin of the church of Rome—founded by the apostles *Peter and *Paul—it is understood that each church must be in agreement with it, since in it the tradition that comes from the apostles has always been preserved (Adv. haer. 3, 3, 2).

For *Clement of Alexandria (d. after 200), the church is proof of God's power always at work. "As his will is a work and is called the world, so his intention is the salvation of humanity, and this is called the church" (Paed. I, 6, 27, 2). In the ecclesiastical orders of bishops, presbyters and deacons, Clement sees "images of the angelic world and of the future condition which, according to the Scriptures, await those who have walked in the way of the apostles, in perfect justice" (Strom. VI, 13, 107). The just will sit, even if they had no presidency here on earth (though they should hold one, and the ordained should be perfect), on 24 thrones to judge the people, as Rev 4:4 puts it (Strom. VI, 13, 106). Clement probably understood the 24 thrones as a tribunal for the new dual people, composed of Jews and pagans. "Grace has been duplicated," but, even if there is some justification in speaking of more than one Testament, we must speak of a "single Covenant (diathēkē) which works salvation," which "has come down to us from the foundation of the world and has (only wrongly) been considered as given in different ways in accordance with successive generations and times" (Strom. VI, 13, 106). The one Testament can be likened to the one God: "O ineffable mystery; the universal Father is one, and one the universal Word; and the Holy Spirit is one and the same everywhere; and one virgin becomes mother, which I love to call the church" (Paed. I, 6, 42, 1).

*Tertullian (d. after 200) goes further than Clement: "The reason why the church is mentioned (in the baptismal creed) is clear; it is because where the three divine persons, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, are present, there also is the church, the body of the three persons" (Bapt. 6). After Tertullian, no Father of the church expresses himself in this way: even Augustine, the great theologian of the church, limits himself to saying, "After the *Trinity, we must add the church, as after the inhabitant his house, after God his temple, after the founder his city" (Ench. 15, 56). In his exposition of the *Lord's Prayer, Tertullian affirms: "In the title of Father, the Son is also invoked, nor is Mother church left out, because in the father and the son we recognize the mother, in which the very name of father and son finds its basis" (Orat. 2). He is also the first to point out the parallel between Adam and Eve on one hand and Christ and the church on the other: "as Adam was a figure of Christ, Adam's sleep represents the death of Christ, who had to fall asleep in *death so that from his wounded side the church, true mother of the living, could be formed" (De an. 43). The church lives in each of its members, feels and suffers with each one, because she is Christ himself (Poen. 10). "We are one body by the consciousness of religion, the unity of discipline and the covenant of hope" (Apol. 39, 1). Christians know that God examines them; so that "in our meetings a judgment takes place in God's name; and if one has sinned gravely, he is excluded (excommunicated) from the community of prayer, from the meeting and from any religious association" (Apol. 39, 4). As in Irenaeus, the communities of apostolic origin have a special authority (Praescr. 35, 2-5); but since all are linked to each other through the "communion of peace, the name of brotherhood and the mark of hospitality," all the churches are "the first and all are apostolic" (Praescr. 20, 7-9).

*Origen, while desiring to understand the inner reality of which all degrees of ecclesial ministry are a symbol (Mt. Com. 14, 22), leaves no doubt that "the form of the churches is entrusted to the priests" (Num. hom. 9, 1), which is why judgment on faith and morals is the province of those who hold ministries. There is no inner hierarchy of the perfect that can exercise full powers and replace the clergy. Nevertheless, a sinner must seek the advice of a perfect person as much as possible, to know his own state and the means of salvation. A bishop who is personally in a state of sin will bind and loose in vain, since, not possessing a clear criterion of virtue, he cannot be sure that his judgment corresponds to that of heaven (Mt. Com. 12, 14). This is not *Donatism ante litteram, but the conviction that discernment is given only as the fruit of a virtuous life. The church is the community of those who work for a deeper understanding of *revelation, a mutual participation in it and a common realization of it (Jo. Com. 19, 8, 45). Believers, even when not attaining the highest perfection, possess the *hope of salvation, though this seems highly graduated, able to include even a little dishonor (Josh. hom. 10, 1) if anyone should fall far short of their task. But for unbelievers or heretics, even an austere life seems to lead to perdition (Ezech. hom. 7, 3; Mt. Com. Ser. 33). Israel is the first and last recipient of all God's favors; all other peoples can be admitted to them only in its place (fragm. 464 in Mt 23,39; fragm. 125 in Lc 8,41). The provisional destiny of the synagogue cannot affect the church as a whole; Jesus weeps only over individual souls, as he wept over Jerusalem (Lc. hom. 38; Jer. hom. 13, 2).

The church is not sinful; rather, whoever falls into sin ceases to belong to the church (Mt. Com. 12, 11ff.), not just when excommunicated, but even when his sin remains hidden. If his sin is discovered, he must be excommunicated; only for those whose exclusion is not possible is the parable of the wheat and tares valid; but their presence in the church is clearly unjustified, like the persistence of the Jebusites in Jerusalem. Believers must avoid, as far as possible, any contact with them (Josh. hom. 21, 1, 2). Indeed, from birth no one is exempt from guilt, but it is possible to free oneself from sin. Even the churchman (ekklesiastikos) was defiled, but now he no longer has "any spot" (Lc. hom. 2).

The holy church, for Origen, is not something heavenly or otherworldly: it lives not just in the objective sanctity of doctrine and *sacraments, but in the saints of actual communities, i.e., in the sanctity of Christians. Many Christians live so purely as to be able to be considered perfect priests (C. Cels. 7, 48). Neither the communion of all Christians nor the totality of all the (local) communities is identified simply with the church, the holy body of Christ; by following the way of penance and sanctification, made possible by grace (Rom. Com. 5, 7; Lev. hom. 9, 8), we are identified more and more with Christ's body. Therefore this reality of the church in process of realization must be increasingly known, which occurs, e.g., through seeking the spiritual meaning of Scripture, which refers to the church herself. In fact Origen is rather reserved in this; various passages in which later exegesis would see the church, he interprets as referring to the individual soul (e.g., Mt 24:40-41 and Lk 17:34, in Mt. Com. Ser. 57, 58 and Mt. fragm. 488ff. and fragm. 225 in Lk.). The church cannot be fully realized on earth, since sinners are found in her and sin in her members; she must in all things follow her savior who was crucified, buried and rose on the third day (Jo. Com. 10, 35, 229). The church's body will rise again in the future world, passing through God's judgment, which will separate the noble from the ignoble parts (Jo. Com. 10, 36, 237); to each will be assigned his proper place according to the merits acquired on earth (ibid. 10, 39, 268), and excluding those who are not in harmony with the other members (ibid. 10, 36, 236).

The ecclesiological ideas of *Cyprian were born from persecution, the rebellion of some clerics, the breaking up of the communities and the controversy over *baptism. Like Ignatius, he sees the ministry of the bishop as the guarantee of unity: "God is one, Christ is one, the church is one and the cathedra too is one, that founded by Peter himself" (Ep. 43, 5 Hartel). For him, the see of Peter is not just the see of Rome; each bishop has a cathedra of his own, as a 3rd-c. African bishop opposed by Tertullian put it: each church is linked to Peter (Petri propinquam), possessing the same power of the keys (Pud. 21). Since Christ wills unity, he has conferred the primacy on Peter, but "the other apostles were what Peter was" (Unit. 4). A few years later Cyprian would declare, against Pope *Stephen, that Peter never claimed to possess a primacy that claimed obedience (Ep. 71, 3). It was perhaps then that he corrected his work on unity to what we now read: "The origin (of the church) comes from unity"; what in the first edition he called apostasy from the chair of Peter, on which the church is founded (Unit. 4), he now called "opposition to the church." One novelty in Cyprian is his awareness of the individual bishop's responsibility for the whole church (ibid. 5). "This is why the great college (corpus) of bishops (sacerdotes) exists . . . and if anyone creates factions or breaks up Christ's flock, let others take care to gather the sheep back into the fold." In this manner Cyprian solicits Pope Stephen to send a letter dismissing the *Novatianist bishop of *Arles and appoint another bishop there (Ep. 68, 3); he thus seems to offer good evidence in favor of the pope's authority.

Cyprian borrows from Tertullian his speech on pax ecclesiae; "peace of and with the church," i.e., reconciliation for sinners, can be accorded the apostates of *Decius's persecution only when "peace for the church," i.e., the end of persecution, has come (Ep. 15, 2 etc.). In fact, for those fallen into apostasy (the lapsi) a period of greater penitence was required; it would end, and pax would be given them, at the moment when the church's peace was again threatened by a new persecution (Ep. 55, 17 and 57, 1). Through reconciliation, brothers in the faith are "armed, fortified and trained for combat" (ibid.). Full connection with the church confers grace; reconciliation is equivalent to the sacrament of penance. Cyprian often calls the church Mother (Ep. 15, 2; 43, 6; 74, 7, etc.). He carries Tertullian's ideas to their maximum expression: "He who does not have the church for mother, cannot have God for father" (Unit. 6). It follows for him that all sacraments administered outside the church are invalid. Baptism can be administered only in the catholica; what is conferred outside is "contamination with profane water" (Ep. 72, 1, etc.), because the Holy Spirit works only in the church (Ep. 69, 11-12).

*Methodius (end of 3rd c.) updates Tertullian's parallel between Adam and Christ: "For the sake of the church, the Word left the Father who is in heaven and came down to join himself to the woman, and fell asleep in the ecstasy of his passion, dying for her of his own spontaneous will. . . . The church grows from day to day . . . by the embrace and communion of the Word, which even now descends among us and even now is rapt out of himself when we recall his passion. In no other way could the church conceive and regenerate the faithful through the washing of regeneration, if Christ himself, for these believers of the church . . . did not return to die, descending from the heavens, and, adhering to his lady the church, did not offer himself so that something of his power could be taken from his rib, by which all those who are built up and regenerated in him by washing might grow by taking from his bone and from his flesh, i.e., from his sanctity and from his glory" (Symp. 3, 8). Here Methodius is not speaking of the Eucharistic meal, but understands the rib of the new Adam as the sevenfold Spirit by which God perfects Christ's bride, "that is, the souls united to him by the bond of marriage."

*Hilary of Poitiers considers the church as God's tent (In ps. 51, 16), i.e., "the desired house; it is joyful news: living stones are placed on the foundation of the twelve precious stones; they have been squared for building, first by Moses in the law, then by the prophets in their suffering, by the Lord in his body, by the apostles in martyrdom and by the Holy Spirit in marvelous deeds" (In ps. 121, 3; see also In ps. 126, 8, 9). The church is likened to the Trinity, almost assumed into it: "So it is proper to God's people, to be brothers under one father, to be one under one Spirit, to advance harmoniously in one family, to be members of one body under one head" (In ps. 132, 3). Christ has "renewed us for a new life, transforming us into new people, assuming us into the body of his flesh. He is the church, since through the sacrament of his body he comprises everything in himself" (In ps. 125, 6). The church is like Christ in this too: "it overcomes when it is struck, it is acknowledged when it is attacked, it conquers when it is abandoned. It would certainly be its wish that all people should live at its side and in its bosom . . . but . . . if it sometimes suffers harm, in that it cannot save all (e.g., heretics), this is compensated for by the certainty that it alone can offer beatitude" (Trin. 7, 4).

For *Ambrose as for Hilary, the church grows when it is diminished, overcomes when it is persecuted and fills the earth with the light of its faith and devotion (Hex. 4, 7). It is like the mother of life, prefigured by Eve (In ps. 36, 36ff.), like the sterile-fertile woman prefigured in Sarah (Abr. 1, 31ff.) and Rebekah (ibid. 2, 2-3; Is 2:9), since it allows God's blessing to pass from the Jewish people to the new people. Some characters who appear in the gospel, e.g., the Samaritan woman (Jn 4:7ff.), the widow of Nain (Lk 7:11-17), the sinner in the house of Simon the leper, are not just images of the church (Is 26; In Lc. 5, 89; 6, 13), but also allegorical figures: by her spiritual teaching the woman of Lk 13:21 sanctifies the three parts of the human person: body, soul and spirit (In Lc. 7, 19). The two women grinding at the same mill signify that "the church is elected (by God), the synagogue abandoned; or that the good sense is taken and the impure left" (Cain 1, 30; cf. In Lc. 8, 52). Here Ambrose goes beyond Origen, who found only the soul, not the church, in this passage. Certainly there were similar interpretations on the soul and the church in Origen, but for Ambrose this is the guiding principle of his exegesis: "ecclesia vel anima" (e.g., see also Virg. 1, 31; Ep. 13; In ps. 118 Tract. 6, 8; Hex. 6, 49; Myst. 37; etc.). He thus draws from the texts a richer spiritual meaning, something stressed perhaps most of all by *Maximus of Turin. For him, not only does "the synagogue grind in vain, since it does not put Christ's teaching into the mixture, but it is also eternally condemned to turn the mill of its own incredulity" (Hom. 111). In his excessive zeal for allegorical interpretation, Maximus forgot the Pauline passage: all Israel will be saved (Rom 11:26). Ambrose aligns himself with salvation-history: "What is celebrated now in the church was just a shadow in the prophets' speeches; . . . now we see through the image; then, when the image has vanished and the truth arrives, we will see truly" (In ps. 28, 25). Indeed the church, as compared with the image represented by the people of the Old Covenant, may be already considered the truth (In ps. 118 Tract. 5, 6), yet it continually bears in itself and adumbrates "the image of the heavenly reality" (Interpell. 2, 9).

While for Ambrose the prerogative of the Roman church consists ultimately only in the fact of preserving the faith of Peter and of all the apostles (Excess. 1, 47), *Jerome is clearer than any other Father on the primacy of the see of Rome. He reassures Pope *Damasus, whom he sees as "the successor of the fisherman": "I feel myself bound to your Holiness, i.e., to the cathedra Petri, in communion of faith. I know that Christ's church has been founded on this rock" (Ep. 15, 2). He is prepared, at an order of the pope, to formulate a new profession of faith (Ep. 15, 4).

From liturgical practice, in which the church sang the psalms as its proper prayer and as a hymn of praise, *Augustine develops, esp. on the basis of the letter to the Ephesians, the image of the church as the "whole Christ, head and body. The head is our Savior himself . . . , his body is the church . . . spread throughout the world." Christ the head "did not wish to speak apart from the body, because he did not wish to be separated from us. . . . If he is with us, he speaks in us, speaks of us, speaks through us, as we also speak in him" (En. in ps. 56, 1; Serm. 137, 1; En. in ps. 30, 1). Since he contains the church in himself as his body, Christ is "the perfect man" according to Eph 4:13 (En. in ps. 90, 2). The church is also Christ's bride, following the expression of Eph 5:21-32 (Serm. 341, 12; En. in ps. 90, 2). This great mystery has its beginning in the virgin's womb: there God's word is the bridegroom, the flesh the bride; in him the whole church is figured. Thus the one Christ, perfect in himself, is one with his church, just as the whole Christ speaks in the psalms. Sometimes we come across expressions in them which seem unsuited to Christ, our head, the Word who in the beginning was God and was with God: and some of these words seem unsuited to him even in his form of a servant. And yet it is Christ who speaks, because Christ is in his members. So it is a single person who is formed from two terms: the head and the body, the bridegroom and the bride. The prophet Isaiah also celebrates the unity of this person as marvelous and sublime, or rather, more than once Christ says prophetically in him: "like a bridegroom he has decked me with a garland, and like a bride he has adorned me with jewels" (Is 61:10). He calls himself "bridegroom and bride" (En. in ps. 30, 2, 4). The procedure of the eucharistic celebration leads Augustine to identify Christ's ecclesial body with the eucharistic body: "If you are the body and members of Christ, your mystery is placed on the Lord's altar. Receive what you are (your mystery). Say Amen to what you are" (Serm. 273).

Against the separatism of the Donatists, Augustine stresses the church's universality (Ep. 52, 1; 76 etc.); against their false claim to sanctity, he refers to the parables of the wheat and the tares (Ep. 93, 2) and of the dragnet (Civ. Dei 18, 49). The church in history is like a threshing floor full of grain and chaff. Whoever looks at the threshing floor from a distance thinks there is nothing there but straw: the ears of grain are almost separate from each other, so that each thinks he is advancing alone (En. in ps. 25, 5). Jacob's lame leg signifies the bad Christians; and yet he was blessed, which refers to the good (Serm. 5, 8). The church is the ark, which contains pure and impure together (Serm. 264, 5). Asked whether the church is a composition of good and bad, Augustine replies resolutely: "To the church—i.e., to the body of Christ, to grace and to the community of saints—those who are negligent hearers or who engage in bad behavior do not belong" (Serm. 149, 4). The ark contains pure and impure, but is built with incorruptible beams, i.e., the souls of the saints and of the just (Serm. 264, 5).

Only in the saints does "the communion of saints, the church, the true mother of believers" exist (ibid.). Bad Christians possess "communio sacramentorum," participation in the sacraments (Ep. 98, 28; Civ. Dei 1, 35ff.), but are not part of the community (societas or congregatio: Serm. 233, 2) of saints. "Many seem excluded who are actually included; others who seem to belong to it are excluded" (Bapt. V, 27, 38). This expression is valid, however, "in that ineffable divine prescience" (ibid.), i.e., in the perspective of its future fulfillment. "The full assembly of the saints will be after the resurrection" (Serm. 223, 2). Augustine's last word on this problem is that "the church, without spot or wrinkle, must not be understood as if it actually were so, but as destined to become so, when it is in glory" (Retract. II, 18).

Against *Pelagius, Augustine stresses divine predestination: "like him who is predestined to be our head, many of us are predestined in him to be his members" (Praed. sanct. 15, 31). "One who is predestined to eternal life will not end his present life without the sacrament of the mediator" (C. Julian. 5, 4), and will also be led to communio sacramentorum. This does not guarantee membership in the final salvific community, but is its premise. In this way Augustine's late thoughts on predestination become determinative for the idea of the church. Of the two Cities (civitates), one is "predestined to reign eternally with God, the other to suffer eternal punishment with the devil" (Civ. Dei 15, 1). It was certainly not God's will that there should be two Cities, but the congregation of the reprobate originated in a free turning away from God (ibid. 11, 33; 12, 2). And just as God is the creator of good natures, he is also the just orderer of bad wills, so that, when bad wills use good natures badly, he uses even bad wills well (ibid. 11, 17). God allows even human sins, because he knows how to draw good out of them. "By his grace he gathers from among the generations of humanity, deservedly and justly condemned, a people numerous enough to supply the places of the fallen angels, so that the beloved and supernal city should not only not be deprived of the number of its citizens, but should be gladdened by a number perhaps even greater" (Civ. Dei 22, 1, 2). Augustine expresses these ideas in his handbook on faith, hope and charity (Ench. 29, 7), where he maintains, unlike *John Chrysostom (Hom. in illud "Vidi Dominum" 4,2), that it was not heaven that was made for the church, but the church for heaven.

*Basil the Great considers the church as God's daughter and as a queen sitting at his right hand (In ps. 44, 9). But "the bad are mingled with the healthy body of the church" (In Hex. 5, 5). Moreover, not all are equal in the church, but in this "great house there is not just every sort of vessel—gold, silver, wood and clay—but a great multiplicity of arts" (ibid. 3, 5); in this way no one is excluded from its profit (In ps. 48, 1). The idea of the fraternity of the church, which Basil propounds above all else in his moral and ascetical works, fell on fertile soil. His distinction between kerygma*, what is proclaimed openly, and dogma, what is known to few (De Spir. 27, 66), did not catch on, though he cited the example of orientation during prayer, in which emerges the lively desire for paradise (situated in the East), something known to few.

For *Gregory of Nyssa, ecclesiology can be based on the Pauline phrase "if the first fruits are holy, so is the whole lump" (Rom 11:16). The head of the ecclesial body is not the eternal God-Logos himself, but the God-bearing man, fruit of the Virgin, in whom the fullness of divinity dwelt bodily (Col 2:9), the first fruits of the whole dough, through whom the Word assimilated our nature and purified it. (Cant. 13; cf. Praef. PG 46, 273A). In this way the dynamism of becoming church is expressed, as is the obligation of imitation.

*Cyril of Alexandria deduces the unity of the ecclesial body from the unity of the divine essence (In Joh. 11, 11); the unity of Christ's members is accomplished by the fact that they receive the same eucharistic bread and become one body with Christ and with each other (PG 74, 560BC). Equally efficacious is the fact that the same Holy Spirit dwells in individual believers (PG 74, 561AB). Thus those who belong to the church are recipients of the sacraments and become once more what man was originally: formed in God's image (i.e., in the Son) and likeness (i.e., according to the Holy Spirit).

For Pope *Leo the Great, the church is the Roman Catholic Church. The one church has been prepared by the one Roman Empire, which brought together many nations and allowed them access to the gospel (Serm. 82, 2). Now Rome has acquired a new significance through Peter: "From the whole world Peter alone was chosen, given as head to those called from all peoples, to the apostles and to all the fathers of the churches. Peter governs all the churches and bishops because Christ, who truly leads them, grants them every power only through Peter" (Ep. 4, 2). Peter unceasingly protects his cathedra and is continually present, in such a way that his "continual communion with the eternal priest" (Serm. 5, 4) is that of the pope himself. Leo does not merely call himself Peter's successor. Undoubtedly he speaks of his heirs (ibid.), but for him the pope is in a precise sense the personification or visible representation of Peter, and in this sense he may be called Peter (Serm. 2, 2).

For *Gregory the Great, the communities, as seen from the outside, together form in the world "one Catholic church" among all peoples (Mor. 16, 68); but internally the number of the elect is fixed (Mor. 25, 20). Many who are part of the "holy church of the elect" (Mor. 13, 46) lived before Christ and were saved by faith in the future passion, which was suffered for them too, just as we are saved through the same passion, now past (Hom. in Ez. 3, 16). Gregory sees "the church as a reality erected against the glory of this world" (Hom. in Evang. II, 32, 6). The church's splendor is shown not just by the miracles at the tombs of the saints, but also by the high esteem enjoyed by "preachers" (In 1 Reg. 1, 104), who direct the whole world, enjoy prosperity and "sing the praise of almighty God by the splendor of their lives" (In 1 Reg. 2, 59, 62).

P.Th. Camelot, Die Lehre von der Kirche. Väterzeit bis ausschliesslich Augustinus (HDG III, 3b), Freiburg 1970 (Sp. tr. Madrid 1978); W. Simonis, Ecclesia visibilis et invisibilis, Frankfurt 1970 (Ecclesiologia e sacramentaria della tradizione africana); Y. Congar, Die Lehre von der Kirche. Von Augustinus bis zum abendländischen Schisma (HDG III, 3c), Freiburg 1971; H. Rahner, L'ecclesiologia dei Padri. Simboli della Chiesa, Rome 1971; P.V. Dias, Kirche in der Schrift und im 2. Jhdt (HDG III, 3a), Freiburg 1974 (Sp. tr. Madrid 1978); R. Hübner, Die Einheit des Leibes Christi bei Gregor von Nyssa, Leiden 1974; H.J. Vogt, Das Kirchenverständnis des Origenes, Cologne 1974; Id., Ignatius von Antiochien über den Bischof und seine Gemeinde: ThQ 158 (1978) 15-27; Id., Das sichtbare Reich Gottes in abendländisch-patristischen Deutung, in Reich-Gottes Kirche-Civitas Dei, = 16. Forschungsgespräch, Salzburg 1980; G. Toscani, Teologia della Chiesa in S. Ambrogio, Milan 1974; P. Scazzoso, Introduzione alla ecclesiologia di San Basilio, Milan 1975; L. Ladaria, El Espíritu Santo en San Hilario de Poitiers, Madrid 1977; J. Ratzinger, Popolo e casa di Dio in S. Agostino, Milan 1977; A. Giacobbi, La Chiesa in S. Agostino, I. Mistero di comunione, Rome 1978; P.J. Fedwick, The Church and the Charisma of Leadership in Basil of Caesarea, Toronto 1979; J. Blank, Vom Urchristentum zur Kirche. Kirchenstrukturen im Rückblick auf den biblischen Ursprung, Munich 1982; V. Twomey, Apostolikos Thronos. The Primacy of Rome as Reflected in the Church History of Eusebius and the Historico-Apologetic Writings of Saint Athanasius the Great, Münster 1982; A. Antón, El misterio de la Iglesia. Evolución histórica de las ideas eclesiológicas, Madrid 1986; B.E. Bowe, A Church in Crisis: Ecclesiology and Paraenesis in Clement of Rome, Minneapolis 1988; Einheit der Kirche in vorkonstantinischer Zeit. Vorträge, gehalten bei der Patristischen Arbeitsgemeinschaft, 2-4 Januar 1985 in Bern, eds. F. v. Lilienfeld - A.M. Ritter, Erlangen 1989; M.A. Cenzon Santos, Baptismal Ecclesiology of Saint Augustin. A Theological Study of His Antidonatist Letters, Rome 1990; A. Faivre, Ordonner la fraternité. Pouvoir d'innover et retour à l'ordre dans l'église ancienne, Paris 1992; M. Garijo Guembe, Communions of Saints: Foundation, Nature, and a Structure, Collegeville, MN, 1994; M. Fiedrowicz, Das Kirchenverständnis Gregors des Grossen: eine Untersuchung seiner exegetischen und homilitischen Werke, Freiburg 1995; D. Rankin, Tertullian and the Church, Cambridge 1995; G. Biffi, Casta meretrix. Saggio sull'ecclesiologia di Ambrogio di Milano, Casale Monf. 1996; Misericordia sempre. "Casta meretrix" in alcuni testi dei Padri della Chiesa, ed. S. Chialà and L. Cremaschi, Bose 1998; A. Dulles - P. Granfield, The Theology of the Church. A Bibliography, New York 1999; J. Mühlsteiger, Sanctorum Communio, in Tradition – Wegweisung in die Zukunft (FS J. Mühlsteiger) ed. K. Breitsching, Berlin 2001, 811-835; I. Pereira Lamelas, Una Domus et Ecclesia Dei in saeculo. Leitura sócio-antropológica do projecto de ecclesia de S. Cipriano de Cartago, Lisbon 2002; H.J. Vogt, Immagini della Chiesa delle origini, Milan 2003; G.D. Dunn, Clement of Rome and the Question of Roman Primacy in the Early African Tradition: Augustinianum 43 (2003) 5-24.

H.J. Vogt

ECONOMY. The word οἰκονομία (Latin dispensatio, dispositio) found ample theological use, rich in content, in the patristic writings (Lampe 940-943). This is easily explained, given the frequency of the word in secular authors (see Reumann) and the suggestive ideas expressed by economy in the corpus paulinum (Eph 1:3-14; 9:3; Col 1:25). In the *Apologists and the Alexandrians, economy refers, with Stoic nuances, to the order in creation and to divine providence. At the same time economy takes on a soteriological meaning, comprising all the divine decrees, decided in eternity and fulfilled in time in view of human salvation. Developing this properly Christian subject matter, the gnostics distinguish between the internal organization of the pleroma and its earthly manifestation. *Irenaeus, taking up this idea, gives it a clearly historical meaning. In view of the unity of the two Testaments, he joins it to his famous idea of *recapitulation. But *Tertullian, opposing the mistaken opinion of divine monarchia, follows the gnostics in the sense that he prolongs the historical economy as far as the eternal dispositio. *Origen, among the divine economies, makes that of the incarnation prevalent—a meaning prepared by *Ignatius and *Justin (see Studer, Theologia, 577-578). In his wake, economy was confined more and more to the saving action of the incarnate Word, as distinct from his eternal existence; thus in *Eusebius (HE 1,1,7-8; C. Marc. II 3,22), *Athanasius (anti-Arian polemic) and then in Greek theology (Greg. Naz., Or. 38; Greg. Nyss., Orat. cat.). In the Cappadocians, the term economy is vested with an ecclesiological meaning: it concerns the administration of the *sacraments (Basil., Ep. 199,47, Greg. Nyss., Orat. Cat. 34) and the tolerant attitude to ecclesial communion, a meaning that would come to have great popularity in Byzantine theology. Though avoiding the term theologia in a Christian sense, *Augustine, like other 4th-c. authors, opposes the res aeternae to the dispensatio (cf. Studer, Theologia, 579, with F. et symb. 4,6; Agon. 17,19). Further developing ideas that were already traditional, he arrives at the clear affirmation that the economy reveals theologia. Like his predecessors, he applies this principle to the real distinction and order of the divine persons, to the relation of the temporal missions of the Son and the Spirit and the eternal characteristics of the Father, who has existence from himself and not from another, of the Son who is born of the Father, and of the Holy Spirit who proceeds from the Father and the Son (see Studer, Theologia, 587-590, with the cit. texts). In this sense Augustine's doctrine on the immanent *Trinity is solidly based on historia, i.e., on the narratio rerum gestarum (see Studer, History, 354-364).

Cath 3,1305ff.; J. Reumann, Οἰκονομία as "Ethical Accomodation" in the Fathers, and Its Pagan Background: TU 78, Berlin 1961, 370-379 (classical background); K. Duchatelez, La notion d'économie et ses richesses théologiques: NRTh 92 (1970) 267-308 (bibl.); A Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche, I, Freiburg 1979, passim and bibl.; U. Dierse, Ökonomie, II. Theologisch: HWP 6 (1984) 1153-1162; G.G. Blum, Oikonomia – Theologia: OS 33 (1984) 281-301 (bibl.); R.J. Kees, Die Lehre von der Oikonomia Gottes in der Oratio Catechetica Gregors von Nyssa, Leiden 1995; B. Studer, Theologia – Oikonomia, in Stud. Ans. 124 (Rome 1997), 575-600; B. Studer, History and Faith in Augustine's De Trinitate: Augustinian Studies 28 (1997) 7-50; E.M. Faber, Ökonomie: LTK[3] 7, 1014-1015 (bibl.); B. Studer, Incarnazione: Origene – Dizionario (2000), 225-229 (bibl.); J. Rexer, Die Festtheologie Gregors von Nyssa, Frankfurt 2002, 262-272.

B. Studer

ECSTASY. Ecstatic phenomena also appear in non-Christian religions; enthusiasm has an important place even in Greek philosophy. The *Holy Spirit manifested itself in the first Christian communities as an ecstatic power, but it is hard to say what character this power had. *Montanus later stressed the person's passivity in such states. The ecstasies of the first monks often have the character of a vision (horasis), but they do not imply a supersession of the intellect. Later we can distinguish three different positions in spiritual authors: (1) *Nilus (Ad Magnam 27, PG 79, 1004) defines prayer as a harpagē, "a rapture of the spirit and a total ecstasy outside the sensible." The intellect must forget, but only that which does not concern God. For *Syriac authors, ecstasy seems to be equated with moral purity, which results in a prayer without distractions. (2) The ecstasy of *Evagrius is more radical, requiring an "infinite ignorance" of all partial notions so that the intellect may become pure light ("light-mysticism"): it is not ecstatic, however, but "catastatic"—to see God is something natural to the intellect. (3) "Darkness-mysticism" is ecstatic in the true sense: *Gregory of Nyssa distinguishes three degrees of knowledge of God: (a) in light, (b) in cloud, (c) in darkness. In the third degree, the intellect recognizes its incapacity to see God-Love, it goes out of itself (ek-stasis), and the person is raised to God on the "wings of love."

DSp II, 1862-1885, IV, 2, 2045ff.; H. Crouzel, Origène et la "connaissance mystique," Paris-Bruges 1961; T. Špidlík, La spiritualité de l'Orient chrétien. Manuel systématique: OCA 206, Rome 1978, 327ff.; bibl. p. 386ff.; I. Couliano, Esperienza dell'estasi dall'ellenismo al Medioevo, Bari 1986; Ph. Savvopoulos, Ekstatische Person als Bildungsziel bei Johannes Klimakos. Ein Beitrag zur griechischorthodoxen Pädagogik, Frankfurt 1986; B. McGinn, The Foundation of Mysticism, New York 1991, vol. I, passim (see index pp. 490-491); Dizionario di mistica, eds. L. Borriello et al., Vatican City 1998, 477-479.

T. Špidlík

EDESSA (Syriac Urhây, Arabic ar-Ruhâ, now Urfa in Turkey)
I. History - II. Archaeology.

I. History. Founded in 304 BC by Seleucus I, Edessa enters history only in 132 BC, when the Seleucids, retreating westward over the Euphrates, abandoned Mesopotamia to the Parthians. It was then that the kingdom of *Osroene was established, with Edessa as capital. The representatives of the dynasties that succeeded each other in this kingdom over some 375 years (132 BC–AD 244) were mostly Nabatean Arabs or Parthians. The region's population, however, was of varied origin: mixed with native Arameans were Nabatean Arabs, Parthians, descendents of Macedonian colonists, Persians and Jews. This ethnic diversity ensured the coexistence of different religious currents in the paganism of Edessa: alongside Babylonian divinities like Nabu and Baal were venerated the goddess Atargatis and the god Hadas of Harran, and all the gods of the pantheon of the desert Arabs. Castration in honor of Atargatis, goddess of fertility, was widely practiced; Chaldaean astrology was much in vogue. Moreover, Edessa's medicinal springs gave it the prestige of a center of miraculous cures.

Origins of Christianity. The Syriac work known as Doctrina Addai attributes the evangelization of Edessa to *Addai (or Addaeus), a disciple sent by Jesus himself: Addai converts and baptizes King *Abgar V Uchama ("the Black"). *Eusebius of Caesarea relates this episode and mentions an exchange of letters between Jesus and Abgar, to which he attributes historical value (HE I, 13; II, 1,6-7). This text, likely legendary, goes back to the late 4th or early 5th c. and reflects the viewpoint of orthodox Christianity at the time of *Ephrem the Syrian (d. 373). The Armenian church took up this legend in order to derive its origin from the apostles. What is certain is that Edessa, given its position on the silk route, was evangelized very early. Syrian Christianity recruited its first followers among the Jewish communities of *Adiabene, numerous at that time in that kingdom, whose dynasty had, since its rulers' conversion to Judaism, long maintained close relations with *Palestine. So Christianity seems to have begun its spread into Osroene from the east, rather than from Palestine. This hypothesis is strengthened by the fact that the Syriac version of the OT, known as *Peshitta (the "Simple"), seems to have originated among the Jews of Edessa.

The first historical document attesting a Christian presence in the region of Edessa is the epitaph of *Abercius (second half of 2nd c.). Eusebius (HE V,23,4) mentions the bishops of Osroene who, toward the end of the 2nd c., sent the other churches a letter expounding their point of view on the question of *Easter. But the most important document remains the *Chronicle of Edessa, a 6th-c. compilation based on much older archival documents. The work starts with the flood that struck Edessa in AD 201 and particularly damaged the Christian church. The only important earlier events, mentioned after the account of this catastrophe, are the birth of Christ, the apostasy of *Marcion in 138 and the birth of *Bardesanes in 154. The birth of *Mani in 240 is also noted, but there is nowhere any mention of the conversion of the king of Edessa. At present, the conversion of Abgar IX the Great is no longer considered historically proven. Only one fact is certain: at the beginning of the 3rd c., the church of Edessa was linked to the see of *Antioch; it was to Antioch that *Palut went to receive episcopal consecration from the hands of *Serapion. Soon after, in 216, Osroene was annexed by the Roman Empire.

Despite Edessa's links with Antioch, local Christianity continued to show a great variety of forms. Edessa's cultural and religious milieu was fertile ground for the birth of a multitude of sects, more or less *gnostic. Works like the Odes of Solomon (early 2nd c.), the Gospel of Thomas (mid 2nd c.), *Bardesanes's Book of the Laws of the Countries and *Tatian's Address to the Greeks (second half of 2nd c.) were composed, even if not all of them, at Edessa, where they enjoyed great popularity. Tatian's Diatessaron shows signs of the author's *encratism. The start of the 3rd c. saw an increase in *Marcionite influence and the appearance of the Acts of Thomas.

It is evident that the church of Edessa too had its martyrs. Leaving aside the legendary account of the martyrdom of Sharbil, Babai and Barsamya, we have the account of the martyrdom of Shemona, Gurya and Habib (309–310), a document whose historical authenticity has been fully ascertained. With these the church of Edessa truly enters history. Bishop Qôna, who began to build the cathedral of Edessa probably in 313, is the first of an episcopal list with no significant gaps. His second successor, Aithalla, attended the Council of *Nicaea in 325. The most important figure of the church of Edessa in the second half of the 4th c. was St. Ephrem. Born ca. 306 at *Nisibis, he spent most of his life in that city. In 363 the Romans ceded Nisibis to the Persians and (that year or the next) Ephrem fled to Edessa, where he died in 373, after having incessantly fought the many heretical sects still flourishing at the time. He was the true founder of the School of the Persians, so called because of the great number of young men who left Persia to become the great Doctor's disciples. At Ephrem's death, the Arian emperor *Valens exiled the orthodox clergy and people; when Valens died in 378, the exiles were able to return to Edessa.

The 5th c. was marked by the episcopate of *Rabbula (412–435), who set himself up as an intransigent defender of Catholic orthodoxy against *Nestorianism and the gnostic sects: he cast Nestorius's followers out of the School of the Persians. But under his successor *Ibas (or Hiba), Nestorianism made such progress at Edessa that in 489 Bishop *Cyrus, with *Philoxenus of Mabbug (d. 522), obtained the closure of the School from the emperor *Zeno. Expelled from Edessa, teachers and disciples transferred their school to Nisibis, which thus became the center from which Nestorianism spread into Persia and as far as China. The final separation between the East and West Syrian churches goes back to this time.

The 6th c. saw the triumph of *monophysitism at Edessa: in 541 *Jacob Baradeus, founder of the *Jacobite Church, became bishop of Edessa and spent his whole life converting Asia Minor, Syria and *Mesopotamia to monophysitism. In 609 *Chosroes II took possession of Edessa, deported the Jacobite Christians en masse and imposed a Nestorian bishop on the city. Between 622 and 627 *Heraclius inflicted a series of defeats on Chosroes, who was assassinated by his son in 628. Soon after, the Muslim Arabs put an end to the rivalry between the Persian and Roman empires. On 20 August 636, at the battle of Yarmuk, Syria fell into their hands; in 637 they penetrated Mesopotamia, and in 639 Edessa fell into their power. It was then that the city lost all its political importance, and on the religious plane too its role was exhausted.

There are Christian archaeological remains, but only a few inscriptions.

EC 5, 72-75; RAC 4, 552-597; R. Duval, Histoire politique, religieuse et littérature d'Édesse jusqu'à la première croisade, Paris 1892; Ortiz de Urbina 13-14, 44, 193-194, 206; A.F.J. Klijn, Edessa, die Stadt des Apostels Thomas, Neukirchen 1965; G.G. Blum, Rabbula von Edessa: CSCO 300 Subs. 34; J.B. Segal, Edessa "The blessed City," Oxford 1970; H.J.W. Drijvers, Cults and Beliefs at Edessa, Leiden 1980; (compte-rendu de A. de Halleux in LM 94 [1981] 205-208); R. Devreesse, Le Patriarcat d'Antioche depuis la paix de l'Église jusqu'à la conquête arabe, Paris 1945; J. Teixidor, Les derniers rois d'Édesse d'après deux nouveaux documents syriaques: ZPE 76 (1989) 219-222; Handbuch der Orientalistik. 1, Nahe und Mittlere Osten, 42, Old Syriac Inscriptions of Edessa and Osrhoene, texts, translations and commentary by H.J.W. Drijvers and J.F. Healy, Leiden 1999; I. Ramelli, Edessa e i Romani fra Augusto e i Severi: aspetti del regno di Abgar V e di Abgar IX: Aevum 73 (1999) 107-143; T. Gnoli, Roma, Edessa e Palmira nel III sec. d.C.: problemi istituzionali: uno studio sui papiri dell'Eufrate, Pisa 2001; M. Amerise, La scrittura e l'immagine nella cultura tardoantica: il caso di Abgar di Edessa: OCP 67 (2001) 437-445; S.K. Ross, Roman Edessa: Politics and Culture on the Eastern Fringes of the Roman Empire, 114–242, London - New York 2001 (A. Camplani and T. Gnoli in: Mediterraneo Antico 4 [2001] 41-68).

R. Lavenant

II. Archaeology. According to the Doctrine of Addai, a portrait of Jesus was painted at Edessa for the king Abgar. This seems to be something different from the acheiropoiētos spoken of by *Evagrius (HE 4,17), held in great esteem for having saved the city from the siege of Chosroes (544); it was later taken to *Constantinople. The *Chronicle of Edessa (CSCO SS Syri I, 1903, 1-13; II, 1-11) lists numerous Christian buildings, including the church of St. Thomas visited by *Egeria in ca. 380. The cathedral was built between 312 and 323 near the springs at the foot of the town; destroyed by a flood, it was rebuilt by the emperor *Justinian. It was described by a liturgical hymn, sung during its consecration. There were also many Christian churches of various confessions (*Nestorian, *monophysite, *Maronite); nothing remains of any of these buildings. Many mosaic floors have been discovered, but so far no Christian subjects. The same goes for sculpture. Only some inscriptions attest local Christianity (Devreesse, Patriarcat d'Antioche, 293-294).

R. Devreesse, Le Patriarcat d'Antioche depuis la paix de l'Eglise jusqu'à la conquête arabe, Paris 1945; K.E. McVey, The Domed Church as Microcosm: Literary Roots of an Architectural Symbol: DOP 37 (1983) 91-121; A. Cameron, The History of the Image of Edessa: The Telling of a Story, in Okeanos, Essays Presented to I. Ševčenko, Cambridge, MA, 1984, 80-94; H.J.W. Drijvers, East of Antioch. Studies in Early Syriac Christianity, London 1984; T.A. Sinclair, Eastern Turkey. An Architectural and Archaeological Survey, IV, London 1990, 1-28; EAM 5, 662-663; C. Jullien - F. Jullien, Apôtres des confins. Processus missionaires chrétiennes dans l'Empire perse, Bures-sur-Yvette 2002 (see index).

B. Bagatti

EDICT of MILAN. Name wrongly given to the text, cited by *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE X, 5) and *Lactantius (De mort. persec. 48), of a letter written to the provincial governors in 313 by the two emperors *Constantine I and *Licinius, who had met at *Milan after Constantine's victory over the usurper *Maxentius. The document recognized freedom of worship for Christians and marked a decisive step forward from *Galerius's edict of 311, which merely ended the anti-Christian *persecutions for reasons of clemency and political opportunity; the text also prescribed restitution of goods previously confiscated from Christian communities (corpori Christianorum), thus sanctioning their existence as lawful institutions. Modern criticism has considerably reduced the importance attributed for centuries both to the so-called Edict and to Constantine's personal initiative in favor of Christian worship.

O. Seeck, Das sogennante Edikt von Mailand: ZKG 12 (1891) 381ff. (the preserved text is not an edict); H. Grégoire, La conversion de Costantin: Byzantion 7 (1932) 648ff. (the document was not issued at Milan, but at Nicomedia); J.-R. Palanque, A propos du prétendu Edit de Milan: ibid. 10 (1935) 607ff. (against an excessive devaluation of Constantine's initiative); T. Christensen, The so-called Edict of Milan: CM 35 (1984) 129-175; G. Lombardi, L'editto di Milano del 313 e la laicità dello Stato: SDHI 50 (1984) 1-60; Ch. Delvoye, Encore "l'édit de Milan," in Studi G. Bovini, Ravenna 1989, 195-201; J. Rist, Die Mailänder Vereinbarung von 313: Staatsreligion versus Religionsfreiheit: SP 34 (2001) 217-223.

M. Forlin Patrucco

EGBERT (678–766). Born in 678 of a noble Northumbrian family, Egbert received a monastic education in the schools of *Ireland. After having been both a disciple and friend of *Bede, he became archbishop of *York (ca. 732) and until his death in 766 worked actively to reorganize the English church.

He received two letters, one from *Boniface (Ep. 38, PL 89, 736-738), who thanks him for some manuscripts, and another from Bede (Ep. 2, PL 94, 657-668), who exhorts him to personal sanctity and to the carrying out of a large-scale work of Christian evangelization. It seems that Egbert wrote the Dialogus Ecclesiasticae Institutiones, the Ep. ad Uuynfridum (Letter to Boniface) and an Anglo-Saxon penitential.

A.W. Haddan - W. Stubbs (eds.), Eccl. Doc., Oxford 1878, 3, 403-413, 416-431; M. Tangl (ed.), MGH, Ep. I, Berlin 1916, 18-21; A.J. Frantzen, The Significance of the Frankish Penitentials: Journal of Ecclesiastical History 30 (1979) 409-431; Id., The Literature of Penance in Anglo-Saxon England, New Brunswick 1983, 69-78, 82-83; P. Sims Williams, An Unpublished Seventh- or Eighth-Century Anglo-Latin Letter in Boulogne-sur-Mer MS 74 (82): Medium Aevum 48 (1979) 1-22; J.-P. Bouhot, Les pénitentiels attribués à Bède le Vénérable et à Egbert d'York: RHT 16 (1986) 141-169.

P. Marone

EGERIA (d. after 385). A rich and educated noblewoman, perhaps a native of *Gallaecia in Spain or S *Gaul; she was part of a circle of women united by religious interests, or perhaps a nun with an important position in her community. The name Egeria—less precisely Aetheria—is generally accepted today (based on a letter of the Galician hermit *Valerius), but her first editors, e.g., Gamurrini and Geyer, thought to identify her with *Sylvia, the prefect *Rufinus's sister. She wrote a famous and interesting summary of a *pilgrimage she took, Itinerarium or Peregrinatio ad loca santa. In this diary, in the form of letters to her "sisters," in the first part she describes the journey made from 381–384 (according to Devos's careful research) from *Sinai to *Jerusalem, then to Mt. Nebo in Idumea, the land of Job, and finally to *Mesopotamia, from *Antioch to *Edessa and Harran and then the return to *Constantinople via the sanctuaries of *Thecla at Seleucia in Isauria and of Euphemia, making the ca. 5000-km (3100-mi) trip on foot or by carriage; in the second part she describes the liturgy of Jerusalem. The only manuscript, originally from Montecassino and preserved at Arezzo, was discovered by Gamurrini in 1884 and published in 1887; the work was mutilated at the beginning and end, and had two lacunae. Egeria was fascinated more by the religious aspect of what she saw than by natural wonders or historical curiosities: she lingered over the biblical places marked by the presence of God, reports legends and memories linked to the great figures of the history of Israel or of early Christianity, tells us of liturgical celebrations and religious feasts, and of *catechesis before and after *baptism; she informs us of ecclesiastical organization and monastic life. The work is a source of inestimable value on all these points. The Itinerarium describes the churches of Jerusalem and its surroundings (Holy Sepulchre, Zion, Mount of Olives, *Bethlehem, Bethany), and provides information on the *liturgical year and its feasts (*Epiphany, *Lent, and esp. Holy Week and *Easter at Jerusalem).

Egeria met various monks in Sinai, *Egypt, *Syria and Mesopotamia; some accompanied her, and she relates her detailed questioning of them; she mentions some virgins living at Jerusalem. The monasteries appear to have been hermitages grouped around a church where a priest officiated; Egeria takes pleasure in emphasizing her participation in the *Eucharist whenever she has the opportunity; she communicates well the increase of collective emotion during the celebrations of Holy Week in the places that were mute witnesses of Christ's passion. At Jerusalem, since people came from various regions and languages (Greek, Syriac, Latin), there was always someone to translate from one language to another, so all could understand. With simple but effective words, Egeria outlines for us almost the "model" of the Christian pilgrimage: "This was our habit: every time we succeeded in reaching the desired place, we would first of all say a prayer, then read the relative passage taken from the Bible, then recite an appropriate psalm and finally conclude with a *prayer" (Pilgrimage 10,7). Thus the ancient pilgrimage expressed itself above all as an itinerary of *faith and worship, where prayer and the Eucharist played an essential role. The style is lively and personal, narrative and detailed, vibrant with enthusiasm. Egeria's language is spoken Latin, but includes reflections of classical culture and numerous Grecisms (Greek terms transliterated into Latin): basically a language dependent on Christian authors.

Bibliography, Lexicons, Concordances: M. Starowieyski, Bibliographia Egeriana: Augustinianum 19 (1979) 297-318; P. Devos, Egeriana: AB 101 (1983) 43-70; 105 (1987) 159-166 and 415-424; 109 (1991) 363-381; 112 (1994) 242-254; W. van Oorde, Lexicon Aetherianum, Amsterdam 1930; D.R Blackman - G.G. Betts, Concordantia in Itinerarium Egeriae, Hildesheim 1989.

Editions: CPL 2325; G.F. Gamurrini, 1887; P. Geyer: CSEL 39 (1898) 37-101 [= PLS 1, 1045-1092]; H. Pétré: SC 19 (1948); E. Franceschini - R. Weber: CCL 175 (1965) 37-90 (bibl.); P. Maraval: SC 296 (1982); N. Natalucci: BPat 17 (1991); G.-D. Thönnes: FC 20 (1995). It. tr.: C. Zoppoli, Turin 1966; P. Siniscalco - L. Scarampi (CTP 48), Rome 1985, [2]1992; N. Natalucci (BPat 17), Florence 1991 and Bologna 1999; E. Giannarelli, Milan 1992.

Studies: F. Lofstedt, Philologischer Kommentar zur Peregrinatio

Aeteriae, Uppsala 1911; DACL 5/1 (1922) 552-584; [see also 7/2 (1927) 2304-2392; 14/1 (1939) 92-110]; DHGE 15 (1963) 1-5; A.A.R. Bastiaensen, Observations sur le vocabulaire liturgique dans l'Itinéraire d'Egérie (Diss.) Nijmegen 1962; P. Devos, La date du voyage d'Egérie: AB 85 (1967) 165-194; Id., Egérie: AB 86 (1968) 87-108; C. Milani, I grecismi nell'Itinerarium Egeriae: Aevum 43 (1969) 200-234; C. Mohrmann, Egérie et le monachisme: Misc. Dekkers, Bruges 1975, 163-180; Patrologia 3 (1978) 529-532 (ample bibl.); E. Lamirande, La pèlerine Égérie: une grande dame de l'antiquité chrétienne: Église et Théologie 15 (1984) 259-291; TRE 16 (1987) 621-622 [s.v. Jerusalem, IV]; V. Väänänen, Le Journal-Épitre d'Égérie (Itinerarium Égeriae): Étude linguistique, Helsinki 1987; H. Sivan, Who Was Egeria? Piety and Pilgrimage in the Age of Gratian: HTR 81 (1988) 59-72; Var. aus., Atti del convegno internazionale sulla Peregrinatio Egeriae (Arezzo 23-25 ottobre 1987), Città di Castello 1990; LTK³ 3, 464.

M. Maritano

EGYPT

I. Origins of Christianity - II. Liturgy - III. Archaeology.
Ancient Egypt, in N-E Africa, extended along the Nile valley as far as the first cataract (Philae/Aswan), including part of the Libyan and Arabian deserts. The pharaohs of the middle kingdom, the Ptolemys and the Roman emperors pushed its S borders beyond the second cataract. The foundation of the colony of Naucratis in 700 BC on the Canopic branch of the Nile by the Milesians begins the history of Greek Egypt which, after its conquest by Alexander the Great, became a stable kingdom under the Ptolemaic dynasty until the Roman conquest of 30 BC. Egypt is a "gift of the Nile" (Hecataeus of Miletus 550-490 BC). The existence of the great river has left profound marks on the topography, economic and political history, and even the religious life of the Egyptian people. In this singular context we can glimpse the development of so-called lines of force that nourished the sociocultural originality of Greco-Roman Egypt even in its encounter with Christianity.

I. Origins of Christianity. On the origin of Christianity in Egypt we possess only scanty and uncertain evidence. The Acts of the Apostles (18:24-25) speak of the arrival at *Ephesus of a certain Apollos, an Alexandrian Jew "instructed in the way of the Lord" who "taught with exactness the things regarding Jesus," but who "knew only the baptism of John." Nevertheless there is nothing in the text, which appears in all the manuscripts except one (the famous Codex Bezae), that authorizes us to assert that this Apollos had come to know Christianity in his native city, and not in some other city in the eastern part of the Roman Empire.

An ancient tradition, which the Coptic Church still recognizes as valid, attributed the beginnings of the preaching of the Good News in Egypt and the foundation of the Christian community of *Alexandria to *Mark the evangelist. This is attested by *Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History (II, 16, 1), but he introduces the information regarding Mark with "they say," making it clear that he was not entirely certain this was true. In *Jerome's Latin translation-revision of Eusebius's Chronicle, the following information appears in the year 43: "Mark the evangelist, Peter's interpreter (interpres), announced Christ to Egypt and at Alexandria." Another passage of the Ecclesiastical History (II, 24) says that Annianus succeeded Mark as leader of the church of Alexandria; and in the Latin version of the Chronicle, in the year 62, we read: "First after Mark the evangelist, Annianus was ordained bishop of the Alexandrian church; he led it for 22 years." Neither Eusebius nor Jerome say that Mark died a martyr; this is likely a legend that sprung up later.

Judgment is divided among modern scholars on the value of the tradition that makes Mark the founder of the Alexandrian Christian community. Many have observed that no hint of this is found in the many works preserved by two important Alexandrian writers, *Clement and *Origen, who certainly would have mentioned it in several places if they had known of it. Nor is there any mention in other 2nd- and 3rd-c. Christian authors where we might expect it, e.g., *Irenaeus of Lyons (ca. 140–202). In 1973, however, Morton Smith published a text that presents itself as an excerptum "from the letters of the most holy Clement, author of the Stromateis" in which it is said, among other things, that Mark, having written his gospel at Rome, went to Alexandria after Peter's death and there wrote a "more spiritual Gospel . . . [for] those who are being initiated into the great mysteries." According to the editor this is an authentic letter, previously unknown, of Clement of Alexandria. What it says of Mark would correlate to a tradition known for some time, according to which a "secret" gospel, written by Mark, was in the possession of the *Carpocratians, a gnostic sect. Smith's publication of the text led to a lively debate over its attribution to Clement. Oden (2007) presents literary, archaeological and circumstantial evidence of Mark's life and death in Alexandria.

There is no doubt, however, that a Christian community was begun at Alexandria already in apostolic times. The city's Jewish component—the natural environment for the spread of Christianity during the first generations—was very numerous, and religious ferment, born of a crisis of the traditional form of the Jewish religion and manifest in Jewish literary and philosophical output at Alexandria, favored the spread of the new faith. Relations between the Alexandrian Diaspora and *Palestine were ongoing and intensive.

For the 2nd c., the primary evidence we have are the list of the bishops of Alexandria transmitted by Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History (probably based on the list compiled by the chronographer Sextus *Julius Africanus, and for the most part reliable), biblical papyri (found outside Alexandria) and the information provided by Clement of Alexandria (ca. 150–215). The scarcity of evidence on Christianity at Alexandria and in Egypt for the hundred years between the beginning of its spread and the time in which Clement wrote has preoccupied many scholars, leading them to suppose that the development of the Egyptian church was interrupted at a certain point and refounded midway or near the end of the 2nd c. These hypothetical events are explained in two ways: either that the Jewish character of the Christian communities of Egypt had exposed them to repression during and after the insurrection of Egyptian Jews (115–117), or that, because of the strong gnostic influences among the Christians of the first generations, the Egyptian church of the second half of the 2nd c. did not adequately preserve its records. These two explanations are not necessarily mutually exclusive—in fact, a variety of religious options could have coexisted within the Egyptian church. These are, nonetheless, hypotheses. It is possible that the relative lack of evidence is merely by chance or by centuries of persecution, war or intentional destruction.

Beginning from the last decades of the 2nd c. with Clement of Alexandria, Christianization made rapid progress in Egypt, and not just at Alexandria. There are sure indications of this; e.g., the discovery of papyri containing biblical texts or documents attesting the presence of Christians in various places in Egypt, including even Upper Egypt. The persecutions ordered by *Decius, *Valerian and *Diocletian did not slow the pace of development of the Christian communities.

Despite the increase in the number of Christian communities, the process of formation of a network of bishoprics took place later in Egypt than elsewhere. A work written by an orthodox patriarch of Alexandria, Eutychius (10th c.), informs us that the first to ordain bishops for Egypt was *Demetrius (bishop of Alexandria, 189–231), who ordained three. His successor *Heraclas (231–247) continued this work, ordaining twenty bishops. Eutychius says nothing precise about these bishops' field of activity, and names no city. By the time of *Dionysius (bishop of Alexandria, 248–264/265), Egypt had powerful bishop. This is attested by two letters of Dionysius, referred to textually by Eusebius (HE VII, 21, 2; 24, 1): the only Egyptian bishops mentioned here, Nepos and Hierax, bear the strange title of ἐπίσκοπος τῶν κατ' Αἴγυπτον, "bishop of the lands (or: of the things?) of Egypt."

*Alexander, bishop of Alexandria from 312–328, wrote in a letter that a synod called by him and which had condemned *Arius, had gathered "almost 100" bishops; this number also appears in letters of *Athanasius. The list of the names of bishops that results from Annik Martin's detailed research, however, gives a more modest number for the first quarter of the 4th c.: 57 bishoprics in Egypt, 16 in *Libya and the *Pentapolis. In the following decades of the 4th c. the number of bishoprics grew continually. Toward the end of the century there are 75 bishoprics in Egypt, 23 in Libya and the Pentapolis. At that time, every Egyptian town with the status of city had a bishop. Even some larger towns whose administrative status was nonetheless a village had, for various reasons, their own bishop. At Alexandria and in Upper Egypt, the presbyters had a higher position than in the churches of other countries. There is a well-attested tradition that, up to the time of Demetrius and Heraclas, the bishops at Alexandria were elected by the Alexandrian presbyters from within their own group (this practice may have endured even longer, up to the time of Dionysius).

In the 4th c., when the number of Christians in Egypt increased rapidly, especially (and this is a peculiar trait of the Egyptian Christianity of that time) in the villages, a network of autonomous churches, led by presbyters, was formed—churches that in some way can be compared to parishes.

A characteristic trait of the Egyptian church was the dominant role of the bishop of Alexandria. The Alexandrian episcopate had under it the bishoprics of Libya (we do not know when this relationship of dependence was established; in canon 6 of the Council of *Nicaea, thus in a text of 325, it is said that this relationship conforms to "an ancient practice") and all of the Egyptian bishoprics. The Alexandrian episcopate prevented the formation of ecclesiastical metropolises in Egypt, and imposed on all the Egyptian bishoprics the obligation to send their candidates to Alexandria to receive episcopal ordination. Beginning with Dionysius (mentioned above), the bishop of Alexandria sent an *Easter letter to all the Egyptian bishops, in which he announced the date of the following Easter.

The Christian communities of Egypt, at least from the 3rd c. (we know too little for the 2nd c.), were composed of both Greek- and Egyptian-speakers (i.e., what we traditionally call Coptic; the first translations of biblical texts into Coptic were made in the 3rd c.). There is no reason to think that the division between Christians and pagans coincided with the division between Coptic- and Greek-speaking citizens. The religious crisis that underlay the rapid spread of Christianity involved all social groups.

Christianity did not divide, and indeed united, the different social groups. Even the clear distinction between Alexandria and Egypt (recall the expression "Alexandria in Egypt") no longer had meaning when considering Christian Alexandria. Considering what we now know of the culture of the 3rd and 4th c., we must admit that there is no basis to oppose—as scholars often do—Alexandria to Egypt. In the Alexandrian church there was place not only for the cultural élite (for thinkers such as *Pantaenus, Clement, Origen, Dionysius of Alexandria), but also for ordinary folk, Greek- or Coptic-speaking. And conversely, the Christian communities of Egypt were not made up only of peasants and artisans, to whom the theological subtleties of the Alexandrian masters were inaccessible and irrelevant. Many cities of the Delta and of the Nile valley had a significant level of cultural life, and among its participants were some who were interested in theology.

Scholars disagree as to when Christians became the majority in Egypt's population: at the time of Constantine (R.S. Bagnall)? Toward the end of the 4th c. (E. Wipszycka)? It is certain, however, that in the 5th c. pagans were decidely in the minority. In some towns, however, they were strong enough to be able to practice their cult, which had been prohibited by the imperial authorities. Among others, groups of monks sometimes took part—violently—in the fight against pagans who gathered around certain ancient sanctuaries.

A. Heckel, Die Kirche von Ägypten. Ihre Anfänge, ihre Organisation und ihre Entwicklung, diss., Strassburg 1918; E.A. Judge - S.R. Pickering, Papyrus Documentation of Church and Community in Egypt to the Mid-Fourth Century: JbAC 20 (1977) 47-71; G.H.R. Horsley, New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity. I: A Review of Greek Inscriptions and Papyri Published in 1976, North Ryde, Australia 1981, followed in the subsequent years by similar volumes, beginning with vol. V, eds. S.R. Llewelyn and R.A. Kearsley; B.A. Pearson - J.E. Goehring (eds.), The Roots of Egyptian Christianity, Philadelphia 1986; R.S. Bagnall, Egypt in Late Antiquity, Princeton, NJ 1993; E. Wipszycka, Études sur le christianisme dans l'Égypte de l'antiquité tardive, Rome 1996; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IVe siècle (328-373), École Française de Rome 1996; A. Camplani (ed.), L'Egitto cristiano. Aspetti e problemi in età tardo-antica, Rome 1997; M. Naldini, Il cristianesimo in Egitto. Lettere private nei papiri dei secoli II-IV, Fiesole [2]1998; E. Wipszycka, Les papyrus documentaires concernant l'Église d'avant le tournant constantinien. Un bilan des vingt dernières années, in Atti del XXII Congresso Internazionale di Papirologia, Florence 2001, 1307-1330; A. Jakab, Ecclesia alexandrina. Evolution sociale et institutions du christianisme alexandrin (IIe-IIIe siècles), Bern 2001; T.C. Oden, The African Memory of Mark, Downers Grove IL 2011.

E. Wipszycka

II. Liturgy. The surviving liturgical documents from Egypt of the patristic era are rare and fragmentary due to the literary devastations of the Roman persecutions and the Arab conquest. The information we can draw from the works of the Alexandrian fathers or from hagiography is insufficient to reconstruct how the liturgy might have been celebrated in these regions. The diligent investigations whose results F.E. Brightman has brought together (Liturgies Eastern and Western I, 1896, Appendix J, 504-509) demonstrate this clearly, even for the liturgy of the *Eucharist with which we are better acquainted. It seems that, after the 5th c. at least, this liturgy was heavily influenced by Antiochene customs, esp. through the Apostolic Constitutions. This influence of the Syrian metropolis was reinforced when, from 451, the church of Egypt more decisively asserted its autonomy from *Constantinople, and above all from the time of the Arab conquest when Patriarch *Benjamin (626–665) reorganized the liturgy, generalizing the use of the Egyptian (Coptic) language. The decrees of the reforming patriarchs of the 11th and 13th c., the great liturgical and canonical compilations of the 13th-14th c., and finally the Ordinatio of Patriarch Gabriel V (1409–1427) definitively fixed these liturgical traditions whose texts, apart from rare fragments, survive only in MSS of that era. So, for the period that concerns us, we have only fragments that escaped the destruction and whose origin and even meaning remain mostly uncertain.

1. Fragments of anaphorae: (a) The most important is Papyrus gr. 254 of Strasbourg University Library (ed. M. Andrieu - P. Collomp: RSR 1928, 489-515), datable to the 4th-5th c. This text preserves the formulary of thanksgiving (lines 1-2 are missing) and part of the intercessions. (b) A fragment, in very poor condition, preserved in the British Museum (Pap. 2037 E.F.) on 6th-7th-c. parchment, identified by G. Mercati (Aegyptus 30 [1950] 3-7), gives a very similar text which may allow us to supplement the former by some words. (c) Much more important, a 6th-c.-parchment folio preserved in the John Rylands Library, Manchester (Pap. Gr. Lat. 465), gives a great deal of the anaphora of St. Mark, from after the postsanctus to the end of the *epiclesis. These three texts allow us to reconstruct the greater part of the anaphora of St. Mark in a form quite close to that preserved in the Coptic version called "of St. Cyril," while the Greek text has only come down to us in six late (12th-16th c.) MSS of *Melkite origin, which transmit it in a more or less deeply Byzantinized recension. Other fragments of anaphorae have been published by Th. Lefort (Coptica Lovaniensia, Muséon 1940, 22-24 and 26) and by E. Lanne (Le Grand Euchologe du Monastère Blanc: PO 28, 2) in a Sahidic Coptic version. Most of them seem to be translated from Greek. Particular attention has been paid to three fragmentary folios from Deir-Balizeh in the Guizeh region, preserved in the Bodleian, Oxford (ms. Gr. Lit. d. 2-4, P), first published by P. de Puniet (RBen 1909, 34-51, reprinted in Cabrol-Leclercq: Reliquiae liturgicae vetustissimae, Monum. Lit. I, 2; CLXIV-CLXV) and subsequently with an abundant philological and liturgical commentary by Dom B. Capelle (C.H. Roberts - D.B. Capelle, An early euchologium. The Dêr-Balizeh papyrus enlarged and reedited: Bibl. du Muséon 23, Louvain 1949). Recently J. Van Haelst proposed a new reconstruction, modifying the order of the folios (Bibl. Ephem. Theol. Lov. XXVII [1970] 201-212).

2. Finally we should point out that numerous texts of liturgical interest have been transmitted by papyri, ostraka or in the form of inscriptions and graffiti. Besides those published in Monumenta Liturgiae I e II, a rich collection can be found in the article Papyrus of the DACL, and in C. Wessely, Les plus anciens monuments du christianisme écrits sur papyrus: PO IV, 2 and XVIII, 3; but, in many cases, the origin and destination remain uncertain.

3. The euchologion of Serapion. Of exceptional importance is the collection of 31 liturgical prayers preserved in an 11th-c. MS on Mt. Athos (Athos Lavra 149) that contains several texts attributed to Bishop *Serapion of Thmuis, a friend of St. *Athanasius who dedicated his four Letters on the Holy Spirit to him. First published at Kiev in 1894 by A. Dmitrievsij, it attracted scholarly attention thanks to two simultaneous editions by G. Wobbermin (TU, N.F. II, 3) and F.E. Brightman (JTS October 1899 and January 1900), soon followed by F.X. Funk's reconstruction (Didascalia et Constitutiones apostolorum II, Paderborn 1905, 158-203). The collection's homogeneity, defended by Brightman from the start, has never been doubted; likewise, attempts have been made to justify the arrangement of the various parts, at first sight rather strange, despite the fact that Brightman—followed by Funk—proposed a more logical reconstuction. The authenticity of the attribution of the whole to Serapion of Thmuis was also long undisputed, despite the fact that his name appears only in the title of the anaphora (I) and of the prayer for the blessing of the oils (XV). But careful examination of the anaphora, the only passage that has been studied closely, led Dom B. Botte to question this attribution. Some passages seemed to him incompatible with Serapion's strictly Nicene theology and betrayed an Arianizing attitude both in the doctrine of the Logos and, still more, in that of the *Holy Spirit (B. Botte, L'euchologe de Sérapion est-il authentique?: OrChr 48 [1964] 50-56)—difficulties that had not been considered by D.B. Capelle, L'anaphore de Sérapion, essai d'exégèse: Muséon 59 (1946) 425-443. We may consider the question still open. In any case it is certain that, if the Alexandrian character of the theology and liturgy of these prayers is indubitable, in both these aspects they denote peculiarities that make it hard to recognize them as the habitual liturgy of a church.

G.J. Cuming, The Liturgy of St. Mark, OCA 234, Rome 1990; M.E. Johnson, The Prayers of Sarapion of Thmuis: A Literary Liturgical and Theological Analysis, OCA, Rome 1995; M. Krause, ed. Ägypten in spätantik-christlicher Zeit, Einführung in die koptische Kultur, Wiesbaden 1998; J. Henner, Fragmenta liturgica coptica: Editionen und Kommentar liturgischer Texte der koptischen Kirche des ersten Jahrtausends, Tübingen 2000.

I.H. Dalmais

III. Archaeology

1. Ecclesiastical architecture. While the structure of houses, tombs, baths, military installations and other public buildings was not significantly modified by the advance of Christianity, two new types of building with particular characteristics appeared: churches and convents, whereas the building of pagan sanctuaries seems to have stopped.

a. General characteristics. Egyptian church architecture, from the time of its oldest known expressions, exists in the context of the Mediterranean architectural tradition. The structure of buildings in the countries of N Africa and the Near East, with the expected canonical partitions, esp. for the basilica, was also obligatory, with the same connotations, in Egypt. There too the most common structure was the three-aisled basilica. The sanctuary was to the E and consisted, as in *Syria, of a central apse with, at the sides, two more rooms assigned to collateral liturgical functions. The naos, the area reserved for the laity, usually had three aisles, rarely five. The side aisles, esp. in Upper Egypt, were often connected by two other small aisles on the W and E sides, thus forming a quadripartite ambulatory. This typically Egyptian peculiarity occurs in basilicas nowhere else. Otherwise, the only typically Egyptian feature is the general scheme of the architectural layout, which is given a cubic, compact form resembling those of the old Pharaonic temples. A narthex was added to this compact structure, usually on the W side. An atrium of the type generally found in European churches was unknown here.

b. Development in the 4th and 5th c. 5th-c. churches are rare. The first examples, however, like the church SE of Kellis (Dakhla Oasis) from the first half of the 4th c., are basilicas with quadripartite ambulatory. Inside the larger churches, like the southern church of Antinopolis (P. Grossmann, Vic. Oriente 12 [2000] 269-281, fig. 1) and the oldest church (ca. 336) of the main Pachomian convent of Pbou, today Fa'w al-Qibli (P. Grossmann, Esempi d'arch., 151ff., fig. 1B), the central nave is tripartite, thus forming a larger space and giving the church a quality of having five aisles. All these buildings still have an undeniably provincial character. The same would have been true of most of the churches of this period, now lost. Presumably only in the capital, Alexandria, did monumental buildings exist in the 4th c.

Monumental examples must have existed in the church from the first half of the 5th c., since some buildings built in the mid 5th c. in Hermopolis Magna, Pbou and Suhag are unthinkable without a corresponding model. They are among the best of that period and presuppose a fully developed architectural program, which would later undergo only small modifications. Noteworthy is the complex articulation of the naos, linked with two small transverse aisles and with a narthex on the W side of the church. From here to the naos, passage is assured by at least one door, and usually three. But only in the cathedral of Hermopolis Magna do we find an atrium. All the buildings have a sanctuary with more than one room, with a central space, normally apsed. In front of this is the altar, in a space that extends into the naos and is surrounded by cancelli. Only in monastic churches is the altar situated in the central space of the sanctuary. In the church of the convent of Shenoute near Suhag, the so-called White Convent (U. Monneret de Villard, Sohag I-II; P. Grossmann, Esempi d'arch., 155ff., fig. 3), and in a few other southern churches, the niche has the form of a triconch. Furthermore, some churches—except perhaps the monastic church of Pbou, not yet completely studied—have a matroneum, reached by stairs arranged at various points. The church of Pbou certainly had five aisles, of which the outside ones were conceived as quadrilateral corridors (P. Grossmann, Esempi d'arch., 159). The episcopal church of Hermopolis Magna had a tripartite transept with horseshoe ends (see Wace - Megaw - Skeat, Hermopolis Magna); this form, however, cannot be understood as a triconch. In the last quarter of the 5th c., the transept appears again in the great basilica and pilgrimage center of Abu Mina, the largest church known in Egyptian territory, where the arms of the transverse aisle present a genuine terminus (see P. Grossmann, Abu Mina IX, 212ff.). Since such 5th-c. buildings attest for the sanctuary a program of relatively mature and complex spaces, as in all likelihood can be learned from the width of the space in question, there follows for the smaller buildings of the same period a canonical division of the spaces into three categories. As a rule this consists of a semicircular apse and two adjacent rectangular rooms, at least one of which is directly accessible from the nave. Exceptional cases, in which the adjacent rooms are absent, are thus far known only in the Mediterranean coastal zones. In buildings that possess a presbytery in the form of a triconch, the Γ-shaped side rooms are attached to the lateral conchs. From the 5th c. on, esp. in the Theban area, the two central columns of the E ambulatory of the naos stood out more prominently and were set farther apart, thus forming a second triumphal arch at the front of the apse. The altar was now, except in the churches of the monastic colony of Kellia, almost always placed in front of the apse and was surrounded, as usual, by cancelli. The walls of these churches, esp. of the sanctuary, but also often of the area reserved for the congregation, are furnished with numerous niches, regularly spaced. These account for the sometimes enormous thickness of the walls in most Egyptian churches; they also occur in simpler buildings. Only in the churches of the Mediterranean coastal area, more profoundly influenced, as we know, by imperial architecture, are such lateral niches absent.

c. Principal buildings of the 6th c. In the 6th c. the structure of the basilica remains more or less unvaried. However, the proportions appear more reduced and the design more uniform. No more great complexes were built. In their place were built—esp. in the area around Alexandria—some central-plan buildings which can be assigned to the type of four-lobed buildings that originated in Syria and Asia Minor and which were certainly influenced by them (see P. Grossmann, Abu Mina IX, 222ff.). So far we know two examples: one from Abu Mina and a perfectly circular church at Pelusium (P. Grossmann - M. Fafiz, BSCA 40 [2001] 109-116). Most have three aisles, i.e., a central space and an ambulatory separated from the central space by columns. These buildings can rightly be numbered among the best-known examples of Late Antique architecture in Egypt. There may be a direct model for them in Alexandria. At the same time or a little later, some buildings appear in Upper Egypt supported by four corner pillars (P. Grossmann, Elephantine, II, Mainz 1979, 86ff.). As for their diffusion, they spread out considerably, esp. in the architecture of *Nubia, showing outstanding developments there.

2. Monasteries

a. Cloisters. Already in the early Christian era two radically different systems of monastic life had developed in Egypt: that of the *anchorites, who lived in solitude in the desert, far from human civilization, and that of the *cenobites, who lived in community in the cultivated areas. Their monastic buildings, like their ways of life, were radically different. Egyptian anchorites lived as hermits, or in common with a small number of disciples. Consequently, their dwellings were, up to the Arab period, always isolated huts (κελλία), often at a great distance from each other. In the earliest times they were content with caves dug in rock or with empty tombs, furnished inside in a very primitive way for living requirements. In the 5th and 6th c. the kellia were still small, modest dwellings, but already with more than one room, answering only to the most elementary needs of domestic life. The houses of the monastic colony E of Abu Mina (W. Müller-Wiener - P. Grossmann, Abu Mina IV, 463-468) also comprised a large room in front, for visits and for work, and a small dormitory at the back, also used for recital of daily prayers. Kitchen and toilet were outside. The similar but underground monastic dwelling of Adaima near Isna had a separate oratory (S. Sauneron, Les ermitages). But the large, well-developed dwellings (Coptic manshubi) of the desert, today Wadi'n-Natrun (E. White, Monasteries Natrûn III), and of the laura of Kellia (F. Daumas - A. Guillaumont, Kellia Kom. 519; R. Kasser, Kellia Top.), date at least from the post-Arab period.

The church was always built at a later date and was placed at a central point, though at a great distance from some kellia; some of the more isolated kellia therefore had their own churches. From the 5th c. we know of the construction of a refuge-tower (Arabic gausaq), usually in the vicinity of the church, where the monks would flee in the case of attack (the oldest example is in complex 57,4/18 at Kellia; see M. Egloff, Kellia III [1977], pl. 117). This was a tower of several stories, with strong walls; its upper floor was reached directly by a drawbridge, for reasons of security. But this tower could only be used by those anchorites who lived in the immediate vicinity, if they chose not to flee.

b. Cenobia. Much more developed were the convents of the cenobite monastic movement initiated by St. *Pachomius. In accordance with rule laid down by this monastic father (Monac. graec., 3 ed. Nau, PO IV, 1908, 425ff.), the monks lived in large community complexes, in groups usually of three (ibid. 426) to a cell. The hours of the day were rigorously distributed between work and prayer. Meals were taken in common in a large refectory (ibid. 428). The cenobia were surrounded by a wall, which made a strict separation from the outside world. The entrances, which certainly existed, were strictly watched, and no monk was to leave without the superior's permission. As yet, unfortunately, we possess no archaeological evidence of such structures in any Pachomian convent. But two later attestations do exist. An 8th-c. cenobitic convent (unpublished) discovered by the Egyptian Antiquities Service near Antinopolis has a one-storied building for housing the monks, with a wide corridor in the middle opening onto individual dormitory cells on both sides. Sleeping-places were arranged along the outside wall, each with a small niche in the wall for the occupant's personal effects. The refectories of cenobia were mostly two-aisled rooms. One could sit with one's back to the wall or on benches arranged in a circle (example at Saqqara; see P. Grossmann - H.G. Severin, Jeremiaskloster: MDAI(K) 38 [1982] 162-163). There was not always a table in the middle of the circle of seats, though one is expressly mentioned in Pachomius's rule (Monac. graec., ed. Nau, PO IV, 1908, 429). In convents of this type, too, the church was usually a later addition.

W. de Bock, Matériaux pour servir à l'archéologie de l'Égypte chrétienne, St. Petersburg 1901; C.M. Kaufmann, Die Ausgrabung der Menas Heiligtümer in der Mareotiswüste, I-III, Cairo 1906-1908; Id., Die Menasstadt und das Nationalheiligtum der altchristlichen Ägypter, Leipzig 1910; J.E. Quibell, Excavations at Saqqara, II-IV, Cairo 1908-1912; E. Chassinat, Fouilles à Baouît [MIFAO 17, 1911] without text; J. Clédat, Fouilles à Khirbet el-Flousiyeh: Ann. Serv. arch. de l'Égypte 16 (1916) 6-96; U. Monneret de Villard, Les couvents près de Sohâg, I-II, Milan 1925; H.G.E. White, The Monasteries of the Wâdi'n Natrûn, I-III, New York 1932, [2]1980; F.W. Deichmann, Zum Altägyptischen in der koptischen Baukunst: MDAI(K) 8 (1938) 34-37; U. Monneret de Villard, La basilica cristiana in Egitto, Atti del IV Congr. int. di arch. crist., Vatican City, October 1938 (1940), I, 291-319; J.B. Ward Perkins, The Shrine of St. Menas in the Maryut: PBSR 17 (1946) 26-71; H. Torp, Some Aspects of Early Monastic Architecture: Byzantion 25-27 (1955-57) 513-538; A.J.B. Wace - A.H.S. Megaw - T.C. Skeat, Hermopolis Magna, Ashmunein, Alexandria 1959; K. Wessel, Koptische Kunst, Recklinghausen 1963; P. du Bourguet, Les Coptes, Baden-Baden 1967; W. Müller-Wiener - P. Grossmann, Abu Mina IV: AA (1967) 457-480; F. Daumas - A. Guillaumont, Kellia I (FIFAO 28) Kom 219, Cairo 1969; F. Daumas, Rapport sur l'activité de l'IFAO du Caire au cours des années 1968-1969: CRAI (1969) 496-507; R. Kasser, Kellia II. Topographie, Geneva 1972; S. Sauneron, Les ermitages chrétiens du désert d'Esna, I-IV, Cairo 1972; M. Egloff, Kellia, la poterie copte: quatre siècles d'artisanat et d'échanges en Basse-Egypte. Geneva 1977; P. Grossmann, Eine vergessene frühchristliche Kirche beim Luxor Tempel: MDAI(K) 29 (1973) 167-181; Id., Zur frühchristlichen Baukunst in Ägypten: Enchoria 8 (1978) 135-146; Id., Abu Mina IX: MDAI(K) 36 (1980) 203-227; Id., Esempi d'architettura paleocristiana in Egitto dal V al VII secolo: CCAB 28 (1981) 149-176; H.G. Severin, Zur Südkirche von Bauit: MDAI(K) 33 (1977) 113-124; P. Grossmann - H.G. Severin, Reinigungsarbeiten im Jeremiaskloster bei Saqqara IV: MDAI(K) 38 (1982) 155-193; P. Grossmann - H. Jaritz, Abu Mina X: MDAI(K) 38 (1982) 139-154; R. Kasser et al., EK 8184 I-III (Louvain 1981-1999); I. Clédat, Le monastère de Baouit (MIFAO 111, 1999); G. Haeny - A. Leibundgut, Kellia. Kôm Qouçoût 'Isa '366, Louvain 1999; N.H. Henein - M. Wuttmann, Kellia, l'ermitage copte, QR 195 (MIFAO 41, 2000); P. Grossmann, Christliche Architektur in Ägypten [HdO 1, 62] Leiden 2002; F. Caloment, Contribution à l'archéologie et à l'histoire de l'art "coptes." Autopsie d'une feuille singulière: Journal of Coptic Studies 5 (2003) 115-144.

P. Grossmann

3. Sculpture

a. Present state of studies. Evaluations of so-called Coptic sculpture, in the framework of Late Antique sculpture, are considerably discrepant; as far as value judgments and dates go, the specialized bibliography offers a confused overall picture. Mainly responsible for this situation are certain still-fashionable errors of the old historiography, and the following difficulties: in nearly all the old excavations, to which we owe the most celebrated monuments and complexes (Ahnas/Heracleopolis Magna, Bawit, Saqqara, Bahnasa/Oxyrhynchus), in wrongly evaluating the architecture, the types and characteristics of the sculptures have also been ignored and distorted. In particular we have failed to recognize the sepulchral, and indeed pagan, character of certain architectural complexes and the sculptures that decorated them, and so these complexes have been wrongly interpreted as Christian churches (e.g., in E. Naville's excavations at Ahnas; J.E. Quibell's at Saqqara, esp. dig n. 1823; E. Breccia's at Bahnasa. See H.G. Severin, Scavi, 299-314). Second, we have taken and still take little account of the Egyptian custom of reusing old architectural structures and decorative elements not only in their original use, but also for analogous or even different functions. Hence many buildings with architectural decorations, including church buildings, have been wrongly considered homogeneous units (e.g., Bawit, S church: see H.G. Severin, Süd-Kirche von Bawīt, 113-124; Bawit, N church: see H.G. Severin, Notizen, X-XX; Ashmûnein/Hermopolis Magna, main basilica of S. Jeremiah's monastery: see P. Grossmann - H.G. Severin, Reinigungsarbeiten 4. Bericht, X-XX. Research has thus been conditioned, for decades and up to our own day, by the presumption of the Christian or sacral-Christian character of some sculptures and by certain concepts wrongly considered as fixed points. Third, since some materials of Late Antique Egyptian sculpture, caught up in the trade of objets d'art, are typically provided with false attestations of origin, we lose any possibility of connecting them with their original circumstances (topography, architectural type, iconographical context, date), and the way to mystification is opened.

In particular the field of figurative sculpture—which has always attracted the most authors, being by far the most prevalent sector, quantitatively, of ornamental sculpture—has been gravely polluted by a huge number of false or falsified objects ending up in non-Egyptian collections, fed into the market on a massive scale for more than twenty years. Spectacular in this regard have been the series of so-called Sheikh Ibada reliefs and their derivatives, which have generated a wave of false problems, with related literature (the few authentic examples of this type of sepulchral relief come from Bahnasa; see K. Parlasca, Grabreliefs von Oxyrhynchos, 161-166). The most important collections of Late Antique Egyptian sculpture are in the Cairo Coptic Museum, the Graeco-Roman Museum at Alexandria (materials esp. from Bahnasa: E. Breccia, Musée Gréco-Romain I, pl. 41-51; Musée Gréco-Romain II, pl. 24-47) and the early Christian and Byzantine collection of the Berlin State Museums (O. Wulff, Bildwerke, 24-47, 65-93, 310-315; A. Effenberger, Koptische Kunst, passim). Only in a few cases have the sculptures found in the archaeological zones and in the still-extant early Christian or Late Antique buildings of Egypt been properly cataloged and documented.

b. Materials. The materials of Late Antique sculpture in Egypt were porphyry, granite, marble, limestone, sandstone, stucco and wood. Of these, porphyry played a particular role; specialized workshops, probably located in Alexandria, worked mainly for export (incl. sarcophagi and imperial portraits). From the 5th c. it seems that granite was little used for architectural elements; granite pieces in the Late Antique buildings of Egypt are mostly reused. Marble was highly prized, but it did not occur in Egypt and had to be imported by sea. Importation of finished works from *Constantinople seems to have been relatively rare; rather, rough imported forms were finished or decorated in or near Alexandria, and sent inland from there. Among the evidence of this extensive output are the many hundreds of 4th-6th-c. pedestals, bases, column shafts and capitals that were later reused in Islamic buildings. On the whole, it seems that the largest series of marble manufactures were used exclusively in the coastal zone (e.g., Abu Mina) and in the big cities. The material most used in the Egyptian interior was limestone, sometimes sandstone, available in many parts of the Nile valley; the vast local output of Egyptian sculpture, usually called Coptic sculpture, was worked in these rocky places. Stucco was employed partly for pieces intended for particular structures (e.g., keystones of domes) and for the detailed decoration of schematically roughed-out sandstone blocks (e.g., the cornice of the transept basilica of Ashmûnein); great stucco capitals—like the imperial-era works in Tuna al-Gabal—seem to have been very rare in Late Antiquity (an outstanding unique example in Wadi ʿn-Natrun). The preservation, unusually abundant, of wooden sculptures is due to the favorable climatic conditions of Middle and Upper Egypt.

c. Typology. Nearly all surviving stone sculptures and many of those in wood were made for insertion into architectural complexes, and so we must count the following among architectural sculptures: in stone—architraves, jambs, lunettes, tympana, niche decorations, pedestals and bases, decorated columns and pillars, capitals of various kinds, cornices and friezes, cancelli, windows, and nearly all the groups of funerary reliefs; in wood—doors, balustrades and grilles, trusses and crossbeams, cornices and friezes, decorations. Used for furnishing rooms were, among other things, vase-stands in decorated stone, decorated wooden furniture, chests and various wooden objects.

d. Influences and peculiarities. Marble sculpture was subject—in relation to the provenance of the materials—to a constant influence from outside. Generally its character was East Roman; forms and motifs were influenced by models from Constantinople and *Asia Minor. In local limestone and sandstone sculpture such influences remained sporadic, limited in time and space; even in Alexandrian marble sculpture, we do not feel the presence of outside motifs. Forms typical of Constantinopolitan art are absent for generations in Egyptian work, e.g., in the second half of the 5th c., the fundamental motif of the acanthus finely interwoven with the related combinations of motifs and types. Only in the first half of the 6th c. did Egypt receive a tide of Constantinopolitan models, inventions of the workshops of the capital in the early 6th c. and the time of *Justinian I, esp. the pilaster capital in the special form of the curled capital. Such influences are attested, in the same period, in figurative reliefs, though only to a limited degree in local products (Bawit, Fayum; the reused wooden door of the church of St. Barbara in the old city of Cairo). The rich inventory of motifs on limestone and sandstone works drew profit from imperial-era E Mediterranean sources and continued local traditions for centuries. These products have a provincial Late Antique character, with well-identified peculiarities, clearly distinguishable from the products of neighboring artistic provinces. Among their most marked characteristics are (1) architraves of niches in the form of broken pediments, in two basic types, often represented in the same period, (2) coordination of the side field with the front field by using corbelled cornices and coffered panels or interlaced friezes, (3) funerary reliefs with differentiated architectural motifs, (4) wall decorations with friezes of vines and leaves, (5) cornices with corbelled friezes and coffered panels, (6) Corinthian capitals of various categories decorated with a drastically reduced repertoire of motifs, following uncanonical and fantastic criteria.

Scientific literature has always stressed the peculiarities that can be encountered in the typology and elaborations of the local Egyptian culture of Late Antiquity, but with somewhat diverging evaluations. The extreme positions that tend to refer the types and style of this work directly to the Pharaonic heritage, excluding any influence of the Eastern Roman empire from the cultural horizon thus drawn, have erred in the same way as the interpretations that recognize, as primary source, a national Egyptian artistic culture developed in opposition to the culture of the Greco-Roman superstratum and Byzantine orthodoxy. Elements long available show that the majority of the oldest sculptures known to us (Ahnas, Saqqara S, Bahnasa) were created for funerary complexes. So too, the iconography of gables over niches, cited more than once, with figurative documentation (e.g., Leda and the Swan, Aphrodite, Daphne, Dionysius, Fauns and Maenads, Nereids and marine sprites, etc.), corresponds point by point with the subject matter of the imperial-era sepulchral art of other regions, e.g., Rome (see H. Torp, Leda christiana, 106-112). From the existential nexus between local stonecutters' and sculptors' workshops and the genre of funerary architecture, in Egypt particularly evolved over time, we could without difficulty explain the poverty of typology as compared to the simultaneous wealth of forms, as well as the independence from foreign models and the traditionalism of Egyptian sculpture. It is clear that the local workshops of the necropolises had been fitted out to satisfy the radically new requirements of the architectural decoration of Christian buildings. On one hand, from a thematic and stylistic point of view, local styles can be identified; on the other, it appears more and more clear that great supraregional stylistic movements developed at a later period. Thus, types and elaborations with significant similarities are attested, around the first half of the 5th c., in the decorations of the funerary complexes of Bahnasa and the church of the monastery of Shenoute (Deir el-Abyad near Suhag), while the late 5th and first half of the 6th c. saw similar types and forms at Saqqara S and at Bawit.

e. Reliable dates. For the period from the end of the tetrarchy to the Islamic invasion of the region, there is no reliably datable iconographical evidence. For certain groups, East Roman models offer elements of dating. The only fixed points for architectural sculpture—after the failed attempts to date the complexes of Bawit and Saqqara (see III, 3, a above)—are provided by three mid 5th-c. monuments: the pieces originally prepared for the church of the monastery of Shenoute (remains of friezes, cornices and rich decorations of niches in the presbytery, the baptistery and the narthex on the S and W sides; parts of the doorway); the well-preserved decoration of the church of Dair al-Ahmar near Suhag (capitals, bases, decorations of doors and niches in the presbytery and in the E wall of the naos); the artifacts, relatively few, originally prepared for the transept basilica of Ashmûnein (pilaster bases, some capitals, corbel moldings, two friezes of niches [?], etc.).

W.E. Crum, Coptic Monuments (general catalog of Egyptian antiquities in the Cairo Museum, nos. 8001-8741), Cairo 1902; J. Strzygowski, Koptische Kunst (general catalog of Egyptian antiquities in the Cairo Museum nos. 7001-7394 and 8742-9200), Vienna 1904; J.E. Quibell, Excavations at Saqqara (1907–1908), Cairo 1909; Id. (1908–1909, 1909–1910), Cairo 1912; O. Wulff, Altchristliche und mittelalterliche byzantinische und italienische Bildwerke, Parte I: Altchristliche Bildwerke (description of sculptures of the Christian period, 2nd ed., vol. III, Berlin 1909; E. Chassinat, Fouilles à Baouit (Mémoires de l'Institut d'archéol. orient. du Caire, vol. 13, 1), Cairo 1911; U. Monneret de Villard, La scultura ad Ahnas, Milan 1923; Id., Les couvents près de Sohag I-II, Milan 1925–1926; G. Duthuit, La sculpture copte, Paris 1931; E. Breccia, Le Musée Gréco-Romain d'Alexandrie (1925–1931), Bergamo 1932; Id. (1931–1932) Bergamo 1933; J. des Graviers, Inventaire des objects coptes de la Salle de Baouit au Louvre: RivAC 9 (1932) 50-96; E. Kitzinger, Notes on Early Coptic Sculpture: Archaeologia 87 (1938) 181-215; J.B. Ward Perkins, The Shrine of St. Menas in the Maryut: Papers of the British School at Rome 17 (1949) 26-71; A.J.B. Wace - A.H.S. Megaw - T.C. Skeat, Hermopolis magna, Ashmunein. The Ptolemaic Sanctuary and the Basilica, Alexandria 1959; J. Beckwith, Coptic Sculpture 300-1300, London 1963; K. Wessel, Koptische Kunst. Die Spätantike in Ägypten, Recklinghausen 1963; P. du Bourguet, I copti, Milan 1969; Id., Les coptes, Paris 1988; H. Torp, Leda christiana. The Problem of the Interpretation of Coptic Sculpture with Mythological Motifs: AAAH 4 (1969) 101-112; L. Török, On the Chronology of the Ahnas Sculpture: AAnt Hung 22 (1970) 163-182; F.W. Deichmann, Die Spolien in der spätantiken Architektur (Bayer. Akad. d. Wiss. Phil.-hist. Klasse. Sitzungsberichte 1975, fasc. 6), Munich 1975; A. Effenberger, Koptische Kunst. Ägypten in spätantiker, byzantinischer und frühislamischer Zeit, Vienna 1976; Id., Die Grabstele aus Medinet el-Fajum. Zum Bild der stillenden Gottesmutter in der Koptischen Kunst: FBSM 18 (1977) 158-168; H.-G. Severin, Frühchristliche Skulptur und Malerei in Ägypten, in B. Brenk, Spätantike und Frühes Christentum, Frankfurt - Berlin - Vienna 1977, 246-253; Id., Zur Süd-Kirche von Bawit: MDAI(K) 33 (1977) 113-124; K. Parlasca, Der Übergang von der spätrömischen zur frühkoptischen Kunst im Lichte der Grabreliefs von Oxyrhynchos: Enchoria 8 (special volume) (1978) 115 (161)–120 (166); H.-G. Severin, Gli scavi eseguiti ad Ahnas, Bahnasa, Bawit e Saqqara. Storia delle interpretazioni e nuovi risultati: CCAB 28 (1981) 299-314; Id., Problemi di scultura tardo-antica in Egitto: ibid. 315-336; M. Rassart-Debergh, Le pitture del convento di S. Geremia a Saqqara: CCAB 18 (1981) 255-279; Id., La décoration picturale du monastère de Saqqara. Essai de reconstitution: AAAH 9 (1981) 9-124; H.-G. Severin, Beispiele der Verwendung spätantiker Spolien. Ägyptische Notizen, II, in Fest. Friedrich Wilhelm Deichmann, II, Bonn 1986, 101-108; L'icône copte, I, À travers les âges, Limoges 1990; M. Rassart-Debergh, Arte e archeologia copte: principali testimonianze, in L'Egitto cristiano. Aspetti e problemi in età tardo-antica, Rome 1997, 293-318 (with rich bibl.); M. Krause, ed., Ägypten in spätantik-christlicher Zeit, Einführung in die koptische Kultur, Wiesbaden 1998; D. Bénazeth, Mathaf al-Qibti, Catalogue général du Musée copte du Caire, 1, Objets en métal, Le Caire: Institut français d'archéologie orientale, 2001; P. Grossmann, Christliche Architektur in Ägypten, Leiden 2002; see esp. the many entries in The Coptic Encyclopedia, 8 vols., New York 1991.

H.-G. Severin

4. Painting

a. Architectural painting. Ever since the first publications, Late Antique, Early Christian and Early Medieval Egyptian painting has been a popular field of study, particularly the sector of figurative compositions. This notwithstanding, there is still a real contrast between the quality of archaeological evidence and the enthusiasm of the studies addressed to iconographical problems. The former is fragmentary, so that a definitive critical evaluation is not possible. Dates are usually approximate and not confirmed by the context (chronology of architecture; identification of layers and overworkings; inscriptions and graffiti, etc.; see the new edition of the Coptic graffiti of the necropolis of al-Bagawat, which go back to the 6th-11th c., with a particular concentration in the 7th-9th c., and which may put in doubt the traditional date of the funerary chapels: G. Roquet, Graffites coptes, 25-49). Recent research has recovered a masterpiece of Late Antique Egyptian painting: the official monumental painting of the imperial religious complex of Luxor, which constitutes the link between Roman triumphal art and the decoration of the great Christian churches (J.G. Deckers, Wandmalerei, 600-652). Surviving mosaics are very rare (e.g., that on the vault at Abu Mina, 6th c.: H.G. Severin, Skulptur und Malerei, 253, fig. 291 b).

In all the civilized provinces, and even in the oases, evidence remains of ornamental architectural painting dividing the wall surfaces into zones and fields. Figurative motifs are found on walls, vaults and columns; complex figurative compositions were much used, esp. in wall niches, apses and domes. Similar paintings are preserved in necropolises (e.g., at al-Bagawat; of the Alexandrian cemeterial frescoes we have only copies), in churches and monasteries (e.g.: Bawit, Saqqara, Kellia, Dair Abu Hinnis, Abu Girga, Karm al-Ahbariya) and in hermitages (e.g., Isna). The well-known niche frescoes, which enclose themes of great breadth in very small spaces, were mostly created after the Arab invasion (mainly at Bawit and Saqqara). The range of artistic quality is very wide: the pictorial decorations, preserved in optimal conditions, of the church of Karm al-Ahbariya (W. Müller-Wiener, Abu Mena 6. Bericht, 473-480, fig. 14-15) may give an idea of the lost Alexandrian frescoes, while the paintings of some necropolises (e.g., al-Bagawat), monasteries and hermitages (Isna) remain on the level of artisans. In some cases the dearth of ornamental paintings has been made up for by the relief decoration, quite frequent, of some architectural elements (e.g., the painted pilasters of the niches in the triconch of Dair al-Ahmar, the niche pilasters decorated in relief in the triconch of Dair al-Abyad near Suhag). Remains of lids of wooden chests decorated with figurative depictions (F.W. Deichmann, Kassettendecken, 83-107) are the sole evidence of this genre from the early Christian period.

b. Painting on moveable objects. The series of mummy portraits goes up to the early Christian era, but use of them was limited to followers of the old religions. For historical reasons we must rule out a continuation of the genre beyond the end of the 4th c. (K. Parlasca, Mumienporträts). The rare early Christian icons, like the portrait of Bishop Abrahan (Berlin) and the double image of Christ and Abbot Menas (Paris) may be considered a technical continuation of them. Besides the painted chests we have the unique example of the peacock sarcophagus of Qarara (Heidelberg).

J. Clédat, Le monastère et la nécropole de Baouit, Le Caire 1904; J.E. Quibell, Excavations at Saqqara (1906–1907), Le Caire 1908; Id. (1907–1908), Le Caire 1909; Id. (1908–1909, 1909–1910), Le Caire 1912; J. Clédat, Le monastère et la nécropole de Baouit, Le Caire 1916; J. Maspéro, Fouilles exécutées à Baouit. Notes mises en ordre et éditées par E. Drioton, Le Caire 1932, 1943; A. Fakhry, The Necropolis of el-Bagawat in Kharga-Oasis, Cairo 1951; K. Wessel, Koptische Kunst. Die Spätantike in Ägypten, Recklinghausen 1963; K. Parlasca, Mumienporträts und verwandte Denkmäler, Wiesbaden 1966; R. Kasser, Kellia 1965, Geneva 1967; P. du Bourguet, I copti, Milan 1969; Id., Les coptes, Paris 1988; W. Müller-Wiener, Abu Mena 6. vorläufiger Bericht: AA (1967) 473-480; F. Daumas - A. Guillaumont, Kellia I Kom 219 (FIFAO 28), Cairo 1969; R. Kasser, Kellia. Topographie, Geneva 1972; S. Sauneron et al., Les ermitages chrétiens du désert d'Esna (FIFAO 29, 1-4), Cairo 1972; A. Effenberger, Koptische Kunst. Ägypten in spätantiker, byzantinischer und frühislamischer Zeit, Vienna 1976; F.W. Deichmann, Kassettendecken: JÖByz 21 (1972) 83-107; G. Roquet, Les graffites coptes de Bagawat: Bulletin de la Société française d'Égyptologie 76 (1976) 25-49; H.-G. Severin, Frühchristliche Skulptur und Malerei in Ägypten, in B. Brenk, Spätantike und Frühes Christentum, Frankfurt-Berlin-Vienna 1977, 243-253; J.G. Deckers, Die Wandmalerei im Kaiserkultraum von Luxor: JDAI 94 (1979) 600-652; M. Rassart-Debergh, Le pitture del convento di S. Geremia a Saqqara: CCAB 28 (1981) 255-279; P. van Moorsel - M. Huijbers, The Preserved Wallpaintings of Apa Jeremias: AAAH 9 (1981) X-XX; M. Rassart-Debergh, La peinture copte avant le XII^e siècle. Une approche: AAAH 9 (1981) 221-285; Id., La décoration picturale du monastère de Saqqara. Essai de reconstitution: AAAH 9 (1981) 9-124; A. Karakovkine, Certains monuments coptes de l'Ermitage (Saint-Pétersbourg), in Akten des XII Intern. Kongresses f. christl. Archäologie, II, Münster 1995, 889-891; M. Rassart-Debergh, Arte e archeologia copte: principali testimonianze, in L'Egitto cristiano. Aspetti e problemi in età tardo-antica, Rome 1997, 293-318 (with rich bibl.); M. Krause, ed., Ägypten in spätantik-christlicher Zeit, Einführung in die koptische Kultur, Wiesbaden 1998; see esp. the many entries in The Coptic Encyclopedia, 8 vols., New York 1991.

H.-G. Severin

EKTHESIS MAKROSTICHOS. The early sources give this name to a long doctrinal text that the Eusebians delivered to Emperor *Constans at *Milan in 345 in order to mitigate his unfavorable impression of the rupture caused by the Council of *Serdica. An elucidation of the Antiochene formula of 341, its approach to the *Trinity is based on the articulation of the three divine prosopa (the term hypostasis is avoided out of consideration for the Westerners), clearly distinct from each other.

A. Hahn, Bibliothek der Symbole, Breslau 1897, 192-196; Simonetti 182-192; G. Feige, Die Lehre Markells von Ankyra in der Darstellung seiner Gegner, Leipzig 1991, 142-145; A.M. Ritter, Dogma und Lehre in der alten Kirche, in C. Andresen (ed.), Handbuch der Dogmen- und Theologiegeschichte, vol. I, Göttingen 1982, 187ff.; H.C. Brennecke, Hilarius von Poitiers und die Bischofsopposition gegen Konstantius II, Berlin 1984 54ff., F. Dinsen, Homoousios. Die Geschichte des Begriffs bis zum Konzil von Konstantinopel (381), Kiel 1976, 108ff.

M. Simonetti

EKTHESIS of HERACLIUS. The patriarch *Sergius of Constantinople (d. 638), to resolve the question of *monothelitism, affirmed that there are two natures in Christ, according to *dyophysite doctrine, but only one operation (energia), as the *monophysites wanted. This doctrine came to be called *monoener-gism (or monoergism). Sergius obtained from the emperor Heraclius the issuing of a document (Ekthesis) in 638, according to which in Christ there was only one operation and one will. Pope *Martin and *Maximus the Confessor opposed this new doctrine; the emperor *Constans then issued the Typos, with which he banned discussion of the question of one or two wills in Christ. The Lateran Council of 649 rejected this new document, and both Martin and Maximus were arrested. Martin died in Crimea in 655; Maximus was tried and condemned in 662 and sent to Laico (Georgia), where he died.

M. Simonetti, Il Cristo, II, Testi teologici e spirituali in lingua greca dal IV al VII secolo, Milan 1986, 514ff.; 633ff.; M. Simonetti, Un falso Ippolito nella polemica monotelita: VetChr 24 (1987) 113-146.

A. Di Berardino

ELEUSIUS of Cyzicus (d. ca. 384). Ordained bishop of Cyzicus (Hellespont) ca. 358 by *Macedonius of Constantinople, he actively collaborated with *Basil of Ancyra in the activity of the *homoiousians in 358–359 and played an important part in the Council of *Seleucia (359). For this he was deposed at the Council of *Constantinople of 360, which sanctioned the defeat of the homoiousians. Restored to his see on *Constantius's death (362), he was removed from it by *Julian, who aimed to punish several bishops who had harmed pagan worship and temples. Also harassed by *Valens, after 362 he resumed his part in the trinitarian controversy, still aligned with the homoiousians. When the controversy over the *Holy Spirit broke out, he became one of the leaders of the Macedonians, i.e., the homoiousian wing that refused to acknowledge the Holy Spirit's divinity. In ca. 376 he presided over a Macedonian council at Cyzicus which ignored the Nicene homoousion, again confirmed the validity of the homoiousion, and defined the Holy Spirit as a creature. Sent to the Council of Constantinople of 381 together with other Macedonians, he refused to subscribe the Nicene Creed of 325 beforehand and so left the proceedings. In 383, at *Theodosius's request, he presented that emperor with a formula of faith, whose terms we do not know.

Socrates, HE 2,39-40; 4,6; 5,8-10; Sozomen, HE 4,20,2-24; 5,15; DHGE 15, 144-145; Simonetti 588.

M. Simonetti

ELEUTHERUS (Eleuterus, Eleutherius), pope (175–189). Succeeded *Soter perhaps in 175 and was pope until his death in 189 (the date at which a more certain chronology for the bishops of *Rome begins). In Irenaeus's list, Eleutherus is in the final place, the twelfth successor to the apostle *Peter (Adv. haer. III, 3, 3). A Greek from Nicopolis (Epirus), deacon to Anicetus (Eus., HE IV, 22, 1), the son of Abbondius or Abbondantius (LP I, 136), he lived under the emperor *Commodus, in a period of relative truce in the Roman *persecutions. The church's peace was disturbed in another sense by the spread in the West of the *Montanist heresy. In the context of that controversy, in 177 Eleutherus received through Irenaeus, then a simple presbyter, a letter on Montanist theories (Euseb., HE V,3,4; V,4,1-2). The document was addressed from the Christians of *Lyons, then prisoners and confessors of the faith, "to the brothers of Asia and Phrygia, and to Eleutherus, bishop of Rome." Rather than condemning Montanism, the Christians of Lyons expounded its heterodox contents, informing Eleutherus of them and inviting him to that moderate and pacific approach which he did in fact observe in the years that followed, refusing to disturb the church's internal peace with condemnations that were too broad and harsh. This caution seems to be confirmed by *Tertullian's Adversus Praxean, where in a probable allusion to Eleutherus he rebukes a bishop of Rome for having recognized the orthodoxy of Montanus and other heresiarchs (PL 2, 178-179). It is also true that in his last years Eleutherus assumed a less conciliatory attitude toward the Montanists. The LP mentions a sending of missionaries by Eleutherus to *Britain, at the request of King Lucius. The circumstances of Eleutherus's death are unknown, although he is remembered as a martyr of the church of Rome (26 May).

Irenaeus of Lyons, Adv. haeres. III, 3, 3, SC 211 (A. Rousseau - L. Doutreleau), 36-38; Tertullian, De praescript. haeret. 30, 2, CCL 1-2 (R.F. Refoulé), 210; Id., Adv. Prax. I, 5, CCL 1-2, III, 5; Euseb., HE IV,11,7; 22,3; V, Prologue, 1; 22; 24,14; PG 5, 1143 (letter of Eleutherus to Lucius); P. Hinschius, Decretales pseudo-Isidorianae et Capitula Angilramni [. . .], Leipzig 1863, 125-127; LP I, LXV, CI-CIV, 58-61 and 136-137; A Dictionary of Christian Biography, II, London 1880, 79-81; III, 1882, 754-756; L. Duchesne, E. et le roi breton Lucius: Revue celtique 6 (1883–1885) 491ff.; Catholicisme IV, 1-2 (G. Bardy); DTC IV, 2, Paris 1956, 1-2; BS IV, 1004-1007 (B. Cignitti - I.B. Marsali); DHGE XV, 147-148 (B. Botte); LTK³ 3, 586 (G. Schwaiger); EPapi 1, 226-229 (F. Scorza Barcellona).

M. Spinelli

ELEUTHERUS (Eleuterus, Eleutherius) of Tournai (d. 531). Born ca. 456 of Christian parents and a member of the Gallo-Roman aristocracy, Eleu-therus spent most of his youth at the royal court of Tournai. The Vita Medardi (BHL 5864), and subordinately the Vita Eleutherii (BHL 2455), state that after having been a count, between 497 and 500 he was consecrated bishop of Tournai and made considerable efforts to combat pagans and heretics, in particular *Arians. He also went to *Rome, first to Pope *Symmachus and then to Pope *Hormisdas, and held a synod in 527. Died 30 August 531. Six sermons (Sermo, seu confessio de SS. Trinitate; Transitus S. Eleutherii episcopi; Sermo de Trinitate; Sermo de incarnatione Domini; Sermo de natale Domini; Sermo in annuntiationis festum) and a prayer (Oratio Beati Eleutherii) have been erroneously attributed to Eleutherus.

CPL 1004; PL 65, 83-102; P. Rolland, Les Monumenta historiae Tornacensis saec. XII: Annuaire de l'Académie Royale d'Archéologie de Belgique 73 (1926) 255-313; Id., Les origines légendaires de Tournai: RBPh 25 (1946–1947) 555-581; A. Lumpe, Die Quellen von Ps. Eleutherius, sermo de Trinitate: RhM 100 (1957) 199-200; BS IV, 1012; DHGE XV, 150-153; Patrologia IV, 300.

P. Marone

ELIAS of Jerusalem (430–518). Patriarch of *Jerusalem (494–516). Saint: feast 4 July. Of Arab origin, an *anchorite in *Egypt and *Palestine, consecrated priest by Anastasius of Jerusalem, he became patriarch at the height of the *Acacian schism, under the reign of the *monophysite emperor Anastasius. Although he was orthodox and antimonophysite, Elias, wanting to maintain a moderate and conciliatory approach, accepted the Henotikon and avoided an open defense of the Council of *Chalcedon; he nonetheless did not escape the attacks of the monophysites. In 512 he managed to avoid, through St. *Sabas's intercession with Anastasius, the deposition decreed by the Council of Sidon, though his friend *Flavian II of Antioch was deposed. Elias then refused communion with Flavian's successor at Antioch, the monophysite *Severus. He was exiled to Aila (Eilat), on the Red Sea, where he died.

BS IV, 1053-1057; DHGE 15, 189-190; Patrologia 5, see index; Storia del Cristianesimo 3, passim.

E. Prinzivalli

ELIGIUS of Noyon-Tournai (ca. 590–660). Born ca. 590 at Chaptelat, near Limoges, of an old Gallo-Roman family, he was apprenticed as a goldsmith in the mint of Limoges before going over to the service of kings *Chlothar II and Dagobert, where he exercised an immense influence over 7th-c. monetization, also creating masterpieces of religious art. Still a layman, he founded monasteries at Solignac, *Paris and Noyon, helping the poor and prisoners. On Dagobert's death, Eligius was ordained bishop of Noyon 13 May 641. He evangelized the N part of his vast diocese, fallen back into paganism with the barbarian invasions, but with only moderate success; he took part in the synods of Orléans (639/641)—a fact known only from his Life (CPL 2094)—and Chalon-sur-Saône (24 October 647/653). The homilies transmitted under his name are not authentic (PL 87, 593-662), except the homily De supremo iudicio (CPL 2096), in which he has constant recourse to the homilies of *Caesarius of Arles. We also have a letter of his written to *Desiderius of Cahors (CPL 1303) and the Charta cessionis Solemniacensis (CPL 2095). Died 1 December 660 and was buried at Noyon.

BHL 2474-2480; Verzeichnis (Freiburg [4]1995), 441-442; BS 4, 1064-1073; BBKL 1, 1490-1491; C. Baussan, St. Éloi, Paris 1932; P. Fouracre, The Work of Audoenus of Rouen and E. of Noyon in Extending Episcopal Influence from the Town to the Country, in D. Baker (ed.), The Church in Town and Countryside, Oxford 1979, 77-91; A. de Vogüé, Vestiges de l'"Admonitio ad filium spiritualem" du Pseudo-Basile dans la prédication de saint Éloi: RB 98 (1988) 18-20.

V. Saxer - S. Samulowitz

ELIJAH, prophet

I. Exegesis - II. Iconography.

I. Exegesis. There is an OT apocryphon entitled the Apocalypse of Elijah. E. Schürer (Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi, 3, 368) considers it a Christian work of the 3rd c. W. Bousset (Beiträge zur Geschichte der Eschatologie: Die Apokalypse des Elias: ZKG 20 [1899] 103-112) considers it a Jewish work revised by a 3rd-c. Christian. More recently, without convincing proof, J.M. Rosenstiehl (L'Apocalypse d'Élie. Introduction, traduction et notes, Paris 1972) has tried by force of circumstances to date it to the 1st c. BC.

This work had little influence on the Christian reception of the prophet Elijah. *Clement of Rome (Cor. 17, 1) proposes Elijah as a true model. *Justin Martyr (Dial. 8, 4; 39, 1-2; 49, 1-3; 69, 1; 87, 6) mentions him mainly in the eschatological perspective. *Irenaeus (Adv. haer. IV, 20, 10; V, 5, 1) only speaks of him twice, and always on a typological level. *Origen evokes him on two levels: that of the prophet's history; and, esp. in his NT commentaries and homilies (Com. Mt. 12, 13, 17; Hom. Lc.; Com. Jo.; Com. Rom.), that of the significance of the events in which the prophet took part. From the Origenian interpretation of Elijah come teachings on practical Christian life, esp. through his OT homilies (Hom. Gn. 16, 3; Hom. Ex. 3 and 8; In Ps. 4, 5, 37). *Methodius of Olympus explains in an anti-Origenist sense Elijah's flight from Jezebel and his apparition on Mt. Tabor (Symp. 10, 3; De res. I and III).

References to Elijah in 4th-5th-c. Greek patristics are rare. *Eusebius of Caesarea names him in On the martyrs of Palestine 11, 9. Many references appear in *Athanasius, the most interesting being in Vita Antonii 7, where Elijah is presented as a model for monks. *Eusebius of Emesa, in his Oratio II de Filio, uses Elijah to emphasize the Son's superiority to all OT figures. *Cyril of Jerusalem presents Elijah to catechumens as bearer of the gifts of the Holy Spirit (Cat. 2, 3; 12, 14). Hardly mentioned by *Basil (Great Rules 23) and only conventionally in *Gregory of Nazianzus, in *Gregory of Nyssa Elijah becomes a commonplace when the saint has recourse to *Scripture. *John Chrysostom dedicates a whole homily to Elijah: On Elijah, the widow and almsgiving. *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, *Cyril of Alexandria, *Nilus, *Isidore of Pelusium, *Diadochus of Photice and *Maximus the Confessor hardly mention him.

In the *Syriac tradition, Elijah appears as a giant of biblical prophecy, a man of action and prayer, "prophet and father of prophets," esp. in *Aphraates and *Ephrem. Among the Latins, according to *Cyprian (Ep. 67, 8) Elijah is a model of the martyrs; a prophet of the last days for *Hilary (Com. Mt. 26, 6), *Augustine (Civ. Dei 20, 29) and *Gregory the Great (Moral. XI, 15, 24); an ascetic of the desert, virgin and poor, for *Ambrose, who dedicates a whole treatise to him, De Helia et ieiunio; a model of monastic life for *Jerome (Ep. 58, 5) and *John Cassian (Inst. 1, 1; Conl. 14, 4; 18, 6). The *Pelagian crisis would emphasize his need of grace, and *Isidore of Seville would see in Elijah's assumption a distant annunciation of Christ's ascension.

EC 5, 232-235; BS 4, 1031-1032; DSp 576-571; Élie le prophète, I-II, Études carmelitaines, Bruges 1956; E. Poirot, Le saint prophète Élie chez les Pères de l'Église. Textes présentés par les Carmelites du Monastère St.-Élie, Abbaye de Bellefontaine 1992; M. Masson, Élie ou l'appel du silence, Paris 1992; E. Poirot, Les prophètes Élie et Élisée dans la littérature chrétienne ancienne, Turnhout 1997.

Ch. Kannengiesser

II. Iconography. Many works of Latin and Greek Fathers contain more or less extensive references to Elijah. His ascent into heaven in a fiery chariot is disbelieved only by *Origen (In Ps. XV, 9), who denies that his body could have been dead. According to *Augustine, Elijah and Enoch will die together at the end of the world, fighting against *Antichrist (Ep. CXCIII, 3, 5; De Gen. ad litt. IX, 5). These same two figures are identified with the figures of the two witnesses of Rev 11 by various authors, including *Jerome (Comm. in Ev. Mt. III, 57), who considers Elijah the second precursor of Christ, as St. John the Baptist was the first. A similar comparison appears in *Gregory of Nyssa (De Virg. VI) and in St. Augustine (Civ. Dei XX, 29). For his many virtues (poverty, continence, faithfulness in prayer, penitence), he is pointed to as an example of monastic life by St. *Athanasius (Vita Ant.) and *John Cassian (Conl. XIV, 4). *Ambrose (De vid. I, 3) gives him first place among the prophets, and Jerome too celebrates the conduct of his life and his work of exalting the divine glory (Contra Ioan. Hieros. II; Comm. in Ez. XI, 35).

The scene of Elijah most widespread in the early Christian figurative repertoire is that of his ascent in a fiery chariot (2 Kings 2:11) which, formally, draws inspiration from scenes of *apotheosis and triumph in classical art and which alludes to the baptism of fire. The oldest depictions yet known are probably those on Roman sarcophagi, where Elijah appears even before the time of *Constantine (Ws 190, 3). In painting, Elijah is recognizable on a damaged lunette in the catacomb of *Domitilla (4th c.) (Wp 230, 2): the prophet, beardless, in tunic and pallium, is on the moving quadriga while Elisha points to him. A lunette of an arcosolium in the catacomb of Via D. Compagni (Ferrua, Via Latina, pl. XXIII) dates from the second half of the 4th c. In mosaics, Elijah appears at Milan (apse of S. Aquilino) and Ravenna (S. Apollinare in Classe), with the usual compositional schemes. In sculpture, the scene appears on few sarcophagi besides those mentioned above: the Borghese sarcophagus in the Louvre (Ws 82, 2), that of St. Ambrose at Milan (Ws 189, 2). In a design on the sarcophagus of St. Peter's in the Vatican (Rep. 675, 2), a single scene comprises the whole event, while in a fragment in the Arles Museum (Ws 198, 1), it is in two parts: above, Elijah in the chariot hands over the pallium; below, Elisha, bald and bearded, receives it; another character next to Elisha is interpreted as the Jordan. A fragment of baptismal font from the church of Vitalis at Sbeitla, now in the Bardo Museum, Tunis, dates from the 4th c. Elijah also appears probably on the left side of the Brescia Reliquary (350–370), on a fragmentary clay tablet in the Bardo Museum (5th c.) and on the wooden door of S. Sabina, Rome (ca. 430).

DACL IV, 2670-2674; EC II, 232-234; RAC 4, 1157-1163; LCI I, 607-613; M.A. Merlin, Catalogue des Musées et Collections archéologiques de l'Algérie et de la Tunisie. Musée Aloui, Paris 1921, II, L 110, 283; III, C 1444, 73; C. Cecchelli, in Calderini -

Chierici - Cecchelli, S. Lorenzo Maggiore, Milan 1952, 221-229; Volbach-Hirmer, 75, fig. 86, 94, fig. 168; E. Dassmann, Sündenvergebung durch Taufe, Busse und Märtyrerfürbitte in den Zeugnissen frühchristlicher Frömmigkeit und Kunst, Münster 1973, 267-283; G. Jeremias, Die Holztür der Basilika S. Sabina in Rom, Tübingen 1980, 41-45, figs. 34-36; C. Stella, Scheda n. 5b. li, in Var. aus., Milano capitale dell'Impero Romano 286-402 d.C., Milan 1990; A. Ferrua, Catacombe sconosciute. Una pinacoteca del IV secolo sotto la via Latina, Florence 1990; A.M. Ardovino, I mosaici di S. Aquilino: note sulla loro storia e prospettive di ricerca, in Milano ritrovata, Milan 1991, 43-48; J. Dresken-Weiland, Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarcophage. Band II, Mainz am Rhein 1998, n. 150,2; M. Perraymond, Elia (s.v.), in F. Bisconti (ed.), Temi di iconografia paleocristiana, Vatican City 2000, 170-171.

M. Perraymond

ELISAEUS, doctor (Ełišē Vardapet) (6th c.?). Armenian author of a History of Vardan and the Armenian War, which recounts the Armenian insurrection of the years 449–451. Traditionally considered an eyewitness of the events he relates, Elisaeus is now more commonly dated in the 6th c.; Akinian puts the composition of the History in the 7th c., seeing the present text as a 9th-c. revision that transformed the original hero, Vardan II, into Vardan I. In the manuscripts Elisaeus appears as the author of homilies and ascetic and exegetical treatises, which seem to use translations from the Hellenophile period (6th c.), but at the same time show little interest in the anti-Chalcedonian disputes.

DHGE 15, 232-235; DSp 4, 594-596; Bardenhewer V, 202-206; G. Cappelletti, Eliseo storico armeno del quinto secolo, Venice 1840; Srboy hawrn meroy Ełišēi vardapeti Matenagrowtiwnk' [Works of our holy father Elisaeus doctor], Venice 1859; V. Langlois, Collection des historiens anciens et modernes de l'Arménie. II, Paris 1869, 177-251; S. Weber, Ausgewählte Schriften der armenischen Kirchenväter I, Munich 1927, 271-298; N. Akinian, Ełišē vardapet ew iwr Patmowt'iwn Hayoc' paterazmi. Matenagrakan-patmakan owsowmnasirowt'iwn [Elisaeus doctor and his "History of the Armenian War." Historical-critical research]. I-II, Vienna 1932-36 [Ger. summ. in appendix]; N. Akinian, Ełišē vardapet Kołbac'i: Keank'n ew grak'an gorcownēwt'iwnĕ [Elisaeus of Kołb, doctor: life and literary activity]: HA 64 (1950) 385-421; 65 (1951) 1-43; B.L. Zekiyan, Ełišē as Witness of the Ecclesiology of the Early Armenian Church, in N.G. Garsoïan et al. (eds.), East of Byzantium: Syria and Armenia in the Formative Period, Washington, D.C. 1982, 187-197; R. Thomson, Ełishē, History of Vardan and the Armenian War (Harvard Armenian Texts and Studies 5), Cambridge, MA - London 1982; L. Leloir, Élisée l'Arménien, Discours sur la Transfiguration, in Joie de la Transfiguration d'après les Pères d'Orient, ed. M. Coune (Spiritualité orientale 39), Abbaye de Bellefontaine 1985, 135-138; H.H. K'yoseyan, Ełišē i čaragrakan erkeri ałbyowrneric' [Sources of the homiletic works of Ełišē]: Patmabanasirakan Handēs 123 (1988) 4, 108-112; B. Outtier, Une exhortation aux moines d'Élisée l'arménien, in Mélanges Antoine Guillaumont. Contributions à l'étude des christianismes orientaux (Cahiers d'orientalisme 20), Geneva 1988, 97-101; R.W. Thomson, Aspects of Armenian Biblical Exegesis: Ełišē on the Passion, in S. Ajamian - M.E. Stone, Text and Context: Studies in the Armenian New Testament: Papers Presented to the Conference on the Armenian New Testament May 22-28, 1992 (University of Pennsylvania. Armenian Texts and Studies 13), Atlanta 1994, 83-95; R.W. Thomson, Ełišē, The History of Vardan and the Armenian War. A Facsimile Reproduction of the 1957 Yerevan Edition (Classical Armenian Texts), Delmar 1993; R.W. Thomson, A Homily on the Passion of Christ Attributed to Elishe, Louvain 2000.

S.J. Voicu

ELKESAITES. The origin of the Elkesaites goes back to the Jewish inhabitants of the border region during the Roman-Parthian War at the end of Trajan's reign (ca. 116). At that time a book was written among these Jews which contained revelations and demanded conversion in view of an imminent judgment. According to the book, the revelations were made by two important angels. Although a man called Elxai is generally mentioned in connection with the book, it is normally held that in this word we can make out the Hebrew words ksh ḥyl (Book of) "Hidden power." The revelations were not fulfilled, but the book enjoyed such immense credit that its contents were not only interpreted, but even adapted to new circumstances.

We know that a certain Alcibiades of *Apamea came to Rome in the time of Bishop *Callistus preaching a second baptism, referring to the Elkesaite book of revelation (Elenchos IX, 13, 1-17, 2). *Origen wrote that the Elkesaites appeared at *Caesarea announcing that pardon was possible even for those who had denied the faith (Euseb., HE VI, 38). *Epiphanius describes a sect called Sampseni, who according to him derived from the Osseni, who had been influenced by Elxai (Pan., chs. 19 and 53). The Fihrist, a work written in Arabic at the end of the 10th c., reveals that a sect of Mughtasilah, founded by Elxai, counted Mani's brother among its members and that *Mani himself had been "their head" (al-Nadim, Kitab al-Fihrist 9, 1, ed. Dodge, vol. II, 773-774 and 811). This is supported by a *Manichean document on Mani's youth, commonly called the Cologne Mani Codex. The problem connected with the study of the Elkesaites is to determine, on the one hand, to what extent their original ideas influenced already-existing religious groups, and on the other, to what extent Elkesaite ideas were influenced by these groups. We know from *Hippolytus that Alcibiades propagated a conception of Jewish life and accepted a Christology in which Christ appeared in all eras; in this regard Hippolytus also speaks of practices of exorcism and astrology. The Jewish Christian element is much less important in Epiphanius's descriptions. He emphasizes the supposed influence of the Elkesaites on the *Ebionites, but it is plausible that the influence went the other way. Finally, we note that in the description of the Fihrist and the Cologne Mani Codex nothing is said about Jewish Christian ideas. With the Elkesaites, then, it would seem that we are not dealing with a particular group, but with the influence of a mysterious book of revelations that held sway over a number of preexisting religious ideas, probably starting with some Jewish Christian groups E of the Jordan.

EC 5, 194; W. Brandt, Elchasai, Leipzig 1912; A.F.J. Klijn - G.J. Reinink, Patristic Evidence for Jewish-Christian Sects: Supplements to Novum Testamentum 36, Leiden 1973, 54-67; Id., Elchasai and Mani: VChr 28 (1974) 277-289; L. Cyril, Elchasai e gli elchasaiti, Cosenza 1984; G. Lüdemann, Opposition to Paul in Jewish Christianity, Minneapolis 1989; S.C. Mimouni, Le judéo-christianisme, Paris 1998; S. Légasse, L'antipaulinisme sectaire au temps des Pères de l'Église, Paris 2000.

A.F.J. Klijn

ELPIDIUS (4th c.). The layman Elpidius is mentioned by *Jerome (Ep. 133, 4; CSEL 56, 248). *Sulpicius Severus calls him a rhetor and presents him, with a woman named Agape, as *Priscillian's teacher. Also according to Sulpicius, Elpidius was condemned at the Council of *Saragossa of 380 (Chron. II, 46-47).

H. Chadwick, Priscillian of Avila. The Occult and the Charismatic in the Early Church, Oxford 1976, 20, 27, 37; V. Burrus, The Making of a Heretic. Gender, Authority, and the Priscillianist Controversy, Berkeley - Los Angeles - London 1995, 139-140.

S. Zincone

ELPIDIUS RUSTICUS (5th-6th c.). Latin Christian poet (late 5th c.–first half 6th c.), variously identified with the deacon Elpidius, Theodoric's teacher, recipient of letters from *Cassiodorus, *Ennodius and Avitus, mentioned in *Procopius and the Vita Caesarii (Fabricius); with Flavius Elpidius Rusticius Domnulus, Theodoric's comes consistorialis, subscriptor of some classical texts (Brandes); with the Gallic poet Domnulus, mentioned by *Sidonius Apollinaris, whom some scholars consider the same person as the subscriptor of *Ravenna (Jahn, Cavallin). The solution, not yet reached, of this problem is connected with that of the source of the two Elpidian works: Carmen de Christi Iesu beneficiis (149 hexameters) and a series of epigrams entitled Historiarum Testamenti veteris et novi Tristicha XXIV, first published by G. Fabricius at Basle in 1564 on the basis of a codex now lost. The Tristicha, probably captions to figurative cycles of episodes from both Testaments recalling *Prudentius's Dittochaeon, lack the technique of the Carmen, dictated by intense religiosity and quite often rising to genuine poetic vibrations, with various Sedulian borrowings. Composed between 525 (death of *Boethius, alluded to in vv. 45-47) and the end of the *Ostrogoth kingdom (555; in v. 140 this is spoken of as still existing), it may be considered an effective and devout summary, through its essential moments, of Christ's saving action in human history, with a final vision of heavenly beatitude, contrasted with the evils (famine, war, sickness, cruelty of tyrants) dominating the poet's own time. Noteworthy in the Carmen, besides the presence of some neologisms, is the proclaimed difference and superiority of the poetry of Christ's "vates" to the artificial poetry of pagan writers, "experts in errors" (vv. 39-40). Finally, there are four epigrams (Versus Rustici defensori Augustin: CPL 1508) which summarize *Augustine's trinitarian doctrine.

CPL 1506-1508a; PL 62, 543-548; D.H. Groen, Rustici Elpidii carmina, Groningen 1942; F. Corsaro, Elpidio Rustico, Catania 1955; S. Cavallin, Le poète Domnulus. Étude prosopographique: SE 7 (1955) 50-66; Patrologia IV, 285-286.

L. Navarra

ELVIRA, Council of. We know two cities with the Latin name Eliberris (Iliberris): one in Gallia Narbonensis, the other in the province of Baetica. There is no doubt that the council was celebrated in the latter: it is sufficiently proven by the sees of the participants. Archaeological data fix its site in an outlying ward (Abaicín) of modern Granada, ruling out other homonymous places nearby. Most problematic is the year of its celebration, since the acts give only its day and month: 15 May. All are agreed on only one fact: it was held after 295 (probable beginning of Ossius of Cordoba's episcopate) and before 314 (year of the Council of *Arles). Nothing can help us determine the exact year except the data derived from a study of its 81 canons: can. 25 refers to those who are given the title of confessores; can. 60 does not accept as martyrs those put to death only for destroying idols; can. 73 mentions informers on Christians. All this seems to indicate the aftermath of a persecution; in this case, it would be that of *Diocletian and we could date it between 306 and 314. But other clues oblige us to take the date back to before the persecution: the absence of the problem of lapsi (present at the Council of Arles) and the coexistence of Christians and pagans, a situation characteristic of the time of lasting peace, not of that of persecution. So we can place the year of celebration between 300 and 303. The acts are signed by 19 bishops and 24 presbyters, delegates of 37 Christian communities (six of them sent a presbyter as well as the bishop). We can thus speak of a national council, also because the representatives of the five Roman provinces were present: *Baetica, 19 (and probably 3 more); *Carthage, 8; *Lusitania, 3; *Tarraconensis, 1 (and probably one more); and *Gallaecia, 1. In all the registers Felix of Acci (Guadix) signed first, a privilege probably given him on account of his personal seniority among the bishops, not of the antiquity of his see.

The importance of this council is considerable for our knowledge of the church in *Spain at that time. The first thing it tells us is the wide diffusion of Christianity in the peninsula, esp. in Baetica, as in its various social strata: flamines (cans. 2, 3, 4, 55); duumvirs (can. 56); rich matrons (cans. 5, 41); landowners (can. 40); usurers (can. 20); charioteers and actors (cans. 62, 69); freedmen (can. 80). The second is how ineffective was this Christianization, since idolatry still existed among Christians (can. 1), who took part in pagan worship (can. 59) and had idols in their houses (can. 41); Christians married pagans or Jews (cans. 15, 16, 17); even the bishops believed in witchcraft and were notably permissive in matters of married life and in sexual matters. We should also note a certain rigidity in the penalties imposed, to the point of total exclusion from the church of backsliding userers (can. 20), those who kept idols in their houses (can. 41), those who had their crops blessed by Jews (can. 49), and charioteers and actors who failed to keep their promise to renounce this type of work (can. 62). The council wanted to intensify the Christian life, freeing it from all pagan links and vestiges and from any contact with Jews, and it wanted insistently to make the lives of the clergy exemplary—famous on this account is can. 33, variously interpreted, which requires sexual abstinence to bishops, presbyters and deacons during the exercise of their ministry. All this depends on the authenticity of the canons, among the earliest preserved of any council. Their late appearance (in Hispana; 2nd half of 6th c.), other internal factors such as the vocabulary used, the unusual number of canons (81), which are jumbled and some at first sight contradictory, and the presence of some subjects treated at later councils, have led some to deny their authenticity and consider them a later compilation; in this case only the first 21 (22) canons would belong to the acts of the Council of Elvira. One author (J. Suberbiola) maintains the thesis that the 81 canons are the acts of five Spanish councils from the 3rd and 4th c., but the evidence advanced does not give a sufficient response to the questions raised by recent proposals.

ES 19 and 55-56; DHGE 15, 317-348; R. García Villoslada, Historia de la iglesia en España, 1, Madrid 1978, 81-119; Mansilla, Geografía 1, 92-130; Martínez Diez, Hispana IV, 233-268; Vives, Concilios, 1-15; Orlandís, Concilios, 25-63; M. Meigne, Concile ou collection d'Elvire?: RHE 70 (1975) 361-387; E. Griffe, Le Concile d'Elvire et les origines du célibat ecclésiastique: BLE 77 (1976) 123-127; D. Ramos-Lissón, En torno a la autenticidad de algunos cánones del concilio de Elvira: ScTh 11 (1979) 181-186; D. Ramos-Lissón, Communio y recepción de cánones conciliares de los sínodos hispánicos en los siglos IV y V: AHC 12 (1980) 26-37; J. Suberbiola Martínez, Nuevos concilios hispano-romanos de los siglos III y IV. La Colección de Elvira, Universidad de Málaga 1987; M. Sotomayor, Las actas del Concilio de Elvira. Estado de la cuestión: Revista del centro de estudios históricos de Granada y su Reino 3 (1989) 35-67; J. Vilella - P.E. Barreda, Los cánones de la Hispana atribuidos a un Concilio Iliberritano. Estudio filológico: SEA 78 (2002) 545-579; El concilio de Elvira y su tiempo, eds. M. Sotomayor - J. Fernández Ubiña, Granada 2005.

P. de Luis

EMERENTIANA (d. 303?). One of a group of martyrs buried in the coemeterium majus on the Via Nomentana, known from an inscription (ICUR 21590) and included in Mart. hier. on 16 September. In *Gaul she is given prominence by the historical martyrologies and by the late manuscripts of the Mart. hier., on the basis of a chapter added to the Passio of St. *Agnes in which Emerentiana is considered her foster sister; she was stoned while still a catechumen, during her sister's funeral in the catacomb (BHL 2527). These events led to the institution of a feast in her honor on 23 January. The 7th-c. Roman itineraries also attest her cult (CCL 175, 306. 319. 326). Emerentiana's body was translated by Pope Paschal I to the basilica of S. Prassede (Duchesne LP 2, 64); Emerentiana is also included in the procession of martyrs in the mosaics of S. Apollinare Nuovo at *Ravenna.

AB 102 (1984) 183; BS 4, 1161-1167; LCI 6, 144; A. Amore, I martiri di Roma, Rome 1975, 81-82; Ph. Pergola, Le catacombe romane, Rome [2]1999, 146.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

EMERITUS (d. after 418). *Donatist bishop of *Carthage and leader of the Donatist cause at the Conference of Carthage of 411. Apparently a lawyer by training. He first came to the fore in 394, when he drew up the decree of the *Primianist majority at the Council of Bagai, which excommunicated the followers of *Maximian. His language was both ornate and virulent (see Aug., C. Cresc. III, 19, 22; De Gestis cum Emerito 10-11). At the Conference of Carthage in 411 he was one of six bishops who spoke for the Donatists and, with *Petilian of Constantine, he upheld the Donatist cause from start to finish. On this occasion he showed himself a master of procedural tactics and an effective orator, speaking 64 times, often at length, in the first three days of the debate. Deprived, like other Donatist bishops, of his see by order of the imperial government (CTh XVI, 5, 52), he nonetheless remained active around Caesarea (Cherchel). In September 418 *Augustine, visiting that city, met him by chance in the forum and tried to persuade him to accept union with the Catholics. In a tense scene in the cathedral of Caesarea, Emeritus refused, and despite Augustine's exhortations remained to the end firmly attached to Donatist principles (De Gestis cum Emerito, 12).

Augustine, De Gestis cum Emerito (ed. Petschenig, CSEL 53, 181-196) and Sermo ad Caesariensis ecclesiae plebem (ibid., 167-178); see also Contra Cresconium III, 19, 22 (sentence of the Council of Bagai); Monceaux VI, 145-189; S. Lancel, Actes de la conférence de Carthage en 411, I, Paris 1972 (SC 194), 208-221 (list of Emeritus's interventions during the conference of Carthage, 208, n. 5); PCBE I, 340-349; P. Langa, Actas del debate con el donatista Emerito. Introducción, bibliografía y notas, BAC 34, Madrid 1994, 569-614; S. Lancel, Emeritum episcopum Donatistarum post conlationem (Ad-) and Emeritus in AugL, II/5-6, Basel 2001, 801-804.

W.H.C. Frend

EMESA

I. City - II. Archaeology.

I. City. Emesa (modern Homs, Hims), on the right side of the Orontes river in a fertile plane, was a crossroads on the passage from the sea to the interior and *Palmyra, as well as a strategic point between *Damascus, *Aleppo and Palmyra. It was part of the Roman province of *Syria, coming under indirect Roman control at the time of Pompey and governed by a vassal king. It was named Emesa under *Domitian (81–96), when it came under direct Roman control. It also became a Roman colony with the typical structures of a city. Under *Theodosius it was attached to the province of Lebanese Phoenicia, of which it was the capital. It was the birthplace of Julia Domna, wife of the emperor *Septimius Severus, Julia Mammaea, and of the emperors *Heliogabalus (218–222) and *Alexander Severus (222–235), under both of whom the city experienced significant development in the first half of the 3rd c. The god Ba'al (Helios-Baal), of whom the emperor Heliogabalus was a priest, was worshiped there under the form of a black rock; the cult spread due to the favor of the imperial family, a temple being built on the Palatine at *Rome.

We know nothing of the Christian origins in Emesa, although the Liber Pontificalis (p. 134) says that Pope *Anicetus (154–166) was born there. We know of the teacher Julian who lived at the time of the emperor Numerian (283–284); during *Diocletian's persecution there were some martyrs, including Sylvanus, whom *Eusebius of Caesarea describes as bishop "of the churches around Emesa" (Eusebius, HE 8,13,3), and whose episcopate lasted 40 years (Eusebius, HE 9,6,1). Bishop Anatolius was present at the councils of *Nicaea (325) and *Antioch (341). During the Arian controversy the bishop was *Eusebius (died before 359), a writer praised by *Jerome for his style (De vir. ill. 91). Bishop Mark, under the emperor Julian (d. 363), destroyed a pagan temple and was imprisoned and tortured because he would not rebuild it; the church was turned into a temple of Bacchus (Theodoret, HE 3,7; Chronicon Pasch.: PG 92, 741B). The city was praised by *Julian for its paganism (Misopogon 7,28). In the late 4th c. the bishop was *Nemesius, an important theologian. Also born there was the Byzantine hymnographer *Romanus Melodus (d. after 555), who then moved to *Constantinople. *Simeon the Holy Fool was born and lived at Emesa in the 6th c.; *Leontius of Neapolis wrote his life. The episcopal see depended on the metropolitan of Damascus. When the head of *John the Baptist was found in a nearby cave (452) and was carried into the city, Emesa became an autocephalous ecclesiastical metropolis. After the Council of *Chalcedon (451), there were two Christian communities at Emesa: one *Melkite and the other *monophysite. The Anonymous Piacentine writes: "We arrived at Emesa, where there is the head of St. John the Baptist in a glass container" (46,7). In 969 the head was taken to Constantinople. Emesa was conquered by the Arabs in 637, who turned the church of St. John the Baptist into a mosque, which it still is today. In 1099 it was occupied by the Crusaders.

EAA 3, 326-327; DHGE 15, 397-400; DACL 4, 2723-2730; LTK³ 5, 260-261; Fedalto II, 736; Encyclopédie de l'Islam, vol. II, Leiden 1971, 409-415; J. Nasrallah, Saints et évêques d'Émèse (Homs): POC 21 (1971) 213-234; R.D. Sallivan, The Dynasty of Emesa: ANRW II 8 (1986) 198-219; W.J. Aerts, Emesa in der Vita Symeonis Sali von Leontios von Neapolis, in V. Vavřínek (ed.), From Late Antiquity to Early Byzantium, Prague 1986, 113-116; M. Frey, Untersuchungen zur Religion und zur Religionspolitik des Kaiser s Elagabal, Stuttgart 1989; L. Rydén, Gaza, Emesa and Constantinople: Late Ancient Cities in the Light of Hagiography, in Aspects of Late Antiquity and Early Byzantium, Stockholm 1993, 13-144; J.-M. Fiey, Pour un Oriens Christianus novus, Beirut 1993, 211-214; L. Padovese, Guida alla Siria, Casale Monf. 1994, 96-91; W. Bell, Rome in the East, London - New York 2000, 33-47 (Emesa).

A. Di Berardino

II. Archaeology. At Emesa is a 5th-6th-c. chapel with a mosaic floor; at Karm el-Arabis a three-aisled church with mosaic floors in geometrical designs, and a necropolis. During the restoration of the orthodox church of St. Elias, traces of wall mosaics were found in the apse. Inscriptions mention a church of St. George and invoke St. John. On the crosses are invocations to the Virgin and the archangels Michael and Gabriel; on one a person is depicted in the middle, others are funerary crosses. In the necropolis was buried a deacon and probably also a bishop with red vestments, as appears from the mosaic that reproduces it, of the Justinianian period (Balty, Mosaïques, n. 67, 144), now in the Damascus Museum.

J. Balty, Mosaïques antiques de Syrie, Brussels 1977; W. Bell, Rome in the East, London - New York 2000, 33-47 (Emesa).

B. Bagatti

ENCOLPION. As its etymology indicates, encolpion (from the Greek ἐν κόλπῳ, "on the bosom") was a general name given to any object worn on the breast, hanging from the neck, by ancient Christians for mainly devotional ends. A direct descendant of the amulets and bullae worn by the classical world to ward off evil and disease, the use of encolpia among Christians is documented from at least the 4th c., the time of its earliest literary references (Greg. Nyssa, V. Macr.: PG 46, 990; John Chrys., Hom. XIX ad pop. Antiochenum: PG 49, 196), but its use must almost certainly go back further, even to earliest antiquity. Like the term's meaning, the form of encolpia varies considerably. Generally small, they sometimes consisted of small containers (boxes, capsellae, flasks, etc.) suitable for holding fragments of relics; sometimes, more simply, of round medallions with a hook, round or rectangular plaques, symbolic figures, etc. Particularly widespread from the 5th c. is the encolpion in the form of a cross (pectoral cross), often containing a minuscule relic of the Holy Cross. The materials of these were also quite varied: gold, silver, bronze, lead, stone, ivory, crystal, wood, etc. Given their frequent character of reliquaries, encolpia were often richly decorated with figures from the usual Christian repertoire of symbols and biblical, christological or hagiographical scenes. Also frequent are inscriptions, often containing formulae of invocation. A long list of the many surviving encolpia is given in Wessel.

C. Cecchelli, La vita di Roma nel Medio Evo. I.1, Rome 1951-52, 43, 119-124, 128, 156-157; I.2, Rome 1960, 742-744, 916-918, 996-997; K. Wessel, s.v. Enkolpion: RBK 2, 152-164 (with ample bibl.).

V. Fiocchi Nicolai

ENCRATISM (from ἐγκράτεια = continence) meant a form of extreme asceticism, which quickly appeared suspect to the early church since it implied a rejection of the goods created by God for the use and service of humanity (1 Tim 4:1-5). This ascetic tendency, which rejected marriage and the consumption of meat, was widespread even before Christianity in *Palestine (Essenes), in *Egypt (Therapeuti) and in the pagan world (ascetic forms assumed from Cynicism and strands of late *Platonism). Such tendencies interested Christianity from the start, sharing as they did its esteem for eschatological virginity and chastity (1 Cor 7), but differing from it by the radicalism of their conceptual premises and by their having become typical of various heterodox currents (*Satornilus, *Marcion, etc.). It is doubtful whether an actual sect of Encratites (Ἐγκρατεῖς, Ἐγκρατηταί, Ἐγκρατῖται, according to different heresiologists) existed, at least at first; there was more a like set of behaviors and ideas, present among various currents more or less heretical or marginal to the Great Church, which rejected marriage, procreation, meat and wine.

According to *Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. I, 28, 1), these different tendencies came together in the doctrine of *Tatian, "patriarch of the Encratites," who gave encratism a more rigorous doctrinal formulation based on the doctrine of Adam's fall and damnation, involving the whole human race and transmitted through procreation, with features added from *Valentinian *gnosis. Encratite or related ideas appear in Syrian Christianity (such as the administration of *baptism only to those who professed complete chastity), just as there are denunciations and refutations of these ideas by various church Fathers (besides Irenaeus, cit., and III, 23, see Clem. Al., Paed. II, 2, 33, 1; Strom. I, 15, 71, 6; III, 17, 101, 1-103, 1 and passim; VII, 17, 108, 1-2; Hippol., Ref. VIII, 20, 1-4; Euseb., HE IV, 29; Epiph., Panar. 45-46-47, etc.). Precise traces of Encratite ideas are still found in fragments preserved by way of citations (e.g., in the Gospel of the Egyptians, in the dialogue between Jesus and Salome, cited by Clem. Al., Strom. III, 9, 63, 2-66, 1; Excerpt. ex Theod. 67, 1-4), and in various passages of the Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles (esp. Acts of Thomas, Acts of Paul, Acts of John, etc.), as in the Gospel of Thomas discovered at *Nag Hammadî. Toward the end of the 2nd c. an example of moderate orthodox encratism is given by the so-called Sentences of Sextus, a compilation of ascetic sayings of pagan origin that had been christianized. Encratic currents, flourishing in the 2nd c., continued in subsequent centuries. According to *Eusebius (HE IV, 29, 4-5), the leader of certain 3rd-c. Encratites was a certain Severus, of gnostic tendencies, whose disciples accepted the OT but rejected St. Paul. According to *Epiphanius (Panar. 47) there were numerous Encratites in *Phrygia and Pisidia in the 4th c. A certain number of epigraphs, considered as belonging to these groups, have been published, though it is not certain whether the encratism "referred to was actually heretical." In the 4th c., in fact, we see in monastic and ascetic circles generally an ever clearer recovery of ἐγκράτεια, which becomes almost the essential connotation of monastic life, though here and there it continued to arouse suspicions because of the radical forms it could sometimes assume. Various ascetic motifs which, at least formally, closely recall the encratism of the 2nd c. have been recognized specifically in *Messalianism, but even those were, at least in part, recovered by the Great Church.

On the sources for the history of encratism: H. Koch, Quellen zur Geschichte der Askese und des Mönchtums in der alten Kirche, Tübingen 1933 (first part); F. Bolgiani, La tradizione eresiologica sull'Encratismo, I-II, AOT 91, 1956–57; 96, 1961–62. On encratic ascesis: K. Müller, Die Forderung der Ehelosigkeit für alle Getauften in der alten Kirche, Tübingen 1927; A. Vööbus, History of Asceticism in the Syrian Orient, I, Louvain 1958; G. Blond, L'"hérésie" encratite vers la fin du IV^e siècle: RecSR 32 (1944) 157-210 (with republication and discussion of the epigraphs published by W.M. Calder and others); E. Peterson, Frühkirche, Judentum und Gnosis, Rome - Freiburg - Vienna 1959, 183-220; H. Chadwick (ed.), The Sentences of Sextus, Cambridge 1959; Id., art. Enkrateia: RAC 5 (1962) 343-365; Atti del Convegno "La tradition de l'Enkrateia," Milano 20-23 aprile 1982, Milan 1985; G. Sfameni Gasparro, L'Epistula Titi discipuli Pauli De dispositione sanctimonii e la tradizione dell'enkrateia: ANRW II, 25,6 (1988) 4551-4664; Y. Tissot, L'encratisme des Actes du Thomas: ANRW II, 25,6 (1988) 4415-4430.

F. Bolgiani

ENCYCLOPEDIA. By the term encyclopedia (Gk. ἐγκύκλιος παιδεία) the ancients designated, from the Hellenistic era, the group of disciplines that formed the indispensable basis for the education of the cultured man and, at a higher level, assumed the more specific function of a propaedeutic to the study of philosophy. This group, apart from occasional additions or subtractions, comprised as a rule what would become, over time, the well-known canonical disciplines of the trivium (grammar, rhetoric, dialectic) and the quadrivium (arithmetic, music, geometry, astronomy). The attitude of the Fathers toward encyclopedic culture was at various times well-disposed or extremely cautious, according to their different approaches to classical culture in general. Greek *patrology shows significant cases of appreciation and adherence, such as that of *Origen who, in a letter to *Gregory Thaumaturgus, exhorted his friend to put Greek philosophy and ἐγκύκλια μαθήματα at the service of the Christian faith; or of *Anatolius, bishop of Laodicea, who according to Eusebius had studied all, or nearly all, of the liberal disciplines.

Above all, it is in Latin patrology that we meet a genuine attempt to reorganize in a Christian sense the system of the disciplines (or liberal arts, by another name) that had first been given comprehensive treatment in Varro's nine Disciplinarum libri. If *Lactantius (Institutiones III, 25, 1) praised the function of the disciplinae as a preparation for philosophy, it was *Augustine who put forward a concrete plan for an adaptation of the Varronian encyclopedia. Of this project, a rough sketch of which can in some sense be traced in the excursus on the disciplinae contained in book II of De ordine, Augustine only succeeded in completing a Liber de grammatica (lost, at least in its original version) and six books De musica which, though limited to the rhythmic-metrical aspect, are the most prestigious treatise (in dialogue form) on musical aesthetics in all of patristic literature. Also linked to the encyclopedic tradition are the treatises of *Boethius's so-called quadrivium (only a De arithmetica and a De musica remain, based exclusively on Greek sources and with no explicit connection with Augustine and the patristic tradition) and esp. book II of *Cassiodorus's Institutiones, a sort of handbook for the use of the monks of Vivarium, which joins a summary treatment of the essential principles of each discipline to a list of books available in their own library. An encyclopedic compendium of great prestige throughout the Middle Ages—extended from the quadrivium to other sciences—was that contained in *Isidore of Seville's Etymologiae which, however, along with an ambitious plan of cultural synthesis, reveals clear lacunae due to the general decadence of the period. We cannot speak properly of an encyclopedic culture for the insular culture of the 7th and 8th c., despite the interest of the Venerable *Bede in disciplines such as arithmology, the science of nature and perhaps even music; we must await the 9th c. and the Carolingian Renaissance for the great syntheses of an Augustine, a Boethius, a Cassiodorus or an Isidore to be thoroughly and definitively included in the cultural development of medieval Christian literature.

Fundamental is the volume of H.I. Marrou, S. Augustin et la fin de la culture antique, Paris [4]1958 (It. tr. Milan 1994); see also U. Pizzani, Il filone enciclopedico nella Patristica da S. Agostino a S. Isidoro di Siviglia: Augustinianum 14 (1974) 667-696; Id., Il filone enciclopedico nel primo secolo d.c., in La storia, la letteratura e l'arte a Roma: da Tiberio a Domiziano, Mantua 1992, 191-216; Id., L'enciclopedismo tardoantico e le discipline del quadrivio: prospective metodologiche, in Metodologie della ricerca sulla tarda antichità, ed. A. Garzya, Naples 1989, 49-69; F. Della Corte, Agostino e il progetto enciclopedico, in L'umanesimo di sant'Agostino, ed. M. Fabris, Bari 1988, 89-117; A. Tessier, Il tardo enciclopedismo: alcuni motivi, in Lo spazio letterario della Grecia antica, I, 3, Rome 1994, 741-756; M. Díaz y Díaz, Enciclopedismo e sapere cristiano tra tardo-antico e alto Medioevo, tr. Aldo Granata, Milan 1999; L. Holtz, Arti liberali ed enciclopedismo da Cassiodoro a Alcuino, in Giornate filologiche "Francesco Della Corte," II, Genoa 2001, 213-230; G. Polara, L'enciclopedismo di Cassiodoro dai "Chronica" al "De ortographia," in ibid., 187-205; CPPM III/A, 11-14.

U. Pizzani

ENDELECHIUS (4th-5th c.). Severus Sanctus Endelechius, identifiable with *Paulinus of Nola's friend of that name (epist. 28, 6), was a Gallo-Roman rhetor active at *Rome in 395. Under his name an 11th-c. manuscript (now lost) transmits an amoeba-poem of 132 verses in 33 (number alluding to the years of Christ's life) Asclepiadean strophes under the title De mortibus boum, later changed to De virtute signi crucis Domini. It is a dialogue between three cowherds: Egon and Bucolus lament that a terrible plague of livestock (probably that of 386), after having devastated *Pannonia, Illyricum and the region of the Belgae, ravaged their district (probably *Gaul) and destroyed Bucolus's herd; he pathetically describes the effect of the disease upon his unhappy animals. Bucolus then asks Tityrus, who has arrived with a miraculously unharmed herd, to say what god has protected it. To this question Tityrus replies that his only remedy against the plague was the sign of the *cross of Christ, the god "magnis qui colitur solus in urbibus" (v. 106), impressed on the animals' foreheads. The sign of the cross and *prayer are efficacious, if done with *faith. Altars are not needed, only a pure heart. The two cowherds convert to Christ on the spot, and are ready to go with Tityrus to the nearby city to venerate the god whose "signum quo vis morbida vincitur" (v. 132) is also proclaimed as salutary for human beings.

The bucolic poem, which represents an important segment of Virgil's prodigious Fortleben, is characterized by the crossing of genres; it recalls, in fact, both the first Eclogue and the third book of the Georgics (one thinks of the famous description of the plague that afflicted the cattle in the mountainous province of Noricum), and Horace, though the meter has been changed.

CPL 1456. Editions: PL 19, 797-800; F. Buecheler - A. Riese, Anthologia Latina, 1, 2, Leipzig 1906 (repr. Amsterdam 1972), 334-339; D. Korzeniewsky, Hirtengedichte aus spätrömischer und karolingischer Zeit, Darmstadt 1976 (text with Ger. tr. and comm.). Studies: C. Weyman, Beiträge zur Geschichte der christlich-lateinischen Poesie, Munich 1926 (repr. Hildesheim 1975) 103-110; W. Schmid, Tityrus christianus. Probleme religiöser Hirtendichtung an der Wende vom vierten zum fünften Jahrhundert: RhM 96 (1953) 101-165 (rev. and expanded ed. in K. Garber, Europäische Bukolik und Georgik, Darmstadt 1976, 44-121); F. Corsaro, L'autore del De mortibus boum, Paolino da Nola e la politica religiosa di Teodosio: Orpheus 22 (1975) 3-26; T. Alimonti, Struttura, ideologia ed imitazione virgiliana nel "De mortibus boum" di Endelechio, Turin 1976; Id., Endelechio: Enciclopedia Virgiliana, II, Rome 1985, 219-220; J. Fontaine, La conversion du chritianisme à la culture antique: la lecture chrétienne de l'univers bucolique de Virgile: BAGB 37 (1978) 50-75 (repr. in Études sur la poésie latine tardive d'Ausone à Prudence, Paris 1980); C.G. van Leijenhorst, Endelechius' De mortibus boum: Hermeneus 51 (1979) 140-147; M. Barton, Spätantike Bukolik zwischen paganer Tradition und christlicher Verkündigung. Das Carmen de mortibus boum des Endelechius, Trier 2000.

A.V. Nazzaro

ENHYPOSTASIS. The word ἐνυπόστασις means both "actual existence" and "independent existence" (εἶναι καθ' ἑαυτόν) (Lampe 485-486). While in the first sense we encounter it as a theological term from the 4th c. on (see Epiph., Anc. 77-78), in the second it occurs in Byzantine authors exploring the Chalcedonian distinction between φύσις and ὑπόστασις. *Leontius of *Byzantium and, even more exactly, *Leontius of Jerusalem after him, develop the concept to demonstrate against *Nestorians and *monophysites that every concrete nature, while always being in a hypostasis, does not necessarily exist in its own hypostasis (ἰδιουπόστατος) (Lampe 666). Hence in Christ the hypostasis of the Logos is both the subject of the properties of his human nature and the principle of subsistence of this nature, thus uniting the human properties with the divine properties and distinguishing that man from all others.

J. Tixeront, Histoire des dogmes, III, Paris 1928, 151-159; H.A. Wolfson, The Philosophy of the Church Fathers, I, Cambridge, MA 1964, 414ff.; S. Otto, Person u. Subsistenz, Munich 1968; A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus II/2 (1989), 63-69, 204-208; H.L. Müller, Enhypostasie: LTK[3] 3, 673-674; C. Markschies, Enhypostasis: RGG[4] 2, 1315-1316.

B. Studer

ENNODIUS (474–521). Latin Christian writer, born at *Arles in 474 to noble parents. Orphaned, he completed his studies in N Italy, living with an aunt at Pavia. Beginning an ecclesiastical career, he worked with Bishop *Epiphanius of Pavia and was in *Rome in 502 with Bishop *Lawrence of Milan at the "synod of the palm"; in 515 and 517, now bishop of Pavia, he was sent by Pope *Hormisdas to the emperor *Anastasius at *Constantinople to try to end the *Acacian schism. Died 521.

A transitional figure, he had to face the problem posed by the Greco-Roman cultural heritage: to deny it or to incorporate it into the new Christian vision. Linguistic affectations and pagan-Christian contaminatio are present in his 28 Dictiones, scholastic exercises on sacred and profane subjects, and two books of Carmina. We have a sort of moral portrait of the author in his 297 Letters, both because of the importance of the recipients and because, despite frequent vacuity of form and content, a vivid sense of spirituality pervades them at times. Still more intimate is the autobiographical Eucharisticum de vita sua, which modestly echoes *Augustine's Confessiones, also promising a conversio from profane to sacred studies. The need for a Christian culture to counter the study of the classics is confirmed in the Paraenesis didascalica, a sort of ratio studiorum in prose mixed with verse. Historically important is the Panegyricus dictus clementissimo regi Theoderico, which transcends biographical or episodic interest to become a symptom and statement of ideological position.

The problem of the impact of the two cultures, pagan and Christian, resolved by a partial absorption of the former into the latter, had now been replaced by that of the preservation of the new cultural synthesis and the addition to it of the fresh energies of the barbarians. Ennodius intuited the importance of the entry of the Germanic peoples into the history of the West, as we see from the Panegyricus which, though a precious historical source, is also the expression of an illusion of Ennodius: he believed a Romano-Gothic syncretism was possible and saw in *Theodoric a defender of civilization, a man of Providence.

Ennodius's participation in ecclesiastical affairs is known through his Libellus adversus eos qui contra Synodum praesumpserunt, composed to refute the accusations, contained in a violent anonymous pamphlet, against Symmachus and the work of the "synod of the palm." In it, he combines the ardor of the orator with the subtlety of the theologian and the skill of the rhetor. With the Vita Epiphani and the Vita beati Antoni, Ennodius makes a dignified entry into early medieval hagiography, indeed he brings to it a new note of cultural commitment and critical sense which, by almost totally excluding the marvelous (rampant in the devotional literature of the time), brings the holy closer to the more accessible and imitable human dimensions. Ennodius's concern for church unity is clear from his antimonophysite Dictio VI, while his position on semipelagianism, to which he alludes in a letter to *Constantius and some passages of the Eucharisticum, is disputed.

CPL 1487-1503; PL 63, 14-464; A. Dubois, La latinité d'Ennodius, Paris 1903; G.M. Cook, The Life of S. Epiphanius by Ennodius, Washington, D.C. 1942; L. Navarra, Ennodio e la "facies" storico-culturale del suo tempo, Cassino 1974; Id., Contributo storico di Ennodio: Augustinianum 14 (1974) 315-342; M. Cesa, Ennodio: Vita del beatissimo Epifanio vescovo della Chiesa pavese, Como 1988; B. Marotta Mannino, La "Vita Antoni" di Ennodio fra tradizione classica e cristiana: Orpheus 10 (1989) 335-358; M. Carini, Due città per un poeta. Saggio su Magno Felice Ennodio, Catania 1989; S.A.H. Kennell, Ennodius and the Pagan Gods: Athenaeum 80 (1992) 236-242; W.D. Lebek, Deklamation und Dichtung in der "Dictio Ennodi diaconi quando de Roma rediit," in Festschr. A. Dihle, Göttingen 1993, 264-299; Ch. Rohr, Der Theoderich-Panegyricus des Ennodius, Hannover 1995 (MGH, Studien und Texte 12); S.A.H. Kennell, Magnus Felix Ennodius: A Gentleman of the Church, Ann Arbor 2000; S. Rota (ed.), M.F. Ennodio. Panegirico del Clementissimo re Teoderico (Op. 1), Rome 2002.

L. Navarra

ENTERTAINMENTS

I. Mime - II. Pantomime and other entertainments - III. Judgment of the Fathers - IV. Attempts at reform.

I. Mime. The mime is defined as follows: sermonis cuiuslibet imitatio et motus sine reverentia vel factorum et dictorum turpium cum lascivia imitatio, "the imitation of any speech and movement without reverence even of deeds and the imitation of scandalous statements with playfulness/lewdness" (Diomedes, Gramm. lat., ed. Keil III, 491). The actor, μῖμος, mimus, often imitated with vulgar gestures (mimica levitas) (Donatus, Ad Verg. Aen. V, 64) scenes from daily life. The actors were different, with a leader (the archmime); they were joined together in a society (collegium, sodalitas); they did not wear masks. A typical personage was the Roman mime, stupidus calvus (i.e., a senseless bald man), who wore the centuculus (i.e., a mime's garment) (Apul., Apol. XIII), a waistcoat with colored patches (Arlecchino), a short tunic and a tall, pointy cap. He performed the role of the adulterer and the mime of adultery, that of the priest and the mime-parity: in these representations, he was the protagonist. Moreover, he appears as the shaven jester, a victim in the mimes of adultery, and in the mime of the religious parody he appears immersed in baptismal water. The actresses present in the mime were from a lower social condition and of dubious reputation; they went around with their heads uncovered with wavy and curly hair (John Chrys., C. ludos et theatra, 2: PG 56, 267), they made obscene jokes with gentle gestures or sang wicked songs (John Chrys., In Iohan. hom. 18: PG 59, 120).

The structural elements of the mime were the dance, vulgar songs or crude chants, the choir of mixed voices, instrumental music with various types of instruments. The text was the point of departure for the representation and constituted the plot, although the remainder was improvised. At the beginning, as an opening act, the plot (fabula) was read, while a mime exhorted to benevolence; there was also a person in charge of getting applause from the audience (Libanius, Or. 41,7). There existed mimographi (i.e., composers of mimes) (*Jerome, Ep. 54,15: PL 22, 558). With respect to the mime, nothing else is known aside from what the Fathers said in polemic against them.

According to Reich, the mime could be classified in various genres: the mime of daily or real life, called "biological," the mime of the topic taken from mythology, and therefore "mythological." Moreover, the mime genre was recurrent in the exhibitions during the nuptial and nonnuptial feasts such as those convivial feasts (with ethereal, acrobatic and other types of dances) or feasts organized by the state or during the intermissions of the races held at the hippodrome or in the orchestra exhibited at the theater (Thetis mime or the mime in the water, *John Chrys., In Matth. hom. 7,6-8: PG 57, 79-82) or lastly in parody of the Christian mysteries, especially *baptism, like the one dating back to the time of *Diocletian at *Alexandria (Socr., HE I, 6: PG 67, 52; Arnob., Adv. nat.: PL 5, 271: de sacris semper eorum movet risus; Greg. Naz., Apol. or. 11,84: PG 35, 489). This type of mime flourished during the period of Arianism: "in the same theaters the Christian religion was mocked" (Socr., HE I, 6: PG 67, 51). Baptism and martyrdom were preferred themes; for this reason *Augustine set forth the problem of the validity of a baptism conferred on stage: an iocans . . . sicut in mimo, "whether joking . . . just as in the mime" (De bapt. VII, 53: PL 43, 242).

II. Pantomime and other entertainments. The structural elements of the pantomime were as follows: actor pantomime (actor-dancer, a mute person, who expressed himself by dancing out in the manner of a mime with musical accompaniment the ideas sung by the chorus); the chorus that sang the legend, fabulae salticae (dancing songs) with female or mixed voices; a musical instrument; the appearances; and lastly, the themes, which were mythological, especially the theme of adultery.

During the imperial era the entertainments in the amphitheater, the circus and the hippodrome were common. In the amphitheater, various types of entertainments were carried out: gladiatorial fights (ludi gladiatori); fights waged on horseback by horsemen carrying long lances; battles between the essedarii (war-chariot fighters), and lastly the venationes (the hunting shows). The Christian masses, along with the pagans, attended the amphitheaters (Emperor *Honorius in 404 sanctioned its demise, which had already largely occurred). In the circus and in the hippodrome, ludi circenses (i.e., circus games) and horse races took place; the latter were well known by Christians (John Chrys., De Lazaro concio VII, 1: PG 48, 1045). In Late Antique *Rome and *Constantinople, the various factiones of the circus (i.e., the company of persons acting together to run the circus) were famous, which often also had an influence on the political and social life of the city.

III. Judgment of the Fathers. The attitude of the Fathers varied according to the types of entertainments. *Clement of Alexandria considered the exhibitions and the gymnastic exercises something admirable, if practiced with moderation (Paed. III, 10: SC 158, 49), although he condemned the professional ethics of some entertainers. The stadium and the theater, however, were judged by some as "the cathedra of pestilence" (Paed. III, 11: SC 158, 76-77). *Tertullian regarded athletic games as idolatrous (De spect. 11,1-3: CCL 1, 240-243); some (such as boxing and wrestling) are violent while others are useless (De spect. 18,1-3: CCL 1, 243).

Their judgments on the circus and the amphitheater were more severe, inasmuch as watching a man be killed is almost like killing him yourself (Athenag., Legat. 24,4-5; Theoph. Ant., Ad Antol. 3,15: SC 20, 235). For Tertullian the circus and the amphitheater events were idolatrous manifestations (De spect. 7,2: CCL 1, 146-150) because they were connected to the pagan cult (the worship of the sun). *Cyprian wrote, "What show is there without an idol? What game without a sacrifice?" (De spect. 4: PL 4, 813). For *Augustine, the gladiators were public sinners (De fide et op. 18,33: PL 40, 220).

With respect to the theatrical entertainments, the Fathers prohibited catechumens from attending them because of their pagan, mythological, perverse and luxurious character; the actor is a person possessed. A trace of this prohibition probably also remains in the baptismal formulas (H. Waszink, Pompa diaboli: VChr 1 [1947] 13-41). Such entertainments were immoral (Clem. of Alex., Paed. III, 11: SC 108, 76, 77). To delight in the flutist, choirs, dances, Egyptian rattlesnakes, cymbals and timbales is disorderly and foolish (Paed. II, 4: SC 108-140). *Theophilus of Antioch condemned anthropophagia (i.e., cannibalism) (Thyestes and Atreus) and adulteries among the gods (Ad Autol. 3,15: SC 20, 235). For Tertullian, religious motives (idolatry) prevent a Christian from attending them in light of their baptismal promises (De spect. 13-14) and for moral reasons (De spect. 15 and 17: CCL 1, 288-289). For *Cyprian, the tragedy, cothurnus, represented parracides, incests and mimes (Ad Donat. 8: CCL 1, 290ff.). It is a scandal for the catechumens to see the same men filling the churches on Christian feast days and the theaters on pagan feast days (Aug., De cat. rud. 25,48: CCL 46, 172). *Basil of Caesarea warns the Christians not to pay attention to the entertainments and dissolute theatrical songs of charlatans (In Hex. hom. 4: SC 26, 80). *John Chrysostom recalls in this regard their baptismal promises that were incompatible with the "Satanic exhibition" (In Iohan. hom. 1,4: PG 59, 28-29); the average 4th-c. Christian, Chrysostom laments, gives less attention to Christ than they do to a pantomime (In Iohan. hom. 17,4: PG 59, 112): entertainments, musical lewdness, Satanic songs are placed by young people before spiritual songs (Id., In ep. ad Cor. hom. 48,3: PG 58, 491). John Chrysostom prohibited transgressors from receiving the *sacraments (In Matth. hom. 17,5-6: PG 56, 269).

Parents and educators should keep children far from theaters so that their children do not get molested (homosexuality) (In Matth. hom. 59,7: PG 58, 584). Adultery is not only the union of bodies, but it is also an immodest look (De poen. hom. 6,2: PG 49, 315). Actors are condemned for their conduct, looks and precious garments (In Matth. hom. 58,4: PG 58, 645). Moreover, young actors are regarded as suspect, because they are corrupt and perverted (In ep. I ad Cor. hom. 12,5: PG 61, 102). The theater is a loss of time, it habituates one to an unreal life, it is a waste of money, robbery from the poor, and it causes the destruction of marriages. Christians also bring to church theatrical customs: rude voices, sensuous movements of the body, clapping of the hands, stomping of the feet and immodest looks. They know the songs of the theater, but not the Psalms; the names of horses, but they are unable to identify which and how many letters the apostle *Paul wrote (In illus Salutate Prisc. 1,1: PG 51, 188). The judgment of the Fathers with respect to the theater is imperious: the theater ought to be condemned on the basis of the aforementioned reasons. It was untimely, however, for the Fathers to imagine a type of theater that was different from the pagan one that existed at that time; the passage to a Christian theater would demand its time, precisely the one necessary to later be transferred, through the dramatic homily, to the medieval liturgical drama.

IV. Attempts at reform. The Fathers committed themselves to offering new entertainments: the beauties of nature, the wonders of God (mirabilia Dei) contained in the *Scriptures, the contemplation of the spirit in its war against the passions, the ardent expectation of the ultimate realities, the vision in heaven of God: Spectaculum . . . Deus ipse est, "God himself is the show" (Aug., En. in Ps. 146,4: CCL 40, 2124). On the pastoral level, they valued in this regard the liturgical forms, like the singing of the Psalms: in all the churches, Christians sang with loud voices hymns and psalms to God (Constant., Or. ad sanct. coet. 12: PG 20, 1271; Basil., Ep. 107,3: PG 32, 763). In the 4th c., at *Edessa, responsorial psalmody and antiphonal song began, which was also practiced by John Chrysostom at Constantinople in the anti-Arian processions (Socr., HE VI, 8: PG 67, 689). Regarding hymns, St. *Ephrem in the 4th c. inserted orthodox words into the heretical songs (D. Jeannin, Mélodies, I, Paris 1923, 146); such hymns reached *Gaul from *Byzantium through *Rome and *Milan (Aug., Conf. IX, 7). Other liturgical forms include the visits to the monasteries: outside the city, amid nature, and listening to the singing of the Psalms; the Christian feasts: to Sunday was added Christmas, Epiphany and Easter.

For the Fathers, however, "every day is a feast day"; they intended thereby to break the connection between a feast day and a set day, which was a custom proper to the pagans. Another liturgical form that provided a substitution was the cult of the *martyrs: for the neophytes, the feasts of the martyrs were the compensation for their renunciation of the pagan entertainments and feasts (Greg. Nyss., Vita S. Gregorii Thaum.: PG 46, 954). The feasts of the martyrs were developed for the most part according to the following schema: a pilgrimage to the martyrion (i.e., a church that contains the relics of martyrs, marking the site of a martyr's grave) on the day of the vigil (often Sunday), the liturgy of the word with one or more *panegyrics (for the presence of the bishops) on the martyr, Eucharistic liturgy, followed by the agape (at times with abuses): everything was done amidst flowers, lights, drapes. The Fathers rebuked excesses of songs and dances, esp. in front of and at times inside the martyrion, intemperance in drinking and eating were the worthy object of repeated rebukes by the Fathers. Despite these reservations, on the whole, martyr feasts turned out to have been simultaneously popular and religiously appropriate. In the cult of the martyrs the translation of the relics reentered, at times at night, with phantasmagories (i.e., an exhibition of optical illusions produced with fire) of lights, even on the sea: on the occasion of the reception of the relics of St. Phoca, John Chrysostom exclaimed, "For the second time we make of the sea a church with torches, bathed with fire and fillings of flames with water" (De s. Hierom. Phoca 1: PG 50, 699), and in another circumstance, "The torchlight procession gave the impression of a river of fire" (Dicta postquam reliquiae, hom. 2,1: PG 63, 468-469). It was the spiritual Christian feast that buried the pagan feast. In the context of a martyrial feast, John Chrysostom, in the suburb of *Antioch, Daphne, would say, "Behold the suburb of the heavenly Jerusalem; behold spiritual Daphne!" (In s. Iulianum martyrem: PG 50, 672).

Lastly, the commitment of the Fathers was noteworthy with respect to music; for them, the musical instrument of preference was the human tongue. They generally prohibited in the worship service the use of string and wind instruments (Chrysostom allowed for the reed-pipe [tibia], lyre and bagpipes). In the liturgy, the lyre was perhaps allowed. Earsplitting instruments, however, were prohibited because, in addition to arousing the emotions, they recalled the ambience found in the theater, circus and the pagan cults (in the cult for Cybele and Isis, loud music was played to drive out evil spirits) and pagan weddings. The Fathers moved in this direction to offer Christians "new entertainments."

Imperial and canonical legislation intervened in order to prohibit certain entertainments, but not always with success. *Constantine abolished the gladiatorial games (anno 325; CTh XV, 12,1), and the other emperors did likewise from 357 to 397. Later, they took measures against the theater (CTh XV, 5,7). The church prohibited church officials from attending the games during wedding ceremonies (Council of *Laodicea 380: can. 53); actors were not admitted to baptism, and Christian actors were denied communion (*Elvira: can. 62; Council of *Arles I: can. 4 and 5; 397: can. 35).

Sources: works of the Fathers, especially John Chrysostom, PG 47-64; Tertullian, De spectaculis, ed. E. Castorina, Florence 1961; CCL 1, 227-253; M. Bonaria, Mimorum Romanorum Fragmenta, I-II, Genoa 1955.

Studies: H. Reich, Der Mimus, I-II, Berlin 1903; L. Friedländer, Darstellungen aus der Sittengeschichte Roms in der Zeit von August bis zum Ausgang der Antonine, II, Leipzig [8]1910 (Eng. tr. 1907, repr. 1969); F.J. Dölger, Sol Salutis, Gebet und Gesang im christlichen Altertum, Munich 1930; J. Quasten, Musik und Gesang in der heidnischen Antike und christlichen Frühzeit, Münster 1930; Th. Gérold, Les Pères, l'Église et la musique, Paris 1931; C. Hog, Les rapports de la musique chrétienne et de la musique de l'antiquité classique: Byzantion 26 (1956) 383-412. On entertainment in Late Antiquity: Enciclopedia dello Spettacolo, I-IX, Rome 1954–62; updated volumes: 1955–65; H. Jürgens, Pompa diaboli. Die lateinischen Kirchenväter und das antike Theater, Stuttgart 1972; W. Weismann, Kirche und Schauspiele. Die Schauspiele im Urteil der lateinischen Kirchenväter unter besonderer Berücksichtigung von Augustin, Würzburg 1972; O. Pasquato, Gli spettacoli in S. Giovanni Crisostomo. Paganesimo e cristianesimo ad Antiochia e Costantinopoli nel IV secolo, Rome 1976, 97-207; O.G. Brockett, Storia del teatro. Dal dramma sacro dell'antico Egitto agli esperimenti degli anni ottanta, Venice 1988, 17-84 (Greek and Roman theater); M. Carlson, Teorie del teatro. Panorama storico e critico, Bologna 1997, 43-51 (Roman and late classical theory); J.R. Brown (ed.), Storia del teatro, Bologna 1998, 25-59 (Greek theater, by D. Wiles); 61-104 (Theater in Roman and Christian Europe, by L. du S. Read); F. Doglio, Teatro, in F. Lever et al. (ed.), La comunicazione. Il dizionario di scienze e tecniche, Rome 2002, 1115-1122 (1115-1119: history); T. Lewicki, Circo, ibid, 214-215 (214: history); L. D'Abbicco, Mimo, ibid., 759-760; F.E. Consolino, Tertulliano e gli atleti all'inferno, in Ad contemplandam sapientiam, Studi in memoria di S. Leanza, Soveria Mannelli 2004, 163-170.

O. Pasquato

ENTRY of JESUS into JERUSALEM (iconography). Though this representation took its inspiration from the Gospels (Mt 21:6-9; Mk 11:4-11; Lk 19:32-38; Jn 12:14-16), it is actually limited to the final moment of the story (the apostles never appear searching for the mule and leading it to the Lord). This scene entered into the repertory of Christian art beginning in the 4th c., together with the image of Christus Rex in contrast to the image of the emperor. Even the iconography is modeled on the Adventus of the emperor in *Rome or in some other great city (e.g., Rome: the Arch of Constantine), but substituting the chariot of the emperor with a donkey that proceeds from the left toward the right. The representation consists of many elements: Christ on the donkey with a tunic and pallium, making the gesture of speech (recently interpreted as the sign of the Ogdoad); a figure in smaller size in a sleeved tunic with or without a girdle, who extends his mantle in front of the donkey (e.g., Ws 212,2; 92,2); the crowd that acclaims Christ while waving palm branches (e.g., Ws 141,1; 230,6); apostles (e.g., Ws 225,1; 92,2); a background of city walls (e.g., Ws 230,6). Sometimes there appears between the legs of the donkey a colt scampering along (Mt 21:5) (e.g., Ws 235,5; Dinkler, fig. 5).

Sometimes between the branches of the tree there appears the shape of a figure in smaller size

(e.g., Ws 235,5; 13). Some consider this figure to be Zacchaeus (von Sybel, Becker, Ws, Bovini), who, since he was of a small stature, climbed a sycamore tree in order to be present at Christ's arrival in Jericho. This episode, which, in Luke's narrative (Lk 19:1-6), precedes the entrance of Christ into Jerusalem, is translated into iconography by the presence of this small figure among the tree branches, and therefore, by a fusion of the two scenes. Others (Dinkler) hold that it represents the Hebrews ready to cut the tree branches that would be extended as Christ passed by, according to Matthew's account (Mt 21:1-11); thus, there is no contamination between the two scenes. Still others (Nicoletti, Bisconti, Cristini) hold that the fact of contamination can be concluded only in those cases in which Christ speaks to the figure between the branches, as is probably the case on the sarcophagus of Berja (Ws 151,2) or on a tile of the cathedra of Maximian (Volbach, n. 140). On the so-called sarcophagi of Bethseda (the most ancient of these is the Vat. 125; it can be dated to the last quarter of the 4th c.: Ws 230,6) the entrance of Christ into Jerusalem is always preceded by the call of Zacchaeus, which has independent importance and is portrayed with many details: crowds, wreathes, palms, city gates. Zacchaeus also appears sometimes by himself, portrayed among tree branches, as on a fragment of a sarcophagus of Arles (Dinkler, fig. 35) and in an ivory diptych of the Castello Sforzesco of Milan (Volbach, n. 111).

The scene was unknown in 4th-c. painting. Some think that there is one example in the cemetery of the Vigna Cassia in Syracuse, but the present condition of the painting does not allow us to confirm this. The scene appears in a fresco (first half of the 5th c.) in a hypogeum in S. Maria in Stelle (Verona). The representation of the entrance into Jerusalem reoccurs on ivory objects in Milan, Museo del Duomo (diptych, 5th c.) (Volbach, n. 119); in *Ravenna, Museo Arcivescovile (cathedra of *Maximian, mid-5th c.) (Volbach, n. 140); in miniatures of the 6th and 7th c., such as the codex of Rabbula (Cecchelli, Rabb. Gosp., pl. 11b), of Rossano (Muñoz, pl. 2), Corpus Christi College, ms. 286 (Wormald, pl. 4).

LCI I, 593f.; E. Becker, Einzug in Jerusalem: Strenna Buliciana, Zagabriae-Aspalathi 1924, 337f.; Ws 310f.; E. Dinkler, Der Einzug in Jerusalem. Ikonographische Untersuchungen in Anschluss an einem bisher unbekannten Sarkophagfragment, mit einem epigr. Beit. v. H. Brandenburg, Opladen 1970; A. Muñoz, Codex Purpureus Rossanensis e il frammento della Sinope, Rome 1907; L. von Sybel, Christliche Antike, Einführung in die altchristliche Kunst, 2 vols., Marburg 1906-1909; F. Wormald, The Miniatures in the Gospels of St. Augustine (Corpus Christi College, ms. 286), Cambridge 1954; Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarkophage. Erster Band: Rom und Ostia, F.W. Deichmann - G. Bovini - H. Brandenburg (eds.), Wiesbaden 1967; W. Dorigo, L'ipogeo di S. Maria in Stelle in Val Padana (Verona), in Saggi di Storia dell'arte 6, 1968, 9f.; J.M.C. Toynbee, The Early Christian Paintings at Santa Maria in Stelle near Verona, in Kyriakon. Festschr. J. Quasten 2, Münster 1970, 648f.; A. Quacquarelli, L'ogdoade patristica e i suoi riflessi nella liturgia e nei monumenti, Bari 1973; W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und der frühen Mittelalters, Mainz ³1976; A. Nicoletti, I sarcofagi di Bethesda, Milan 1981; F. Bisconti, La chiamata di Zaccheo (Lc 19,1-10): riflessioni patristiche e traduzioni figurate: Bessarione 6 (1988) 89-104; TIP 200-201, 307-308.

D. Calcagnini Carletti

EPHESUS

I. Historical notes - II. Councils.

I. Historical notes. Ephesus, a Lydian city at the mouth of the present-day Cayster river on the Aegean coast, recorded by all ancient geographers (see Ptol., V, 2; Strab., XIV, 1, 20ff.; Plin., Nat. Hist. V, 29, 115), was of very ancient origin (legendary foundation by Amazons). From the establishment of the province of Asia, Ephesus was its metropolis and seat of the governor: even after its division into seven lesser provinces under *Diocletian, Ephesus remained capital of the most important, Asia proconsularis. A city teeming with productive activity and commercial traffic, religious life (the local temple of Artemis was one of the wonders of the world) and cultural life (seat of the Mouseion, a sort of academy of medicine, as well as the famous library of Celsus), it was among the most flourishing centers of Christian propagation and one of the most important episcopal sees of the East. One of the best-known "Pauline cities" (Acts 18 and 19), held to be the home of the aged St. *John (a church was erected on the supposed site of his tomb in the time of *Justinian), it was one of the "seven churches" of the Apocalypse. Later traditions had it that the Virgin *Mary and *Mary Magdalene also died there; its people received a letter from *Ignatius of Antioch, written at *Smyrna while being taken prisoner to *Rome. Much frequented by pilgrims, it was the burial place of the so-called *seven sleepers, young men who—according to legend—went to sleep in a cave where they had sought refuge during *Decius's persecution and awoke two centuries later at the time of *Theodosius II (H. Leclerq: DACL 15, 1251-1261). With the creation by Diocletian of the diocese of Asia, of which it was capital, it exercised ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the diocese's 11 provinces, a jurisdiction recognized by the councils of *Nicaea (can. 6) and *Constantinople (can. 2) in 381, when it had 39 suffragans.

Bishops (note that at the Council of Chalcedon [451] Leontius of Magnesia declared that until then Ephesus had had 27 bishops, only some 15 of whom are known to us): Timothy, John I, Onesimus (martyr under Trajan), *Polycrates, *Apollonius, Isaac, Menophans (at Nicaea), Eventius (Macedonian), Menophans II, Antoninus (ca. 400), Heraclides (appointed by *John Chrysostom and deposed by *Theophilus of Alexandria: Socr., HE VI, 17), Castinus, Memnon (431), Basil (440), Bassianus (446–451), Stephen, John II, Paul (monophysite), Aetherius (monophysite), Hypatius, Andrew, Rufinus, Procopius, Eutropius, Abraham, Rufinus, Theodore, Stephen.

H. Burchner, Ephesos: PWK V, 2, 2772-2822; P. Romanelli, Ephesus: Diz. epigr. 2, 3, 1961, 2110-2127; R. Janin, Ephesus: DHGE 15, 554-561; W.M. Ramsay, The Letters to the Seven Churches and Their Place in the Plan of the Apocalypse, London 1904, 210-250; R. Tonneau, Éphèse au temps de saint Paul: RBi 38 (1929) 5-34 and 321-363; D. Knibbe - W. Alzinger, Ephesos von Beginn der römische Herrschaft in Kleinasien bis zum Ende der Principatszeit, ANRW II, 7; 2 (1980) 748-830; Fedalto 1, 113-114; V. Conti, Paolo ad Efeso: RivBib 37 (1989) 283-303; M. Günther, Die Frühgeschichte des Christentums in Ephesus, Frankfurt a. M. 1995; Efeso paleocristiana e bizantina / Frühchristlicher und byzantinischer Ephesos, ed. R. Pillinger - H.H. Reinhardt - J. Gunhild, Vienna 1999.

M. Forlin Patrucco

II. Councils. 400. A local council meeting at *Constantinople between 399 and 400 under the presidency of John Chrysostom had appointed a three-man commission to examine various charges against Bishop Antoninus of Ephesus. He died before the commission had deliberated and, at the request of the local clergy, Chrysostom presided over a council of ca. 70 Asiatic bishops at Ephesus, which elected the deacon Heraclides as his successor. Provisions were taken against simoniacal elections and six bishops found guilty of this crime were deposed and replaced.

431. The Council of Ephesus, the third ecumenical council, was called by Emperor *Theodosius II at the request of Patriarch *Nestorius of Constantinople. Letters of convocation were sent on 19 November 430 to all the metropolitans of the Eastern empire and a few Western bishops: the council was indicated at Ephesus for Pentecost 431. It was to resolve the difficulties caused by the teaching of Nestorius who, in harmony with the dictates of Antiochene Christology, did not agree that Mary should be called Mother of God (Theotokos) and had consequently aroused the reaction of *Cyril of Alexandria and the condemnation of *Celestine of Rome. Pentecost 431 fell on 7 June. On this date many bishops were still absent, including the Eastern bishops (i.e., of the diocese of the East), who were mostly of an Antiochene doctrinal cast and hence favorable to Nestorius. When they were known to be within a few days' journey of Ephesus, Cyril forestalled them and convoked the council for 22 June in the great church of Ephesus, dedicated to Mary. The majority of the bishops present—about 200—were hostile to Nestorius: among them were Cyril with some 50 Egyptian bishops, *Memnon of Ephesus with many bishops from Asia Minor, who resented the claim of the patriarch of Constantinople to primacy over them, and *Juvenal of Jerusalem with some Palestinian bishops. They started work despite the protests of the comes *Candidianus, the imperial official seconded to the council, who objected to the irregularity of the proceedings and in vain proposed to wait for the latecomers.

In just one session, after the reading of the Nicene Creed of 325 and of ample evidence relating to the controversy, including Cyril's 12 anathemata, the council approved Cyril's texts and the condemnation and deposition of Nestorius, who had refused to attend the proceedings. He was charged with this refusal and with his impious preaching. The Eastern bishops arrived on 24 June and, told what had happened, met under the presidency of *John of Antioch: they complained about the irregularity of the proceedings, stressed the dangers of *Apollinarianism and *Arianism which they saw in Cyril's anathemata, and declared Cyril and Memnon condemned and deposed. While they were awaiting Theodosius's decisions on all these events, Pope Celestine's delegates Arcadius, Proiettus and Philip arrived extremely late, having been ordered to conform with Cyril. Cyril reconvened the council and, at the sessions of 10 and 11 July, the Roman delegates approved all the decisions taken against Nestorius. At two subsequent sessions (16 and 17 July), the bishops meeting around Cyril and Memnon condemned John of Antioch and 34 other Eastern bishops and declared them deposed. Two final sessions, on 22 and 31 July, dealt mostly with secondary questions; at the session of 22 July the council laid down that from then on, no other formula of faith would be admitted than the Nicene Creed of 325. In the first days of August Theodosius's reply reached Ephesus: he approved the deposition of all three bishops—Nestorius, Cyril and Memnon—rejected all the other decisions and declared the council dissolved. There followed a period of confused and futile attempts at compromise during which Cyril multiplied pressure on the court in his favor, while Nestorius renounced his episcopal see and withdrew to a monastery near Antioch. A discussion at Chalcedon between delegates of the two parties bore no fruit with regard to the 12 anathemata, the point of greatest friction between Alexandrians and the Eastern bishops. Theodosius then declared the council definitively closed and authorized the bishops still at Ephesus to return to their sees, with the exception of Cyril. But he, by the time Theodosius's letter reached Ephesus, had already left for Alexandria, where he was welcomed triumphantly.

Ca. 434 and ca. 447. The 11th session of the Council of Chalcedon (29 October 451) examined the conflict between *Bassianus and *Stephen over the see of Ephesus. Bassianus maintained that bishop Memnon, jealous of the popularity he enjoyed among the Ephesians as a priest, had consecrated him bishop of Evaza to get rid of him, but he had not accepted the ordination. In 434 a council called at Ephesus by Basil, Memnon's successor, had recognized the invalidity of the ordination. On Basil's death, Bassianus had been elected in his place; but in 447 a council of 40 Asiatic bishops, meeting at the emperor *Theodosius II's orders, had declared Bassianus's election invalid and deposed him, electing Stephen in his place. Stephen claimed that, on Basil's death, Bassianus had irregularly taken possession of the see with the help of the mob, and that his consecration had been irregular. The Council of Chalcedon decided to consider both elections irregular and to elect a new bishop of Ephesus.

449. This council, later called latrocinium Ephesinum, was called by the emperor Theodosius II at Ephesus for 1 August 449. It was proposed to reexamine the condemnation of *Eutyches and the subsequent disputes between *monophysites and *dyophysites. Faced with the violent reactions of the monophysites, led by *Dioscorus of Alexandria, to Eutyches' condemnation, Theodosius had changed his position, originally unfavorable to Eutyches. Dioscorus himself was delegated to preside over the council, assisted by *Juvenal of Jerusalem, while *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, the most seasoned exponent of dyophysite Christology, was forbidden to attend. The council opened 8 August in St. Mary's church in the presence of some 130 bishops. The Roman delegation requested the reading of some letters of *Leo of Rome, including one, doctrinally very important, to *Flavian, bishop of Constantinople and adversary of Eutyches (Tomus ad Flavianum); but Dioscorus eluded the request. Subsequently Eutyches was cleared of every accusation and the dyophysite Christology, which preached two natures in Christ after the incarnation, divine and human, was condemned. Dioscorus then demanded the condemnation of Flavian and of *Eusebius of Dorylaeum, who had been the first to accuse Nestorius. In the tumult that followed, soldiers and others entered the council chamber. Flavian was severely beaten and died three days later, while Eusebius managed to escape; both were condemned by the council. At a later session, on 22 August, *Ibas of Edessa and Theodoret were condemned along with others, including *Domnus of Antioch, who had so far approved all of the council's proceedings. Thus all the Antiochene exponents of dyophysite Christology were eliminated, and Dioscorus closed the council by having Cyril's 12 anathemata read and approved.

Ca. 475. In the context of the pro-monophysite policy of the usurper *Basiliscus (475–476), a council of numerous Asiatic bishops met at Ephesus, including the monophysite patriarch of Alexandria, Timothy Aelurus (*Timothy II), who was passing through. The council upheld the rights of the metropolitan see of Ephesus against the primacy of the patriarch of Constantinople, sanctioned by the Council of Chalcedon, restored the local bishop Paul whom *Acacius of Constantinople had expelled because he had been elected without his participation, confirmed the pro-monophysite encyclical issued by Basiliscus and asked the emperor to punish the bishops who had refused to subscribe it.

P.T. Camelot, Éphèse et Chalcédoine, Paris 1962; 400: Hfl-Lecl 2, 122; P. Stockmeier, Ephesos, Synoden/Konzilien: LMA 3, 2050-2052; J. Vogt, Ephesus. Konzil u. Synoden: LTK[3] 3, 706ff. 431: ACO I, I-IV; Hfl-Lecl 2, 219-277; L. Scipioni, Nestorio e il concilio di Efeso, Milan 1974 (bibl.); A.J. Festugière, Éphese et Chalcédoine. Actes des conciles, Paris 1982; J.J. O'Keefe, A Historic-Systematic Study of the Christology of Nestorius, Münster 1987; J.A. McGuckin, The Christology of Nestorius of Constantinople: Patristic and Byzantine Review 7 (1988) 93-129; A. de Halleux, Les 12 chapitres cyrilliens au concile d'Éphese: RTL 23 (1992) 425-458; A. de Halleux, La première session du Concile de Éphèse (22 juin 431): EThL 69 (1993) 48-87; E. Reichert, Nestorius: BBKL 6 (1993) 629-633; H. Engelmann, Konzilsakten und Grabungsbericht (zur Marienkirche in Ephesus): ZPE 102 (1994) 185-188; V. Limberis, The Council of Ephesos: The Demise of the See of Ephesos and the Rise of the Cult of the Theotokos, in H. Koester (ed.), Ephesos. Metropolis of Asia. An Interdisciplinary Approach to Its Archaeology, Religion and Culture, Valley Forge, PA 1995, 321-340; R. Teja, La "tragedia" de Efeso (431): herejía y poder en la antigüedad tardía, Universidad de Cantabria 1995; B. Studer, La recezione del concilio di Efeso del 431: La tradizione: forme e modi = SEA 31, Rome 1999, 427-442; 434, 447: Hfl-Lecl 2, 479; 2, 757; 3, 755; 449: Mansi 6, 503-930; Hfl-Lecl 2, 555-621; DHGE 15, 574-579; Le Chiese d'Oriente e d'Occidente (432-610), ed. L. Pietri, it. ed., ed. E. Prinzivalli, Rome 2002; 475: Hfl-Lecl 2, 912-913.

M. Simonetti

EPHREM of Antioch or of Amida (his birthplace). Bishop of Antioch (527–545). One of the leaders of the Chalcedonian party in the time of *Justinian. Before his episcopate we know only that he was a civil servant, attaining the dignity of comes orientis. As bishop of *Antioch, he acted vigorously and systematically against the followers of *Severus of Antioch, making pastoral journeys and calling a synod at Antioch (ca. 538). He showed similar energy in subscribing the condemnation of *Origenism (synod of Antioch of 542; Justinian's edict of 543). We have mainly fragments of his works (very numerous according to Photius, Bibliotheca, cods. 228-229), which reveal a loyal but not particularly original follower of the *Neochalcedonian party.

CPG 6902-6916; DHGE 15, 581-585; J. Lebon, Ephrem d'Amid, patriarche d'Antioche (526–544): Mélanges d'histoire offerts à Ch. Moeller, I, Louvain-Paris 1914, 197-214; G. Downey, Ephraemius. Patriarch of Antioch: Church History 7 (1938) 364-370.

S.J. Voicu

EPHREM the Syrian (ca. 306–373)
I. Life - II. Works - III. Ephrem as poet, exegete and theologian.

Ephrem of *Nisibis (feast in the Syrian church 28 January or 1 February; in the Byzantine rite 28 January; in the Coptic rite 9 July; in the Latin church 9 July or 1 February, at present 18 June) is unquestionably the most important of the Syrian Fathers and the greatest poet of the patristic era. His original work is, with that of *Aphraates, an irreplaceable link in the chain of the Eastern tradition. Witness to a Jewish Christianity that developed on the fringe of the Roman Empire, he placed the biblical-semitic tradition and its symbols in opposition to the influence of Greek philosophy. His poetic genius, often badly imitated by his Syrian successors, still animates the Eastern liturgies today, and is inherited by the *Byzantine branch through the oblique line of *Romanus Melodus's kontakion. We will confine ourselves here to the authentic Syriac Ephrem: for the rest, see Ortiz de Urbina, par. 19, D. Hemmerdinger-Iliadou and J. Kirchmeyer, DSp I, 800-822, and K. Samir, L'Efrem arabe, État des travaux: OCA 205 (1978) 229ff. and M. Schmidt, Ephraem Latinus: ZDMG, Suppl. 4 (1980) 181-184 for the question of the translations and the tangle of spuria and dubia. This survey is based primarily on R. Murray, cited below.

I. Life. Born at Nisibis of Christian parents ca. 306. Ephrem grew up under the tutelage of Bishop *Jacob (303–338, present in 325 at the Council of Nicaea), with whom he founded the theological school of *Nisibis. Ephrem, once a deacon, became its main animator under Jacob's successors Babu (from 338), Vologeses (346–349) and Abraham (from 361). After the sieges of 338, 346 and 350 (Carmina Nisibena, Memre de Fide), the war between Romans and Persians resumed in 359 (Memre su Nicomedia); in 362–363 *Julian the Apostate was killed not far from Nisibis (Hymni contra Julianum). His successor, the orthodox *Jovian, ceded the city to the *Sassanids in 363. Ephrem had to leave it and move to *Edessa, where he continued his work of preaching, teaching and controversy until his death (373, according to the *Chronicle of Edessa). Various scholars have shown (against the theses of A. Vööbus, History of Asceticism in the Syrian Orient, CSCO 184 and 187 [sub. 14 and 17] 1958–60) that it would be anachronistic to make Ephrem a monk or an *anchorite. He was simply a "son of the covenant," i.e., a full member of the Christian community, or rather of its élite, having consecrated his life to Christ in abstinence and virginity. It is worth emphasizing how Ephrem was reclaimed from the monastic circles, which attributed a great many writings to him and were the compilers of his "lives," which they embellished with legends, e.g., a journey in the Egyptian desert and a meeting with *Basil the Great at *Caesarea (B. Outtier, S.E. d'après ses biographies et ses œuvres: PdO 4 [1973] 11-35).

II. Works. Except for the works previously cited, which contain some historical data, and the Hymni de Fide adversus scrutatores, which speak of the struggle with the Arians in Edessa, a chronology of Ephrem's works is hard to establish. In general it is preferred to classify the doctor's writings according to their different literary genres. Here we will cite only the main works, which have generally benefited from a recent edition, marking those whose authenticity is disputed with a dagger (†):

1. prose scriptural commentaries: (a) on Genesis and Exodus; (b) on the Diatessaron* (gospel harmony); (c) on the Pauline letters (passed down in Armenian); (d) on the OT and on Acts (Armenian fragments in the catenae); (e) Confutationes of *Mani, *Marcion and *Bardesanes; (f) Sermo de Domino Nostro; letters: (g) to Hypatius; (h) to Publius; (i) ad Montanos†.

2. metrical homilies (or mēmrē): (a) Sermones de Fide; (b) Mēmrē on Nicomedia (in Armenian); (c) Sermones in Hebdomadam Sanctam†; (d) a great number of passages whose authenticity can be ruled out.

3. hymns (or madrēšē): (a) Carmina Nisibena; (b) Hymni contra Julianum; (c) H. contra Haereses; (d) H. de Fide adversus scrutatores; (e) H. de Nativitate;

(f) H. de Azymis, de Crucifixione, de Resurrectione; (g) H. de Paradiso; (h) H. de Ieiunio; (i) H. de Virginitate; (j) de Ecclesia; (k) a mixed collection in Armenian; (l) H. de Epiphania†; (m) numerous inauthentic hagiographical hymns: the closest to Ephrem are de Abraham Qidunaya, de Juliano Saba, de Confessoribus et Martyribus, de Maria Virgine.

III. Ephrem as poet, exegete and theologian. Like an immense litany, Ephrem's essentially poetic work reflects an Aramaic and Mesopotamian Christianity, which appears terribly archaic when compared to that of contemporaries like *Basil or *Gregory of Nyssa. In fact the doctor of Nisibis is a privileged witness of the tradition of the primitive Persian church, which lived at the margins of Greek culture; he himself did not know Greek and he rejected the rationalism that was the prerogative of heretics, the "curious," whom he had to combat ceaselessly: *Bardesanes, *Marcion, *Mani and above all the *Arians. Hence, notwithstanding his vehement polemic against the Jews, his greatest affinities are with the Jewish, Jewish Christian and pre-Nicene "Asiatic" traditions (of which the school of Antioch would be, with that of Edessa, the main heir). His OT exegesis is often close to the targumic and midrashic traditions and, for the NT, he makes use of testimonia and typological parallelism, like *Melito of Sardis. In his poetic-contemplative approach to the mystery of God, though he betrays a secondhand knowledge of some Stoic themes and at times uses terms that would later become technical, such as kyāna (nature) or qnōma (person, hypostasis), Ephrem isolates himself in a radical agnosticism reflected in silence and humility (inner harmony); this preserves him from modalist, *tritheist and *subordinationist deviations, and led to his being adopted as spiritual father of different factions of the church in the 5th and 6th c.

The heart of his faithful search—concerned to preserve the integrity of human freedom and not simplistic, since he rejects from the outset the Scriptural "fundamentalism" of the speculatives—resides in his semantic openness, his polysemy of symbols, in the divine names drawn not just from *Scripture (King, Shepherd, Bridegroom) or from ancient Mesopotamia (Maker, Physician, Vital Remedy), but also from nature. Indeed the perfect harmony of God and his creation, rooted in the "dialectical" mystery of the Son's incarnation, opens the door to this analogical experience of God (R. Murray even sees Ephrem as the precursor of the philosophy of P. Ricoeur): "This Jesus has multiplied symbols for us; I have fallen into a sea of symbols, which show me in parables the *resurrection of the dead through every kind of symbol and figure" (Carmina Nisibena 39, 17). Hence Ephrem describes the *Trinity through the image of sun/fire, ray, heat; paradise through the images of Noah's ark, Mt. Sinai, or the different facets of the human being, God's likeness (body, soul and spirit). He speaks of the relation between the Father and the Son as like that between the tree and its fruit; of the Spirit who hovers over the *sacraments (*baptism, *orders, *Eucharist); of the *economy of salvation as a road that extends "from the tree to the cross, from the wood to the wood, from Eden to Sion, from Sion to the holy Church and from the church to kingdom" (H. de Fide 26, 4).

Ephrem's symbolic, christocentric method makes a systematic exposition of his doctrine difficult. Nevertheless, studies of different aspects of his thought have multiplied in recent years. We will confine ourselves to reference works and to the most recent works. Editions and translations: The old editions of J.S. Assemani (6 vols., Rome 1732–43, with Lat. tr.), the Mechitarists (4 vols., Venice 1836, in Armenian), J. Overbeck (Oxford 1865) and T.J. Lamy (4 vols., Paris 1882–1902, Lat. tr.) are now out of date. Recent publications are largely in CSCO; all those of Beck are followed by a German tr.

1. prose: (a) R.M. Tonneau, CSCO 152-153, Syr. 71-72 (1955), cf. T. Jansma's corrections in OC 20 (1972) 59ff. and 22 (1974) 121ff.; (b) L. Leloir, Commentarius in Evangelium Concordans, Syriac text and Lat. tr., Chester Beatty Monographs 8, Dublin 1962; Id., CSCO 137 and 145, arm. 1-2 (1953-54), Lat. tr.; Id., SC 121 (1966), Fr. tr.; Id., Commentaire de l'Évangile concordant. Texte syriaque (Manuscrit Chester Beatty, 709). Folios additionnels, Louvain-Paris 1990, with Lat. tr.; C. McCarthy, Saint Ephrem's Commentary on Tatian's Diatessaron. An English Translation of Chester Beatty Syriac Ms 709 with Introduction and Notes, Journal of Semitic Studies. Suppl. 2, Oxford 1993; (c-d) Id. in DHGE, XV, 595ff.; (e) E. Beck, OC 60 (1976) 24-68, Ger. tr.; (f) Id., CSCO 271, Syr. 117 (1966); Id., in OC 22 (1974) 76-120; (h) S.P. Brock, in Muséon 89 (1976) 261-305, (i) E. Beck, CSCO 334-335, Syr. 148-149 (1973).

2. metrical homilies: (a) E. Beck, CSCO 212-13, Syr. 88-89 (1961); (b) A. Renoux, PO 37 (1975), Fr. tr.; (c) E. Beck, CSCO 412-13, Syr. 181-182 (1979); (d) Id., Sermones I-IV, CSCO 305-306, 312-313, 320-321, 334-335, Syr. 130-131, 134-135, 138-139, 148-149 (1970-73).

3. hymns: (a) E. Beck, CSCO 218-219, 240-241, Syr. 92-93, 102-103 (1961–63); Fr. tr. P. Féghali, C. Navarre, Saint Éphrem, Les chants de Nisibe, Paris 1989; (b) Id., CSCO 174-175, Syr. 78-79 (1975); (c) Id., CSCO 169-170, Syr. 76-77 (1957); (d) Id., CSCO 154-155, Syr. 73-74 (1955); (e) Id., CSCO 186-187, Syr. 82-83 (1959); Fr. tr. Fr. Cassigena-Trévedy, SC 459 (2001); (f) Id., Paschahymnen, CSCO 248-249, Syr. 108-109 (1964); Fr. tr. G.M.A. Rouwhorst, Les hymnes pascales d'Éphrem de Nisibe, Leiden 1989; (g) see (b); Fr. tr. R. Lavenant, SC 137 (1968); Eng. tr. S. Brock, St. Ephrem the Syrian. Hymns on Paradise, New York 1990; (h) E. Beck, CSCO 246-247, Syr. 106-107 (1964); Fr. tr. D. Cerbelaud, Hymnes sur le Jeûne (Spiritualité orientale 69), Bégrolles-en-Mauges 1997; (i) E. Beck, CSCO 223-224, Syr. 94-95 (1962); (j) Id., CSCO 198-199, Syr. 84-85 (1960); (k) L. Mariès - C. Mercier, PO 30 (1961); (l) see (e); (m) E. Beck, CSCO

322-323, Syr. 140-141 (1972) and Id., Nachträge . . . , CSCO 363-364, Syr. 159-160 (1975). Eng. tr. of various hymns in S.P. Brock, The Harp of Spirit, Suppl. to Sobornost 4, 1975, and in K.E. McVey, Ephrem the Syrian, Hymns, New York 1989 (de Nativitate, contra Julianum, de Virginitate).

Studies: Dictionary articles: E. Beck: DSp 4, 788-800 (1956); Id.: RAC 5, 520-581 (1962); L. Leloir: DHGE 15, 590-597; J.M. Sauget: BS 4, 944-949 (1964); Ortiz de Urbina §§ 18-20, 56-83; R. Murray: Catholic Dictionary of Theology, 2, 220-223 (1967); Id., Theologische Realenzyklopädie 9, 1986, 755-762; K.E. McVey, Encyclopedia of Early Christianity, New York 1997, 376-377. Instruments: M. Roncaglia, Essai de bibliographie sur E.; K. Samir, Compléments de bibliographie éphremienne; S.P. Brock, A Classified Bibliography, ad loc.; K. den Biesen, Bibliography of Ephrem the Syrian, Giove in Umbria 2002. Monographs and articles: R. Murray, Symbols of the Church and Kingdom, Cambridge 1975; Id., The Theory of Symbolism in St. Ephrem's Theology: PdO 6-7 (1975-76) (= Mélanges Graffin) 1-20; B. de Margerie, Introduction à l'histoire de l'exégèse I, Les Pères grecs et orientaux, Paris 1980, 165-187; E. Beck, numerous articles esp. in OC and recent volumes of CSCO 391, sub. 55 (1978): Ephräms Polemik gegen Mani . . . ; CSCO 419, sub. 58 (1980): Ephräm Psychologie und Erkenntnislehre; CSCO 425, sub. 62 (1981): Ephräm Trinitätslehre . . . ; Nabil El Khoury, Die Interpretation der Welt bei Ephräm dem Syrer, Mainz 1976; J. Martikainen, Das Böse und der Teufel in der Theologie Ephräms des Syrers, Åbo 1978; S. Hidal, Interpretatio syriaca, Lund 1974; T. Kronholm, Motifs from Genesis I-II in the Genuine Hymns of Ephrem the Syrian, Uppsala 1978; G. Saber, La théologie baptismale de Sain Eprem, Kaslik 1974; P. Youssif, L'eucharistie chez St. Ephrem de Nisibe: OCA 224, 1984; S. Brock, The Luminous Eye (Cistercian Studies Series 124), Kalamazoo 1992, Patrologia V, 445-448.

F. Rilliet

EPICLESIS. The earliest appearance of an epiclesis in liturgical documents is in the *Anaphora of *Addai and Mari (Hänggi - Pahl, Prex Eucharistica, 380) and in the Apostolic Tradition* (ibid., 81). In both texts the invocation is directed to the coming of the Holy Spirit "on this your servants' oblation" (Addai and Mari) or "in oblationem sanctae Ecclesiae" (Apost. Trad.), so that the assembly may profit spiritually by receiving it. There is no mention of a transformation of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ as a result of the epiclesis. It is in the mystagogical Catecheses of *Cyril (or John) of Jerusalem that the role of the Holy Spirit in the transformation of the eucharistic species into Christ's body and blood is clearly indicated: "Then we, being sanctified through these spiritual hymns, invoke the merciful God that he may send his Holy Spirit on these offerings, so that he may make the bread Christ's body and the wine Christ's blood; what the Holy Spirit touches is sanctified and transformed" (Cat. Myst. V, 7: Hänggi - Pahl, Prex Eucharistica, 208). From the time of the Council of *Constantinople (381), which defined the divinity and consubstantiality of the three Persons of the *Trinity, this statement appears as a liturgical application of the conciliar doctrine. At Rome, whose eucharistic epiclesis is primitive in that it does not mention the role of the Holy Spirit in the transformation of the species, Pope *Gelasius writes: "Ad divini mysterii consecrationem coelestis Spiritus invocatus adveniat" (Frag. 7, Ep. ad Elp.). It should be noted that Gelasius could not have deduced the consecratory role of the epiclesis just from the Roman canon: it is probable that he had applied the Council of 381 liturgically to the Roman canon or that he was under the theological influence of the East.

The consecratory nature of the epiclesis is affirmed by many Fathers after the Council of Constantinople. *Gregory of Nyssa writes: "Though things of little value before the blessing, after the sanctification that comes from the Spirit, both these things work in an excellent way" (In bapt. Christi: PG 46, 581). *Theophilus of Alexandria echoes this doctrine when he says: "Dicit Origenes Spiritum sanctum non operari ea quae inanima sunt nec ad irrationabilia pervenire. Quod asserens non recogitat aquas in baptismate mysticas adventu sancti Spiritus consecrari, panemque dominicum, quo Salvatoris corpus ostenditur et quem frangimus in sanctificationem nostri; et sacrum calicem (quae in mensa Ecclesiae collocantur et utique inanimae sunt) per invocationem et adventum sancti Spiritus sanctificari" (Epist. paschalis an. 402, 13; Jerome's Lat. tr.: PL 20, 801). *John Chrysostom gives a similar testimony: "The priest is there not to draw down fire but the Holy Spirit: and he makes long supplications, not for a flame kindled on high to consume the offerings, but for grace, descending on the sacrifice, to kindle through it the hearts of all" (De Sacer. III, 4: PG 48, 642). In the West, *Gaudentius of Brescia affirms the same doctrine: "Ne commune et terrenum existimes sacramentum, sed ut per ignem divini Spiritus id effectum quod annuntiatum est, credas quia quod accipis corpus est illius panis caelestis, et sanguis est illius sacrae vitis" (Serm. II de Exodi lectione: PL 20, 858-859). *Augustine, who follows *Ambrose on the consecratory power of Christ's words, also speaks of the consecratory aspect of the epiclesis: "Sacramentum corporis et sanguinis Christi . . . non sanctificatur, ut sit tam magnum sacramentum, nisi operante invisibiliter Spiritu Dei cum haec omnia quae per corporales motus in illo opere fiunt, Deus operetur" (De Trin. III, 4, 10: PL 42, 874). *Isidore of Seville writes: "Oblatio, quae Deo offertur, sanctificata per Spiritum sanctum, Christi corpori et sanguini conformatur" (De eccl. off., L 15: PL 83, 753).

Not just the Fathers, but the Eastern anaphorae too confirm the consecratory dimension of the epiclesis: "We beseech you, send your Holy Spirit upon us and upon these offerings. Make this bread the precious body of your Christ, transforming it with your Holy Spirit. Amen. Make what is in this chalice the precious blood of your Christ, transforming it with your Holy Spirit. Amen. To whoever receives it, may it avail for sobriety of soul, remission of sins, communion of your Holy Spirit, fullness of the kingdom of heaven, confidence in you, and not for sin and damnation" (Anaph. Ioan. Chrysost.: Hänggi - Pahl, Prex Eucharistica, 226; cf. Anaph. Basilii Caesar. Byzantina: ibid., 236, 238). In these texts the epiclesis, as a consecratory prayer, is closely connected with the epiclesis of communion. Indeed we may say that the consecratory epiclesis does not stand on its own, but in relation to the spiritual transformation of the assembly in communion. The main interest of these anaphorae is not the transformation of the eucharistic species considered in themselves, but insofar as this transformation makes the *sacrament a communion with God. This is probably why, in these anaphorae, the epicleses of consecration and communion, which in the Roman Canon and in the new eucharistic prayers are distinguished into the pre- and post-consecratory epicleses, are combined together and placed after the account of institution. The explanation that the whole anaphora and not just part of it (whether the account of institution or the epiclesis) is consecratory remains a good one, but the immediate explanation of this problem seems to be the purpose of the epiclesis as conditio sine qua non of sacramental communion.

If the development of the consecratory epiclesis comes close on the heels of the pneumatological controversies, affirmations of the consecratory character of the words of institution appear much earlier. *Irenaeus of Lyons, e.g., says: ". . . eum qui ex natura panis est, accepit, et gratias egit, dicens: 'Hoc est meum corpus.' Et calicem similiter, qui est ex ea creatura, quae est secundum nos, suum sanguinem confessus est . . . " (Adv. haer. IV, 17, 5: PG 8, 1023; see also V, 2, 3: PG 8, 1125-1126). Ambrose, commenting on the words of institution, says: "Quid dicamus de ipsa consecratione divina ubi verba ipsa Domini Salvatoris operantur? Nam sacramentum istud, quod accipis, Christi sermone conficitur . . . Ipse clamat Dominus Jesus: Hoc est corpus meum. Ante benedictionem verborum caelestium alia species nominatur; post consecrationem corpus significatur. Ipse dicit sanguinem suum. Ante consecrationem aliud dicitur; post consecrationem sanguis nuncupatur. Et tu dicis: Amen, hoc est: verum est" (De Myster. IX, 52, 54: SC 25, 125, 127), and: "Quomodo potest, qui panis est, corpus esse Christi? Consecratione. Consecratio autem quibus verbis est, cuius sermonibus? Domini Iesu. Nam et reliqua omnia quae dicuntur in superioribus, a sacerdote dicuntur. Laudes Deo deferuntur, oratio petitur pro populo, pro regibus, pro coeteris. Ubi venitur ut conficiatur venerabile sacramentum, iam non suis sermonibus utitur sacerdos, sed utitur sermonibus Christi. Ergo sermo Christi conficit sacramentum . . . Vides ergo quam operarius sit sermo Christi" (De Sacram. IV, 4: SC 25bis, 82). Augustine follows the same doctrine when he says: "Panis ille quem videtis in altari, sanctificatus per verbum Dei, corpus est Christi. Calix ille, immo quod habet calix, sanctificatus per verbum Dei, sanguis est Christi" (Serm. 227: PL 38, 1099), and "Tolle verbum, panis est et vinum. Adde verbum, et jam aliud est. Et ipsum aliud, quid est? Corpus Christi et sanguis Christi. Tolle ergo verbum: panis est et vinum; adde verbum et fiet sacramentum" (Sermo 6, de sacramento altaris ad infantes 2: PL 46, 834-835). In the East, the main testimonies are those of Gregory of Nyssa (Orat. catech.: PG 45, 96-97) and John Chrysostom (Hom. I de proditione Judae 6: PG 49, 381-382).

In both East and West, affirmation of the consecratory character of the words of institution does not necessarily rule out the consecratory nature of the epiclesis: this is affirmed by both Gregory of Nyssa and John Chrysostom and, in the liturgical praxis itself, by the Alexandrian anaphora of St. Mark and the anaphora of Serapion, which have an epiclesis before the institution: "Truly heaven and earth are full of your glory, by the manifestation of our Lord God and Savior Jesus Christ: grant, O God, that this sacrifice too may be filled with your blessing through the coming of your most Holy Spirit" (Anaph. Marci Evang.: Hänggi - Pahl, Prex Eucharistica, 112; cf. Anaph. Serapionis, ibid., 130). The Roman Canon, in both its Ambrosian and Gregorian forms, contains a pre-institutory epiclesis (ibid., 450, 465). Though the Holy Spirit is not mentioned, its action of transforming the oblation into a spiritual (rationabilem) reality receives sufficient attention. Thus, even where the words of institution are considered the consecratory element of the anaphora, the epiclesis is always associated with them.

The existence of epicleses in other sacramental celebrations is attested by *Tertullian, who speaks of the sanctification of the baptismal water through the Holy Spirit (De Bapt. 4: CSEL 20, 204). Ambrose implies it (De sacr. I, 15: SC 25bis, 58, 60), as does Cyril of Jerusalem (Cath. Myst. III, 3: SC 126, 124). The prayer of ordination in the Apost. Trad. mentions the Holy Spirit received by the presbyter, the deacon and the bishop for their ministry (Botte, La Tradition Apostolique . . . , LQF 39, 8, 20, 26).

A. Hänggi - I. Pahl (eds.), Prex Eucharistica, Fribourg (Ch) 1968 (Spicil. Friburg. 12); M. Jugie, De forma eucharistica, de epiclesibus eucharisticis, Rome 1943; A. Chavasse, L'épiclèse eucharistique dans les anciennes liturgies: MSR 3 (1946) 197-206; B. Botte, L'épiclèse dans les liturgies syriennes orientales: SE 6 (1954) 48-72; Id., L'épiclèse de l'anaphore d'Hippolyte: RQA 14 (1947) 241-251; A. Marini, L'epiclesi nel canone romano: EphLit 90 (1976) 243-261; K. Gamber, Die Epiklese im abendländischen Eucharistiegebet, Studia Patristica et Liturgica 18, Regensburg 1988; R. Taft, From Logos to Spirit. On the Early History of the Epiclesis, in Gratias Agamus. Studien zum eucharistischen Hochgebet, A Heinz - H. Rennings (eds.), Freiburg 1992, 489-502; C. Giraudo, La doppia epiclesis delle preghiere eucaristiche, Vincoli di carità. La celebrazione eucaristica rinnovata dal Vaticano II, Bose 1995, 177-179; A. Thaler, Die Epiklese in der Eucharistiefeier: Liturgisches Jahrbuch 46 (1996/3) 178-199; G. Winkler, Weiter Beobachtung zur frühen Epiklese: OC 80 (1996) 177-200; I. Schinella, L'epiclesi nella Liturgia eucaristica della Chiesa latina: Liturgia 145 (1998) 29-50; J. Dricoll, Anamnesis, Epiclesis and Fundamental Theology: EO 15 (1998/2) 211-238; E. Lodi, The Oriental Anaphoras: Handbook for Liturgical Studies, vol. 3, Collegeville, MN 1999, 91-94.

A. Chupungco

EPICTETUS of Corinth. A contemporary of *Athanasius of Alexandria, to whom he wrote concerning the more controversial christological opinions in his church. Like his predecessors Hesiod and Dionysius II (to whom Pope Julius I wrote), Epictetus battled *Arianism. Athanasius, in his reply written after the Roman Synod of 371, expounded in minute detail the errors denounced by *Epictetus, and affirmed that the Nicene faith is sufficient against all heretical impiety.

CPG II, 2095; PG 26, 1049-1070; J. Lebon, Altération doctrinale de la lettre à Épictète de saint Athanase: RHE 31 (1935) 713-761; E. Ferguson, The Church at Corinth Outside the New Testament: Restoration Quarterly 3 (1959) 169-172; E.D. Moutsoulas, La lettre d'Athanase d'Alexandrie à Épictète, in Politique et Théologie chez Athanase d'Alexandrie, Paris 1974, 313-333; M. Tetz, Markellianer und Athanasius von Alexandrien: ZNTW 64 (1973) 75-121 (esp. 102-103; 108, 117-118); A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IVᵉ siècle (328–373), Paris 1996, 626-629.

Ch. Kannengiesser

EPIGONUS. According to the author of the Philosophumena (IX, 7, 1), our sole source on Epigonus, he, a disciple of *Noetus of *Smyrna and teacher of *Cleomenes, was the first to spread the *patripassian heresy at Rome. The etymology of his name (descendant) suggests that he is an invented person.

DHGE 15, 602-603.

E. Prinzivalli

EPIGRAM. By epigram is meant either an inscription proper or a brief composition rising to the dignity of an autonomous poetic genre, and present in Greek and Latin literature with an extraordinary variety of motifs and formal expressions. The epigram, renewed in content no less than in modes of expression, appears in Christian antiquity mainly in its primary meaning of an inscription—metrical or in prose, intended for incision or not, funerary (epitaph) or dedicatory in character.

Leaving aside sepulchral inscriptions proper, which are covered in the entry "Epigraphy, Christian," we will focus here on the literary epigram. The Christian literary epigram developed mainly after *Constantine, in the East with *Gregory of Nazianzus and in the West with Pope *Damasus (366–384). Between 357 and 385 Gregory composed a group of Epitaphs in various meters (elegiac distichs, hexameters, iambic trimeters), constituting a sort of "Christian Spoon River" (E. Bellini). Recalling many dear departed friends, Gregory revived the themes of Greek poetry and Alexandrian epigrammatic poetry (the transitoriness and unhappiness of human existence, the glory that accompanies one who in life has done deeds worthy of remembrance) in the light of Christian hope.

In the West, the ancient Roman funeral elogium, rising to new literary dignity, was revived and Christianized with Damasus, "the first great poet of the Theodosian era," whom *Jerome (Vir. inl. 103, 1) recalls as a writer of elegant verse. Damasus conceived the plan of seeking out, restoring and giving over to veneration almost all of the suburban monuments of the martyrs and popes of earlier centuries. He undertook excavations, restored catacombs and verified the authenticity of relics. In the process, he had the idea of increasing the fame of the monuments by having metrical elogia (some current in the Christian communities, some composed ex novo) incised on the restored loculi. The metrical tituli (almost all Virgilian hexameters), incised in the marble by Furius Dionysius *Philocalus, were a main attraction for pilgrims (who at that time came to Rome from all over the empire) and contributed to the spread of the cult of the martyrs. In addition to elogia we should recall the Versus ad fratrem corripiendum, an epigram not destined to be incised, which opens with an interesting reuse in a polemical setting of the incipit of Virgil's first Eclogue (Tityre, tu fido recubans sub tegmine Christi ~ Tityre, tu patulae recubans sub tegmine fagi), and warns the sacerdotes dei against the dangers of profane poetry. The epigram—in which Damasus demonstrates his capacity to use a linguistic code (Virgilian bucolic poetry) emptied of its original ideological values and rendered apt for expressing antithetical (Christian) values—proved to be a subtle and effective tool of religious propaganda among educated persons. With his verses, Damasus undoubtedly contributed to defining a new Christian Romanitas.

*Ambrose of Milan (374–397) had two churches built in that city: the first, built between 382 and 386, is the Basilica Apostolorum, later called S. Nazario; the second, built between 395 and 396, was dedicated to the martyrs and later named for Ambrose himself. To him is attributed the inscription in the Basilica Apostolorum, which in five elegiac distichs tells of the foundation and dedication of the basilica, in a cruciform plan, and notes the deposition of the mortal remains of S. Nazario under the altar of the semicircular apse. Ambrose is also the author of 21 hexametric distichs which were the captions of the biblical scenes decorating the basilica's walls; the perspective in which the bishop illustrates the largely OT scenes is christological and ecclesiological. To him we also owe eight elegiac distichs for the octagonal baptistery of S. Tecla, centered on the symbolism of the number eight, that of the ogdoad, indicating the day of Christ's *resurrection. Ambrose is also the author of two epitaphs in elegiac distichs, for his brother Satyrus and for Dedalia, sister of the consul Manlius.

*Paulinus of Nola composed metrical tituli, with a description of the architectural structure of the basilicas in which they were inscribed or with an illustration of the pictures adorning the basilicas of Nola, Fundi and Primuliacum, inserting them in his Epist. 32 to Severus. The importance of the illustrations and their respective captions is stated explicitly by Paulinus in Carm. 27, 580-585: Propterea visum nobis utile totis / Felicis domibus pictura ludere sancta / (. . .) quae super exprimitur titulis ut littera monstret / quod manus explicuit. Among tituli dedicated to persons were those for the priest Clarus and the youth Cynegius, buried near the martyr Felix. An unusual concept is found in this hexametrical elogium, supplemented by Mommsen, i.e., that on the day of judgment the martyr Felix will accompany Cynegius before God's judgment seat.

To so-called iconological epigrams belong the 49 hexametrical tetrastichs composed by *Prudentius to illustrate biblical episodes, which go under the name Dittochaeon (= double nourishment—of the OT and NT?). It seems by now settled that the two series of 24 tetrastichs each were to illustrate the OT and NT biblical scenes decorating the walls of a Spanish basilica, while the 49th tetrastich was to illustrate a scene from the Apocalypse painted in the basilica's apse (Pillinger); some, however, think that the inscriptions belonged to a miniature biblical codex (Recio Veganzones), or that they constitute a sort of iconographical anthology to be drawn upon as necessary (Quacquarelli). To this work are related the 24 hexametrical tristich compositions (Historiarum Testamenti veteris et novi Tristicha XXIV) of *Elpidius Rusticus, who lived at *Ravenna in the first half of the 6th c.; these were also for the illustration of biblical scenes.

A special place in the history of Christian epigrammatic poetry belongs to *Prosper of Aquitaine (390–455), who composed two epigrams against an unknown detractor of *Augustine; a satirical epigram, Epitaphium Nestorianae et Pelagianae haereseon, written after 431 (the epigram, once again a satirical composition, is put at the service of theological polemic); and 106 Epigrammata, which are a poetical paraphrase of the Liber sententiarum compiled from works of Augustine, written ca. 451 against the *Eutychians. Thirteen compositions (epitaphs, inscriptions for churches, eulogies of friends) in various meters (elegiac distichs, hexameters, Phalaecean hendecasyllables)—among which stands out the elogium in memory of *Claudianus Mamertus—are inserted in the collection of letters in 9 books that *Sidonius Apollinarius composed between 469 and 480. In the 6th c., while in the East epigrammatic poetry took on a bawdy and jocular character even in authors of undoubted Christian faith, e.g., *Paul Silentiarius and Agathias, in Italy *Ennodius of Pavia, the last epitaphista, author of 151 epigrams of varied meter and content, flourished. Besides profane elements inspired by Martial, in him we find Christian elements in the form of epitaphs, epigraphs for churches, encomia of clerics. Among Christian epigrams should be recalled the tituli composed by Ennodius, at the request of Bishop *Lawrence of Milan, to illustrate the images of the Ambrosian bishops portrayed on the walls of the church of S. Nazario; the poet attempts to illustrate the moral characteristics of the bishops based on their images.

Sepulchral and monumental poetry was very popular in *Gaul from the 6th c., thanks first to *Venantius Fortunatus (535–603/04) and later to Alcuin and the other poets of Charlemagne's court. Book IV of Venantius's Miscellanea contains 28 epitaphs (some intended for incision, others for reading, such as no. 26 for Wilithuta, wife of Dagaulfus, who died in childbirth aged 17, which has 160 verses). Venantius's epitaphs are laced with philosophical-religious considerations, including some of pagan derivation: the brevity of life, the precariousness of human affairs, punishment for the wicked and reward for the good.

RAC 5 (1962) 539–577; G. Bernt, Das lateinische Epigramm im Übergang von der Spätantike zum frühen Mittelalter, Munich 1968; G. Pfohl (ed.), Das Epigramm. Zur Geschichte einer inschriftlichen und literarischen Gattung, Darmstadt 1969; A. Di Berardino, Poesia e innografia nel Tardo Antico, in La cultura in Italia fra Tardo Antico e Alto Medioevo, II, Rome 1981, 493-511; D. Mazzoleni, Patristica ed epigrafia, in A. Quacquarelli (ed.), Complementi interdisciplinari di patrologia, Rome 1989, 319-365. - Gregorio di Nazianzo, Epitaffi, testo tr. e comm. di C. Peri, Milan 1975. - Epigrammata Damasiana, recensuit et instruxit A. Ferrua, Vatican City 1942; A.V. Nazzaro, Sui Versus ad fratrem corripiendum di papa Damaso: KOINONIA 1 (1977) 195-203; J. Fontaine, Damase poète théodosien, in Saecularia Damasiana, Vatican City 1986, 113-145. - Testo delle Inscriptiones et tituli di Ambrogio con tr. it. e note, eds. G. and I. Biffi in S. Ambrosii Episc. Mediolanensis Op. 22 (Milan-Rome 1994) 93-121; I. Schuster, Di una catechesi biblica di S. Ambrogio: Riv. Dioc. Mil. (1951) 19-30; O. Perler, L'inscription du baptistère de Ste. Thècle et le De Sacramentis de S. Ambroise: RivAC (1951) 145-166; P. Borella, L'arte a servizio della catechesi nella Milano di S. Ambrogio: Arte Christian 54 (1966) 73-80; A. Quacquarelli, L'ogdoade patristica e i suoi riflessi nella liturgia e nei sacramenti, Bari 1973, 69-70; Var. aus., Ambrogio e la cruciforme "romana" basilica degli Apostoli nei milleseicento anni della sua storia, Milan 1986. - G. Guttilla, I tituli in onore del presbyter Clarus e la datazione del Carme 31 di Paolino di Nola: BStudLat. 19 (1989) 58-69; Id., I Carmi 27 e 28 di Paolino di Nola e le Epistole 30 e 32 a Sulpicio Severo: Orpheus 15 (1995) 59-82; A. Ruggiero, Agostino, Paolino e l'epigrafe per Cinegio: Impegno and Dialogo (Nola) 8 (1990-91) 147-181; T. Piscitelli Carpino, Paolino di Nola: le iscrizioni absidali delle Basiliche di Nola e Fondi e la donazione delle reliquie, in T. Piscitelli Carpino (ed.), Fondi tra Antichità e Medioevo. Atti del Convegno 31 marzo - 1 aprile 2000, Comune di Fondi 2002, 109-163 (with bibl.). - R. Pillinger, Die Tituli Historiarum, oder das sogenannte Dittochaeon des Prudentius, Vienna 1980; A. Recio Veganzones, review of R. Pillinger, Die Tituli Historiarum: RivAC 57 (1981) 347-351; A. Quacquarelli, Reazione pagana e trasformazione della cultura (fine IV sec. d.C.), Bari 1986, 158. - F. Corsaro, Elpidio Rustico, Catania 1955; Id., Didascalia e tipologia nei Tristicha di Elpidio Rustico: Orpheus 21 (2000) 44-53. - G. Polara, I distici di Ennodio, in G. Catanzaro - F. Santucci (eds.), La poesia cristiana latina in distici elegiaci. Atti Conv. Intern. Assisi 20-22 marzo 1992, Assisi 1993, 217-239; D. Di Rienzo, Intertestualità biblica nel II libro dei Carmina di Ennodio, in E. D'Angelo (ed.), Atti della Seconda Giornata Ennodiana, Naples 2003, 91-107. - P. Santorelli, *L'*Epitaphium Eusebiae di Venanzio Fortunato (IV 28), in G. Catanzaro - F. Santucci (eds.), La poesia cristiana latina, 285-316; Id. Venanzio Fortunato, Epitaphium Vilithutae (IV 26), introd., tr. and comm., ed. P. Santorelli, Naples 1994.

A.V. Nazzaro

EPIGRAMMA PAULINI (5th c.). A poem of 110 hexameters, it appears in the Codex Par. lat. 7558 (9th c.) together with the Alethia of *Claudius Marius Victorius (to whom it was formerly attributed), and is today attributed to Paulinus of Béziers (Gallia Narbonensis). Composed after the invasions of the Vandals and Alans (407–409), which devastated S *Gaul, the Epigramma describes—by means of a dialogue (variously reconstructed by, among others, Griffe and Fo) between an old monk, Tesbon, and a younger guest, Salmon, who had previously lived for a time in the monastery—the regions of S Gaul devastated by the barbarians, lingering over the moral and spiritual decadence of those who did not grasp the lessons of the invasions, considered a divine punishment. The women, having abandoned Sacred *Scripture, amused themselves reciting Virgil and Ovid, dressing up as Dido or Corinna and applauding, in houses turned into theaters, declamations of lyrical orations and the mimes of Marullus (vv. 76-79).

The composition, which has significant points of contact with the Carmen de Providentia attributed to *Prosper of Aquitaine (composed ca. 416) and *Salvian's De gubernatione Dei (composed between 440 and 450), goes back—as Smolak shows—to two classical models: the satirical diatribe of Horace and Juvenal, and Virgil's first Eclogue; the pastoral setting is well adapted to the concept of the monastic life as an anticipation of the peace of Paradise.

CPL 1464. Editions: PL 61, 969-972 (defective); CSEL 16, 1 (1888) 503-510; A. Schuller, Das sogenannte S. Paulini epigramma. Einleitung, Text, Übersetzung und Kommentar, Diss., Vienna 1999; K. Smolak, Zwischen Bukolik und Satire: Das sogenannte Sancti Paulini Epigramma: International Journal of the Classical Tradition 6 (1999) 3-20. Studies: E. Griffe, *L'*Epigramma Paulini, poème gallo-romain du V[e] siècle: REAug. 2 (1956) 187-194 (with Fr. tr.); Patrologia III, 317-318; A. Gallico, *Note per una nuova edizione dell'*Epigramma Paulini: Studi Storico Religiosi 6 (1982) 163-172; A.V. Nazzaro, Paolino: Enciclopedia Oraziana, III, Rome 1998, 49-50; A. Fo, Il cosiddetto Epigramma Paulini attribuito a Paolino de Béziers, testo criticamente riveduto, traduzione e studio: RomBarb 16 (1999) 97-167.

A.V. Nazzaro

EPIGRAPHIC SYLLOGES. This term refers to well-known collections of inscriptions, which are invaluable because they report texts that have often been lost and that were of great historical, archaeological and hagiographical importance (think of the case of the epigraphs composed by Pope *Damasus, the originals of which have not been preserved, or of which only random fragments exist). The first in-depth study on these documents was composed in the second volume of the Inscriptiones Christianae Urbis Romae by De Rossi, who critically analyzed all of the very numerous manuscripts that were well known until 1888, which were dated from the 6th through the 16th c., also providing epigraphic comments and emphasizing their chief characteristics. Subsequent investigations on the epigraphic collections were undertaken by Silvagni.

By the 4th c. certain pilgrims had begun to copy for devotion and personal use inscriptions found in venerated places; subsequently small collections were made, prototypes for more extensive works, which equipped the first Roman itineraries. From the 9th c. onwards the original collections, which were already full of lacunae, became a source of inspiration for new compilations, in which, however, often noteworthy corrections and variants, even typographical, were inserted skipping over certain parts. These documents form the basis for subsequent anthologies, which were added in various redactions until the present. It was rather difficult for De Rossi to distinguish in the various texts the most ancient redactions and their sources.

The majority of the epigraphic collections contain inscriptions from Rome, and they generally subdivide into two primary groups: the basilicas, containing the dedications of urban and suburban sanctuaries; the cemeteries, mostly regarding the Roman catacombs, apart from some poems pertaining to the basilicas. According to Silvagni, all the epigraphic collections go back to two prototypes: the first from the 7th c., which originated along with an itinerary and was formed by cemeterial epigraphs, apart from a few basilical epigraphs; the second from the 8th c., composed only by inscriptions from St. Peter's Basilica and a description of the basilica.

The most important epigraphic inscriptions come from monasteries in *Gaul and *Germany, as well as from *Britain (Cambridge and *Canterbury). From other areas (for example, *Milan) only a few fragmentary documents have survived. The most ancient would be the epigraphic collections of Latin poems inserted in the Anthologia Salmasiana (ICR II, 238ff.) and dated to the 5th c., although the Collection of Tours is attributed to the first half of the 6th c., which gathers together the existing inscriptions in that sanctuary. Moreover, the documents considered most important and which are dated before the year 1000 are as follows: the Corpus Laureshamense (Vat. Pal. lat. 833), from two authors of the 9th and 10th c.; the Corpus Einsiedlense (Eins. 326) containing pagan and Christian texts; the Corpus Virdunense (Vird. 45), from the 10th c. Likewise worthy of mention, among the cemeterial collections, are the following corpora: Turonense, Einsiedlense II, Sangallense, Virdunense I, Vaticana, Centulense, Harleiana, Laureshamense IV and Laureshamense III; among the basilica collections: Laureshamense I and Laureshamense II, Virdunense II, Wirceburgense and Cantabrigense. The practice of composing epigraphic collections is attested until the 10th c. and was resumed in the 14th, contining almost uninterrupted thereafter. Besides that from *Rome, there is an epigraphic collection from the city of Nola and two from Milan (also containing texts of Pavia, Vercelli, Piacenza and Ivrea).

DACL 7, 1, 850-1089; 15, 1, 35-42; 1755-1756; ICR I-II, Rome 1888; A. Silvagni, Nuovo ordinamento delle sillogi epigrafiche di Roma anteriori al sec. XI, Rome 1921; Id., ICUR I, pp. XX-LVI; Id., Studio critico sopra le due sillogi medievali di iscrizioni cristiane milanesi: RivAC 15 (1938) 107-122 and 249-279; Id., La silloge epigrafica di Cambridge: RivAC 20 (1943) 49-112; P. Testini, Archeologia cristiana, Bari [2]1980, 32-36.

D. Mazzoleni

EPIGRAPHY, Christian

I. Christians inscriptions: A Late Antique problem - II. First manifestations of Christian inscriptions - III. The pre-Constantinian era - IV. The late imperial era - V. Devotional inscriptions.

I. Christians inscriptions: A Late Antique problem. Even a summary view of the substantial number of inscriptions (ca. 70,000 examples), for the most part funerary, that are conventionally defined as Christian allows us to easily verify that even those commissioned by Christians assumed the forms, functions and meanings that characterized Roman inscriptions of Late Antiquity. A funerary inscription, even in its conception and use by Christi fideles, had as its primary aim the commemoratio of the deceased, identification of the burial, its protection, and a response to that final oblivion, the secunda mors; it is the immediate result—even if formally mediated and homogenized by the stereotypical formularies—of the irruption of *death. It is not, on the other hand—at least at the level of general practice—the deliberate and explicit affirmation of a creed, or the premeditated reflection of a doctrinal principle; its existence is not due to an autonomous initiative of the new faith, but to an age-old tradition with respect to which—to use G. Sanders's fine expression—it appears to be a kind of "effect of salvation"; within the parameters of that tradition, expressions and signs found space and justification that gave life to a genuinely Christian particularity. In their formal manifestations, these peculiarities do not in general present any traces of system or rigor. Almost a refraction of a "work in progress," they seem rather to indicate, at least for common practice, that in the Christian communities "neither faith nor culture existed in a pure state, both being the result of mediations, combinations and compromises which constitute the inexhaustible richness of every spiritual conquest" (G. Sanders). The contraints of a complete self-referentiality appear to be completely foreign to a production in which, for at least three centuries (3rd-5th), there was a simultaneous interaction of "symbioses and metabolisms," reuses and transformations: that "dialectic between the ancient world and Christianity" (Auseinandersetzung zwischen Antike und Christentum) which is one of the most typical traits of the cultural and spiritual dynamisms of Late Antiquity.

It is moreover an indisputable fact that a very substantial portion (ca. 60%) of the inscriptions attributable to Christian buyers, and particularly in the 3rd and 4th c., present no traces of elements clearly inspired by principles and practices derived from the Evangelium vitae: for the most part funerary texts exhibited the sole functionality of indicating the physical presence of the deceased and perpetuating their memory via the inscription's text. The absence of objective textual or figurative "elements" traceable to a specific religious identity does not prejudice, in principle, the possibility of identifying the commissioning (Christian or pagan) of formally "neutral" inscriptions, in cases—of course—where it is possible to trace the find to an original monumental context (subterranean or open-air cemetery, cemeterial basilica, church) which, by its location in time and space, morphology, typology, is proposed as the result of a conscious initiative of the Christian community. In the final analysis, this leads to the formation of the principle that an inscription commissioned by or for an individual Christian—contrary to what was held for over a century by an essentially "partial" criticism, with little sensibility for the archaeological dimension of the epigraphical find—does not necessarily show specific identifying elements in the text or its accompanying figurative apparatus.

Presently in the Orbis christianus antiquus, the most substantial epigraphical complex is that of the city of *Rome (ca. 40,000 examples), to which can be added—with highly significant evidence, including quantitatively—numerous centers on the Italian peninsula (in particular *Milan, *Aquileia, Grado, Concordia, *Ravenna, Chiusi, Bolsena, Eclano, Tropea), Sicily, *Sardinia, *Spain, *Gaul, *Africa, *Asia Minor, *Syria, Greece, *Dalmatia.

II. First manifestations of Christian inscriptions. The oldest manifestations of Christian inscriptions can likely be attributed to the second half of the 2nd c. and the early 3rd c. These were a relatively limited group of funerary texts that seem to document the phase, in fact not easily defined in all of its components, in which individuals of Christian faith had their own tombs prepared and the respective memorial written in pagan burial areas. Real or presumed "signs" of Christian belonging would, in the opinion of some, be identified in the presence of symbols, figurative themes or locutions containing more or less veiled allusions to the new faith, inserted—generally in a disorganized way (which has aroused and continues to arouse some legitimate suspicions)—in the context of the normative textual structures of 2nd- and 3rd-c. pagan practice. One fact that is certain is that the original use of these (sometimes reused) materials can be traced to sub divo funerary areas, i.e., in the open, as is clearly indicated by supports composed either of stelae or of sarcophagus covers.

From excavations in the Vatican necropolis come some inscriptions exemplifying which, and how many, elements of uncertainty remain for an objective evaluation of this evidence. The example with the greatest evidence—and perhaps the most famous—is the stele of Licinia Amias (ICUR II 4246), whose inscription, introduced by the traditional dedication dis Manibus, is preceded by the image of two fishes opposite an anchor and by the exegetical inscription ἰχθὺς ζώντων ("fish of the living"); the christological meaning is implied in the acrostic Ἰ(ησοῦς) Χ(ριστὸς) Θ(εοῦ) Υ(ἱὸς) Σ(ωτήρ), "Jesus Christ, God's Son, Savior." It must be observed, however, that this stele was reused at least twice already in ancient times, since it shows an obvious deepening of the level of the writing in the part containing the Latin dedication (Liciniae Amiati be/nemerenti vixit [- - -]), as though preceded by the wearing away of an earlier text; the insertion of the Greek writing and the relative figurative apparatus thus seems to be a later intervention, nothing about which says that it must necessarily be attributed to the ancient world.

From the same Vatican burial area come two sarcophagi with inscriptions, that of Livia Primitiva (ICUR II 4212) and that dedicated by Saturninus and Musa (ICUR II 4224) to their son, generally attributed to individuals of Christian faith: in neither case do the text or the figurative themes represented (fish, anchor, shepherd, sheep, a veiled woman praying) appear to be decisive arguments in favor of a Christian commissioning, also because, in both cases, we do not know their primitive monumental context. Similar reservations can be advanced for the stelae of Τολλία Ἀσκληπιακή (ICUR X 26971), of Aegrilius Bottus Philadespotus (ICUR V 15360) with anchor and fish below the inscription, of Iulia Calliste (ICUR 3.2.1), which presents in the lower part the enigmatic and perhaps later sign P IH XP.

On the other hand, no doubts about attribution

seem to remain for the small black stele of Πρῶτος (ICUR X 27233), with the inscription ἐν ἁγίῳ | πνεύμα|τι θεοῦ | ἐνθάδε | κεῖται ("Here rests Proto in the Holy Spirit of God"); or for the sarcophagus dedicated in 217 to Prosenes, a powerful former imperial slave at the court of *Marcus Aurelius and *Commodus, whose date of death is introduced by receptus ad deum (ICUR VI 17246); or for the memorial erected between 198 and 211 by Alexander | augg(ustorum) ser(vus) to his son Marcus, which concludes with a plea to the brothers in the faith not to tamper with the grave: peto a bobis [scil. vobis] | fratres boni per | unum deum ne quis | <h>u<nc> titelo [scil. titulum] moles[tet] (ICUR X 27126). Perhaps also commissioned by Christians are the 18 inscriptions found in the cemetery of the "Piazzola" under the memoria apostolorum on the Via Appia where, into a pagan complex which arose in the mid 2nd c., a Christian presence was inserted between the late 2nd and early 3rd c., as we are led to suppose by a painting with a gospel theme (the Gerasene demoniac? But recent research following a restoration raises serious questions regarding this identification) and a graffito with the acrostic I{T}ΧΘΥΣ (ICUR V 12889), intersected by a T (an altered cross?). The users of this cemetery belonged mostly to two nuclear families, the Ancotii and the Ulpii, who commissioned Latin and Greek inscriptions (ICUR V 12890-12905) characterized by an evident formal and technically executed homogeneity, e.g., the systematic absence of the dedication dis Manibus and the presence of the figurative module fish-anchor, which, moreover, on the basis of the fundamental research (too often ignored) of F.J. Dölger and some recent acquisitions, in no way can be considered to be of exclusively Christians use, as indicated by numerous examples of their use in pagan inscriptions (Carletti 2000). Serious doubts of attribution can also be raised for other epigraphical evidence outside Rome: e.g., two stelae of Classe (2nd-3rd c.), at Antifonte (CIL XI 320) and at Valeria Maria (CIL XI 332), in which neither the presence in the pediment of the shepherd, fish and a disc surrounded by rays (read by some as a christogram) are elements sufficient to indicate a Christian origin; for the same reasons (the presence in the figurative apparatus of fish or presumed doves), it seems rash to consider some stelae of *Edessa in Macedonia as Christian (Feissel n. 7).

Clearly excluded as Christian inscriptions—as already indicated by Ferrua (1978, 601)—are some inscriptions of *Arles and *Lyons, characterized respectively by the presence of the binomial fish-anchor and by a presumed Pythagorean Ψ. Likewise in Africa, where Monceaux believed he had identified certainly Christian 3rd-c. inscriptions, the most recent critics, esp. Février and Duval, have reconsidered in depth the presumed criteria of attribution which, e.g., had led the inscription of Magnia Crescentina (Tipasa, CIL VIII 20892) to be considered as Christian due to the presence of an anchor and a dove, or that of Rasinia Secunda (CIL VIII 9289), due to the obituary formula reddidit followed by the date.

III. The pre-Constantinian era. In ca. 200, an act fundamental for the history of the Christian community was formalized at Rome under *Septimius Severus. Pope *Zephyrinus (198–217) put his deacon Callistus, an ex-slave, in charge of the administration of an underground burial area on the Via Appia, the future cemetery of St. Callistus (the evidence regarding the entrustment to Callistus of the coemeterium on the Via Appia [εἰς τὸ κοιμητήριον κατέστησεν] is reported by ps.-Hippolytus, Philosophumena IX, 12: GCS 26, 3, 248). This was the act establishing a communitarian cemetery of the Christians, whose distinctive character with respect to contemporary practice was in the substantial change in statute: no longer a cemetery for the nobility or a corporate one, but comunitarian, and therefore open without distinction to all members of the faith, independent of their social extraction. Over the next fifty years other underground funerary areas were added, encircling the city in its immediate suburbs along the Vias Appia, Ardeatina, Tiburtina, Salaria, Nomentana and Aurelia. The characteristic of these locations—already called coemeteria in the 3rd c., as we have seen—of ownership by the Christian community, or in any case for its exclusive use, are seen, not only in some morphological, topographical and administrative-organizational aspects of the areas for receiving the dead (generally galleries with wall loculi), but also and especially in many aspects of the forms and ways of "inscribing death."

The most surprising fact that we garner from a first reading of these inscriptions is the very high percentage of texts (83%) that, at least apparently, present no Christian or pagan connotation (dedication to Mani or others): thus inscriptions that, at least provisionally, we are led to define as "neutral," though commissioned by individuals of Christian faith and destined for cemeteries belonging to the community. The other large-scale phenomenon is the high percentage (62%) of inscriptions that present only the name of the deceased with a structure that we may call "nomen singulum." If the percentages pertaining to the onomastic system (cognomina singula 62%, duo nomina 34%, tria nomina 4%) on the one hand fit coherently into the general process of the dissolution of the traditional onomastic system and consequent establishment of the "single name system," on the other hand they seem to coherently reflect the actual social composition of the communities, which were predominantly composed of elements from the lower-middle class and with a substantial servile component.

In these inscriptions, generally assignable to between 200 and the beginning of the Constantinian era, an explicit sign of the new faith recurs sporadically (17%) in the form of locutions based on the terms pax—εἰρήνη (pax tibi, pax tecum, εἰρήνη σοι, εἰρήνη σου), which seem to function as formulae of greeting, in this case a farewell to the survivors of the deceased: Caelestina | pax (ICUR IX 25046), Filumena pax tecum (ICUR VIII 23243), pax tecum Priv|ata (ICUR IX 25457), Κρησκεντῖνα εἰρήνη σοι (ICUR IX 26087). These directly take up the contemporary formula of greeting in the community, whose antecedent was the Hebrew shalom, but which finds its conceptual root and thus its justification in the NT writings, where pax marks greetings among the living in a Christian sense. Thus we have a process of transposition from the world of the living to that of the dead which, on the formal level, found its most immediate epigraphical antecedent in the pagan practice which, at the foot of the inscription, sometimes included locutions such as salve, ave, vale, χαῖρε, addressed to the deceased: exemplary in this sense is an inscription in the catacomb of Priscilla in which both forms of greeting, the classical and the Christian, are combined: Leonti p|ax a fra|tribus | vale (ICUR IX 25319). Contemporaneously with the appearance of these formulary modules came more articulate expressions and, especially, the irenic formula par excellence—ἐν εἰρήνῃ, which would accompany early Christian epigraphical production until the end (6th c.) of its course.

The characteristics that can be observed in Roman inscriptions recur systematically in other centers as well, which preserve early Christian funerary sites certainly attributable to the pre-Constantinian era: thus the structure of the singulum name, accompanied or not by an irenic formula, is found at Naples in the vestibule of the catacomb of S. Gennaro, at Syracuse in the complex of S. Maria del Gesù (Vigna Cassia), at Hadrumetum (modern-day Sousse) in the catacomb of the Good Shepherd, in Provence at Arles and Vaison-la-Romaine, at Amiens and at Autun. Entirely atypical and appearing nowhere else are the elements that characterize the pre-Constantinian inscriptions of the Aegean island of Thera, where the text of the inscription is composed of ἄγγελος followed by the name of the deceased, and of those of the Tembris Valley (Phrygia), where the inscription includes the initial or specifying formula Χρειστιανοὶ Χρειστιανοῖς "Christians [did this] to Christians."

During the pre-Constantinian era Christian inscriptions mainly showed a textual plan reduced to the indispensable minimum, which was substantially different from prevalent contemporary pagan practice, which, in the course of the 3rd c., had reached the maximum of its textual articulation with the insertion of multiple facts remembering the deceased and their survivors, i.e., those who dedicated the tomb. De Rossi, who dedicated many years of his activity to the study of primitive Christian cemeterial nuclei, of course noticed this evidence, limiting himself to comment on "a laconic and mysterious quality in early Christian inscriptions." But there was nothing mysterious in this practice, much less crypto-Christian; it was rather a clearly defined ideological choice that touched on the mode of being and appearance of the Christian community in society: the ideological referent seems to be the Pauline precept of Gal 3:28: "there is neither Jew nor Greek, neither slave nor free, neither man nor woman, because you are all one in Jesus Christ." The rigorous consistency of this approach, wholly communitarian, finds a further extraordinary epigraphical "translation" in the oldest pontifical cemetery, that of area I in St. Callistus, where the inscriptions of the leaders of the 3rd-c. community (from Pontian d. 235 to Gaius d. 296: ICUR IV 10670, 10558, 10694, 10645, 10616, 10584) differ in nothing from those of the common faithful; for them too, only the individual element, the name, is registered; no space whatsoever is given to any other retrospective data, and even the minimal elogium, the benemerenti, is lacking. These are the tangible effects of what was maturing in the church of Rome, and probably also in other centers, between the late 2nd and early 3rd c.: first, the transition from collegial (presbyterial) government to the monarchical and centralized government begun under the pontificate of *Victor (188–198), which seems to explain a widespread prevalence of homogenous inscriptions, probably inspired and controlled from above; second, the establishment, in particular by Callistus, of a new and prevailing ideology of being church: not the elite, educated, rigorist, select community longed for by ps.-*Hippolytus and *Novatian, but an open community with a strong and varied popular component, which saw itself reflected in the image of Noah's Ark, in which all the animals (the pure and the impure) found equal acceptance: this image of the community is that which seems to shine through 3rd-c. funerary inscriptions taken as a whole.

IV. The late imperial era. A presentation, though summary, of Christian inscriptions in the centuries of the late imperial era (4th-5th c.) must consider from the outset the new situations in which the Church of Rome (as an institution and as a community) would find itself in the aftermath of religious pacification. One emerging phenomenon—perhaps the most dramatic in its extension and consequences—was that of mass conversion. In accepting a large number of new members, the communities de facto accepted in their milieu the coexistence of a rooted pagan formation with an as yet immature, perhaps superficial and at times even calculated, adherence to the new faith: St. *Jerome, for example, denounced the fact that, among the new converts, many were Christians "in name only" (Ep. 45, 4, 2 anno 385; 125, 6, 3 anno 411). Faced with this phenomenon the church diligently increased its catechetical activities, widely using not just oral communication, but written. It is during this period that the Christians first widely adopted the new form of the book (the codex), and it was also during this period that saw in the Latin church the extremely rapid spread of a new graphical style in books, uncial script, which already in the course of the 4th c. had begun to be used in inscriptions, through the mediation of ecclesiastics. The church, heir to the middling-to-high level of written culture in the society of the middle imperial period, came to propose itself, perhaps even unconsciously (this was not its main objective), as the element of "continuity" during a time in which, for the exercise of its own mandate, it succeeded in "maintaining the diffusion of writing at a high level in the lower classes of society even in centuries, such as the 4th and 5th, in which scholastic organization and primary instruction, which had once flourished, were declining in every part of the empire" (A. Petrucci).

Already at the start of the Constantinian era and even more evidently beginning in the mid 4th c., the new ecclesial reality concretely manifested itself also through the practice of inscriptions which, in not a few aspects, after the parenthesis of the 3rd c., began to reappropriate the consolidated heritage of the tradition. Between the pre-Constantinian era and that which immediately followed it, the differences are immediately evident and very profound. With good reason A. Ferrua, comparing the pre-Constantinian inscriptions of region I - Y of the catacomb of SS. Marcellino e Pietro on the Via Labicana with those of the second half of the 4th c. of the cemetery of Commodilla, could legitimately observe: "It is incredible how in a few decades cemeterial practices would change profoundly, and in almost every aspect of their explication: we seem to enter a new world."

The first and most evident symptoms of the "new world" evoked by Ferrua can preliminarily be fixed in two aspects of significant importance: first, the reentry into current practice of all that had been "ideologically" excluded in the epigraphical structures of "archaic laconism" (retrospective data); and second, a greater and more conscious visibility of the "specifically Christian" which, still submerged and almost reticent in the 3rd c., over a brief period increasingly became a clear sign of belonging. The most striking evidence of this phenomenon is the extraordinary proliferation of christological signs (first the monogram and the monogrammatic cross and then, from the 5th c., the Greek cross and then the Latin) which invaded every type of inscription, including those on objects for everyday use (instrumentum).

With the Constantinian era, the inscriptions put on the tombs of Christians, noticeably increasing in length, reappropriated the traditional dedicatory structure ("from so-and-so to so-and-so"), into which was reinserted information about the life of the deceased: biometric data, the elogium, remembrance of the role played in the civil, ecclesial and family communities, mention of the day of death/burial (depositus / depositio—κατετέθη / κατάθεσις) which, while it cannot be called specifically Christian in a theological-doctrinal sense (as has been erroneously maintained), nonetheless seemed to be widely adopted by Christians. Also inserted into these same structures were terms, expressions or simply "signs" that identified deceased and dedicator as followers of the new faith: most typical and widespread was the definitive consolidation of the irenic formulae in pace—ἐν εἰρήνῃ, variously assumed with eschatological (in pace Christi, Dei, Domini), funerary (the quies of the tomb) or retrospective value, the latter in reference to a life lived secundum legem domini (e.g., Maxema que vi|xit in pace a|nnos triginta: ICUR IV 9419). It is precisely in this specific formulary context, much more so than in the tired repetition of formulae of the pagan inheritance (e.g., the dis Manibus), by then already emptied of their original meanings, that we find symptoms of the gap between the doctrinal-disciplinary norm and its actual impact on the behavior of the mass of new converts. This can be observed, e.g., in inscriptions that mention Christian initiation (ca. 60 examples datable between 330 and the mid 5th c.), in which the average age of the newly-baptized deceased (from 20 to 50 years) allows the legitimate supposition of a deliberate and calculated delay of *baptism until the approach of death (ICUR I 2087, 2833, 3202, 3553; II 4164; III 7379; IV 11806, 11862, 12020, 12459, 12652; V 13443; VII 17548, 18469, 18631, 18693, 18979, 19820; IX 24870): these procrastinantes (as the fathers of the church called them) therefore approached baptism in the status of audientes, and not of electi. In this evidence—and this is substantially valid for both Latin and Greek inscriptions throughout the Orbis christianus antiquus—Christian initiation, with rare exceptions, is mentioned not with the specifically technical terms βάπτισμα | βαπτίζειν (baptisma, -us | baptizare) and the Latin equivalents tinctio—tingere, but with formulae such as gratiam dei accipere (percipere, consequi), fidem accipere, which clearly record the effects of initiation rather than those properly connected with the ritual action, as would be implicit in baptisma—baptizare. We can in fact note a double lexical-expressive register in the mention of baptism and of the images connected with it: that discussed here, succinct and reduced to a limited, stereotypical vocabulary; and that, profoundly different, more refined and more doctrinally aware, documented esp. in inscriptions ad fontes, i.e., inscriptions conceived and commissioned by the hierarchy and placed in baptisteries, such as the very famous one wanted by St. *Ambrose for the baptistery connected to the cathedral of St. Thecla at *Milan (Cuscito 2001, n. 16; ILCV 1841), or that for the Lateran baptistery of *Sixtus III (432–440: Cuscito n. 4; ILCV 1513).

With respect to the specifically doctrinal sphere, we observe a clear separation between popular inscriptions and those of the élites, clerical and lay. Evidence from the latter groups contains expressions and formulae that go back, sometimes in explicit terms and in articulate settings, to the basic principles of the Christian faith: profession of faith, hope of *resurrection, immortality, intercession of the saints, mention of worthy behavior in light of the gospel. Among the numerous examples are those of the neophyte Aedesius . . . qui crededit in Patre et Filio et Spiritu Sancto (ICUR 13443); the presbyter Tirgrinus who declares pono metum de fine meo, spes una salutis nam mihi fit Christus, quo duce mors moritur (ICUR VI 15842); Iunianus and Bictora, remembered respectively as amator pauperorum and amatrix pauperorum; of Gentianus fidelis, to whom the survivors address a prayer of intercession: et in orationis tuis roges pro nobis quia scimus te in Christo (ICUR VIII 22480); the Syracusan Criside in whose Greek inscription we read: “Remember, God, your servant Criside and give her a splendid repose, a place of comfort in the bosom of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob” (IGCVO 475); Cyriacus and Babosa to whom are dedicated, respectively, the hopeful formulae martures sancti bonibenedicti vos atiutate Quiriacu (ICUR X 26350) and refrigeret tibi Deus et Christus et domni nostri Adeodatus et Felix (i.e., the martyrs Felix and Adautto; ICUR II 6152). Noteworthy in this context is a conspicuous group of Syrian inscriptions characterized by the presence—as incipit of the inscriptions—of the monotheistic formula εἷς θεός, of Jewish origin and already used among the pagans (Guarducci IV, 274). Naturally, all of these elements were particularly popular in decorative monumental inscriptions (i.e., inscriptions in churches) and in funerary inscriptions of community leaders (Carletti 2001, 345-354, 362-383).

An age-old tradition that endured without interruption was that of the “cult of the name”—the essential element of funerary inscriptions—which precisely in the 4th and 5th c., and esp. in inscriptions in verse, was emphatically visualized through the use of acrostic, or by insertion into equivocal constructions, through which, in harmony or in contrast with the meaning of the name, the moral and/or spiritual qualities of the deceased were expressed, as e.g.: hic requiescit Superbus | tantum in nomine dictus, | quem innocentem miotemq(ue) sa(n)cti novere beati . . . (ICUR V 13954); . . . Felicitas isto | clauditur infelix falso cognomine dicta (ICUR I 713); . . . Anastasia secundum nomen credo futuram (i.e., vitam; ICUR II 6130).

Another peculiar trait symptomatic of the “new times” can be seen in the large-scale irruption in the epigraphical formulary of a series of locutions that repropose the atavistic need for the possession and visibility of the final dwelling. The faithful—unheard of in the pre-Constantinian era—concerned themselves already in their lifetime with assuring a dignified burial for themselves and their relatives: thus reemerged, even in communitarian burial grounds—which continued, formally, to be that of Christians—the tradition of the tomb of the nobility (the cubiculum), often decorated with paintings and furnished with imposing doors to emphasize ownership and to protect exclusivity of use. As a consequence we note the widespread recovery of the formulary repertoire that fixed on the stone the acquisition of the tomb during life and certified its possession: se vivi fecerunt, fecit sibi et suis, se vivo fecit, to which was frequently added the specific kind of burial (locus, arcosolium, cubiculum, sar- cophagus, tumulus, memoria, domus, domus aeternalis), and the verbal forms emere and comparare, used either absolutely (see ICUR V 13148, 13150, 13613; X 27541, 27542) or in conjunction with the explicit mention of the object of acquisition, the burial (ICUR III 8266; V 13113, 13140, 13471), of which not infrequently the location was also indicated (ICUR IV 12494 . . . in cymiterium Balbinae in crypta noba; IV 12458 . . . emit sibi et ux|ori suae Felicitati a Felice fossore | in Balbinis basili|ca locum sub teglata se vibum). Emerging in these formulary contexts in the role of protagonist was the figure of the fossor, whose presence, barely discernible in the pre-Constantinian era and almost exclusively in the production of frescoes (e.g., in the so-called cubicles of the sacraments in St. Callistus), assumes, beginning in the first third of the 4th c., an important epigraphical visibility, with a significant concentration from the time of Pope Damasus until the early 5th c., which was the period of maximum development of the cult of the martyrs in the catacombs and of the consequent phenomenon of graves located near venerated tombs (Depositio ad sanctos*), the most desired and likely the most expensive (ICUR II 6077, III 8669; IV 9441, 9924, 12748; VI 17192; VIII 23546; IX 25165; X 27034, 27060). Their activities, expanding well beyond their normal tasks (excavation and preparation of graves), came to include the direct management of the sale of graves (ICUR II 6077, 6102; IV 12458).

Also during that same key juncture of Damasus's pontificate began the process of conversion of not a few members of aristocratic families, along with the emergence of an enterprising class that would occupy increasingly important roles in the pontifical curia. For them, prestige, ancestry and power were perpetuated also in their final dwelling. This occurred esp. in the great cemeterial basilicas of Via Cornelia, Via Ostiense, Via Appia and Via Tiburtina which, for their monumental visibility and the prestige of the associated martyrs (Peter, Paul, Lawrence), became the preferred cemeteries of the upper echelons of society, whether lay or clerical. There was not a systematic exclusion of "ordinary" deceased, but a very limited space was reserved for them, little more than for common mass graves, in which there was no possibility of an inscription.

Concentrated to a high degree (54%) in these monumental cemeteries—certainly not by chance—was one of the most typical products of Late Antique funerary epigraphy: the inscription in verse, which, beginning precisely in the second half of the 4th c., attained a notable diffusion, thanks especially to the powerful impulse of the activity, in many respects unique and unrepeatable, of Damasus with the composition of the elogia martyrum, and in the wake of the entrance into the community of those familiar groups that were most rooted in the traditional culture. The epigraphical genre of the carmina—classical in its expressive forms, metrical structures and graphical forms—would become the Church of Rome's official form for public exposition: the great inscriptions that adorn churches (St. Peter's, St. Paul's, S. Maria Maggiore, S. Sabina) are in verse, and beginning with Pope *Liberius (352-366: ICUR IX 24831) the funerary inscriptions of the popes began to be composed in verse.

Nothing of what can be observed in monumental cemeteries and churches with respect to the quantity and quality of epigraphical production is reflected in the anonymous pockets of some catacombs active from the mid 4th to the first decades of the 5th c., where in vain do we look for individuals belonging to the élites of society, burial arrangements of some pretention, or even less inscriptions in verse. The users of these cemeteries seem to belong to culturally and economically depressed social classes: the already sporadic and in some cases even exceptional practice of the written funerary memorial shows evidence of having undergone an irreversible collapse. The data pointing in this direction seems incontrovertible: in level I of the cemetery of Panfilo, put in use between 348 and 361 (ICUR X 26549, 26550), of 325 burials in niches (loculi) only 3% bear a written text; in the complex of S. Agnese on the Via Nomentana the percentage of tombs bearing writing is 14% (of a total of 5,753 tombs), in the catacomb of Commodilla on the Via Ostiense it does not exceed 13%, and in that of Marcellino e Pietro on the Via Labicana only 10% (2,200) of the 22,500 burials are accompanied by an inscription. In essence "written death" was no longer, as in the 3rd c., a balanced reflection of the actual social stratification of the communities, but tended to be concentrated more and more in the ecclesiastical hierarchy, the aristocracy and the public and pontifical bureaucracies, contexts in which, due to tradition and contingent necessity (pastoral and professional), the production and circulation of written culture continued to be vital. Illuminating in this sense is the situation observable in the basilica Apostolorum on the Via Appia where, from 340 to the first decades of the 5th c. (the period of greatest activity), there were about 1,000 burials. Here, relative to contemporary underground cemeteries, the greatest difference besides the obvious morphological and structural differences is that of the frequency of a written memorial, which are concentrated in a high percentage (60%) in burials belonging to the societal hierarchies: viri clarissimi and clarissimae feminae (ICUR V 13355 anno 389, 13507, 13551, 13594, 13796a; 13327 anno 371, 13335 anno 389, 13484, 13491, 13562, 13606, 13740), viri perfectissimi (ICUR V 13487), viri ac feminae honesti (ICUR V 13309 anno 360, 13365 anno 394, 13385 anno 404, 13411, 13413 anno 518, 13674). In this as in other suburban complexes (St. Peter's, St. Paul's, S. Lorenzo) were tangibly manifest the symptoms of that process of selection that in the centuries of the Early Middle Ages would lead Roman epigraphical production in a single direction: that of "inscribing the great" (A. Petrucci).

In the other regions of the Orbis christianus antiquus, from the middle of the 4th c., we note an extraordinary proliferation of epigraphical production, in large part funerary, commissioned by Christians. The texts, in the course of ca. 50 years, began to conform to a single structure, indicative-locational ("here lies/rests so-and-so"), which definitively replaces the dedicatory form ("so-and-so to so-and-so") of consolidated pagan and Christian tradition. This was a profound change, manifested by the beginning obituary formulae hic iacet, hic positus est, locus cuisdam and especially hic quiescit, hic requiescit. Another aspect that marks the epigraphical formulary in the passage from Late Antiquity to the Early Middle Ages is the appearance in epigraphical formularies of surprisingly articulate formulae, of obvious ecclesiastical origin, which, besides a monetary fine to be paid to civil authorities or to the church, threaten unspeakable calamities against violators of the grave, including divine judgment as manifested in some events of sacred history (the leprosy of Naaman and of Elisha's servant Gehazi, the deaths of Ananias and Sapphira, the demise of Judas the traitor) or in the anathema that the 318 fathers of Nicaea launched against Arius. These forms were very popular in Italy (ILCV 3848, 3849, 3850, 3851, 3852, 3853, 3859, 3860, 3861, 3864), except at Rome, where we count very few examples (ICUR II 4421, V 13130, VII 18191; ILCV 3858A), and especially in Asia Minor and particularly in Phrygia, where one of the constants of local inscriptions was the so-called formula of Eumenia: the potential violator of the grave is reminded that "he will have to deal with God" (Perraymond 1980–81). In the different areas—though within a homogeneous textual structure, by now even codified—one can note some peculiarities of form: thus the conspicuous production of Trier is characterized by the initial formula hic pausat and by the presence at the end of the inscription of the figurative module of two doves facing a tree; in Africa, besides the denomination of the burial with the term mensa, we observe the rather widespread practice of designating the deceased with the term fidelis, and the introductory formula memoria (Duval 1988). In Italy, in particular local areas, one observes specific formulary traits such as the inscriptions of Bolsena with the typical phrase pax tibi cum sanctis (ICI I passim), or those of Tropea in which the dedication of the grave is expressed with the formula cui bene fecit (ICI V 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 18, 20, 21, 23, 24, 25, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 33, 34, 35, 36, 39).

V. Devotional inscriptions. From the pre-Constantinian era the practice of devotional inscriptions directed to the "heroes" of the Roman church, i.e., the martyrs of the faith, developed rapidly within the community. These were extemporaneous attestations, generally autograph, traced as graffiti on the walls of the sacred areas in the city's suburbs. The most important complex of this type of written production, unique in its genre, is certainly that called "of the Triclia" under the basilica Apostolorum on the Via Appia: a courtyard, porticoed on three sides and furnished with benches, on whose walls were traced 332 graffiti (22% of them in Greek) between the mid 3rd and early 4th c., attesting the memory of some 600 individuals. In this place where, according to a tradition already attested by the depositio martyrum* and by an epigram of Pope *Damasus ("You who go in search of the names of Peter and Paul, must know that the saints once dwelt here": ICUR V 13273, vv. 1-2), Peter and Paul were temporarily buried, a funerary cult center developed for a period of about 50 years for the commemoration of the two apostles, in honor of whom visitors ate a ritual meal (refrigerium) and sometimes left written traces of their presence. This is not the place to take up the hoary (and perhaps idle, in their periodic repetition) questions about the presence of Peter and Paul in catacumbas, whether dead (following a translation) or alive (tradition of a dwelling there). What seems certain is that the Christian community of Rome considered that place as an area made sacred by the presence, whether true or presumed, of a funerary memory of the two apostles. In this sense the messages conveyed by the graffiti traced on the walls of the porticoed courtyard (triclia) do not seem to admit of doubts. The numerous visitors there seem to have been for the most part little skilled in writing, and used unusual large, rough capital letters, sometimes alternated with small letters (esp. the letter b), traced "with difficulty" with implements not always suitable to the purpose, as it seems we must conclude from the oversized, ragged character of the letters, which were uneven and often not very clear.

Most of these inscriptions contain prayers addressed to the two apostles, usually expressed in the locutions "remember so-and-so" (in mente habete, εἰς μνείαν ἔχετε: ICUR V 12914, 12980, 13055), "protect so-and-so" (συντηρήσατε,τηρήσατε: 13053), "pray for so-and-so" (petite, orate, rogate pro: 12931, 12989) "help so-and-so" (subvenite, adiuvate: 12967). Sometimes visitors made explicit the particular motive that led them to ask the intervention of Peter and Paul: a good journey by sea [Petre et Paule in mente | ha]bete Restitu[tum] | nabiga felix in deo] (ICUR V 12973 and the similar 12959), or the victory of one's favorite horse in the circus races, as indicated by some images of richly dressed horses with their heads wreathed (ICUR V 13088 a-c, 13089 a-d). One certain fact that results from the texts of these graffiti, as well as from the morphology and the functional typology of the setting, is that not a few visitors expressed their devotion also with a meal consumed in honor of the two martyrs. This custom finds cogent expression in the terms refrigerium, refrigerare, taken from everyday language and already used among the pagans to indicate the meals taken at the tombs of relatives: Petro et Paulo | Tomius Coelius | refriger[i]um feci (ICUR V 12981); Dalmatius | botum is promisit | refrigerium (V 12932); XIIII kal(endas) apriles | refrigeravi | Parthenius in deo et nos in deo omnes (V 12961).

Another complex of graffiti inscriptions, all in Latin, is dated to between the late 3rd and first two decades of the 4th c.: the very famous—perhaps more for the debates it has aroused than for its intrinsic value—area of the so-called wall G under the confession of St. Peter's in the Vatican. Here, different from what has been observed for the graffiti of the triclia, one sees "a frenetic superimposition of different writings in the same very small space, without respect for the preceding messages, with no graphic order and with no concern for legibility" (Petrucci). The important fact that emerges from these inscriptions is the precocious occurrence of the christological monogram in the decussate form, used mostly as an abbreviation (compendium scripturae) in acclamatory contexts such as [- - - et] Simplici vivite in Chr(isto); Nikasi vibas in Chr(isto); Victor | Gaudentia | vivatis in Chr(isto); Marcu | bive in Chr(isto). Also important, and in some ways surprising, is the absence of any mention of the Apostle's name; nor, to this end, do some efforts appear persuasive to see its presence in some abbreviated monogrammatic forms (the letters PE), effectively a "laboratory reconstruction," i.e., through a presumed mechanism of transfigurations, superimpositions and tangents among alphabetical elements belonging to different inscriptions and hands. From the 4th c., however, the monogram PE is in fact widely documented in funerary inscriptions, as well in other types of inscriptions (e.g., the contorniates), as a literal "compendium" of the congratulatory acclamation p(alma) e(t) l(aurus): a typically Late Antique formula which in some way could be considered specific to the Christians.

In the course of the 4th and 5th c., besides in the Roman sanctuaries (in particular in Callisto, Marcellino e Pietro, Priscilla), the practice of devotional inscriptions scratched into the burial site spread to a great rural sanctuary, that of S. Felice at Nola, where on a small plaster panel texts are preserved—in every way similar to those at Rome—which record the names of visitors and sometimes that of the saint in the context of invocational formulae. The custom of extemporaneous devotional writings was common at Rome throughout the early Middle Ages, and in fact it is precisely during the course of the 6th-8th c. where we find its maximum diffusion as a phenomenon associated with pilgrimages ad limina. Cultic centers, all of them suburban, that preserve evidence of this devotional practice are the martyrs' sanctuaries, esp. those of S. Calepodio on the Via Aurelia, Ponziano on the Via Portuense, Commodilla on the Via Ostiense, S. Callisto and Pretestato on the Via Appia, the anonymous basilica of the Via Ardeatina, S. Ippolito on the Via Tiburtina, S. Ermete and S. Panfilo on the Via Salaria, S. Valentino on the Via Flaminia.

With the start of the 8th c. began inexorably the end of this practice of writing which, at Rome, from the first imperial age and then uninterruptedly for seven centuries, in different ways, places and circumstances, was proposed as one of the symptomatic "signs" of an extensive and indirect diffusion of extemporaneous and occasional epigraphical writing. But between the end of the 8th and the beginning of the 9th c., the material contexts of this practice were lost—the suburban sanctuaries, which were emptied of their precious contents, the bodies of the martyrs. The final seal of this period can be considered the inscription put by Paschal I (817–824) in the church of S. Prassede in memory of the translation of 2300 bodies of martyrs (or presumed as such) from the sanctuaries of the catacombs to the urban church on the Esquiline.

S.L. Agnello, Silloge di iscrizioni paleocristiane della Sicilia, Rome 1953; M. Guarducci, I graffiti sotto la confessione di S. Pietro in Vaticano, I-III, Vatican City 1958; P.A. Février, Remarques sur les inscriptions funéraires datées de Maurétanie Césarienne orientale (II-V siècle): MEFRA 76 (1964) 105-172; G. Cuscito, Depositus in hanc piscinam. Morte e risurrezione

nell'antico cristianesimo aquileiese: Aquileia Nostra 42 (1971) 57-64; Id., Valori umani e religiosi nell'epigrafia cristiana dell'Alto Adriatico: AAAd 2 (1972) 167-196; Ch. Pietri, Grabinschrift: RAC 12, Stuttgart 1983, cols. 514-590; M. Guarducci, Epigrafia greca, IV, Rome 1978; A. Ferrua, L'epigrafia cristiana prima di Costantino, in Atti IX Congresso Internazionale di Archeologia cristiana, Vatican City 1978, 583-613; J. Janssens, Vita e morte del cristiano negli epitaffi di Roma anteriori al VII secolo, Rome 1981; M. Perraymond, Formule imprecatorie ('Arai) nelle iscrizioni funerarie paleocristiane: Annali dell'Istituto di Lingua and letteratura latina - Facoltà di Magistero - Università di Roma "La Sapienza" 2-3 (1980-81) 115-152; G. Cuscito, Studi e ricerche di epigrafia cristiana a Milano: Felix Ravenna 127-129 (1985) 133-157; Ch. Pietri, La Bible dans l'épigraphie de l'Occident latin, in Le monde antique et la Bible, Paris 1985, 189-205; C. Carletti, Iscrizioni cristiane a Roma. Testimonianze di vita cristiana (secoli III-VII), Florence 1986; Id., "Epigrafia cristiana" "Epigrafia dei cristiani": alle origini della terza età dell'epigrafia, in La terza età dell'epigrafia, in Colloquio AIEGL - Borghesi '86, Faenza 1988, 115-135; Id., L'epigrafia dei cristiani: prassi e ideologia tra tradizione e innovazione, in Aurea Roma: dalla città pagana alla città cristiana, S. Ensoli - E. La Rocca (eds.), Rome 2000; N. Duval, L'épigraphie funéraire chrétienne d'Afrique: traditions et ruptures, constantes et diversites, ibid., 265-309; A. Ferrua, Note e giunte alle iscrizioni cristiane della Sicilia, Vatican City 1989; Id., La polemica antiariana nei monumenti paleocristiani, Vatican City 1991; G. Sanders, Lapides memores. Païens et chrétiens face à la mort: le témoignage de l'épigraphie funéraire latine, Faenza 1991; A. Felle, Note su Sacra Scrittura ed epigrafia cristiana in margine a C. Wessel, Inscriptiones Graecae Christianae Veteres Occidentis: ASE 9 (1992) 467-482; A. Petrucci, Le scritture ultime. Ideologia della morte e strategia dello scrivere nella tradizione occidentale, Turin 1995; C. Carletti, Viatores ad martyres. Testimonianze scritte altomedievali nelle catacombe romane, in Epigrafia medievale greca e latina. Ideologia e funzione (Atti del Seminario di Erice 12-18 sett. 1991), Spoleto 1995, 197-225; A. Felle, Loci scritturistici nella produzione epigrafica romana: VetChr 32 (1995) 61-89; Var. aus., Le iscrizioni dei cristiani in Vaticano. Materiali e contributi per una mostra epigrafica, ed. I. Di Stefano Manzella, Vatican City 1997; C. Carletti, "Un mondo nuovo." Epigrafia funeraria dei cristiani a Roma in età postcostantiniana: VetChr 35 (1998) 39-67; Id., L'epigrafia di apparato negli edifici di culto da Costantino a Gregorio Magno, in La comunità cristiana di Roma: la sua vita e la sua cultura dalle origini all'alto medio evo, eds. L. Pani Ermini - P. Siniscalco, Vatican City 2000, 439-459; Id., L'arca di Noé: ovvero la chiesa di Callisto e l'uniformità della morte scritta: Antiquité tardive 9 (2001) 97-102; Id., Dalla "pratica aperta" alla "pratica chiusa": produzione epigrafica a Roma tra V e VIII secolo, in XLVIII Settimana CISAM, I, Spoleto 2001, 325-392; D. Mazzoleni, Epigrafi del mondo cristiano antico, Rome 2002; G. Cuscito, La prassi epigrafica dei cristiani in Alto Adriatico tra simbiosi e metabolismo, in Historiam perscrutari. Miscellanea O. Pasquato, Rome 2002, 255-277.

Editions used for cited texts: Inscriptiones christianae urbis Romae septimo saeculo antiquiores. Nova series, eds. A. Silvagni - A. Ferrua - D. Mazzoleni - C. Carletti, vols. I-X, Romae - In Civitate Vaticana 1922-1992 (= ICUR); Inscriptiones Christianae Italiae, vol. IX, Bari 1985-1995 (= ICI); Inscriptiones latinae christianae veteres, vols. I-III, ed. E. Diehl, Dublin - Zürich [3]1970; vol. IV, Supplementum, eds. J. Moreau - H.I. Marrou, ibid. 1967 (= ILCV); Inscriptiones Graecae Christianae Veteres Occidentis, ed. K. Wessel - A. Ferrua - C. Carletti, Bari 1989; Epigrammata damasiana, ed. A. Ferrua, Vatican City 1942; Recueil des inscriptions chrétiennes de Macédoine du III^{e} au VI^{e} siècle, par D. Feissel, Paris 1983; The "Christians" for "Christians." Inscriptions of Phrygia, Greek texts, translation and commentary by E. Gibson, Missoula 1978; G. Kiourtzian, Recueil des inscriptions grecques chrétiennes des Cyclades, Paris 2000.

C. Carletti

EPIPHANES (2nd c.), heretic of gnostic tendency, son of *Carpocrates and known from a mention in *Clement (Strom. III, 2, 5-9). He wrote a treatise On justice in which he maintained that the natural law—the work of God the creator, the source of equality and of complete communion of goods and of women—has been violated by human law, which prescribed the division of property and marriage. Hence his system was not dualistic, since responsibility for evil was attributed to human law. Clement relates that Epiphanes's mother Alexandra was a native of Cephalonia, and that at Same of Cephalonia, Epiphanes, dead at 17 and immediately divinized, received honors at the time of the full moon. This last fact, of doubtful credibility, has led to the hypothesis of the identification of Epiphanes with a lunar god, and of Carpocrates, also called Harpocrates, with Horus.

W. Völker, Quellen zur Geschichte der christlichen Gnosis, Tübingen 1932, 33-36; K.L. Gaca, The Making of Fornication. Eros, Ethics, and Political Reform in Greek Philosophy and Early Christianity, Berkeley 2003, 273-291; F. Bolgiani, La polemica di Clemente Alessandrino contro gli gnostici libertini nel III libro degli Stromati: SMSR 38 (1967) 86-136, esp. 95-99; Testi patristici in lingua greca e latina, ed. M. Simonetti, Milan 1993, 183-194.

E. Prinzivalli

EPIPHANIUS, monk (8th-9th c.), monk and priest of *Constantinople. A monk in the Kallistratos convent of Constantinople, we have no other information on his life; he is often identified with others of the same name: Epiphanius, *hegumen of Mount St. Auxentius, or Epiphanius Agiopolita. He is the author of the first Life of Mary (two recensions), also attributed to *Epiphanius of Salamis, written based on the various apocrypha and translated into Latin in the 12th c. by Paschalis Romanus; and of the Life of Andrew Apostle, important for the development of the Apostle's legend (the apostolicity of the see of Constantinople). Other works are ascribed to him.

BHG 1049, BHL 5343v, CANT 91 (Life of Mary); BHG 102, CANT 233 (Life of Andrew); PG 120, 186-260; Sp. tr. of the Life of Mary: G. Pons Pons, Madrid 1996; J. Darrouzès: DHGE 15, 1963, 615; A.A. Longo: LTK[3] 3, 722-723 (bibl.).

M. Starowieyski

EPIPHANIUS of Constantinople (d. 535). In 520, year of his consecration as patriarch of *Constantinople (Mansi VIII, 490; 491; 492), he ratified the union with *Rome; he wrote frequently to Pope *Hormisdas and sent him gifts (Mansi VIII, 502-503; 505-506; 514-515; 524). He tried to put the region of *Thessalonica under his own jurisdiction, supporting the revolt (531) of two bishops who opposed the election of *Stephen of Larissa. Stephen appealed to Pope *Boniface II, who confirmed (III Council of Rome) the dependence on Rome of all Illyricum (Mansi VIII, 739-784). Died June 535 (Theophanes, Chron. A.C. 529).

Patrologia V, 44.

F. COCCHINI

EPIPHANIUS of Pavia (438–496). Became bishop of Pavia in 466. He lived in a particularly difficult period for the Western empire, working always for peace; more than once he was asked to mediate disputes between various Germanic kings. He contributed to the rebuilding of Pavia, destroyed by *Odoacer in 476, and obtained its exemption from tribute. He also earned the respect of *Theodoric, king of the *Ostrogoths, who sent him to Gundobald, king of the *Burgundians, to obtain the liberation of 6000 prisoners. These facts come from his biography written by *Ennodius, in his turn bishop of Pavia.

AASS (Venice 1734) Ian. II, 364-380; Ennodius, Vita Epiphani, CSEL 6, 331-383; PCBE 2, 637-641; DBI 43, 22-24; L. Cracco Ruggini, Ticinum: dal 476 d.C. alla fine del regno gotico, in Storia di Pavia, I, Milan 1984, 272ff.; V. Lanzani, Ticinum: Le origini della città cristiana, ibid., I, Milan 1984, 350ff.; Id., La Chiesa pavese nell'alto Medio Evo: da Ennodio alla caduta del Regno longobardo, ibid., II, Milan 1987, 408ff.

G. PILARA

EPIPHANIUS of Salamis (d. 403). Bishop of Salamis from ca. 365 to 403. Born ca. 315 at Besanduche, near Eleutheropolis in *Palestine. Educated in *Egypt; returning home aged 20, he founded a *cenobium, of which he was superior and presbyter for ca. 30 years. From there he zealously followed heretical movements, taking part in the anti-Nicene struggle and drawing attention to the presence of *Ebionites, *gnostics, *Manicheans, *Quartodecimans, *Audiani, etc. He tells us of his visit to *Eusebius of Vercelli, who had been transferred to a palace of Comes Joseph of Tiberias (curator of sacred buildings from the time of Constantine) in Arian Scythopolis. He denounced the mitigated forms of *Basil of Ancyra's homoiousianism (third formula of Sirmium: 358) and the various attitudes of Ebionism, S and N of *Damascus, to believers in Christ's divinity. He was not intransigent, however, against those who did not celebrate *Easter according to the decrees of *Nicaea. Formed on the simplicity of biblical culture, he condemned with particular vigor the neosophistic language of the time as falsity and gnostic theatricality, unworthy of the Message. For this he was accused, esp. by the moderns, of anti-Hellenic mania and limited intellect; but in fact he was consistent with his Egyptian training, midway between *allegorism and literalism, christocentric even in isopsephism. The fame of his teaching and sanctity led to his being made bishop of Constantia (ancient Salamis, modern Famagusta), where he pursued his activities, missionary and catechetical, controversial and pastoral, uncomprimising in the fundamentals of the faith, but more sympathetic in resolving the practical problems of his diocese and his suffragan dioceses. He allowed bishops under his jurisdiction to ordain presbyters for his flock; he encouraged ascetic life by word and example, leading *Jerome to call *Cyprus a meeting place for monks from the whole world (Ep. 108). But his main concern was to keep them in purity of faith, for him the guarantee of the church's unity. On the schism of *Antioch, he was in communion with *Alexandria and with St. Peter's successor, seeing *Paulinus as the sole genuine representative of *Eustathian orthodoxy; he went to Rome with Paulinus in 382 to obtain from Pope *Damasus a decision favorable to the Eustathians.

A veteran of the struggle against *Origenism, aged ca. 80 he was involved in Theophilus's campaign against the Long Brothers, who had taken refuge with *John Chrysostom. He had known them at the time of his education in the Egyptian monastery, and had condemned their *subordinationist Christology and theories on preexistence and *resurrection. Despite not having read all of *Origen's books, he had good reasons for condemning the Origenist monks, from among whom he had seen emerge the most conspicuous exponents of *Arianism. Jerome says he was averse to quarrels and was admired by the unlearned and the erudite alike; *Socrates praises his piety and rectitude; *Sozomen admires him.

Today we usually remember just the heresiologist and collector of singular information, and forget the pastor and teacher of spirituality. We forget that his works were mostly polemical: his masterpiece, the Panarion; the Ancoratus; the three works Against Images. The other four works accepted as authentic are all incomplete: On Measures and Weights, On the Twelve Jewels, Letters, Commentaries on Scripture surviving minimally among the scholia of the Greek catenae.

*Palladius, so favorable to Chrysostom, had nothing to say against Epiphanius. Nor did the case of Origen do any immediate harm to his reputation, which remained undisputed all through the Middle Ages, until the revival of humanistic thought and classical form. Then Melanchthon criticized the weakness of Epiphanius's theological structure and his careless manner of expression; others exacerbated the contempt by bringing in his attitude, which they considered presumptuous and sectarian; his intellect, judged incapable of understanding Origen; his pastoral activity, judged only in the light of an alleged overconfidence that led him to commit errors. Epiphanius was certainly a great pastor of souls, anxious to find antidotes for the 80 serpents of heresy, a mystic of the *Holy Spirit which proceeds from the Father and the Son, an ecclesiologist open to dialogue with souls disposed to faith (the countless maidens of the *Song of Songs), severe only against spirits obstinate in harboring the poison of error. We forget that his controversial writings all appear to be dictated by a certain mentality apparently alien from kerygmatic dialogue, which posterity finds it difficult to share.

CPG 3744-3807; PG 41-43; GCS 25, 31, 37; It. tr.: C. Riggi, Epifanio contro Mani (part of the Panarion), Rome 1967; Id., L'ancora della fede, Rome 1977; Altaner 325-328 and 601 (with bibl.); DHGE 15, 717-731; DSp 4, 854-861; RAC 5, 909-927; K. Holl, Die handschriftliche Überlieferung des Epiphanius (Ancoratus and Panarion), Leipzig 1910; Id., Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Kirchengeschichte I, Tübingen 1928, 210-350; M. Villain, Rufin d'Aquilée. La querelle autour d'Origène (rôle d'Epiphane de Salamine): RecSR 37 (1937) 5-18; E. Moutsoulas, Der Begriff "Häresie" bei E. von Salamis: SP 7 (TU 92), Berlin 1966, 362-371; C. Riggi, Il termine di "hairesis" nell'accezione di Epifanio di Salamina: Salesianum 29 (1967) 3-27; C. Riggi, Lavoro e ricchezza nel Panarion di Epifanio: Augustinianum 17 (1977) 161-175; R.M. Hübner, Die Hauptquelle des Epiphanius (Panarion, haer. 65) über Paulus von Samosata, Ps.-Athanasius, contra Sabellianos: ZKG 90 (1979) 201-220; C. Riggi, Formule di fede in Sant'Epifanio di Salamina: Salesianum 41 (1979) 309-321; B. Schultze, Epiphanius über Petrus: Archivum historiae pontificiae 17 (1979) 7-68; M. Mees, Textverständnis und Varianten in Kap. 5 des Johannesevangeliums bei Epiphanius von Salamis: Lateranum 46 (1980) 250-284; Id., Textformen und Interpretation von Jn 6 bei Epiphanius: Augustinianum 21 (1981) 339-364; Id., Die antihäretische Polemik des Epiphanius von Salamis und ihr Gebrauch von Jn 4: Augustinianum 22 (1982) 405-425; C. Riggi, Sangue e antropologia biblica in Epifanio di Salamina, in Centro Studi Sanguis Christi, Atti della Settimana Sangue e Antropologia biblica nella patristica, Rome 1982, II, 389-411; Id., Catechesi sullo Spirito Santo in Epifanio di Salamina, in S. Felici (ed.), Spirito Santo e catechesi patristica, Rome 1983, 59-73; Id., Origene e origenisti secondo Epifanio (Haer. 64): Augustinianum 26 (1986) 115-142; J.F. Dechow, Dogma and Mysticism in Early Christianity: Epiphanius of Cyprus and the Legacy of Origen, Macon 1988; W. Adler, The Origins of the Proto-heresies. Fragments from a Chronicle from the First Book of Epiphanius' Panarion: JTS 41 (1990) 472-501; A. Pourkier, L'hérésiologie chez Épiphane de Salamine, Paris 1992; F. Dolbeau, Nouvelles recherches sur le De ortu et obitu prophetarum et apostolorum: Augustinianum 34 (1994) 91-107; J. Dummer, Epiphanius von Constantia und die Apologie des Aristides: eine quellenkritische Untersuchung: Philologus 138/2 (1994) 267-287; M. Mees, Text und Textverständnis von Joh 8,12-59 in den Werken des Epiphanius von Salamis, in Id., Die frühe Rezeptionsgeschichte des Johannesevangeliums: am Beispiel von Textüberlieferung und Väterexegese, Würzburg 1994, 175-193; O. Knorr, Die Parallelüberlieferung zum Panarion des Epiphanius von Salamis: textkritische Anmerkungen zur Neuausgabe: WS 112 (1999) 113-127.

C. Riggi

EPIPHANIUS Scholasticus (5th-6th c.), monk. A writer born perhaps in the late 5th c. and living in the 6th, he was apparently *Cassiodorus's secretary (scholasticus) at Vivarium (Calabria). His name is linked to a Historia tripartita, in 12 books, modeled on the Historia tripartita of *Theodore the Lector, i.e., summarizing and reworking the text of the ecclesiastical histories of *Socrates, *Sozomen and *Theodoret. The work, in the form of a handbook, was very popular in the Middle Ages and later. Critics disagree over Cassiodorus's part in its compilation: some think he had a hand in choosing excerpta from the three authors' Histories, leaving Epiphanius to then make the Latin translation; others think he intervened in the final draft (so much as to attribute the work to him); still others think that Epiphanius himself read, chose and translated the Greek sources and that Cassiodorus merely "oversaw" him and added a short preface. Besides the mentioned work, Epiphanius translated Greek works of *Didymus the Blind (commentaries on biblical books: Proverbs, Catholic Epistles), *Philo of Carpasia (Song of Songs) and other Christian authors into Latin.

Verzeichnis, 306; PL 69, 879-1214; CSEL 71; M.L.W. Laistner, The Value and Influence of Cassiodorus' Ecclesiastical History: HTR 41 (1948) 51-67; L. Szymanski, The Translation Procedure of Epiphanius-Cassiodorus in the Historia Tripartita Books I and II, Washington, D.C. 1963; R. Hanslik, Epiphanius Scholasticus oder Cassiodor? Zur Historia ecclesiastica tripartita: Philologus 115 (1971) 107-113; F. Weissengruber, Epiphanius Scholasticus als Übersetzer. Zu Cassiodorus-Epiphanius Historia ecclesiastica tripartita: SAW 283, 5, Vienna 1972; LTK 3, 947; DHGE 11, 1376ff.; W. Berschin, Griechisch-lateinisches Mittelalter von Hieronymus bis Nikolaus von Kues, Bern-Munich 1980.

P. Siniscalco

EPIPHANIUS SYNCELLUS (d. after 431). Epiphanius, archdeacon and secretary of *Cyril of Alexandria, is known to us from a single writing: a letter sent to *Maximian, the new bishop of *Constantinople after *Nestorius's departure, in the period immediately following the Council of *Ephesus. The brief text, furnished with a unique appendix (CPG III, 5450 and 5396; ACO I,4, 222-225), is extremely interesting for a knowledge of the tangled background to the then extremely intense theological debate and the accompanying diplomatic intrigue. In fact in it Epiphanius says that Bishop Cyril, so worried over the negative direction of events as to fall sick, was disappointed over the little zeal shown for his cause by his colleague at Constantinople. What is needed, the author firmly requests, is that every effort be made at court to gain the emperor's favor. The *Alexandrian church had already taken steps along these lines, sending letters to the most influential dignitaries, to the Augusta *Pulcheria and to the ladies *Marcella and Droseria, and sending these same people gifts (eulogiae, benedictiones) so conspicuous as to have bled the coffers to the point of having to take out loans, both then and at a later date. But that was not enough. Maximian in his turn had to intervene at court, esp. with Pulcheria, maintain contacts with the Alexandrian clergy and act in concert with Cyril: only in this way was the whole question brought to a happy conclusion. To convince his correspondent, attached to the note was a detailed list of the gifts given and their recipients, probably to give Maximian another nudge and, especially, a useful suggestion.

This text has reached us through an indirect tradition. The letter and the list of gifts were in fact included in the Synodicon adversus tragoediam Irenaei, a dossier composed in the 6th c. by a defender of the *Three Chapters, probably an African, who had translated from Greek into Latin a series of texts taken mostly from a lost apology of Nestorius, entitled Tragedy and written by the count *Irenaeus, friend of Theodoret and Nestorius. The whole was thus handed down by an opponent of Cyril. This is not surprising, considering that Cyril himself seems to have felt obliged to respond to the accusations that came against him because of the facts exposed in Epiphanius's letter, at least if a homily is to be attributed to him in which, with a typical trick of retorsio, Cyril accuses Nestorius himself of having emptied the coffers to incite the court against him (PG 77, 1029-1040; cf. CPG III, 5248).

Mansi, V, 987-989; PG 84, 826-829; Tillemont, XIV, 439; ACO I,4, 222-225; Hfl-Lecl II, 426, 436, 441; P. Batiffol, Les présents de S. Cyrille à la cour de Costantinople: BALAC 1 (1911) 246-267; (= Id., Études de Liturgie et d'archéologie chrétienne, Paris 1919, 154-179); P.Th. Camelot, Ephèse et Chalcédoine (Histoire des conciles œcuméniques, 2), Paris 1962, 58; Fliche-Martin IV, 234; Ch. Fraisse-Coué, Il dibattito teologico nell'età di Teodosio II: Nestorio, in Storia del cristianesimo. Religione, politica e cultura, 2: La nascita di una cristianità (250–430), eds. Ch. and L. Pietri, it. ed., ed. A. Di Berardino, Rome 2000, 506-507, 514-515; Id., Da Efeso a Calcedonia: "La pace illusoria" (433–451), in Storia del cristianesimo. Religione, politica e cultura, 3: Le chiese d'Oriente e d'Occidente (432–610), ed. L. Pietri, it. ed., ed. E. Prinzivalli, Rome 2002, 41.

E. Zocca

EPIPHANIUS the Latin. In PLS 3, 834-964 is the text of the Interpretatio Evangeliorum attributed to a bishop named Epiphanius, no better identified despite the studies of Morin, still uncertain whether to make him a bishop of Benevento or Seville in the late 5th to early 6th c. The only sure facts are the work's Latin origin and its date during the period indicated. The Interpretatio Evangeliorum follows the narrative of the synoptics, in 62 chapters. After briefly commenting on Christ's nativity, infancy, Herod's persecution, the *baptism, temptation and calling of Peter and Andrew, the remaining 42 chs. briefly comment on Jesus' miracles and parables. The text as we know it does not narrate the events of the Paschal mystery. Its emphasis is on making the gospel texts ecclesially and sacramentally topical. The use of earlier patristic commentaries is constant, though reduced to the essential: for ch. 25: De divite (Mt 19:16-29/Lk 18:18-30) see, e.g., *Origen, Comm. Mt. XV, 10-12; *John Chrysostom, Hom 63 in Mt.; *Augustine, Serm. 84, 85; for ch. 37: De parabola duorum filiorum secundum Lucam (Lk 15:11-32), see Origen, Comm. Lc. frag. 216 and 218 (GCS IX, 321), *Irenaeus, Haer. 3, 23, 5, *Tertullian, Pudic. 9, 11. The community addressed by Epiphanius, already aware of the Christian mystery, appears mainly interested in a sacramental discourse and a common spiritual walk.

CPL 914; PLS 3, 834-964; G. Morin, Le commentaire inédit de l'évêque latin Epiphanius sur les Évangiles: RBen 24 (1907) 336-359; M. Inguanez, I sermoni sui Vangeli del vescovo latino Epifanio nei codici Cassinesi: Riv. storica benedettina 19 (1915) 368-375; A. Erikson, Sprachliche Bemerkungen zu Epiphanius' Interpretatio evangeliorum, Lund 1939; Patrologia IV, 236-238.

M.G. Mara

EPIPHANY, Feast of

I. In the East - II. In the West.

I. In the East. Epiphany is, as the name indicates, of Eastern origin (ἐπιφάνεια, epiphania, θεοφάνεια, theophania). Epiphany means, in the Hellenistic sense, the "shining forth" and soteriological revelation of God, who is revealed in the miracles of his omnipotence. *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 1,21,146) first mentions the celebration of the *baptism of Jesus on 6 and 10 January, but it is only celebrated, as Clement himself says, by the *gnostics of *Basilides (theological idea: only at the baptism is the Logos joined with Jesus' flesh); we do not know whether the feast was then called Epiphany. At *Alexandria, probably under Athanasius, the feast is linked to various moments: Jesus' birth, his baptism, the wedding at Cana. Initially there was probably a connection with a popular feast at Alexandria: the birth of the god Aion of the virgin Kore; on the same day there was the rite of drawing water from the Nile (Epiph., Haer. 51,22,10; 51,30,3). Evidence on this becomes numerous only in the last third of the 4th c.: Epiphany is attested at *Caesarea in *Cappadocia in 372 (Greg. Naz., Or. 43,52), at *Cyprus ca. 374–377 (as the *nativity, adoration of the *magi, *wedding at Cana); at *Antioch in 386 (nativity). At Jerusalem ca. 381–384 Epiphany included a stational liturgy in honor of Jesus' birth: on 5 January, Statio (station) in the shepherds' field at Bethlehem, Statio in the grotto of the nativity, vigil in the basilica and return to Jerusalem on 6 January; then Statio in the Anastasis (almost a feast of light), *Eucharist in the basilica of the Holy Sepulchre (Peregr. Eger. 9,1; 25,6-12; Lect. Armen. 1; Lect. Georg. 2-25; FCh 20, 84-86). *Egeria does not know the feast of 25 December; at *Bethlehem it was celebrated only by the Latin ascetics (Jerome, Hom. de nat.). In *Syria, also, the theme of the Epiphany is Jesus' birth (Ephrem). Testimonies to the Epiphany are very numerous esp. in the years 380/90, when the Roman feast of Christmas was introduced in the East on 25 December (in Cappadocia: ca. 370–378; Antioch: 386; Alexandria: 432; Palestine: 6th c.) and the Epiphany became the celebration of the incarnation, the feast of the baptism of Jesus and of lights. In Cappadocia and at Constantinople 6 January became the preferred day for baptism.

II. In the West. The feast passed into the West before 361, when *Ammianus Marcellinus mentions it in *Gaul (21,2,5), while at the same time, or soon after, it was still unknown in *Africa (and probably at *Rome), where only Christmas was celebrated, together with the adoration of the magi (*Optatus of Milevis). *Augustine knew the feast (only the adoration of the magi; Serm. 199-204); thus from the 5th c. it became the preferred day for baptism. In Gaul in the first half of the 5th c., Epiphany included commemoration of the adoration of the magi, the baptism of Jesus and the wedding at Cana. In *Spain the first evidence of the Epiphany is from the Council of *Saragossa of 380 (can. 4). *Isidore of Seville tells of the adoration of the magi, the baptism of Jesus and the wedding at Cana. In N Italy the theme of the feast oscillated between the tria miracula of the adoration of the magi, the baptism and the wedding at Cana (*Ambrose, Luc. 4,76; *Filaster of Brescia, Haer. 140,1-4; *Peter Chrysologus of *Ravenna, ps.-Maximus of Turin). Pope *Siricius, in his letter to Himerius (385), mentions the feast of the Epiphany. At Rome, before *Gregory the Great, the adoration of the magi was the only theme of the feast of the Epiphany (Leo, Serm. 31-38); later the baptism and the wedding at Cana were also added. The oldest formulae of the *Mass of the Epiphany are in the Gelasianum Vetus (nos. 61-68) and the Gregorianum Hadrianum (nos. 87-91): apparitio, adoration of the magi, star, enlightenment of the nations. Only in the Romano-German Pontifical do we again find the Eastern interpretation of this feast: adoration of the magi, baptism of Jesus, wedding at Cana and multiplication of the loaves; the administration of baptism was expressly excluded on 6 January. Epiphany was the day of baptism in Gaul, N Africa and *Ireland; Rome protested this development (Leo, Ep. 16; Gelasius, Ep. 14).

CPG 5, 148-149; PO 38,4 (three Syrian homilies); RAC 5, 902-906; TRE 9, 762-770; LMA 5, 25-26 (the ascension in art); M. Meslin, Les ariens d'occident, Paris 1967, 401-403; M. Righetti, Manuale di storia liturgica 2, Milan [3]1969, 102-114; H. Auf der Maur, Feiern im Rhythmus der Zeit 1, Regensburg 1983, 154-165; H. Rahner, Griechische Mythen in christlicher Deutung, Basel 1984, 124-133; H. Förster, Die Feier der Geburt Christi in der Alten Kirche, Tübingen 2000; G. Passarelli, Icone delle dodici grandi feste bizantine, Milan 2000, 125-146; K. Thadathil, The Feast of the Epiphany in the Malankara and the West Syrian Traditions, Diss. Pont. Institutum Orientale, Romae 2001.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

EPIRUS. As a geographical entity Epirus extends from the Ionian Sea to the mountains that separate it from *Thessaly and *Macedonia to the E; to the N it is bounded by the Ceraunian mountains and the rivers Sousitsa (anc. Polyanthos) and Vjosa (anc. Aoos), to the S by the Ambracian gulf (Philippson - Kirsten 11ff.). With the administrative reorganization carried out probably under *Diocletian and his successors, the name Epirus was assigned to two eparchies of the diocese of Macedonia: Old Epirus (Epirus Vetus) and New Epirus (Epirus Nova). To Old Epirus was assigned the territory S of the Ceraunian mountains, Acharnania, part of Aetolia S of the river Acheloos as far as the mouth of the Gulf of Patras, and the isles of Corfù, Ithaka and Levkas. Its capital was Nicopolis; its most important cities Dodona, Euroia, Hadrianopolis or Justinianopolis (now Libochovo), Appon (location unknown), Phoenice (Finiki), Anchiasmus or Onchiasmus (now Aghioi Saranta or simply Saranta), Buthrotum (Butrinto), Photice (near Limponi or Limpobethra, N-E of Paramythia) and Corcyra. New Epirus, Illyria, to which was annexed a portion of Macedonia salutaris, extended in the territory N of the Ceraunian mountains as far as Drin and, in the E, beyond Lake Ohrid. Its capital was Durazzo (anc. Epidamnos or Dyrrachium); its most important cities, Scampa or Scampia (now Elbasan), Apollonia (near the monastery of Pojani), Boullìs or Byllìs (now Ballsh), Amantia (now Pljoka, Pliocia), Pulcheriopolis (perhaps modern Berat), Aulon (now Valona, Vlora), Lychnidos (now Ohrid), Alistron (location unknown) and Skepton (?) (location also unknown) (Hierocl., Synekd. 651-653; Honigmann 19-20; cf. Marquardt I, 320-321, 331, Chrysos 12-21, Soustal - Koder 41-42 and 46-49). The small number of Epirote cities is due to the fact that few were legally recognized as civitates (Chrysos 13-14). The two Epirus's were annexed to Macedonia, one of the two dioceses of E Illyricum (Praefectura praetorio per Illyricum: Not. dign., Or. III, Seeck 9-10), whose capital was *Thessalonica. From the time of *Theodosius I (379–395), E Illyricum was under the jurisdiction of the Eastern empire. Epirus suffered, to varying degrees, the invasions of the Heruli (267), *Goths (380), Goths under *Alaric (397 and 406), *Ostrogoths (479–482), Getae (517), Ostrogoths again (551) and Slavs (548–549) (Chrysos 25, 40-41, 41-50, 63-64, 65-68, 69-70). In 474 Nicopolis was sacked by the *Vandals (ibid. 52-55); in 479–482 Dyrrachium fell into the hands of the Ostrogoths (ibid. 55-63; cf. Soustal - Koder 47-50). The settlement of the Slavs, from 587 on, caused destruction and mass migration (ibid. 71-80, Soustal - Koder 50-54), but Nicopolis was spared (Chrysos 77), as was Dyrrachium (Janin). Their metropolitans took part in the ecumenical councils of the 7th c. (Soustal - Koder 52).

The population was mixed: in the S parts the Hellenic ethnic element and Greek language predominated, in the N the Illyrican element with Latin as official language. At the time of the administrative reorganization of the Byzantine Empire, Old and New Epirus respectively constituted, in the mid 9th c., the themes of Nicopolis and Dyrrachium (Zakythinos XVII, 239-243 and 210-218, ibid. XXI, 194-197 and 198-205, Soustal - Koder 53ff.). Early Christian Nicopolis, of limited extension, was surrounded by new walls presumably in 474 (Chrysos 53); in ca. 540 *Justinian rebuilt its fortifications (Pallas, Epiros 229). Between the late 9th and early 10th c., Nicopolis ceased to exist. Dyrrachium, birthplace of the emperor *Anastasius I (491–518), was given new fortifications under Justinian (Proc., Aed. IV 4; CSHB 277; Miraj, with up-to-date bibl.). Christianity was probably introduced to Epirus by St. *Paul (Tit 3:12; cf. Harnack, Mission, 624). At Nicopolis it seems to have developed from a Hellenized Jewish community. In the mid 3rd c. *Origen, in search of an old translation of the OT, stayed at Nicopolis (Euseb., HE VI 16, PG 20, 553-556, GCS II/2, 552-554 [Schwartz]). Pope *Eleutherus was born at Nicopolis (Botte). Ecclesiastical figures include *Diadochus, bishop of Photice. The names of Christian martyrs from the 3rd c. are known, but not the names of any bishops. As the eparchy of E Illyricum, Epirus was under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of Rome through the metropolitan of Thessalonica, the pope's vicar (Pallas, L'Illyricum 70-73), until the 8th c., when it came under *Constantinople. Church life was subject to the metropolitans of Nicopolis and Dyrrachium, who were obeyed by the bishops, who took part in ecumenical councils and met in local synods (Konidaris 453ff., 483ff. passim; Chrysos 99-104; Soustal - Koder 81-83). Episcopal sees were set up, it seems, in the cities legally recognized as such (Chrysos 13-14). On the bishops, see Konidaris 511-513. The list of bishops of Nicopolis is in Phourikis 150-155 (see also Pallas, Epiros 214, with bibl.); for the list of bishops of Dyrrachium, see Janin. Of the ancient temples, that of Dodona had lost all importance even before Christ (Spieser 319-320). Early Christian monuments are found in many of the Epirote cities mentioned above: Nicopolis (see below), Dodona (Pallas, Epiros 238-241; Id., Corinthe 131), Euroia (building attributable perhaps to Donatus, bishop of Euroia at the time of Theodosius I [379–395]: Pallas, Epiros 238; Id., Monuments 138-140), Phoenice (Pallas, Epiros 235-236; Soustal - Koder 158), Anchiasmus (Pallas, Epiros 303-308; Soustal - Koder 255-256. A one-aisled basilica with inscribed apse and lateral buildings on the N side was recently discovered at Boutrotos [Pallas 232-235; Soustal - Koder 133-134]. The published plan of the basilica already known is wrong. On the baptistery mosaics: Nallbani, Mozaiku i pabtisterit), Photice (Pallas, Epiros 237-238; Id., Monuments 140-141; Soustal - Koder 236-237), Corfù (Pallas, Monuments 142-146; Soustal - Koder 180-181), Dyrrachium (see below), Scampia (Pallas, Epiros 253: The basilica of St. Peter is attributed to 519 [Chrysos 103]. A basilica with baptistery has been discovered in the village of Lin, near Pogradec [Anamali, Les mosaïques]), Apollonia (Pallas 253), Boullis (Pallas 253; Anamali, Bazilika; Kosta), Amantia (Pallas 253; Anamali, Amantie 119-120. Justinian rebuilt its fortress: Proc. Aed. IV 4; CSHB 278), Pulcheriopolis (Pallas 253), Lychnidos (Pallas 254, Bitrakova Grozdanova). Among non-episcopal towns, there are early Christian remains at Antigone (now Argirocastro: Pallas 236, Andrea, Budina, Baçe).

The most important monuments are at Nicopolis, where six basilicas have so far been brought to light or identified (Pallas, Epiros 214-232; Id., Corinthe 119-131; Konstantios). The most remarkable for size and architectural structure is that of Alcisone—basilica B—of the mid 5th c. (Pallas, Epiros 215ff.; Id., Corinthe 119-123 and Monuments et textes 50ff. and 60ff. passim). Distinguished for its mosaic floor decorations is the basilica of Dumezio or of St. Demetrius—basilica A—dating from 575 (Pallas, Epiros 214-215 and 231-232; Id., Corinthe 126-128). Nicopolis was the center from which church architecture and mosaic paving techniques spread to the whole of central Greece and Epirus (Pallas, Corinthe 131-134; Assimakopoulou-Atzaka 263-275). Characteristic of church architecture in Nicopolis are the presence of a transverse aisle or transept, a separate building used as a sacristy, and pastophories of Greek type (Pallas, Monuments et textes 55ff. and 80ff.). Architectural reliefs discovered at Dyrrachium (bibl. in Pallas, Epiros 253) suggest the existence of large church buildings. Inside the amphitheater has been found a small chapel with baptistery and wall mosaics, perhaps early 7th c. (Thierry, Nallbani, Mozaiku i kishës).

J. Marquardt, Römische Staatsverwaltung, I, Leipzig [2]1881; O. Seeck, Notitia dignitatum; accedunt, Notitia urbis Constantinopolitanae; et, Latercula prouinciarum, 1876, repr. Frankfurt a. M. [3]1983; A. von Harnack, Mission und Ausbreitung des Christentums in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten, Leipzig [4]1924; P.A. Phourikis, Μικρὰ συμβολὴ εἰς τὴν Ἠπειρωτικὴν Ἰστορίαν. Νικόπολις – Πρέβεζα: Epeirotika Chronika 3 (1928) 118-159; D.A. Zakythenos, Μελέται περὶ τῆς διοικητικῆς διαιρέσεως καὶ τῆς ἐπαρχιακής διοικήσεως ἐν τῷ βυζαντινῷ κράτει: EHBS 17 (1941) 208-274 and 21 (1951) 179-209; G.I. Konidaris, Ἐκκλησιαστικὴ Ἱστορία τῆς Ἐλλάδος I, Athens 1954; A. Philippson - E. Kirsten, Die griechischen Landschaften, II, 1, Frankfurt am Main 1956; R. Janin: DHGE 14, 1248-1252 (s.v. Dyrrachium); B. Botte: DHGE 15, 147-148 (s.v. Eleuthère); N. Thierry, Une mosaïque à Dyrrachium: CArch 18 (1968) 227-229; D.I. Pallas: RBK 2, 207-334 (s.v. Epiros); S. Anamali, Amantie: Iliria 2 (1972) 67-148; H. Nallbani, Mozaiku i Kishës së Amphiteatrit në Durrës: Monumentet 7-8 (1974) 111-116; [S. Anamali - S. Adhami], Mosaïques de l'Albanie, Tiranë 1974; V. Bitrakova Grozdanova, Monuments paléochrétiens de la région d'Ohrid, Ohrid 1975; S. Anamali, Les mosaïques de la basilique paléochrétienne de Lin (Pogradec): Iliria 3 (1975) 339-349; J.M. Spieser, La christianisation des sanctuaires païens en Grèce, Neue Forschungen in griechischen Heligtümern, ed. U. Jantzen, Tübingen 1976, 309-320; Zh. Andrea, Gërminet arkeologike të viteve 1974–1975: Iliria 6 (1976) 342-346; Dh. Budina, Mozaiku i trikonkës paleokristiane të Antoginesë: ibid. 7-8 (1977-78) 225-235; S. Anamali, Bazilika e Ballshit: ibid. 296-301; A. Baçe, Arkitektura e dy kishave paleokristiane dhe e varreve në Kështjellën në Paleokastër: Monumentet 15-16 (1978) 73-85; H. Nallbani, Mozaiku i baptisterit të Butrint ndërtim i njekohëshëm: ibid. 18 (1979) 57-61; S. Kosta, Restaurimi i mozaikëve të Mesopotamit dhe Bylisit: ibid. 17 (1979) 62-67; D.I. Pallas, Corinthe et Nikopolis du Bas moyen âge: FR 118 (1979) 93-142; Id., Monuments et textes. Remarques sur la liturgie dans quelques basiliques paléochrétiennes de l'Illyricum oriental: EHBS 44 (1979–80) 37-116 and 523; Id., L'Illyricum oriental: aperçu historique, la problématique de son archéologie chrétienne: Theologia 51 (1980) 62-76; P. Assimakopoulou-Atzaka, Rapports présentés au X^e Congrès Intern. d'Archéol. Chrétienne (Thessalonique 1980), Thessalonica 1980, 205-281: F. Miraj, Për një interpretim të ri të monogrameve në tullat e murit rrethues të Durrësit: Monumentet 20 (1980) 127-129; Ev.K. Chrysos, Συμβολὴ στὴν Ἱστορία τῆς Ἠπείρου κατὰ τὴν πρωτοβυζαντινὴ ἐποχὴ (Δ'–S' αι.):- Epeirotika Chronika 23 (1981) 5-104; Dem. Konstantios, Νέα παλαιοχριστιανικὴ βασιλικὴ στὴ Νικόπολη τῆς Ἠπείρου: ibid. 346-349; P. Soustal - J. Koder, Nikopolis und Kephallenia (= Tabula Imperii Byzantini 3), Vienna 1981; Proceedings of the First International Symposium on Nicopolis, Prèvesa 1987 (various articles); S. Anamali, L'état actuel des recherches sur l'origine des villes du Moyen Âge en Albanie, in Actes du XI^e Congrès Intern. d'archéologie chrétienne, III, Rome 1989, 2617-2635; G. Karaiskaj, Städte der Spätantike in Albanien, in Akten des XII Intern. Kongresses f. christl. Archäologie, II, Münster 1995, 892-897; Z. Andrea, Archaeology in Albania 1984–1990: Archaeological Reports 38 (1992) 71-88; E. Chalkia: EAM 5, 830-836.

D.I. PALLAS

EPISCOPAL LISTS. The church from its birth appears to us as a growing phenomenon of aggregation to the initial group through the work of the *apostles (Acts 2:41-47; 5:14; 11:24; 17:4); the number of communities in different cities grows, but all were in communion with each other through their origin and their profession of faith. *Tertullian expressed this common doctrine as follows: "So the apostles (which means 'sent') . . . at first preached faith in Jesus Christ and set up churches for Judea and, soon after, scattered throughout the world, announced the same doctrine and the same faith to the nations and so founded churches in every city. From these the other churches then derived the offshoots of their faith and the seed of doctrine, and still derive it in order to be churches. In this way they too are considered apostolic, as offspring of the churches of the apostles" (De praesc. 20,4-7). To this end we see, from the start, the apostles bringing into being certain structures that would ensure continuity for their teaching and ministry: they set up leaders (Acts 14:23; 20:17-35; 1 Tim 4:14; 2 Tim 1:6), who were to do the same (Tit 1:5-9; 2:1-15; 1 Tim 5:17-22). On the one hand, there was the idea of a doctrine to be jealously guarded (1 Tim 4:12-16; 6:20; 2 Tim 1:13-14;

2:15; 3:14–4:5); on the other, the idea of continuity of ministry through the legitimate succession of the community's leaders (Clem. Rom., Ep. ad Cor., chs. 42 and 44). This idea, already present in *Clement of Rome, is developed in *Irenaeus, who writes: eos qui ab apostolis instituti sunt episcopi et successores eorum usque ad nos (Adv. haer. III, 3,1; cf. III, 3,4; IV, 26,2), and reaches its full formulation with *Hippolytus and Tertullian.

The two ideas of tradition and apostolic succession were joined together—mainly for apologetic needs against those who defended a secret transmission of doctrine—and, in the course of the 2nd c., led to the elaboration of the doctrine that the tradition was transmitted through succession in the ministry. The idea of continuity was essential for the early church: "Ever since the Christians first wrote their history, they conceived it as the continuity of a movement of communication of the divine life which, begun in God, was propagated on earth, after Christ, through the apostles and the succession of bishops" (Y. Congar, Mysterium salutis, 7, Brescia 1972, p. 643 n. 12).

In this subtle interweaving of ideas, the episcopal lists—i.e., chronological lists of bishops of churches—arose as historical proof of succession, which guaranteed a community's orthodoxy of teaching, since it could go back through the uninterrupted succession of its bishops to the origins. We must not forget that in the 2nd c. there was a greater identification of a local church with its bishop, who was considered the expression of his community.

*Hegesippus was the first to draw up the list of the bishops of *Rome (Euseb., HE IV, 22,3), followed by Irenaeus, who provides reasons for it: "Hence the tradition of the apostles, manifested in the whole world, can be seen in every church by all those who wish to see the truth, and we can list the bishops established by the apostles in the churches and their successors up to ourselves. . . . But since it would take too long in this work to list the successions of all the churches, we will take the greatest and oldest church, known to everyone, the church founded and established at Rome by the two glorious apostles Peter and Paul" (Adv. haer. III, 3,1-2); a little further on he offers the list of the Roman bishops. *Eusebius of Caesarea also draws up the list of the bishops of the principal churches: *Jerusalem, *Antioch, *Alexandria and Rome. Other old lists are found in works of a chronological nature.

The episcopal succession in each church, going back directly or indirectly to the apostles, provided a guarantee of apostolicity of origin and so also of doctrine, allowed the combating of the many heresies that arose from time to time. Tertullian formulates the argument thus: "It may be that there are heresies which dare to go back to the apostolic age, so as to appear to be taught by the apostles, to have arisen under them. We can answer them: let them produce the birth certificates of their churches; let them show the catalogs of their bishops, showing their succession from the beginning, to show us that he who was the first bishop received investiture and was preceded by one of the apostles or at least by an apostolic man, with whom the apostles had had constant relations. This is the way the apostolic churches exhibit their own titles: thus the church of *Smyrna shows that *Polycarp was placed on that see by *John; thus that of Rome shows us that Clement was ordained by Peter: and thus the other churches exhibit the bishops who, established in the episcopate by the apostles, are for them the vehicles of the apostolic seed" (De praescr. 32,1-2).

The episcopal lists of the main churches were those mainly used for apologetic purposes, since communion with them was a guarantee of apostolicity and orthodoxy for the others as well. But with the passage of time, with the intention of providing such lists complete, invented names were sometimes introduced to fill gaps of early times and to defend a greater antiquity, or an apostolic foundation was invented, as in the notorious case of *Constantinople, which only in the 6th c. discovered its founder to be the apostle Andrew. At first these lists were just chronological lists of names; later some of them were amplified or filled out with other facts until they constituted a short history of a community, as is the case of the Liber pontificalis for the Roman church and similar works (such as Gregory of Tours's list of the bishops of Tours at the end of his Historia francorum). There was also a tendency to consider the bishops of the early centuries as saints.

So the episcopal lists, though being valuable documents providing information that we would not have otherwise, are at the same time uncertain, esp. for the earliest period, and must be studied attentively case by case to evaluate their historical value.

DACL 9, 1207-1536; RAC 2, 407-415; Cath 7, 829-837; P.B. Gams, Series episcoporum Ecclesiae Catholicae, Regensburg 1873; C.H. Turner, The Early Episcopal Lists: JTS 1 (1900) 529-553; J. Dubois, La composition des anciennes listes épiscopales: Bull. de la Société nationale des Antiquaires de France 1967, 74-104; N. Duval, Une nouvelle édition des listes épiscopales africaines: REAug 29 (1974) 313-322; J. Dubois, Les listes épiscopales, témoins de l'organisation ecclésiastique et de transmission des traditions: RHEF 62 (1976) 7-256 (only for Gaul); Fedalto; Ch. Munier, À propos d'Ignace d'Antioche. Observations sur la liste épiscopale d'Antioche: RSR 55 (1981) 126-131; E. Cattaneo, Cataloghi e biografie dei vescovi di Milano dalle origini al secolo XVI, Milan 1982; J.-C. Picard, Le souvenir des évêques. Sépultures, listes épiscopales et culte des évêques en Italie du Nord des origines au Xe siècle, Rome 1988; J. Hofmann, Die amtliche Stellung der in der ältesten römischen Bischofsliste der überlieferten Männer in der Kirche von Rom: Historisches Jahrbuch 109 (1989) 1-23; R. Bauckham, Jude and the Relatives of Jesus in the Early Church, Edinburgh 1990; V. Ruggieri, The IV Century Greek Episcopal Lists in the "Mardin Syriac. 7" (olim "Mardin Orth. 309/9"): OCP 59 (1993) 315-356; Var. aus., Griechisch-syrische Väterlisten der frühen griechischen Synoden ["Nomina episcoporum"; "Catalogus episcoporum"]: OC 77 (1993) 1-96; F. Manns, La liste des premiers évêques de Jérusalem, in Early Christianity in Context. Monuments and Documents, ed. F. Manns - E. Alliata, Jerusalem 1995, 419-431; J.-C. Picard, Évêques, saints et cités en Italie et en Gaule, Rome 1998; A. Camplani - A. Martin, Lettres festales et listes épiscopales dans l'église d'Alexandrie et d'Égypte. À propos de la liste épiscopale accompagnant la première lettre festale de Cyrille d'Alexandrie conservée en copte: JJP 30 (2000) 7-20.

A. Di Berardino

EPISTOLA ANNE AD SENECAM. The Epistola Anne ad Senecam de superbia et idolis is a brief 4th-c. Latin treatise against idolatry; Jewish or Christian, the end mutilated, it is preserved in the Cologne MS, Erzbischöfliche Diözesan- und Dombibliothek, MS Dom 17 fol. 99r-102r (first quarter 9th c.). It is rich in both OT and Senecan reminisces, esp. regarding the polemic against idols and against a distorted way of conceiving the deity, which may have contributed to the selection of the title—which is probably not authentic and was influenced by the collection of letters attributed to Seneca and St. Paul that circulated in the 4th c. Seneca was not pro-Jewish, and the only Annas who was his contemporary was the high priest of 62, who was disliked, by Christians because he encouraged the assassination of James the Less, and was the son of the Annas who, with Caiaphas, sent Jesus Christ to his death. Similarly Annas was disliked by the Romans of Seneca's time for his abuse of power in 62 and by the Jews for political reasons. Also, as a Sadducee, Annas did not believe in *resurrection or the afterlife: the Epistola, on the other hand, maintains the survival of the soul for judgment. In its present form there is no greeting, and in the body of the presumed letter the names of Annas and Seneca never appear: the author usually addresses himself in the second person plural (occasionally he uses the singular) to unspecified fratres, a term linked to the doctrine of God's universal Fatherhood, which is developed in the opusculum. This paranetic (i.e., in defense of the true conception of the deity and of the human being) treatise has many thematic and terminological contacts with Christian apologetic, beginning with Paul's discourse in the Areopagus. § I describes the characteristics of God Pater, Lord of the universe, and ties our life and actions to the divine will, in anticipation of future judgment; § II invites an investigation, not so much of cosmological questions, but of the human being, and attacks false pagan representations of the soul; it proclaims human immortality and judgment after this life; § III speaks of the creation of the soul by God and its infusion into the human body; § IV denounces the impotence of manmade idols, which are closely associated with *death; § V explains that God can be recognized in nature; and § VI again criticizes idolatrous beliefs like the cult of Bacchus, which are, as already in Seneca, the hypostatization of human passions.

B. Bischoff, Der Brief des Hohenpriesters Annas an den Philosophen Seneca, in Anecdota novissima, Texte des vierten bis sechzehnten Jahrhunderts, Stuttgart 1984, 1-9; L. Cracco Ruggini, La lettera di Anna a Seneca nella Roma pagana e cristiana del IV secolo: Augustinianum 28 (1988) 301-25; W. Wischmeyer, Die Epistula Anne ad Senecam, Eine jüdische Missionsschrift des lateinischen Bereichs, in Juden und Christen in der Antike, ed. J. Van Amersfoot - J. Van Oort, Kampen 1990, 72-93; A. Hilhorst, The Epistola Anne ad Senecam: Jewish or Christian? in Eulogia. Mélanges offerts à Antoon A.R. Bastiaensen, ed. G.J.M. Bartelink - A. Hilhorst - C. Kneepkens, Steenbrugis 1991, 147-161; A. Merkt, Maximus I. von Turin, Leiden - New York - Cologne 1997, 95-96; D.T. Runia, Filone di Alessandria nella prima letteratura cristiana, It. tr. Milan 1999, 304 n. 1; G. Zecchini, L'immagine di Nerone nel lessico Suda (con una postilla sulla Lettera di Anna a Seneca), in Neronia V. Néron: histoire et légende, ed. J.M. Croisille - R. Martin - Y. Perrin, Brussels 1999, 214-224; I. Ramelli, Alcune osservazioni sulla cosiddetta Epistola Anne: Paideia 56 (2001) 65-78; Id., Dio come padre nello Stoicismo romano al tempo della predicazione cristiana e nell'"Epistola Anne," in Scripta Antiqua in honorem A. Montenegro Duque et J.Mª. Blázquez Martínez, ed. S. Crespo Ortiz de Zárate - A. Alonso Ávila, Valladolid 2002, 343-351.

I. Ramelli

EPISTULA APOLOGETICA. In a collection of Latin texts that concern mainly the question of the *Three Chapters and its repercussions in the West (Paris BN, lat. 1682, 9th c. MS) is an Epistula generalis seu apologetica contra Iohannem Ravennatem episcopum, only recently published by Claire Sotinel. We know a John II, bishop of *Ravenna (578–595), who had fought against the schismatics of *Aquileia and to whom *Gregory the Great dedicates his Regula pastoralis (Ep. 1,24: MGH ep. 1, 37-38). The author, a monk or an ecclesiastic who expressly says that his epistula will be anonymous (ch. 1), proclaims himself a sinner and desirous of obtaining pardon and ecclesial reconciliation; he turns to Bishop John, who refuses to enter relations with him. Feeling guilty and condemned to prison, the author is called a miser by the bishop, who refuses him pardon; John also sides against the papa universalis, the Roman pontiff, who takes an interest in the author's case so as to absolve him. The author, condemned to death and forced to remain in prison, writes at length on the themes of mercy, pardon and not despairing of salvation. The document is interesting for the evolution of penitential discipline in the late 6th c. The writer refers to three authorities: the bishop of Ravenna, the pope and a political authority, distinct from the eternal authority, which has condemned him to death. The text must be from 593–595, at a time when relations between Pope Gregory and John of Ravenna were strained.

Edition, Fr. tr. and study: C. Sotinel, Rhétorique de la faute et pastorale de la réconciliation dans la Lettre apologétique contre Jean de Ravenne, École Française, Rome 1994; PCBE 2, 1087-1093.

A. Di Berardino

EPISTULA APOSTOLORUM (Book Revealed to His Disciples). The title Epistula is from the Latin translation. Only the first part of the Epistula apostolorum is a letter; the work as a whole belongs to the literary genre of Dialogues of Jesus with the *apostles. The text, written in Greek between 160 and 180 in *Egypt or in *Syria, is preserved entirely only in an Ethiopic version, which the first editors of the Ethiopic text called The Testament in Galilee of Our Lord Jesus Christ—the title of the apocalypse that precedes the Epistula apostolorum in that MS. It is preserved fragmentarily in Coptic, and a few passages in Latin. The first chapters (1-11) contain a discourse of Jesus; the second part (12-50) is a dialogue of Jesus with his disciples after the *resurrection. The document contains interesting fragments on Jesus' life (e.g., birth, childhood, wedding at Cana, passion and resurrection). The epilogue speaks of his *ascension (51). Though containing some gnostic elements, the Epistula apostolorum is aimed against *gnosis and the gnostics: *Simon Magus and *Cerinthus. The author stresses the unity of the two Testaments.

CANT 22; Editions: Ethiopic text: L. Guerrier, S. Grébaut, PO 9, 1913, 172-233; Coptic: C. Schmidt, TU 43, 1919 (repr. Hildesheim 1967). Translations: J.N. Pérès, Apocryphes 5, 1994; It.: Erbetta 3, 37-62; Moraldi 2, 27-60; Pol.: S. Kur, in Starowieyski 3, 27-50, bibl. 355; Ger.: H. Duensing, Kleine Texte 152, Bonn 1925; C.D.G. Müller, in Schneemelcher 1, 205-233; M. Hornschuh, Studien zur Epistula Apostolorum, Berlin 1965; J. Hills, Tradition and Composition in the Epistula Apostolorum, Minneapolis 1990; J.N. Pérès, "L'Épître des Apôtres! et l'Anaphore des Apôtres: quelques convergences," Apocrypha 8 (1997) 89-96; Id., "Un élément de christologie quartodécimane dans l'Épître des Apôtres: l'agape pascale comme occurence de solidarité: Apocrypha 13 (2002) 113-121.

M. Starowieyski

EPISTULA DE PATRIA. A letter whose senders are listed at the beginning: Paul, Francus, Valerianus, etc. The recipient was a bishop, Polochronius, perhaps one of the signatories of the councils of *Gaul held at *Valence and Mâcon in 385 (MGH, Leg. III, Concilia, I 163 and 173). The letter's context reveals that the senders had been exiles (Incipit: De patria gravi sumus exire necessitate compulsi) and were sent by another bishop named Castor, quite unknown to us, to seek asylum with Polochronius (at Verdun? in the Alps of Upper Provence?); they thank him for his hospitality and invite him to visit their own see. The style, in a popular Latin, betrays the language of the Merovingian era. Noteworthy is the use of the second person plural pronoun.

CPL 1000; PLS 3, 831-832; C. Turner: JTS 30 (1929) 225-236; G. Morin: RBen 51 (1939) 31-36; Repertorium 353, with the title "Epistola quorundam clericorum ad Polychronium."

L. Dattrino

EPISTULA FERMETIS AD HADRIANUM. This must be numbered among travelers' tales describing natural wonders seen in distant lands: in this case India and Asia generally. We have a Latin version from a Greek original, first published by Omont (BECh, 507ff.). The work, which presents itself as a direct letter to the emperor *Hadrian, is a fiction devised solely to highlight the emperor's personal taste for journeys and exotic things. Its importance arises from the fact that it must be considered one of the springs from which the first streams of French literature would flow. A variant on this letter is entitled Epistola Premonis regis ad Traianum imperatorem. It is not rare in early documents for Hadrian to be given the name Traianus; the name of King Premonis is fictitious. Faral has published the two versions in parallel columns. Incipit: Litteras tuas, domine Caesar.

CPL 1125; H. Omont: BECh 74 (1913) 507-515; E. Faral: Romania 43 (1914) 199-215, 353-370.

L. Dattrino

EPISTULA SCYTHARUM MONACHORUM AD EPISCOPOS. Sent before 523 by the monks of *Scythia Minor under *John Maxentius, to the African bishops exiled in *Sardinia by the *Vandal king Thrasamund, to declare their solidarity with the African prelates and esp. to discuss the condemnation that the presbyter *Trifolius had expressed (Ep. Trifolii presbyteri ad beatum Faustum senatorem, CCL 85A, 137-138) concerning the *Theopaschite formula

Unus de Trinitate passus est, composed in the context of the *Acacian schism.

CCL 85A, 157-172; J.A. McGuckin, The "Theopaschite Confession" (Text and Historical Context): A Study in the Cyrilline Reinterpretation of Chalcedon: Journal of Ecclesiastical History 35 (1984) 239-255; F. Carcione, La controversia tra Ormisda e i monaci sciti sulla formula "Unus de Trinitate passus est carne": calcedonismo integralista e calcedonismo integrato a confronto, in Atti del Convegno su Papa Ormisda (514–523). Magistero, cura pastorale ed impegno ecumenico, ed. C. Noce, Frosinone 1993, 57ff.; C. Sotinel, Le rôle des expertises dans les débats théologiques du VI^{e} siècle: SP 34 (2001) 246-249.

P. MARONE

EPISTULA TITI. The Epistula Titi, discipuli Pauli, de dispositione sanctimonii was discovered by D. De Bruyne in an 8th-c. Würzburg MS. Probably a sermon, it is an exhortation to chastity aimed at men and women and opposes the cohabitation of male ascetics with women vowed to virginity. Composed perhaps in a *Priscillianist setting, it is disputed whether it was originally written in Latin or is a translation from the Greek, as De Bruyne prefers. The Latin and Priscillianist origin is defended by A. von Harnack and H. Koch, who hold that it uses *Cyprian and the ps.-Cyprian De singularitate clericorum. G. Sfameni Gasparro, in an ample study, maintains rather that the anonymous author of the Epistula Titi is from a circle marked by rigoristic formulations of the enkrateia which are consistent with the definition of *encratism, and which were attested also in the West in the 3rd and in the course of the 4th-5th c. Pointing out that the work shows close parallels to African works datable to the mid 4th c. at the latest, Sfameni Gasparro dates the Epistula to the late 4th c., in a generally Western context.

CPL 796; the ed. of the Epistula Titi, ed. D. De Bruyne, is in RBen 37 (1925) 47-72; A. von Harnack, Der apokryphe Brief des Paulusschülers Titus "De dispositione sanctimonii": Sitz. d. Preuss. Akad. 17 (1925) 180-213; H. Koch, Zu Ps.-Titus, De dispositione sanctimonii: ZNTW 32 (1933) 131-144; G. Sfameni Gasparro, L'Epistula Titi disciputi Pauli de dispositione sanctimonii e la tradizione dell'enkrateia, ANRW II 25. 6 (1988): 4551-4664.

S. ZINCONE

EPISTULAE AUSTRASICAE. Name given to a corpus of 48 letters, written between the late 5th c. and late 6th c. by princes, bishops and Frankish notables and compiled from the royal chancellery at Metz. Given the quality of the writers, though some letters are banal and trivial (one is even in verse, Ep. 23), usually they are historically very important. As for form, more than once we note the singular contrast between the custom of this literary genre, which imposed affected and mannered expressions, and the quality of the Latin, by now greatly deteriorated.

CPL 1055-1067; MGH Ep. 3, 110-153 (CCL 117, 403-470); I.N. Wood, Administration, Law and Culture in Merovingian Gaul, in R. McKitterick (ed.), The Uses of Literacy in Early Medieval Europe, Cambridge 1991, 63-81; Id., Letters and Letter-Collections from Antiquity to the Early Middle Ages: The Prose Works of Avitus of Vienne, in M.A. Mayer (ed.), The Culture of Christendom. Essays in Medieval History in Commemoration of Denis L.T. Bethel, London 1993, 29-43; E. Malaspina, Il "Liber epistolarum" della cancelleria austrasica (sec. V-VI), text, tr. and commentary, Rome 2001.

M. SIMONETTI

EQUITIUS of Hippo Dyarrhytus (d. after 404). Catholic bishop of Hippo Diarrhytus in Proconsular Africa (Bizerte - Tunisia), known from the acts of African councils held between 401 and 404. When Equitius refused to submit to a conciliar condemnation, an episcopal delegation was sent in the spring 401 from Pope *Anastasius, Bishop *Venerius of Milan and the emperor Honorius to deal with the situation. On 13 September of the same year a new council sent a commission of 20 bishops to Hippo to organize the election of his successor. Once more on 16 June 404 a new episcopal delegation presented itself to the emperor, the pope and the Italian bishops, for the purpose of putting an end to Equitius's unjustified claim to hold on to episcopal power. Equitius is discussed by scholars because nothing is known of his person, and his case remains very obscure.

C. Munier (ed.), Concilia Africae, CCL 149, 198, 203, 213; PCBE 1, 356; O. Perler, Les voyages de Saint Augustin, Paris 1969, esp. 238-239; J. Merdinger, Bishop Equitius and the Problem of Episcopal Malfeasance in Late Roman Africa: SP 34, 170-176; J.A. Sabw Kanyang, Episcopus et plebs. L'évêque et la communauté ecclésiale dans les conciles africains (345–525), Berne 1999; M.-E. Mombili Thumaini, L'aspect d'autonomie de communion dans la praxis africaine des recours à Rome (III^{e}–V^{e} siècles). Essai d'interprétation du comportement ambivalent de l'épiscopat africain, Rome 2001.

M.W. LIBAMBU

ERECHTHIUS of Antioch (5th c.). Miaphysite bishop of Antioch in Pisidia ca. 440, mentioned by Timothy Aelurus (*Timothy II of Alexandria) in his great work against the Council of *Chalcedon (451). We have two of his homilies: one on the Theophany (PG 86, 3321b), preached at *Constantinople before the patriarch *Proclus (434–446) and translated into Syriac, Armenian and Arabic, and one on the Nativity, which has reached us only in a Syriac translation.

CPG 6163-6164; DHGE 15, 693; PG 86/2, 3321-3322; fragment of the homily on the Theophany in E. Schwartz, Codex Vaticanus gr. 1431, ABAW XXXII/6, 1927, 28; Syriac tr. in F. Nau, Documents pour servir à l'histoire de l'Église nestorienne (PO 13/2), Paris 1916, 169-170; Armenian tr. in N. Akinian, Timotheus Aelurus in der armenischen Literatur, Vienna 1909, 23-25; Arabic tr. in G. Graf, Geschichte der christlichen arabischen Literatur (ST 118), Rome 1944, 366; Syriac tr. of the homily on the Nativity in F. Nau, Documents . . . , Paris 1916., 171-180.

K. den Biesen

ESCHATOLOGY. 1. In modern theological language, the term eschatology means the "doctrine (-logia) of the last things (ta eschata)." The form ἐσχατολογία is not attested in the NT, nor does it appear in the Fathers. It was coined by Karl Gottlieb Bretschneider in an 1804 work to designate what was traditionally called novissimi, res novissimae (J. Carmignac, Les dangers de l'eschatologie, 365ff.). Its conceptual sphere was then extended and broadened, esp. from the end of the 19th c., until it was dangerously confused with concepts from which it should have been kept rigorously distinct, such as messianism, apocalypticism, kingdom of God. Its use is thus not exempt from misunderstandings, which have led many scholars to advise against using the term (J. Carmignac, Le mirage, 136-137). Its presence here thus requires further preliminary clarification and justification.

Modern scholars are not always agreed on the contents that should be included in the concept of eschatology. They oscillate between positions that limit its content to three eschata (*parousia, *resurrection, *judgment), and more elastic and extended definitions that add themes like *death, damnation, *purgatory, the end of the world, *beatitude, the offering to the Father. The meaning used here will be the traditional one. The term eschatology will thus indicate a group of final events concerning humanity's end (both individually—individual eschatology—and collectively—collective eschatology) and the end of the world (cosmic eschatology). For specific treatment of the various eschatological themes, see the following entries: for cosmic eschatology, see *apokatastasis, *cosmos; for individual eschatology, see *resurrection, *refrigerium, *purgatory, *paradise; for collective eschatology, see *millenarism, *parousia, *judgment. The following considerations, with no claim to system or completeness, aim to identify some premises of the Fathers' eschatological beliefs and to provide some interpretative ideas that may serve to connect the various themes.

2. The various eschatological aspects have common roots in the heart of the NT message and faith: humanity's redemption through Jesus, the incarnate, dead and risen Christ. While it is true that the Fathers, even such thinkers as *Origen or *Augustine, wrote no systematic treatments of eschatological doctrines, they were in general "fully aware of that inner logic that led from belief in Christ the redeemer to hope in the future time" (Florovski, Eschatology in the Patristic Age, 256). This common faith was historically translated into a plurality of outlooks and beliefs, which produced a very broad doctrinal spectrum in which "between the ultraviolet of a spiritualizing conception carried to extremes and the infrared of popular beliefs, all the intermediate shades and colors are present" (Visser, A Bird's-Eye View, 22). This variety is also a sign of vitality and depends not so much solely on the diversity of historical-geographical situations and local traditions, but also on social differences and different cultural levels in interpreting and receiving the content of the eschatological message. But it is precisely these discordancies that help to bring out certain basic themes that contribute to a more "symphonic" orchestration of the interpretative voices.

Also at the heart of Christian eschatology is the conception of time. As has been stressed more than once, starting with the studies of O. Cullmann, Christ's death and resurrection quickly imposed themselves as a decisive temporal watershed. For the Christian of the first generations who looked trustfully to the second parousia, it constituted a fundamental tension between "already" and "not yet," onto whose trunk the various eschatological beliefs were destined to be grafted. Thus were laid down the premises from which a cyclical conception of time like that among the Greeks, on which the metaphysical conception of Being was founded, would be overcome. Circuitus illi jam explosi sunt, exclaimed St. Augustine, to express a more general awareness of the conflict taking place: we must follow that straight path which is Christ, thus turning the mind a vano et inepto impiorum circuitu (Civ. Dei XII, 20).

This change brought with it a correlated doctrine of creation. If the controversy with the *gnostics in the course of the 2nd c. had helped, in the case of an *Irenaeus, to clarify the outlines of a salvation-history whose ineluctable point of departure was God's creative act, only in the 4th c., following the dangers that were seen in Origen's daring synthesis, was the problem of distinguishing more clearly between "creating" and "becoming" faced head on. With Augustine, time itself becomes a creature subject to the divine plan: destined for final consummation, and at the same time a way along which the stages of the process of salvation unfold, a telos at which to aim, since its dissolution ushers in the celebration of the triumph of the eschatological hopes.

But perhaps the point of greatest friction between Christian and pagan eschatological beliefs was caused by the belief in the resurrection of the dead. This had nothing to do with a return to origins, but with a new act of divine creation. What is more, as, e.g., *Celsus's objections show, the possibility of ransoming the body went against a mental habit profoundly rooted in Greek thought, according to which only what is spiritual—i.e., the *soul—was worthy to survive. It is not simply, as the Fathers repeatedly recall, a matter of defending the *body as a divine creation, but rather of molding anthropological ideas on the trunk of a new anthropology capable of defending the complexity of the human personality. These are some of the specific and leading elements on which the eschatological reflection of the Fathers would be articulated in its attempt to mediate the heritage of faith with Jewish tradition and pagan culture. But these unitary lines must not make us forget the many and sometimes divergent solutions attempted. More than an evolution and a succession of phases, chronological or psychological, we see a complex process, characterized by a dialectic between continuity and change. Certain solutions or proposals had to wait a long time to be properly evaluated and accepted or rejected by the body of believers. Often, then, the thought of any one Father shows oscillations that are more or less inevitable, before reaching solutions that are in some way clear and definitive. Finally, we must observe that the pace, at times too rapid, of some thinkers was set against the slow, measured progress of channels of transmission of the depositum fidei that are more static by nature, such as the *liturgy, the various *creeds and, after a certain point, the material of *iconography. What the historian finds, then, is a complex process of transformation, of which we will confine ourselves to indicating some of the most important phases.

3. The delay and subsequent postponement of the parousia did not seem to have produced, esp. in the course of the 2nd c., the disastrous effects that certain modern interpreters have wished to attribute to them, without sure textual confirmation. Though throughout the century millenarian hopes, from* Papias to *Justin and *Irenaeus, occupy an important place, we should not forget that these forces were opposed by contrary tendencies. The church was a growing body, in process of formation. As *Origen clearly states in his commentary on Rom 7:5: "Omne ergo corpus Ecclesiae redimendum sperat Apostolus, nec putat posse quae perfecta sunt dari singulis quibusdam membris, nisi universum corpus in unum fuerit congregatum." For this reason *Tertullian, at the end of the 2nd c., in a passage of his Apologeticum (XXXIX, 2), prays not just for Caesar, their ministers, the good of the world and for peace, but also for the deferment of the end. Justin, too, in the mid 2nd c., shows an awareness that within the church of his time, alongside the millenarian tensions of which he was a supporter, there were other positions that could be accepted provided they were pious and respectful of tradition (Dial. LXXX, 2). The logic of an expectation that lived between the certainty of what had already taken place and the hope of the second parousia was also manifest in the very structure of certain liturgical practices. In *baptism, e.g., "the faithful receive the guarantee of the promised inheritance; they are sealed for the final redemption of soul and body at the Parousia. In the *eucharist the eschatological bread of heaven is made available within the present order" (Lampe, Early Patristic Eschatology, cit. in Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines, 461). As the popularity of certain themes by which early Christian symbolism was nourished teaches us, the channel of the symbol, whether literary or iconographical, constituted an important occasion for the persistence of this bipolarity. Thus, the symbolism of death as spiritual marriage, though it "looks to the future, does not belong completely to the future. There is an earthly experience and an anticipation of what is to come. The risen Lord and the heavenly Bridegroom have already filled us with the 'firstfruits of the Spirit'" (Rush, 101). Divine service, finally, included the continual reading and meditation on passages of the gospel message, which could invite at times, as in the case of Tertullian, to pray for the deferment of the end, and at times for the hastening of the parousia.

4. The process that would lead from this situation of bipolarity to the Augustinian doctrine of the "two cities" was complex and bound up with the interaction of multiple factors both internal and external to the life of the church. Of the latter, the confrontation of the *apologists with the pagan world and the struggle against the gnostics appear decisive. The apologists' contribution to the working out of the eschatological heritage can be identified in three orders of factors. First, the attempt to prove to the pagans the reasonableness of certain beliefs such as judgment or infernal punishment by seeking parallels in mythology betrays, beneath the recourse to the theory of theft, a universalizing tension. Second, in the thought of various apologists, in order to justify the concept of God as judge, recourse was had to a natural theodicy that also became important for the parenetic and propagandistic aims of this type of literature. Third, as the case of Justin teaches us, in this way Christian thought was penetrated by categories of Greek thought, in this case *Middle Platonic, which were destined to create—viz. the resurrection of the dead—important tensions and contradictions. The second external factor is linked to the struggle against the gnostics. To the extent that they sought to adapt the Christian message to their mythology, the gnostics ended by attacking its hopes at decisive points. By systematically denying the reality of the incarnation, they threatened at its basis the fundamental dialectic between "already" and "not yet." By rejecting the goodness of creation, they made faith in the resurrection of bodies impossible. Finally, their doctrine of *predestination, by guaranteeing salvation to a few "pneumatics," eliminated free will and with it the necessity of judgment (not by chance did Irenaeus and Tertullian argue at length against *Marcion's ditheism, which delegated the function of judge to the just God of the OT). The reply of Irenaeus, then of Tertullian and *Hippolytus, would aim to establish the nature, phases and telos of Christian redemption, inserting eschatological hope into a typical economy of salvation.

As for internal factors, the contribution of the school of *Alexandria was particularly significant. In *Origen's system, individual and collective eschatology are intimately linked to cosmic eschatology in a cosmological perspective based on the archai and ruled by the telos of apokatastasis. The profound link between creatures and God, despite the limits imposed by creatureliness, by which God is conceived of as perennial beneficent activity toward creatures, determines a tension toward the telos, in its twofold meaning of end and fulfillment. In Origen's De principiis the telos (both end and goal), the opposite pole to the archē, is always recalled and present, with specific treatments that return in each of the four books. The cosmic end/goal is the restoration—in Greek apokatastasis—of the primitive state. The implicit dynamism of the rational creature's recovery, expressed with the biblical image of Gen 1:26-27, of the likeness with God yet to be attained (Princ. 3,6,1), prevents one—aside from the search for statements to resolve the question of whether or not he had conceived of a generalized fall of beings—from thinking of a pure and simple return to the initial situation of the archē: the love poured forth in this process by both parties—and esp. the saving action of Christ—has generated a surplus, producing a dialectic that creates an imbalance in Origen's discourse, a progressive tension toward a future of glorious assimilation to God, rather than toward the past. In light of this vision of a total recovery, Origen effects, thanks to the very allegorical means he uses, a spiritualized rereading of traditional eschatological ideas. From the attack on millenarianism to the symbolic interpretation of many concrete details regarding the parousia, judgment or hellfire, Origen's part would be decisive in this field as well, all the more since, aware of the diversity of the public he was addressing, he could always fall back, when it seemed opportune to him, on the literal sense of the biblical expressions. Finally, it should be noted that the least contested aspect of Origen's eschatological teaching was the centrality it gives to the individualization of the process related to the expectation of the last things, a centrality that finds its counterpart, on the more general level of the Origenian system, in the role Origen assigns—also in polemic with the gnostics—to free will.

This path would be followed in a more systematic way by the subsequent reflection of the Fathers. The growing attention to the intermediate condition between individual death and final judgment, which in certain cases appears to presage themes like particular judgment or the remissive function of ignis purgatorius, which would assume a central role in Scholastic theology, was also favored, after the Constantinian changes, by the disappearance of millenarian hopes. The interpretation of the millennium given by *Tyconius and esp. by Augustine is particularly important in this respect. The church's victory had already taken place and the prophecy of Rev 20:9 had been fulfilled. In this way Augustine could bring out the church's true nature as a divine civitas journeying toward its fullness.

In Augustine's thought, even through oscillations and rethinkings, the various eschatological themes are thus re-presented within a conception that, if not systematic, is certainly unitary in tendency and was destined to shape subsequent patristic reflection. It is characterized by the need to create "an eschatology based on the Bible" (Eger, Die Eschatologie Augustins, 91), which prefers, rather than allegorical exegesis, an approach adhering to the letter of the text. Thus it is applied to the various eschatological themes: parousia, resurrection, judgment. Particularly striking is the attention given to the problem of the intermediate state, to the point that Augustine has been seen as the "creator" of purgatory. Common to these different treatments is the fundamental aspiration to the blessed life promised to the Christian, a life in which the redeemed will finally be able to contemplate God directly. After Augustine, the Fathers, continuing to move within the framework he had outlined, seem to be mainly preoccupied with clarifying details and examining particulars that remained unclear or contradictory. Outstanding among these is the contribution of *Gregory the Great. Not only, following the line of a realism eager for details, did he fix central aspects of the doctrine of purgatory, but he also insisted on the theme of infernal punishment. While the end of the world—whose proofs he sought and found in the dramatic events of his time, of which he was a witness and protagonist—appeared to him to be imminent, at the same time, following the path already trodden by Augustine, he recalled the eschatological task that awaits the church: reaching out toward the kingdom of heaven, but also prefiguring it by preaching its coming to humanity. In this way, even while drawing the contours of a church finally come to the end of its sufferings, he contributed to prolonging "the time of the church," "collaborating in the foundation of a renewed church, destined to succeed the era of the Fathers, the church of the mediaeval West" (Dagens, La fin des temps, 288).

L. Atzberger, Geschichte der christhlichen Eschatologie innerhalb der vornicänischen Zeit, Freiburg i. B. 1896, Nachdruck, Leiden 1970; H. Eger, Die Eschatologie Augustins, Greifswald 1933; G. Florovski, Eschatology in the Patristic Age: SP 2 (1957) 235-250; A.J. Visser, A Bird's Eye View of Ancient Christian Eschatology: Numen 14 (1967) 4-22; J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines, London [4]1978, 459-489; Cl. Dagens, La fin des temps et l'Église selon S. Grégoire le Grand: RecSR 58 (1970) 273-288; J. Carmignac, Les dangers de l'eschatologie: NTS 17 (1971) 365-390; Id., Le mirage de l'eschatologie, Paris 1979; A.C. Rush, Death as a Spiritual Marriage, VChr 26 (1972) 81- 101; A. Fernández, La escatología en el siglo II, Burgos 1979; Var. aus., Studi sull'escatologia. VI Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana (Roma, maggio 1977), n. speciale di Augustinianum 18 (1978); Mysterium salutis, vol. 11, Brescia 1978; B.E. Daley, The Hope of the Early Church. A Handbook of Patristic Eschatology, Cambridge [3]1995; Origene. Dizionario. La cultura, il pensiero, le opere, ed. A. Monaci Castagno, Rome 2000 (s.v. escatologia); "Millennium": l'attesa della fine nei primi secoli cristiani, ed. R. Uglione, Turin 2002.

G. Filoramo

ESDRAS (Ezra) (apocryphal). Besides the canonical book of Ezra (also either called 1 Esdras or included as part of 1 Esdras) and that of Nehemiah (also either called 2 Esdras or included as part of 1 Esdras), there are a certain number of books in Greek, Latin and the various languages, under the name of Esdras/Ezra. These books are Jewish, Christianized Jewish or Christian, and are of the apocalyptic, didactic and historical genres.

The figure of Ezra/Esdras was particularly popular in late Judaism and early Christianity. In this same period a series of books were ascribed to the names of less-known biblical personages (e.g., the Book of Enoch). Ezra, a reformer and renewer of Judaism, becomes a model of the pious priest, lover of Sacred *Scripture, prophet, beloved of God and intercessor before God, and finally a saint in the Catholic Church, with a center of his cult at Teano in Italy.

Among the books under the name of Esdras, the most famous is 4 Esdras, composed of visions, of Jewish origin and very popular in the Christian world; it was translated into various languages, including Latin, and was part of the Vulgate.

Modern scholarly discussion has divided the Vulgate's 4 Esdras as follows:

4 Ezra containing chs. 3-14 of the book;
5 Ezra containing chs. 1-2 of the book;
6 Ezra containing chs. 15-16 of the book

5 Ezra is of Christian origin; 6 Ezra is a 4th-c. Christian apocrypha, directed against God's enemies and containing an exhortation to faithfulness to God. 3 Esdras (Vulgate, but 1 Esdras (α) LXX and 1 Esdras NRSV) is a historical book composed of the fragments of Ezra, Neh and 2 Chr, with some additional content. There are also the Apocalypses of Esdras, in Greek, Syriac (of the Arab kingdom) and Ethiopic. The Vision of Esdras and the Apocalypse of Sedrach (the name Esdras deformed) are apocalyptic literature, recounting Ezra's/Esdras's travels beyond the grave, his discussions with God and his death. (Esdras does not want to let his soul depart!) The Armenian Questions of Esdras addresses problems concerning the soul; the nature of the year is discussed in the Explanations of Esdras (9th-c. Latin apocrypha).

These texts exist in various Eastern translations and enjoyed great success in the Christian world: Latin fragments of 5 Ezra have been introduced into the texts of the Latin *Mass.

CAVT 179-189; CANT 340-342; W. Schneemelcher, RAC 6, 1962, 595-612; LCIK 1,681, cf. 6,170; 6,169; BS 5, 83-86; J.B. Frey, DBS 1, 411-418; 430-444; A.M. Denis, Introduction à la littérature religieuse judéo-hellénistique, 1-2, Turnhout 2000, 1, 803-881 (bibl.). Editions: E. Wahl, Leiden 1977 (Apocal. graeca, Visio, Apocal. of Sedrach); Vulgate: books 3 and 4 (i.e., also 5 and 6). Translations: Eng.: Charlesworth 1, 517-613; It.: Sacchi, IV Esdra: 2, 337-372 (bibl.); III Esdra 1, 97-178; Pol.: Starowieyski 3, 168-209; Sp.: N. Fernandez Marcos, in A. Diez Macho, Apocrifos del Antiguo Testamento, 2, Madrid 1983, 445-478 (III Esdr.). J. Labourt, Le V[e] livre d'Esdras: RBib 17 (1909) 412-434.

Studies: J. Daniélou, Le V[e] Esdras et le judéo-christianisme latin au II[e] siècle, in FS C. Widengren, Leiden 1972, 162-171; G.N. Stanton, 5 Ezra and Matthean Christianity in the Second Century: JTS 28 (1977) 67-83; T.A. Bergren, Fifth Ezra: The Text, Origin and Early History, Atlanta 1990; Id., Sixth Ezra: The Text, Origin and Early History, Oxford 1998; F.G. Nuvolone, "Apocalypse d'Esdras" grecque et latine, rapports et rhétorique: Apocrypha 7 (1996) 81-108.

M. Starowieyski

ETERNITY. The conception of eternity in the Fathers is influenced not only by the philosophical formation (especially Platonic) of some of them, but primarily by the biblical concept. In pre-Socratic philosophy there is no secure attestation of the term αἰώνιος, whereas eternity or perpetuality is indicated by ἀΐδιος, employed by Heraclitus, Empedocles, Parmenides, etc.; in Democritus it refers to the absolute eternity of the atoms. In Platonism, eternity was conceived for the first time in a metaphysical manner: the αἰών (the standard term for eternity in *Plato and *Middle Platonism and *Neoplatonism) is not in time, but beyond time, in that it transcends it (while time is famously defined as "a moving image of eternity" in Tim. 37D5: whereas eternity remains in oneness, time moves according to number); it is the eternity of the divinity, which is unbegotten. The ἀϊδιότης is everlastingness throughout all times, like that of the *soul, or of stars; sometimes it also refers to the Ideas.

In other philosophical schools, however, and in Greek in general, the meaning of αἰών, αἰώνιος and ἀΐδιος was very different. Aristotle seems never to use αἰώνιος, and αἰών only occasionally, mostly in the traditional sense of "life," whereas in his corpus there are nearly 300 occurrences of ἀΐδιος, which is Aristotle's preferred word to designate eternity. His conception of eternity and use of the relevant terminology is generally followed by his commentators. In the *Stoics, αἰών and αἰώνιος, rather than indicating eternity strictly, are rather related to a cyclical conception of αἰῶνες or cyclically recurring cosmic eras, marked by the periodic destruction and restoration of new worlds, where the events follow one another according to Necessity, always identical in each world. Eternity is rather expressed through ἀΐδιος, which is frequent in the Stoics, occurring over thirty times in the Stoicorum veterum fragmenta in the sense of that which endures forever. It is applied to bodies and matter, the ὄντα or realities that truly exist according to Stoic materialism, and above all to God. Notably, to designate eternity, *Marcus Aurelius does not employ αἰών alone, as Plato and *Plotinus do, but ἀΐδιος αἰών, meaning "eternal duration." The Epicureans, following Democritus, regularly employ ἀΐδιος, never αἰών, to designate the eternity of such imperishable constituents of the universe as atoms and void.

Also outside the philosophical world, in Greek eternity was not indicated by αἰών. In *Homer, early lyric, and tragedy, αἰών principally bears the sense of "life" or "a period of time" or "generation." Also in classical and Hellenistic Greek, it means "long duration," "perpetuity from one generation to the next," "lifetime" and the like; it sometimes indicates eternity only in reference to the divine, but this meaning is generally conveyed by ἀΐδιος.

In the Bible, likewise, αἰών and αἰώνιος do not mean "eternity" and "eternal"; they only acquire this meaning, sometimes, when they refer to God. In the Hebrew Bible, the principal term for eternity is ʿôlām, which is almost always translated with αἰών and αἰώνιος in the Septuagint and does not at all mean "eternity" or "eternal," but only acquires this sense when it refers to God or what is closely related to God, and only because of God's own eternal nature. Otherwise, it indicates a long time, a remote time in the past or in the future, the series of generations, a lifetime, or it even means "worldly" or "mundane," or, especially in the most recent books, it refers to the other world (Ramelli - Konstan, 37-49). In the most recent books of the Old Testament, eternity in its strict sense is expressed by ἀΐδιος, which properly means "eternal," "with no end": in Wisd 7:26, it refers to God, "eternal light," and in 4 Mac 10:15 to the eternal life: here τὸν ἀΐδιον τῶν εὐσεβῶν βίον is contrasted to τὸν αἰώνιον τοῦ τυράννου ὄλεθρον, where it is notable that the eternal life is ἀΐδιος, i.e., really "eternal, with no end," whereas the *death of the impious tyrant in the next world is αἰώνιος, i.e., belonging to the other αἰών.

In the New Testament, too, αἰώνιος means "eternal" only in reference to God, otherwise it means "long-lasting" (e.g., χρόνοι αἰώνιοι in Rom 16:25-26 and 2 Tim 1:9 cannot mean "eternal times"!), and αἰών means a "century" or "age," or indicates this or, most often, the next world. Only ἀΐδιος refers to eternity proper, e.g., in Rom 1:20. Above all, when it comes to the future life and death, whereas αἰώνιος refers to both life and death and punishment and fire in the New Testament, which are thus labeled as "belonging to the next world or αἰών" (in opposition to this world, κόσμος or καιρός, or to χρόνος, see, e.g., Mk 10:30 and all John), ἀΐδιος refers only to life; it never refers to death or punishment of human beings or fire. Therefore, in the Bible only life is said to be properly "eternal," "without end," a characteristic that essentially and intrinsically belongs to God. Indeed, eternal life is the participation in the life of God, by grace; Christ himself is said to be this life.

This precise distinction is maintained by many Greek Fathers, especially *Tatian, *Clement, *Origen, *Didymus, *Athanasius, the Cappadocians, *Evagrius, *Theodore of Mopsuestia, *John Chrysostom, *Proclus of Constantinople, ps.-*Dionysius and *Maximus the Confessor (Ramelli - Konstan 82-225). They apply to God both the biblical αἰώνιος and the more philosophical (but attested also in the Bible!) ἀΐδιος—the latter from the apologists onward, e.g., *Aristides and *Athenagoras—but they refer ἀΐδιος only to the future life and bliss, whereas to future death, punishment of human beings, suffering and fire only αἰώνιος is applied. A passage of Didymus (Comm. on Job 76,11ff.), a close follower of Origen, on the polysemy of αἰώνιος and αἰών is telling, since it shows that he was perfectly aware that αἰών in the Bible does not mean "eternity"; only if αἰώνιος refers to God does it signify "eternal" in the absolute sense, without beginning or end, and not subject to time, whereas for human beings it indicates the continuation of this life in the life to come, in the next world: "It must be noted that αἰώνιος is said in several ways: in the expression, 'αἰώνιος God,' it means beginningless and endless; for God is called αἰώνιος by virtue of having neither a beginning nor an end of his existence. But αἰώνιος is something different when used in the expression, 'things unseen are αἰώνια': for these things are not αἰώνια in the way God is, but rather because they do not perish but remain forever in the same condition. And αἰώνιος is meant differently again when it is measured against present time, as when it is said: 'the sons of this αἰών are wiser in their generation'; for the time that extends over the life of a human being is also called an αἰών. Indeed, it is laid down concerning the Hebrew who did not wish to be freed in the seventh year, that he will be your slave unto the αἰών: for no slave of a human being remains forever, even after his death. It is in this sense that Paul too writes (1 Cor 8:13): 'if flesh causes my brother to stumble, I shall not eat flesh through the αἰών,' using this term in place of 'throughout my life.'"

The same awareness was present in many other patristic writers. Let us single out the conception of eternity and the relevant vocabulary at least in Clement, Origen and the Cappadocians. Clement's use of αἰών, αἰώνιος and ἀΐδιος is especially frequent and is remarkably similar to that of Origen. Αἰώνιος is clearly used in the case of biblical quotations, paraphrases or commentaries, very often in reference to life or salvation in the world to come (ζωή, σωτηρία αἰώνιος) or equivalent expressions (such as "αἰώνιος repose," "tent," and "home" or "dwelling," as well as the αἰώνιος kingdom of heaven), and in connection with γνῶσις, faith and ethical commitment, but also with God's mercy and his economy of salvation and therapeutic effect: life in the world to come is provided by the Savior, through grace. This is the telos of the present life, and in turn this telos is explicitly identified with the ἀποκατάστασις; in two passages, ἀποκατάστασις is closely associated with the concept of eternity. In comparison with this abundant use of the adjective in reference to life, the two occurrences of the biblical πῦρ αἰώνιον, the fire in the world to come, seem sparse. Αἰώνιος, moreover, is often used in reference to God, to the three Persons of the *Trinity, or to what pertains to God, in which case—and exclusively in this case—it acquires the sense of "eternal," ab aeterno and in aeternum. Ἀΐδιος too is amply employed in the sense of "absolutely eternal," also to explain that the eternity of God is not an infinite extension into the past and future, but rather "an ἀΐδιος today." The same adjective is often found in connection with eternal life, ζωὴ ἀΐδιος, as a parallel to ζωὴ αἰώνιος and ζωὴ μέλλουσα, but the latter two phrases put the emphasis on the fact that this life pertains to the future αἰών, whereas the former insists strictly on its eternity and absolute everlastingness. The same is the case with σωτηρία ἀΐδιος, "eternal salvation," and ἀΐδιος ὑγεία, "eternal health," granted by God the Physician, who cures with the goal of salvation. Important differences are evident when the subject is "death" and "fire": we have only two occurrences of "ἀΐδιος death," but they are hypothetical and corrected by divine mercy, which acts in order to avoid the realization of an eternal death, and, in face of the two occurrences of "αἰώνιον fire," there is not a single instance of "ἀΐδιον fire."

The same conception of eternity and terminological usage is found in Origen. In his extant Greek works, ἀΐδιος is almost always used in reference to God, whose eternity is absolute: God's power, divinity, kingdom, existence, mercy, etc., may also be designated as ἀΐδια. As in the Bible, αἰώνιος means "eternal" in the absolute sense only in the relatively few instances in which the term is applied to God, but when Origen is not quoting *Scripture, he is more likely to employ ἀΐδιος in these contexts. Αἰώνιος also refers to the life to come, without focusing on its eternity, and can be applied as well to the series of αἰῶνες that precede the true eternity. Origen's idea of a succession of αἰῶνες is very different from the Stoic one, because in his view each of them does not at all repeat the events of the former ones by necessity and Fate, but it is different from all others and characterized by the free decisions of the rational creatures. Moreover, contrary to the Stoic conception, the succession of αἰῶνες will come to an end in the telos, when the complete apokatastasis* will take place, and all will finally participate in the absolute eternity (ἀϊδιότης) of divine life.

This idea of the participation of all in the absolute eternity of divine life in the apokatastasis is taken up by *Gregory of Nyssa. In his writings we find a predominant use of the philosophical adjective ἀΐδιος, in comparison with αἰώνιος, which is mostly confined to scriptural citations and reminiscences. Indeed, Gregory is the most philosophically minded of the Cappadocians and, along with Origen and Augustine, of all the Fathers. In his writings, ἀΐδιος is used very widely, in reference to God, the *Trinity, and its eternity a parte ante and a parte post. Characteristic of his usage is C. Eun. I 9,4, where, in reference to the Son, ἀΐδιος is made to correspond to ἀγέννητος and ἀτελεύτητος: for "eternal" means "ungenerated" and "imperishable." Gregory, like Origen, uses ἀΐδιος fairly frequently also in reference to the eternal life that awaits humans by the grace of Christ and that is thus characterized as endless; ἀΐδιος indicates also the eternal joy that is proper to eternal life. In Or. cat. 16,63, ζωὴ ἀΐδιος is considered to be a gift that was awaiting us from the beginning and to which we ought to return; it is identified with God and Christ himself in C. Eun. II 1,536. The ἀΐδιος life of God is that which traverses the αἰῶνες (ibid. II 1,457), and the life of God itself is that in which the blessed will participate. In Hom. Cant. (GNO VI 69,3) it is promised to humans that they will endure for eternity (πρὸς τὸ ἀΐδιον), together with him who is forever (ἀεὶ ὄντι). The examples could multiply.

The reason for the remarkable frequency with which Gregory employs ἀΐδιος in connection with life is that he conceives of it as a strictly eternal life in the ἀϊδιότης of the apokatastasis, after the end of the αἰών itself: a life that will last for an eternity that is beyond time, together with God, who is beyond any temporal dimension. God is the Good, and its opposite is evil, which is not ἐξ ἀϊδίου and thus cannot subsist eternally (Inscr. Ps. GNO V 100,21-25). Of course, αἰώνιος too is employed by Gregory, generally in connection with scriptural citations, whereas in philosophical discussions which demand their own vocabulary it is ἀΐδιος that is used. Like Origen, Gregory too, when he speaks of life in the beyond, uses ζωὴ ἀΐδιος, if he wishes to indicate its eternity, and ζωὴ αἰώνιος, if he wishes to emphasize that it will be in the next world, in very many instances (so, too, "αἰώνιος home" in heaven, δόξα αἰώνιος, αἰώνιος μακαριότης, "αἰώνιοι and ineffable hopes," i.e., hopes for life in the future αἰών rather than to hopes that are themselves eternal, etc.). The connection between αἰώνιος life and the αἰών to come is especially clear in Inst. Chr. (GNO VIII/1,79,4), where the αἰώνιος joy that characterizes the future life is "that which the souls of the saints will enjoy in the future age that is expected [ἐν τῷ προσδοκομένῳ αἰῶνι]." But when he speaks of destruction or death or misfortune or punishment or the fire in the life to come, Gregory uses always and only αἰώνιος (e.g., ὄλεθρος αἰώνιος, πῦρ αἰώνιον, αἰώνιος κόλασις, αἰσχύνη καὶ ἀτιμία αἰώνιος), never ἀΐδιος. For he holds that the purifying fire will be applied to sinners in the αἰών, which will end with the apokatastasis, the absolute eternity (ἀϊδιότης), and since life will endure in this eternity, but not death and punishment, and all evil will disappear, only life can be called really eternal (ἀΐδιος), not death (as already Origen argued in Comm. Rom. V 7: si vita aeterna est, mors esse non possit aeterna).

Death, fire and punishment are merely αἰώνια, for they will be in the future αἰών but will cease at the end of the αἰών, or even earlier for some people. In De Inf. 91,23–92,2, the use of αἰώνιος in reference to purification in the next world makes it particularly clear that it is not a question of eternal punishment, but rather of a purification that will have an end: "after long periods of time [χρόνων μακρῶν περίοδοις], by means of purification in the future age [διὰ τῆς αἰωνίας καθάρσεως], God will return this person again to the totality of those who are saved [τῷ τῶν σῳζομένων πληρώματι]," where the total number of the saved coincides, for Gregory, with all humankind. Gregory adds that "this will be absolutely clear to all those who consider God's power" and God's nature, with reference to Jesus' assertion in the gospel that the salvation of sinners is "impossible among human beings, but everything is possible for God." In De Anima, Gregory uses αἰών and αἰώνιος in reference to purifying punishment, while explicitly denying that it is eternal: the αἰών in question is—just as in Origen—that between the death of the individual and the universal apokatastasis, after which there no longer is any aeon, but rather the perfect and immutable ἀϊδιότης of all creatures in God, when (in Origen's words) "no one will be in the αἰών any longer, but God will be all in all."

Divine eternity, in which humans will participate, is not an infinite extension in time, but transcends all time. In Gregory, as in Origen and several Fathers influenced by the Origenian tradition, the eternity of God is closely related to God's infinity, on which also Gregory's conception of ἐπέκτασις depends. For God transcends every διάστημα of space or time. Gregory explains this well in C. Eun. I 1,371: the nature of God is absolutely eternal (ἀΐδιος) because it is not situated in time, just as it is not located in a place: it is ἀδιάστατος. In Fragments on Matthew 487, he speaks of τὸ χρονικὸν τοῦτο διάστημα, "this temporal extension," and αὐτὸ δὲ τὸ χρονικὸν διάστημα, "temporal extension itself." He also employs the term διάστημα in reference to intervals of time in several passages, such as Comm. Matth. 15,28.34. In De Or. 27,13-14, Origen compares the extension or διάστημα of a day with that of an entire αἰών. Indeed, time, according to Origen, depends on the freedom of the νόες and on God's Providence, which respects their freedom but at the same time is also infallible in bringing all creatures to the eventual salvation (C. Cels. V 21 etc.): the differentiation of the merits or demerits acquired by rational creatures through their free choices takes place in time, which is the explication of the νόες's free will and free choices, and which extends through several αἰῶνες, but concludes with the ἀϊδιότης of the apokatastasis (Princ. II 3,5). In this connection, another convergence between Origen and Gregory of Nyssa is the description of eternal divine life as ἀδιάστατος, a term already used by *Philo and, then, by Plotinus, who, like Origen, also employs διάστασις, in addition to διάστημα, in reference to time. Gregory in turn will oppose the corporeal nature, διαστηματική, to the incorporeal one, ἀδιάστατος (De an. 48; De hom. op. 23,3; *C. Eun.*12, where his adherence to Origen's vocabulary is particularly evident).

It is in this light that we should consider Augustine's conception of time and eternity, of the temporality of creatures and the eternity of God, a relationship that is analyzed in Book 11 of the Confessions. Whereas eternity, far from being an infinite extension in time, is a "lack of extension" and thus is timeless, time is an "extension" or "dimension of the soul" (distentio animi), where distentio precisely corresponds to διάστημα/διάστασις, and lack of extension to the idea of being ἀδιάστατος. Eternity was not and will not be, but it is an eternal present, and so it represents the fullness of being. Of course, eternity and the fullness of being are typical of God. The Plotinian background for this conception, both in Gregory of Nyssa and in Augustine, is evident: Plotinus too defined eternity as ἀδιάστατος, an eternal present, proper to the fullness of Being. Tzamalikos has also proposed our seeing Origen's influence behind Augustine's conception of time and eternity, and, also in the light of recent studies on the influence of Origen on Augustine, I think he may be right. According to the former, however, in the end all rational creatures will participate in divine eternity and life.

J. Guitton, Le temps et l'éternité chez Plotin et Saint Augustin, Paris 1955; H. Keizer, Life, Time, Entirety, Amsterdam 1999; E. Degani, Αἰών, Bologna 2001; G. Heidl, Origen's Influence on the Young Augustine, Louaize, Lebanon - Piscataway, NJ, 2003, with my review Stylos 14 (2005) 194-198; I. Ramelli, Aion, in Enciclopedia Filosofica, I, Milan [2]2006, 217; P. Tzamalikos, Origen: Philosophy of History and Eschatology, Leiden 2007; I. Ramelli - D. Konstan, Terms for Eternity. Αἰώνιος and Ἀΐδιος in Classical and Christian Authors, Piscataway 2007; Id., Gregorio di Nissa. Sull'anima e la resurrezione, Milan 2007, critical essays and commentaries; Id., Origen, Bardaisan, and the Origin of Universal Salvation: HTR 102.2 (2009) 135-168; Id., Apocatastasi, Milan 2010.

I. Ramelli

ETHELBERT (560–616) king of Kent: his kingdom extended as far as the river Humber. A pagan, he married the Christian Bertha, daughter of the Frankish king Charibert of Paris. In 597 he welcomed *Augustine and his companions, sent to evangelize the Anglo-Saxons, allowing them to live at *Canterbury, his capital. It seems that he soon converted to Christianity, and in June 601 *Gregory the Great addressed letters to him (Ep. XI,37) and to Bertha (Ep. XI,35). The code of laws attributed to Ethelbert, composed iuxta exempla Romanorum (Bede, Hist. II,5) but in the Anglo-Saxon language, is closer to the Lex Salica (whose first redaction goes back to the early 6th c.) than to Roman models; according to Germanic customary law, the code aims at the protection of personal goods, including those of clergy. He was succeeded by his son Eadbald.

CPL 1827; F. Liebermann (ed.), Die Gesetze der Angelsachsen, I, Halle 1903, 3-8; PLRE IIIA, 20; DHGE XV, 1156-1158; A.W.B. Simpson, The Laws of Ethelbert, in S.A. Morris - T.A. Green et al. (eds.), On the Laws and Customs of England, Chapel Hill 1981, 3-17.

E. Malaspina

ETHICS. The early Fathers were deeply interested in the moral implications of the Christian faith, starting with the familiar morals of the *Apostolic Fathers and the public defense of the *apologists. Among Greek Fathers, *Clement of Alexandria resolves various pressing problems and gives detailed advice, *Basil prescribes the behavior of the monk and *Chrysostom preaches ethics to his congregations. Among Latin Fathers, *Tertullian is a rigorist who exaggerates situations, *Lactantius formulates the basic principles of law and *Ambrose follows the model of Cicero in a moral treatise. Ancient tendencies are summed up in *Augustine who, as a *Platonist and a Westerner, joins them all together. At first, private matters remained central; later, the Christian state added wider problems.

Ethical exhortation is formulated in various literary forms: the Apostolic Fathers use those found in the NT: the "two ways" of *life and *death, catalogs of virtues and vices, family codes, proverbs, letters and parables. This variety grows in later writings. Clement of Alexandria provides a manual for daily life and an appeal for spiritual perfection, Basil formulates a Rule (in two forms), which had lasting influence, while Chrysostom prefers to rely on his sermons. Tertullian writes on specific questions; Lactantius inserts moral principles into a doctrinal context; and Ambrose systematically treats of the virtues. Augustine deals with general principles and concrete problems in letters, sermons and treatises of various kinds.

Recurrent themes include freedom, justice and love. Freedom is the condition of moral action; determinism is constantly opposed. Ethics begin and end in Christology. *Clement of Rome links divine justice with the order of the universe (1 Cor. 40). The perfection of every virtue is love, without which no one can please God (1 Cor. 49-50). Christians must be disciples, following and imitating those who have gone before them (1 Cor. 63). *Ignatius insists on the imitation of Christ and the Christian's close communion with his Lord (Eph. 1; Rom. 4, 6, 7; Phil. 7). Martyrdom is the crown the Christian athlete aspires to (Pol. 2; Rom. 4, 6). *Hermas makes a last appeal for justice to a church that has betrayed its past (Vis. 2, 2). Rigorism and *asceticism mark the path of highest rectitude. Every act that brings pleasure is an act of self-indulgence, but it is not wrong to indulge in doing good (Sim. 6, 5). Christian justice obeys the divine precepts: it is the way of love for God, for neighbors and for enemies (Didache 1).

With *Justin, we move in a different world, with the need to explain Christian faith and practice. Christians are considered immoral by some, ignorant by others, faithless by the Jews, and irrational by all: Justin defends and explains. Everyone may observe the changed lives of Christians, a result of their conversion. Those who once lived unworthily now follow the one unbegotten God and pray that their enemies may know the true God. Love for enemies is the distinctive sign of the Christian (1 Apol. 14-16). Justice and love are joined in the one commandment given by the one God. The new law takes the place of the old: the law given on Horeb is no longer valid. Christ is the eternal and definitive law (Dial. 11, 2) for all rational creatures, human beings who by nature know right from wrong. This universal justice is summed up in the dual precept of love for God and for the living rational being who is our neighbor (Dial. 93). Against any kind of determinism, Justin maintains that human beings are rational and capable of choosing between just and unjust: otherwise there could be no hope of salvation for humanity, and morality would be a matter of opinion (1 Apol. 28). If there were no free will, human actions would be neither praised nor blamed, and people would not unexpectedly change from good to bad and from bad to good (1 Apol. 43, 1). God puts off judgment of the world so that human beings can choose salvation (2 Apol. 7, 1). Justin uses a new word, autexousios (Dial. 88, 102, 144), to bring out the fact of human free choice.

Clement of Alexandria has left us the first complete treatment of Christian morality in daily life as it progresses toward perfection. Right reason should govern all human behavior. Virtue is a harmonious rational state that follows the order of the universe. Lustfulness, like any fault, puts things out of place and throws nature into confusion: it is irrational since it subverts the end of the person. With this *Stoic insistence on life in accordance with nature, Clement gives detailed instructions for every aspect of life. One reason for this attention was a *gnostic sect that taught a heavenly justice and defended sexual communism among those who wished to reestablish the higher order. Clement also insists, against *Marcion, on the unity of justice and goodness. In Clement we find a strong ethical monism and an interest in detailed prescription. His presentation of love includes both loving union with God and the good works that spring from this love (Quis div. salv. 27-28). Love of God is the path to perfection, "because the more a man loves God, the more closely he enters God" (ibid.). Love of neighbor develops together with love for God. Perfection consists in martyrdom, which "reveals the perfect work of love" (Strom. IV, 4, 14), but the true gnostic anticipates heaven on earth and worships God with his whole life; he lives in continual mental prayer, giving undivided attention to God (Strom. VII, 7, 43). This is the first exposition of Christian perfection and spirituality, which would dominate subsequent religious life.

Clement's enthusiasm comes from debate with false gnostics and from the mixture of *Paul and *Plato that dominates his teaching. His ascetic tendencies are evident in sobriety, self-control and freedom from the passions, which join humanity to God. Here he joins with the philosophers against the gnostics, who claimed affinity with God and yet indulged their passions. Clement's presentation of gnostic morality has been criticized on the basis of the ascetism of the Nag Hammadi writings. Yet he names specific leaders and practices (Strom. III, 2, 5-6; III, 4, 25-5, 44), and declares that the splendid freedom of the heretics is incompatible with the furtive dissimulation of their misdeeds (Strom. III, 4, 30). However, he tenaciously defends marriage against the gnostic form of asceticism. Marriage is a life of greater day-to-day stress than the tranquillity of celibacy (Strom. VII, 12, 70), and a spiritual union that anticipates the heavenly life (Strom. VI, 12, and VII, 12-13).

Despite many similarities between Clement and the Sentences of *Sextus, the latter's ascetic exertion is much more severe; he demands every possible renunciation of the body and exhibits the Pythagorean soma-sema. In contrast with Clement, his attitude to riches is extremely negative; love of money is a trap: the wise man will possess no private property other than his virtue (79, 81), and private property is impossible for those who are brothers under the one heavenly Father (228). Assimilation to God remains the main goal of ethical endeavor: the *soul must always live in the presence of God while it aims at sinless perfection (8, 234, 237). It leaves the world behind and ascends to God by faith (402), through his Word (420). The wise man is God among human beings (376a), and his soul incorporates God (82d). This assimilation is always possible thanks to a severe renunciation of the body's needs; every sexual desire must be destroyed (232-233). Those who wish to be more closely united with God must renounce marriage; on the other hand, family life is not incompatible with the wise man's life as long as he is aware of its dangers (230a, 230b). *Death is a welcome liberation of the soul from the burden of the body (320). *Faith is the basis of a good life (6, 400, 402); the believer is set free (36) and prevails over the world and human beings (43, 182). Sextus gives a narrower description of *love than Clement: love is directed toward anyone whose soul resembles (106a) God (106b) and truth (158). To love God means to carry out his will (442), and to love another wise man is to love oneself (219, 226).

*Basil of Caesarea insists on human *freedom. Without free will there can be no basis for praise or blame, and the possibility of merit is the first condition of any just judgment (Hom. 6, 7). He rejects astrology in one homily and demonstrates in another that God cannot be the author of evil. Moral choice belongs to the person's faculties and his will is free. Justice is more important than any other consideration and admits no compromise. There is no difference between venial and grave sins, since every sin is disobedience to God, who will judge all on the last day (Reg. f., Pr: PG 31, 891-892). Christian justice must exceed that of the Scribes and Pharisees, and must be characterized by supererogation (Mor. 80, 22). Starting from his fundamental horror of sin and zeal for justice, he ends in a detailed presentation of the upright life. As in Clement, every detail of life is examined. In the Moralia, Basil collects NT passages prescribing the good or forbidding the bad. In the long and short Rules he addresses the details of monastic life. Basil wanted the Rules to become the source of moral reform for the whole church, led by the monks' example. In his homilies on the six days of creation, Basil shows the order, harmony and example of nature. The same God is revealed in creation and in the moral life. His law is established in nature, so that fish migrate (Hex. 7, 4) and swallows build their nests with regularity, perseverance and exemplary industry (Hex. 8, 5). Love of God and neighbor, the end of the commandments, arises from an innate tendency. The heart of the person turns to the beauty and splendor of God, so that longing for God and seeking God's love rises above everything else. United to God in continual prayer, love grows until it reaches perfection. Christ's disciples are distinguished by their mutual love (Mor. 5) and by the peace they show to all. Mutual love, like love of God, is a tendency innate in human beings, a seed that must be developed in the unity of Christ's body.

In John Chrysostom we find the same insistence on human freedom and moral responsibility. Sin comes from the sinner's will, not from any external cause (Comm. Ps. 140, 7); all are given knowledge of what is right or wrong. The person can accept or reject God's grace (Hom. Hebr. 34, 2). As in Clement, free will is distinct from freedom. All have free will, but only Christ's disciple can break the slavery of sin and live a truly free life (Theod. 2, 5). God must be just: he will judge all people, and their present actions will determine their eternal destiny. God does not remain outside the person's moral struggle: he is just and justifies. He does not preside over our contest like an impartial referee: he fights at our side against the devil. God's law governs everything and gives the person an interior law. The natural law is able to guide the conscience to what is good and away from what is evil (De statuis 12, 9). The same God who established the order of the universe formulated the moral order and requires of the person a life of order and moderation. Only sin is to be feared: nothing can harm the person who does not harm himself.

Along with consciousness of the cosmic order, John upholds the importance of work, which is a law of nature and the will of the Creator, who also works in his world (Salutate Priscillam et Aquilam [Rom 16:3], 1, 5). Work finds its meaning through the love that produces every virtue. "Virtue is born from love and love from virtue; they generate each other mutually" (Hom. Eph. 9, 3). God joins human beings together by the bonds of his love. He has made humanity such that its members need one another and must live together in friendship and mutual relationship (Hom. 1 Cor. 34, 4). Christ's love is a great power which, according to Paul, is stronger than any human or angelic power. Thus love cannot be imprisoned in silence: it spreads like fire from friend to friend (De Comp. ad Demet. 1, 8). Love is humanity's greatest teacher; it transforms the violent and sensual into peaceful people, and gives courage to the timid (Hom. 1 Cor. 33, 8). Love guides the way to perfection in this world and admits no compromises: "The measure of love is never to stop" (Hom. Phil. 2, 1).

In Tertullian and the Latin Fathers too, the old emphasis remains: freedom, justice and love; but we do not find Clement's synthesis, passed to later Greek Fathers through Origen. In fact, this synthesis came from the union of Paul and Plato and, though Tertullian uses philosophy, he is no Platonist, but rather a Stoic and, as such, occupied with reason and laws, compassion, chastity and patience. His ethical teaching depends on *Scripture, which he uses as a book of sacred law, giving the precise words uncontestable authority. Freedom remains important; Tertullian establishes this point at some length (Adv. Marc. 2, 6). God can be known only by a worthy being who possesses his image and likeness: free will, which makes the person capable of spontaneously doing good. Part of goodness is thus set free by God in the human souls whom he has freed. Free will is also the source of evil in the world: God's prescience does not limit human freedom. Human beings no longer present the true image of God in which they were made: sin has so disfigured this image that it needs to be restored by the incarnate Christ, who became man so that human beings might become God (Adv. Marc. 2, 27). The heavenly image becomes ours to the extent that we advance in the holiness, justice and truth of Christ (De Res. 49). This imitation of God in Christ is reinforced by fear of God's judgment. Goodness and justice are inseparable and are found in intimacy with God, outside which all is corrupt. What is not of God is of the devil, hence the world cannot produce virtue; its apparent virtues cannot be accepted as indifferent, but are the work of the devil. Good and evil have no common basis. Good is absolute, rational and dependent on God. Rationality is connected with conscience and natural law. Conscience decides what should be done and judges what has been done (Paen. 12). A common ground between Christian and pagan conscience (Apol. 9-10) is what nature teaches (Test. 5; Adv. Marc. 1, 3). Nature is the primary norm for all, common to all people, in whose hearts it is inscribed (De Cor. 5-6). This was made explicit in the Decalogue, but the law proceeds from Moses to its final fulfillment in Christ (Adv. Marc. 4, 15-16).

To Scripture and nature Tertullian adds church discipline: these are the three guides in moral matters. Love remains the supreme sacrament and the treasure of the Christian (Fug. 14), whom it sometimes calls to the gift of life itself for the love of God (Scorp. 4). "See how they love one another": this is the mark of the Christian family (Apol. 39), which is a special unity within the wider unity of the human race. Tertullian formulates a catalogue of Christian virtues, looking particularly at chastity and patience. Salvation is closely connected with modesty (Cult. 2). Virginity and celibacy are of primary importance (Cast. 1); the good done by Christians is the fundamental argument of apologetic. Care of the hair or skin is a form of prostitution (Cult., passim). Abstinence within marriage is praised (Ux. 1, 6). Widows and widowers are recommended to take the opportunity offered by their misfortune to reject the flesh and gain the spirit (Cast. 10). Patience is central to the moral life, strengthening faith, peace, charity, humility and penitence, and restraining the flesh, the tongue and the hands from evil (De Pat. 15).

Lactantius formulates a specific structure for his ethics. Reason is important, since virtue needs knowledge to guide its steps. Freedom is essential since Christ does not use violence when he asks obedience, but leaves human freedom intact (Inst. 4, 24). The will is directed toward doing good by the virtue that is entirely within our power (Inst. 6, 5.6). There is a desire (cupiditas) to do what is right, just as there is an opposite desire born of a bad will (Inst. 6, 5.9). Since moral action derives from faith, freedom of belief is essential. Persons must be free to worship as they wish. Force may constrain people to simulate reverence, but it cannot constrain the will to actual reverence (Ep. 49 [54], 1-2). Reason and choice go together. Wisdom is the knowledge of God (Ira 22, 2) and an understanding of the duty to do good and abstain from evil (Inst. 5, 17). In this way wisdom combines religion and morality, since God is the source of all goodness (Inst. 6, 9). The greatest justice, without knowledge of God, is like a body without a head (Inst. 6. 9). To know and honor God is the whole of human wisdom (Inst. 3, 30), and only justice can lead the person to God (Inst. 7, 27). Justice is piety and knowledge of God as Father (Inst. 3, 9). The world has been made so that human beings may know and serve God forever (Ep. 64 [69], 1).

The unity of the upright life is again brought out in the description of the human being as the image of God, because of the capacity to know and think (Ira 18, 14, 17). From this resemblance arise the two sources of ethics: persons should respect other persons as they respect God (Inst. 6, 10, 1), and neglect their own body so that their affinity with God may become ever more evident (Ira 18, 14). Relationship with God is summarized (as in St. Paul) by the concept of sacrifice (Inst. 6, 25). Nothing visible is offered to God, but only the devotion of soul and spirit (Inst. 5, 19). God requires nothing external and is worshiped by the sacrifice of an upright life (Ep. 53 [581). The tension between body and soul is part of a wider tension that is essential for the moral life. There are two lives or two ways, and the choice between them is an essential struggle (certamen), since "God has made everything so as to put two things in opposition" (Inst. 6, 22). So we must always wage a struggle and make a choice (Inst. 4, 4, 15-17). Lactantius openly accepts Cicero's position on natural law (Inst. 6, 8, citing Cicero, Rep. 3, 22-23). The divine inner law serves as a basis from which to criticize positive law with its expedient variations between nations (Inst. 6,9). Reason is the only guide to right conduct (Inst. 2, 6, 11) and is found perfected in Christ (Ep. 37 [42]). Although reason is supreme, the affectus (passions) are not condemned, as with Stoicism: rather, they must be used well and directed to what is just (Inst. 6, 16). The great virtue that governs and crowns moral life is patience or perseverance (Inst. 6, 18). Sacrifice to God and patience are completed with humanitas and innocentia toward others. Lactantius speaks little of caritas, but subdivides this virtue into specific, concrete parts. People are bound by their common humanitas (Inst. 6, 10), and this must be expressed by their mercy or mutual humanity (Inst. 6, 10). Humanitas, taken from Cicero, is deepened by Christian mercy (Ep. 33 [38] 8). With it goes innocentia (Inst. 5, 17), refusal to render evil for evil. Whatever cruelty is inflicted upon them, Christians do not retort with words or actions, but trust patiently and quietly in God (Ep. 48 [53]). Among other themes, Lactantius defends private property and rejects Plato's idealistic communism (Inst. 3, 21).

*Ambrose maintains the Stoic tendencies of the earliest Latin authors, but joins to them the Platonism of the Greek Fathers. His De Officiis ministrorum is based on Cicero's De Officiis, completed by biblical teaching. He follows Cicero in making clear what is upright or useful and what is both upright and useful: but his measure is based on what is eternal, not on the present world (Off. I, 9). He distinguishes duties valid for all (ordinary) from those valid only for some (perfect) (Off. I, 11), and describes the four cardinal virtues of prudence, justice, fortitude and temperance. The good life is eternal life, which is found in knowledge of God and in doing good (Off. II, 2). Here Ambrose moves from a plurality of virtues to the one source of goodness, from philosophy to theology and from Stoicism to Platonism. He gives a positive description of the Christian battle and victory (Luc. Prol. 6 and Jac. 1, 6, 23). Adversity must be accepted as a school of faith and the way to victory (Luc. 6, 37-39). In his last works, Ambrose makes love the highest Christian virtue. Love flows from faith and hope from love, in a perennial cycle (Luc. 8, 30). But love is the greatest, the fullness and perfection of all the rest (Ep. 78, 9).

*Augustine sums up the greater part of patristic ethics. Freedom, justice and love remain central. The tensions in each sphere are unified by Christian discipleship, the single obedience that joins together all the ethical imperatives. Humility must accompany every Christian virtue and point to its origin in God (Ep. 118, 22). All human beings have free will, but are incapable of overcoming temptations (Enarr. in Ps. 89, 4). Through grace the human will is led back to its original efficacy and the person recovers freedom and charity (Ep. 167, 6, 19). Augustine defends free will against *Manichean determinism, but rejects the *Pelagian claim that people can choose rightly without God. "So we do not in any way weaken the free choice of each human will, nor do we deny with ungrateful pride, but affirm with grateful devotion, that grace of God by which the free will is aided" (De bono vid. 17, 21). Justification comes from God whose eternal law commands that the natural law be observed. This means following the order impressed by the Creator in the creation (Faust. 22, 27 and 30). Nature is ruled by laws; living creatures have instincts fixed in accordance with the natural law (Gen. ad litt. IX, 17, 32). Measure, form and order are universal goods. Order is what guides us to God (De ord. I, 9, 27).

Augustine is aware of the complexity of moral problems. There are various degrees of virtue and vice: e.g., a liar is one who denies truth or affirms falsehood, but lying has eight possible degrees of gravity (De mend. 14, 25). War may vary from mass extermination to deplorable necessity. Suicide is always evil. Augustine wrote several times on marriage and celibacy, but concluded that he was limited to showing the complexity of the problems (Retract. II, 53). All justice, however, comes from God, fons justitiae (Civ. Dei I, 21), sol justitiae (Civ. Dei V, 16) and summa justitia (Civ. Dei XX, 2). From God flows the justice by which human beings are justified (Civ. Dei XXII, 2). God's goodness, unlike that of creatures, does not change but remains always the same (Enchir. 12, 4). Even in his description of love, Augustine is conscious of unity and variety together. The oft-cited "Love and do what you will" (In Ep. Jo. 7, 8) shows how love uses different energies and actions. Love may be severe, as he thought it had to be in dealing with the *Donatists.

He is more convincing elsewhere, in his presentation of what he calls the ordo amoris. The good things of the world should be loved as a pledge of love for God who made them. "God, then, has given you these things. Love him who has made them" (In Ep. Jo. 2, 11). Next, in ascending order, comes love of self, the gift of self to God (Serm. 34, 7 and 57, 7). Then follows love of neighbor, which shows the church to be a demonstration of the truth of the gospel and a living sacrament. Finally and above all is love of God. God is love, present in every love that binds the good angels and God's servants. This means that God is nearer and better known since he himself is love (Trin. VIII, 11-12). Love thus calls the person to perfection, to the God whom he will praise and love forever (Enarr. in Ps. 38, 8). The person's end, whether one speaks of justice or love, is God himself. "Blessed is the one who possesses God" (De mor. eccl. cath. 11, 18). The variety and unity of ethical concepts find their coherence in the discipleship that derives only from God and that follows and imitates Christ (Serm. 304, 22).

Some ethical concepts persist throughout the patristic period. Free will is defended against *gnostic and *Manichean determinism, but perfect freedom is found only in God, and the person strives to reach freedom through the grace of God. Justice becomes insistence on harmonious order, and the notion of natural law emerges. Love remains central, except in Lactantius, whose ideal is expressed by the concepts humanitas and innocentia. Love becomes more mystical and spiritual. Martyrdom remains the ideal of the Christian's moral progress and, when martyrdom is no longer possible, *ascesis grows in importance. The call to deny the world is strong, even if mitigated by the risk of a heretical dualism. In all the variety and confusion, following Christ remains the main task; assimilation to God, imitation of Christ, participation in God—all represent the individual ways by which the ancient Fathers joined together justice and love.

K. Holl, Enthusiasmus und Bussgewalt bei griechischen Mönchtum, Leipzig 1898; Ch. Baur, Das Ideal der christlichen Vollkommenheit nach dem hl. J. Chrysostomus: ThGl 6 (1914) 564-574; E. Tröltsch, Augustin, Die christliche Antike und das Mittelalter, Munich - Berlin 1915 (It. tr. Naples 1970); J. Rivière, S. Basile, évêque de Césarée (Les moralistes chrétiens), Paris 1925; M. Viller, Le martyr et l'ascète: RAM 6 (1925) 105-142; Id., Martyr et perfection: RAM 6 (1925) 3-25; Ch. Baur, Der Weg der christlichen Vollkommenheit nach der Lehre des hl. Johannes Chrysostomus: ThGl 20 (1928) 26-41; J. Mausbach, Die Ethik des heiligen Augustinus, I, II, Freiburg i. Br. 1929; L. Meyer, S. Jean Chrysostome, maître de perfection chrétienne, Paris 1933; K. Heussi, Der Ursprung des Mönchtums, Tübingen 1936; J. Burnaby, Amor Dei. A Study of St Augustine's Teaching on the Love of God as the Motive of the Christian Life, London 1938; T. Preiss, La mystique de l'imitation du Christ et de l'unité chez Ignace d'Antioche: RHPhR (1938) 197-241; M. Viller - K. Rahner, Aszese und Mystik in der Väterzeit, Freiburg i. Br. 1939 (It. tr. Brescia 1991); D. Amand, L'ascèse monastique de S. Basile, Maredsous 1948; T. Ruther, Die sittliche Forderung der Apatheia in den beiden ersten christlichen Jahrhunderten und bei Klemens von Alexandrien, Freiburg i. Br. 1949; W. Völker, Der wahre Gnostiker nach Clemens Alexandrinus, Berlin - Leipzig 1952; J. Dumortier, Les idées morales de S. J. Chrysostome: MSR 12 (1955) 27-36; J. Gribomont, Les règles morales de S. Basile et le NT: SP 2 (TU 64) (1957) 416-426; H. Chadwick, The Sentences of Sextus, Cambridge 1959; O. Schaffner, Christliche Demut, Würzburg 1959; A.M. Malingrey, Philosophia, Paris 1961; A. Benito y Durán, Filosofia de s. Basilio Magno: SP 5 (TU 80) (1962) 446-472; R. Holte, Béatitude et Sagesse. S. Augustin et le problème de la fin de l'homme dans la philosophie ancienne, Paris 1962; E. Dassmann, Die Frömmigkeit des Kirchenvaters Ambrosias von Mailand, Münster 1965 (It. tr. Varese 1975); O. Prunet, La morale de Clément d'Alexandrie, Paris 1966; A. Zumkeller, Das Mönchtum des heiligen Augustinus, Würzburg 1968; M. Spanneut, Tertullien et les premiers moralistes africains, Gembloux 1969; J.P. Broudéhoux, Mariage et famille chez Clém. d'Alexandrie, Paris 1970; E. Osborn, Ethical Patterns in Early Christian Thought, Cambridge 1976; A. J. Malherbe, Social Aspects of Early Christianity, Philadelphia [2]1983; F.X. Murphy, The Christian Way of Life, Message of the Fathers of the Church 18, Wilmington 1986; R. Lane Fox, Pagans and Christians, Harmondsworth 1986 (It. tr. Bari 1991); W.S. Babcock, Augustine on Sin and Moral Agency: The Journal of Religious Ethics 16 (1988) 28-55; A. Jagu, La morale d'Epictète et le christianisme: ANRW II,36,3 (1989) 2164-2199; H. Chadwick, The Originality of Early Christian Ethics. A James Bryce Mem. Lecture Delivered in the Wolfons Hall, Oxford 1990; W.S. Babcock (ed.), The Ethics of St. Augustine, Atlanta 1991; J. Wetzel, Augustine and the Limits of Virtue, Cambridge 1992; W.A. Meeks, The Origins of Christian Morality, The First Two Centuries, New Haven 1993; Etica cristiana nei secoli III e IV: eredità e confronti, SEA 53, Rome 1996; R. Hays, The Moral Vision of the New Testament, Edinburgh 1997; A.-I. Bouton-Touboulic, Les valeurs d'ordo et leur réception chez saint Augustin: REAug 45 (1999) 295-334; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Agostino tra etica e religione, Brescia 1999.

E. Osborn

ETHIOPIA

I. Early Christianity - II. Liturgy - III. Christian art - IV. Classical language or Ge'ez - V. Literature.

I. Early Christianity. The introduction of Christianity into Ethiopia should be linked, it would seem, to the story of Queen Candace's treasurer (Acts 8:27). Yet we know nothing more of the early centuries. There were probably Christians among the foreign merchants residing at Adulis and *Aksum; their religious propaganda must have gained importance with the growth of the church's prestige in the Roman Empire and with the success following on *Constantine's decree (313), which allowed full freedom to the spread of the gospel; in fact, the only source that speaks of the beginnings of the spread of Christianity in Ethiopia (or more precisely in the kingdom of Aksum) puts these events at the time of Constantine. According to the historian *Rufinus (Historia Eccl. I, 9-10), "temporibus Constantini," two young Syrians, *Frumentius and Aedesius, shipwrecked on the coast of "India ulterior," were reduced to slavery by the king, whose confidence they later won. On the king's death, Frumentius, now prime minister of the queen regent, diligently set out to discover whether there were any Christians among the Roman merchants, and gave them leave to build churches and celebrate rites. Aedesius later returned to *Tyre, where, having become a priest, he met Rufinus. Frumentius went to *Alexandria to inform St. *Athanasius of events, who ordained him bishop of the country. Rufinus, however, is imprecise about its geographical position, calling it vaguely "India ulterior"; its exact name is known only from a letter sent by the emperor *Constantius in ca. 356 to the two sovereigns of Aksum: Aizanas and Sazanas. This letter, handed down by Athanasius (Apologia 31), asks the Aksumites to send bishop Frumentius back to Alexandria to submit to the *Arian patriarch *George, who took possession of that see early in 357, but fled from it in August 358. The letter's recipients were almost certainly King Ezana and his brother Sazana; according to a group of Aksumite inscriptions, Ezana passed from paganism to monotheism before being converted to Christianity (ca. mid 4th c.).

Altogether, these Aksumite documents allow us to establish an evolution from polytheism to Christianity, without specifying times or ways. Rufinus shows only how the evangelization of the kingdom of Aksum began; Frumentius's ministerial activity must be considered the continuation of apostolic activity, a stage in the economy of salvation. It is unclear why Frumentius went to Alexandria rather than *Antioch; there may have been preexistent links between the primitive Ethiopian Christian communities and the neighboring *Egyptian sees. The fact remains that, by receiving episcopal ordination from St. Athanasius, he made the church of Ethiopia dependent on the patriarch of Alexandria; the two churches would also remain linked in *monophysitism.

With Ezana's conversion, Christianity became the official religion of the kingdom of Aksum, to which groups of Syrian monks migrated in the 5th and 6th c., as is hinted by local traditions that, in the Acts of the "nine saints" and the "just men" (ṣādqān), preserve references to the origin of these "saints" in Rom (Eastern empire) and to Syrian proper names. Though the Syrian origin of these monks is now universally admitted, it is less certain whether they were for or against the Council of *Chalcedon; many scholars, and the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, hold that they were monophysites. From the "Lives of the Just," we deduce that the immigrant missionaries met local resistance to their evangelization, perhaps related to the decline of Aksumite power, when Christianity was expanding more and more toward the S of that kingdom.

The long, scarcely documented medieval period (7th-12th c.) is characterized by the decline of the kingdom of Aksum and the removal of the capital to the Lasta region under the Zagwe dynasty, famous for its construction of the rock-hewn churches of Lalibela. During these centuries the Ethiopian church continued to depend on the Alexandrian; the metropolitan of Ethiopia, always an Egyptian, was chosen and consecrated by the patriarch of Alexandria, to whom the Ethiopian kings turned for a new bishop whenever the death of the incumbent metropolitan left the country without one. Evangelization intensified and expanded in the pagan regions of Ethiopia, as we can deduce from Acts of local saints living in those centuries. With the coming of Islam in the 7th c., Muslim expansion made lines of communication more difficult between the West and Christian Ethiopia, which for centuries strenuously resisted the new faith, giving Christianity more and more the character of a national religion. With the establishment of the Muslim empire, relations between Ethiopia and other Christian countries could be maintained only through Egypt and *Jerusalem. The Ethiopians who went on pilgrimage to the holy city constituted a community of their own; through them, news of the wonderful Christian king of that distant African land reached Europe.

In 1270 the Solomonids seized power in the Ethiopian nation, which in the following centuries saw the greatest expansion of its borders, esp. under kings Dawit (1382–1413) and Zarʿa Yaʿqob (1434–1468), together with an intensification of the struggle between the Christian state and Islam. At the same time there were new developments in the church of St. Frumentius. While on the one hand the presence in Ethiopia of an Egyptian metropolitan continued, on the other a hierarchy of regular clergy asserted itself. In the 13th c. this hierarchy recognized the abbot of St. Stephen of Hàic as its superior; later, the supremacy of the secular clergy would be assumed by the abbot of Debre Libanos monastery in Shewa, who, under the title of echage, maintained his power over the Ethiopian monastic communities, except for the later monks of the north who recognized a saintly 14th-c. Ethiopian monk, Eustathius, as their founder. Theological disputes flourished in this period, as did heresies, among which were (1) denial of the "Feast of Mount Zion," aimed against the institution of the *Eucharist; (2) the heresy of the Mikaelites, who held that God does not have a human form, but a form that he alone knows, and acknowledged three names, but only one person, in the *Trinity; (3) the heresy of the Stephanites, who refused to venerate Mary and the cross. These doctrinal deviations were severely opposed and, in part, suppressed by King Zar'a Ya'qob.

C. Conti Rossini, Storia d'Etiopia, Bergamo 1928; Sergew Hable Sellassie, Ancient and Medieval Ethiopian History to 1270, Addis Ababa 1972; Taddesse Tamrat, Church and State in Ethiopia 1270–1527, Oxford 1972; E. Cerulli, Etiopi in Palestina, I-II, Rome 1943/47; E. Ullendorff, Ethiopia and the Bible, London 1968; Id., The Ethiopians, Oxford 1973; C.F. Brown, Ethiopian Perspectives: A Bibliographical Guide to the History of Ethiopia, African Bibliographic Center. Special Bibliographical Series. N.S. 5, Westport-London 1978; G. Hasselblatt, Aethiopien. Menschen, Kirchen, Kulturen, Stuttgart 1979; O. Raineri, "Gadla Sadqan" o "Vita dei Giusti": Missionari dell'Etiopia nel sesto secolo, Nicolaus 6 (1978) 143-163; F. Thelamon, Païens et Chrétiens au IVᵉ siècle. L'apparat de l'"Histoire ecclésiastique" de Rufin d'Aquilée, Paris 1981; R. Beylot, Estifanos hétérodoxe éthiopien du XVᵉ siècle: RHR 198 (1981) 279-284; Getatchew Haile, Religious Controversies and the Growth of Ethiopic Literature in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries: OC 65 (1981) 102-136; O. Raineri, La spiritualità etiopica, Rome 1996; Id., Chiesa etiopica: Enciclopedia dei Santi. Le Chiese Orientali (BS), vol. I, Rome 1998, CVIII-CIX; Id., I doni della Serenissima al re Davide I d'Etiopia (ms. Raineri 43 della Vaticana): OCP 65:2 (1999) 363-448; Id., Etiopia, Chiesa Ortodossa: Dizionario Enciclopedico dell'Oriente Cristiano, ed. E.G. Ferrugia S.I., Rome 2000, 287-288; Id., La versione etiopica dei Vangeli, in I Vangeli dei Popoli. La Parola e l'Immagine di Cristo nelle culture e nella storia, ed. F. D'Aiuto - G. Morello - A.M. Piazzoni (Mostra "I Vangeli dei Popoli" Città del Vaticano Palazzo della Cancelleria, 21 giugno - 10 dicembre 2000), Rome 2000, 61-66.

O. Raineri

II. Liturgy. The Ethiopian church recognizes Alexandria as the origin of its liturgy, but this does not mean that the Ethiopian liturgy is the same as that celebrated in the Egyptian church today. The rites, probably identical in Alexandria and Aksum in the 4th c., remain unchanged in their central nucleus in both churches, but have different nuances due to the cultural and psychological differences of the two African nations. Tradition has it that St. Frumentius, ordained bishop of Aksum by St. Athanasius, introduced into his church the *Coptic liturgy, which passed through various phases, the first of which was the use of the Greek language in the Ethiopian liturgy, since that language was then used in the Egyptian church. Frumentius's own Syrian origins, and that of the famous nine saints and the just men (ṣādqān) who, in the 5th-6th c., spread the gospel and monasticism in N Ethiopia, led to the introduction of considerable Syrian influences into the church, easily visible even today, esp. in the sacred language (Ge'ez) of the Alexandrian-Ethiopian rite. Further contributions to this rite were made by various Eastern liturgies through the contacts over the centuries of Ethiopian monks, on pilgrimage in Jerusalem, with the various Christian communities in the holy city. Many Jewish influences can also be noted, e.g., in the construction of Ethiopian churches—with the presence, among other things, of the Sancta Sanctorum—in the celebration of the sabbath, and in the innumerable allusions to OT texts and characters.

For celebrating the *Eucharist, the church of Ethiopia recognizes the texts of 17-20 anaphorae, the most used being that of the Holy Apostles. *Mass, which must always be sung and is characterized by the active participation of the faithful, is divided into two parts: (1) the ordinary, invariable except in the biblical readings, comprises the liturgy of the catechumens (preparation of offerings, offertory, liturgy of the word) and the pre-anaphora, with which the Mass of the faithful begins (various prayers, lavabo, kiss of peace); (2) the anaphora, which can change according to circumstances, is composed of the preface and the eucharistic prayer proper. Besides the missal (kidase) and the rituals for the administration of the *sacraments, the most-used books include: the synaxarion, the antiphonary for the whole year (deggua, attributed to the 6th-c. St. Yared), the collection of responsories (mawase'et) and hymns (me'raf); particular honor is also enjoyed by the "Books of Hours," the "Praises of Mary" (weddase maryam) and the "Miracles of Mary" (Ta'amera maryam). The Ethiopians follow the Julian calendar; the year is divided into 13 months, 12 of 30 days and one of 5-6 days, and is 7-8 years behind the Gregorian calendar (1974 EE = AD 1981/2). The most important feasts are those of Our Lord (*incarnation, *circumcision, *epiphany, *presentation in the temple, sojourn in Egypt, miracle of Cana, transfiguration, passion, *resurrection, appearance to Thomas, *ascension, *Pentecost, finding and exaltation of the cross); then follow the 32 annual festivals in honor of Mary, to whom a most tender devotion is offered; besides the apostles, particular veneration is given to the OT saints and to the angels, particularly Michael, Gabriel and Raphael. Worthy of particular note are the long and rigorous fasts. Chant and sacred music, unrelated to those of other Christian churches, are often accompanied by dances and executed to the accompaniment of drums, sistra and ceremonial batons.

S. Mercer, The Ethiopic Liturgy, Milwaukee 1915; E.A. Wallis Budge, The Book of the Saints of the Ethiopian Church, I-VI, Cambridge 1928; A. Takia Māryām Samhāray Selim, De SS. Sacramentis secundum ritum Aethiopicum, Rome 1931; E. Hammerschmidt, Studies in the Ethiopic Anaphoras, Berliner Byzantinistische Arbeiten 25, Berlin 1961; C. Sumner, The Ethiopic Liturgy: An Analysis: JourEthSt 1 (1963) 40-46; B. Velat, Etude sur la Me'erāf, PO XXXIII, 1966; A. Tito Lepisa, The Three Modes and the Signs of the Songs in the Ethiopian Liturgy: Proceedings of the Third International Conference of Ethiopian Studies, Addis Ababa 1966, II, 162-187; A. Hänggi - I. Pahl, Prex eucharistica. Textus e variis liturgiis antiquioribus selecti: Spicilegium Friburgense 12, Friburg 1968; O. Raineri, Luca 23, 42, greco, nella liturgia etiopica del Venerdì Santo: EphLit 94 (1980) 271-277; Habtemichael Kidane, L'Ufficio divino della Chiesa etiopica. Studio storico-critico con particolare riferimento alle ore cattedrali (Orientalia Christiana Analecta 257), Rome 1998; O. Raineri, L'anafora etiopica inedita di Maria: Na 'kwetata amlāk bafequr waldeka Iyasus Krestos, Miscellanea Bibliotecae Apostolicae Vaticanae VII (ST 396), Vatican City 2000, 337-354.

O. Raineri

III. Christian art. The peoples of Semitic language who occupied the N-central part of the Ethiopian highlands took their culture from South Arabia and from the eastern Hellenistic and Roman world; this mixture of influences, with some of a local character, gave Ethiopian culture a formal Christian aspect, from the 4th c., with the spread of the new religion in the country. The oldest Christian monuments in Ethiopia are found along an ancient road that climbs from Adulis to the highlands and goes through Qohaito, Toconda, Cascase and Ieha, to Aksum. Churches of the first type are externally rectangular, with apse generally square; the body of the building is usually divided into 3 aisles by 2 rows of monolithic pillars; the material is always stone.

During the Middle Ages, the center of Ethiopian civilization moved from the regions of Aksum toward Lasta, where, at Imraha, the church shows a new structure: the pillars dividing the church into 3 aisles support arcades; the sanctuary is formed of 3 rooms, the central one covered by a small dome, while the nave is raised above the aisles. The most important monuments of the Zagwe period are the churches excavated in rock using a particular technique consisting of the isolation of a block of rock in order to work it, inside and out, into the form of a building. These types of churches are found in other parts of the Christian world, esp. in *Cappadocia. As for ground plan, their forms differ: the churches of Libanos and of Mary at Lalibela present an Aksumite structure; others have 5 aisles or are cruciform, such as the church of St. George at Lalibela. They often have arcades, on pillars, and women's galleries. The church of Golgotha at Lalibela is unusual in having sculptures of saints and an altar with the symbols of the four evangelists. With the advent of the Solomonid dynasty (1270), we see a great decline, and church buildings assume new forms bearing no relation to the earlier ones. Round churches become more and more common in this period. The medieval churches are usually decorated with paintings, while in some of them, e.g., the church of Debre Damo, we find inlaid wooden panels. There are immense numbers of sacred vases, crosses, thuribles, tabot (sacred stones) and other richly ornamented liturgical furnishings in metal, often precious metal.

The artistic genre that survives in greatest numbers, however, is that of codex miniatures, though unfortunately the oldest of them hardly go back beyond the 14th c.; the style and iconography of these parchment miniatures show a descent from Egyptian and Syrian styles. Around the 15th c. Ethiopia was influenced by Western artists, as is easily seen, e.g., in the church of Martula Maryam in Gojam, and in the miniatures. Finally we cannot pass over in silence the most widespread popular artistic genre in Ethiopia: the depictions and illustrations that decorate so-called magic scrolls (asmat or talsam). The oldest collection of protective prayers goes back to the 14th c., and the ornamental motifs most recurrent on these parchment texts are angels, saints, crosses, the Virgin, geometrical designs and other depictions, the humblest and most spontaneous suggested by the imagination.

U. Monneret de Villard, L'origine dei più antichi tipi di chiese abissine, Atti del 3° Congresso di studi Coloniali di Firenze, 1937; A.A. Monti della Corte, Lalibelà, Rome 1940; R. Sauter, Où en est notre connaissance des églises rupestres d'Ethiopie?: Annales d'Ethiopie 5 (1963) 235-292; Ibid. 10 (1976) 157-175 (with the most complete bibl. on the rock churches); J. Leroy, La pittura etiopica durante il medioevo e sotto la dinastia di Gondar, Milan 1964; W. Staude, Die ikonographischen Regeln in der äthiopischen Kirchenmalerei: Archiv für Völkerkunde 13 (1959) 235-308; S. Chojnacki, Short Introduction to Ethiopian Traditional Painting: JourEthSt II, 2 (1964) 1-11; Id., Note on the Early Imagery of the Virgin Mary in Ethiopia: Ethnologische Zeitschrift Zürich II (1977) 5-41; O.A. Jäger, Aethiopische Miniaturen, Berlin 1957; J. Mercier, Rouleaux magiques éthiopiens, Paris 1979; Augostino da Hebo, Il Tabot: la sua importanza religiosa e giuridico-cultuale nella chiesa etiopica (ed. Habtemichael Kidane): OCP 60 (1994) 131-157; O. Raineri, Santi guerrieri a cavallo: tele etiopiche. Ill. by Qēs Adamu Tesfaw. Intr. by S. Chojnacki (texts: Italian - English), Clusone (Bg) 1996; African Zion. The Sacred Art of Ethiopia, catalog by M. Heldman with S.C. Munro Hay, essays by D.E. Crummey, R. Grierson, G. Haile, R. Pankhurst, T. Tarmat, S. Uhlig and C. Zanotti-Eman, ed. by R. Grierson, Yale University Press, New Haven and London in association with InterCultura, Fort Worth, The Walters Art Gallery, Baltimore, The Institute of Ethiopian Studies, Addis Ababa 1996; M. Di Salvo, Chiese d'Etiopia, with texts by S. Chojnacki, O. Raineri, Milan 1999 (publ. in It. and in Eng.).

O. Raineri

IV. Classical language or Geʿez. Ancient Ethiopic has its own distinctive alphabet, derived from the S Arabian; yet this Semitic alphabet seems to resemble archaic Greek more than Phoenician. S Arabian writing was boustrophedon, i.e., lines going from right to left alternated with lines going from left to right; Ethiopic, like Greek and Latin, went only from left to right. The Ethiopic alphabet originally had letters or consonants which, around the beginning of the 4th c. AD, were enriched and clarified by vowel signs; the Ethiopians, instead of applying the vowel signs over and under the consonants, as generally happened in other Semitic languages, modified each consonant according to which of the 7 vowels was to follow it, so that one sign expressed consonant and vowel together. The number of signs was later increased as a result of the transformation of some letters to indicate a consonant followed by a diphthong. For writing numbers, Ethiopic abandoned S Arabian signs and adopted the Greek. Geʿez, besides our own sounds, has three grades of aspirate (h); a sort of light breath ('); an occlusive sound (ʿ) like the Arabic ayn: an emphatic dental t; an explosive s; and other particular sounds.

Personal pronouns in the 2nd and 3rd persons have a masculine and a feminine form; when referred to verbs, in the indirect cases, they are joined to the verb itself as suffixes. The verb, in its basic form, consists of 3 syllables; the root is given by the 3rd-person masculine singular of the perfect; from this form can be obtained a causative, a reflexive-passive, a reflexive-causative; still other forms can be derived: an intensive, a frequentative; from these can be formed causatives, passive-reflexives and causative-passives. Conjugation: there are two tenses, perfect and imperfect, both in the indicative mood. There are also the subjunctive, with one tense, the imperative, the infinitive, the gerund and the participle. Nouns: these can be primitive or derived from a verbal word; there are two genders; the plural can be formed with suffixes or by internal modifications (fractional plural). Prepositions: some are used as prefixes, others are separate. The syntax of Geʿez is quite simple and can in some ways be compared to that of neo-Latin languages. Ancient Ethiopic, which was the language of the court and hence the official language from the first centuries AD, and which has not been spoken for several centuries, still survives as a sacred language and, in part, as a literary language.

C. Conti Rossini, Grammatica elementare della lingua etiopica, Rome 1941; T.O. Lambdin, Introduction to Classical Ethiopic (Geʿez): Harvard Semitic Studies 24, Missoula 1978; A. Dillmann, Lexicon linguae Aethiopicae, Leipzig 1965; G. da Maggiora, Vocabolario etiopico-italiano-latino ad uso dei principianti, Asmara 1953; A.J. Drewes - R. Schneider, Origine et développement de l'écriture éthiopienne jusqu'à l'époque des inscriptions royales d'Axoum: Annales d'Ethiopie 10 (1976) 136-156; E. Ullendorff, The Semitic Languages of Ethiopia. A Comparative Phonology, London 1955; E. Mittwoch, Die traditionelle Aussprache des Äthiopischen, Berlin 1926; W. Leslau, Comparative Dictionary of Geʿez (Classical Ethiopic). Geʿez-English / English-Geʿez with an index of the Semitic roots, Wiesbaden 1987; Id., Concise Dictionary of Geʿez (Classical Ethiopic), Wiesbaden 1989; O. Raineri, Introduzione alla lingua Geʿez (etiopico classico), Rome 2002.

O. Raineri

V. Literature. Literature in the Geʿez language finds its first expressions in some epigraphs, still extant, dating from about the 4th c. BC; these inscriptions are mostly dedicatory or commemorate the deeds of kings. With the introduction of Christianity, translation of the *Scriptures, OT and NT, began in Ethiopia: Ecclesiastes was translated in 677/8. Textual criticism tends to hold that these versions were made from a Greek text. In addition to the books of the Bible commonly accepted in the canon of the Christian churches, the Ethiopians accepted as inspired, and translated into their language, other texts, such as the book of Jubilees, the book of Enoch (preserved entire only in Geʿez), the Shepherd of Hermas and some books attributed to Ezra. At about the same time as the Scriptures were translated in Ethiopia, they also accepted some patristic writings relating to the most important and disputed mysteries of the Christian faith, such as the *Trinity and the nature of Christ: the most important of these were the qerillos, which comprised three opuscula of St. *Cyril of Alexandria and a collection of homilies attributed to various Fathers; the didactic *Physiologus, quite widespread in Christian antiquity; the monastic rules of St. *Pachomius; "Acts" of saints, like the lives of St. Paul the Hermit and St. *Anthony abbot—a literary genre that the Ethiopians would take as a model and cultivate to glorify illustrious local persons; patristic works, like the homilies of St. *John Chrysostom; Mariological opuscula like the Pact of Mercy (kidana mehrat), in which Jesus promises to pardon anyone who invokes him in the name of the Virgin. Since these works preserve considerable traces of Greek, they must have been translated in the first centuries (IV-VII) of Ethiopian Christianity, when Greek was still used among the Copts, in whose monasteries their versions were probably made.

In the 13th c., with the advent of the Solomonid dynasty (1270), Ethiopia entered a new period, particularly rich in literary output; the translations were now made from Arabic, which had become the common liturgical language in the church of Alexandria. Translations included the synodos, a collection of canons, the Didascalia of the Apostles, liturgical texts; books fashionable in the Middle Ages, esp. in the East: the "History of the Jews" (Yosippon), stories and journeys of Alexander the Great, also a subject of original compositions in Ethiopic. Secular literature begins with the famous Glory of Kings (kebra nagast), which tells of Solomon and the Queen of Sheba. In the 14th c. the Book of Hours appeared in Ge'ez, both in the redaction derived from the Egyptian church and in one of local make, as well as the office for the dead (mashafa genzat). The second half of the 14th c. saw the fruitful literary activity of metropolitan Salama, to whom is attributed the revision of the Scriptures and the introduction of various works into Ethiopic, some translated into Ge'ez by himself. Among them are the filkesyos, containing rules for monastic life; the Praises of Mary; the Acts of the Passion (gebra hemamat); the Synaxarion; the Acts of the Martyrs; the Lives of the Apostles and of other saints. Many of these "Lives" are followed by a hymn (malke' = effigy, image), in strophes, praising the individual parts of the body of the person celebrated. The 15th c. was characterized by a wealth of hagiographies of indigenous monks, among them the very famous Takla Haymanot and Eustathius. King Zar'a Ya'qob (1434–1468) wrote the Book of Light and other works refuting heretical beliefs and opposing religious deviations. In this period, besides prose, poetical work for sacred celebrations flourished, e.g., the collection of hymns called The Lord Has Reigned (Egzi'abeher nagsa) and the Lyre of the Virgin (arganona dengel). In Marian literature, the Miracles of Mary stand out. The first qene (poetical chants) and the use of the sawasew (scale, grammar and vocabulary) may date from the late 15th c. From earliest times there was an exuberant production of magic-religious writings, with varied and remote cultural links; such are the Fillet of Justification, the Bulwark of the Cross, the Net of Solomon; the liturgical text Teaching of the Secrets (temherta hebu'at) was and is widely used as an amulet. In Ethiopic literature, which, as we have seen, is mostly religious, a place of their own is held by the Royal Chronicles, particularly, for this period, those of Zar'a Ya'qob, Ba'eda Māyām (d. 1478) and Eskender (d. 1494).

I. Guidi, Storia della letteratura etiopica, Rome 1932; E. Cerulli, La letteratura etiopica, Florence - Milan 1968; L. Ricci, Letterature dell'Etiopia (Botto, "Storia of the letterature d'Oriente"), Milan 1969; K. Basset, Les Apocryphes éthiopiens traduits en français, Paris 1893/1909; E. Littmann, The Legend of the Queen of Sheba in the Tradition of Axum, Leiden - Princeton 1909; M.A. Knibb - E. Ullendorff, The Ethiopic Book of Enoch, I-II, Oxford 1978; L. Fusella, Libro dei Giubilei; Libro di Enoc ("Apocrifi dell'A.T.," Classici UTET), Turin 1981; E. Cerulli, Il libro etiopico dei Miracoli di Maria, Rome 1943; B.M. Weischer, Qērellos III . . . , Wiesbaden 1977; Id., Qïrellos IV . . . , Wiesbaden 1980; O. Raineri, "Vita dei Giusti" Missionari dell'Etiopia nel sesto secolo: varianti e inno: Ephemerides Carmeliticae 31 (1980) 377-413; S. Strelcyn, Prières magiques éthiopiennes pour délier les charmes, Warsaw 1955; for edited works, see esp. the two largest collections: CSCO (SAe) and PO; V. Six, Die Vita des Abund Tadewos von Däbrä Maryam im Tanasee, Text, Übersetzung und Kommentar, Wiesbaden 1975; Y. Beyene, ed., Giorgis di Saglā: Il Libro del mistero (maṣḥafa mesṭir), CSCO 532-533, SAe 97-98, Louvain 1993; M. Kropp, Der Siegreiche Feldzug des Königs 'Āmda-Ṣeyon gegen die Muslime in Adal in Jahre 1332 n. Ch., CSCO 538-539, SAe 99-100, Louvain 1994; A. Bausi, Il Sïnodos etiopico, CSCO 552-553, SAe 101-102, Louvain 1995; G. Lusini, Il "Gadla Absādi" (Babra Māryām, Sarā'ē), CSCO 557-558, SAe 103-104, Louvain 1996; O. Raineri, Atti di Banadlewos (1303–1400), ed. of the Ethiopic text and It. tr., PO 48.l, no. 213, 1998; Id., Gli Atti etiopici del martire egiziano Giorgio il Nuovo (d. 978) (ST 392), Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, Vatican City 1999; Codices Comboniani Aethiopici, recensuit Osvaldus Raineri, Vatican City 2000.

O. RAINERI

EUBULUS of Lystra 7th-c. bishop of that Lycaonian city. Author [ca. 634] of a "Discourse against the written request made to the emperor *Heraclius by Athanasius, pseudobishop of the Severians" (i.e., *Athanasius "Gammal" of Antioch), of which two fragments were included in the Doctrina Patrum as proof that *Cyril of Alexandria, in treating the union of Christ, did not confuse physis with hypostasis.

CPG 7685; Fr. Diekamp, Doctrina Patrum de incarnatione Verbi, Münster ²1981, 141-148, cf. p. XLVII; Patrologia V, 162-163.

D. STIERNON

EUCHARIST

I. In the Fathers - II. Iconography.

I. In the Fathers. The Greek term Eucharist, "thanksgiving," for Christians came to designate the sacred meal (the Lord's "Supper"), the consecratory blessing, the sacramental elements and finally the eucharistic action itself. The earliest Christian terms seem to have been fractio panis, a gesture which by metonymy designated the entire action (Lk 24:35; Acts 2:42, later taken up by Act. Pauli et Thec. 5; Serap., Eucol. 14,15), and "Lord's supper" (1 Cor 11:19). *Ignatius uses "Eucharist" as a technical term (Eph. 13,1; Phil. 4; Syrm. 8,1) to indicate both the celebration by which Christ is made really present and the mystery that reactualizes Christ's redemptive incarnation and creates unity in the church. With this term *Justin indicates both the eucharistic liturgy and the eucharistic food (1 Ap. 65-67); he also uses the term anamnēsis* (Dial. 41,1; 70,4; 117,3), which sometimes recurs in *John Chrysostom and in the liturgies (Der Balyzeh: Trad. Ap. 4,10; Lit. Johannis Chrys.). In the 4th c. Greeks often use the term mystērion, and esp. its plural, "mysteries, holy mysteries." Also very frequent are the terms "to offer" and "offering": in Greek prosphora (Latin oblatio), which for the Syrians became kurbons, gift. The term synaxis, which ordinarily indicates the holy assembly gathered to offer the Eucharist, can mean the celebration itself.

The Greek terms were transliterated into Latin: the common term eucharistia, a formal borrowing from the Greek; mystēria (Vita Ambr. 23; Ambrose, Comm. in Luc. 7,11; *Innocent, Ep. 25 and the sacramentaries), a term also translated as sacramenta (*Tertullian, De cor. 3; *Cyprian, Ep. 74,4; also *Hilary, *Ambrose, *Augustine). Cyprian also uses the term dominicum celebrare (Ep. 63,16; De opere 15; cf. Act. Saturn. 7). The expression sacrum or sacrum facere is general, analogous to actio/agere (see in Ambrose), which expresses the effectuation par excellence of sacred action. The term Missa, the dismissal at the end of a celebration, appears already in the 4th c. (Egeria, Itin. 25,10; Ambrose, Ep. 76 [20],4).

The fractio panis was the action that Jesus performed at the Last Supper and repeated after his *resurrection. The first Eucharist was passed down as a complete Paschal event: Christ, the suffering servant, becomes the victorious Lord. This was part of the worship of the first Christians: it was dominated by the joy of remembering the resurrection and simultaneously a "proclamation of the Lord's death until he comes" (1 Cor 11:26).

The Didache* links the Eucharist to the fraternal agapē*, which explains the ambivalence of the expressions in the prayers, which were modeled on Jewish prayers but changed and reworked with a Christian spirit and terminology (chs. 9-10). Every Sunday the faithful gathered to break the bread and give thanks (ch. 14). Both the prayers and the celebration make clear the Eucharist's ecclesial and eschatological character. The Eucharist occupies a central place in the letters of Ignatius (Eph. 5,2; 13,1; 20,2; Magn. 7,1-2; Phil. 4; Smyrn. 7,1; 8,1-2). Presided over by the bishop or his designee, in the Eucharist Christ is really present; in a privileged way, it realizes and concretely manifests unity with Christ and with the church; it plays an essential role in identifying the authentic Christian community. The Eucharist demands charity and faith in the "one bread that is the medicine of immortality, the antidote for *death, so as to live forever in Jesus Christ" (Eph. 20,2). Ignatius considers martyrdom to be closely correlated with the Eucharist: it is like a liturgical offering, the martyr enacting in himself the profound meaning of the Eucharist, as a total and life-giving gift.

Justin offers the first description of the Eucharist after the NT (1 Apol. 65 and 67), in relation to *baptism and Sunday. He clearly distinguishes two parts: the liturgy of the word and the properly eucharistic part (as well as the liturgy extended into one's life through charity, the ethical-social reflection of a religious celebration). The remembrances of the apostles and the writings of the prophets are read; the presider gives a homily of exhortation. All stand and lift up their prayers. Bread and wine are brought, with water. The presider recites the (consecratory) prayer of thanksgiving, to which all respond: "Amen." The eucharistic food is distributed, not forgetting those who are absent. At the end offerings are collected for the needy, realizing the fraternal charity the Eucharist requires. A pure oblation and a spiritual sacrifice (Dial. 41 and 117), the Eucharist is an anamnēsis of all of history, from the creation to the accomplishment of salvation; it must be expressed in "a life in conformity with the Lord's precepts" (1 Ap. 66,1). *Irenaeus (d. ca. 200) puts the Eucharist at the center of his vision of the world and of history: with all the dynamism of its mystery it opposes *gnostic theses. The bread and wine are not only saved, but, becoming vehicles of grace—the body and blood of Christ—are saviors. The Eucharist recapitulates and fulfills the long history of all earthly offerings and, in Christ in glory, anticipates the mystery of the whole harvest (Adv. Haer. IV,17-18). A particular assimilation to the Eucharist and its existential place recur in the Acts of the Martyrs, which celebrate the martyrs' "thanksgiving" through the gift of their lives, dying to the world to rise again in God (Ignatius, Rom. 2,2; see also Polycarp, Martyrs of Lyons). Inscriptions and epitaphs (*Abercius, *Pektorios) express desire for the Eucharist, from which is drawn the hope of incorruptibility. *Cyprian in Ep. 63 offers the first eucharistic treatise. He associates the Eucharist with Christ's passion and resurrection, to which the faithful respond with their sacrifice. In addition to spiritual joy, he emphasizes, in the bond between Christ and the faithful, the unity symbolized by the grains combined in the one bread (already the Didache), a classical theme in the entire tradition up to the Middle Ages.

As for the organization of liturgies, while the structure of the assembly was fixed during the first centuries, the celebrant was free to improvise the prayers of thanksgiving and consecration based on a common tradition. The anaphora, to judge from later texts like the Apostolic Constitutions, followed the pattern of the baptismal creed, taking up its themes in the form of thanksgiving, in a trinitarian development. Salvation history became thanksgiving and eschatological expectation. The Apostolic Tradition* is presented less as a real liturgy of a specific church—not even Rome's—than as a model on which others could also align themselves. The anaphora is a continuous text that develops without the interruption of the Sanctus. The structure is clearly christological and insists above all on the mystery of redemption. The theme of creation, so important in the Jewish liturgy and so clear in the Apos. Con., is almost avoided here. The prayer, which, like the Roman creed, centers on the work of Christ, introduces the account of institution, the thanksgiving in the form of anamnēsis, and finally the *epiclesis to the Holy Spirit. This can be compared with the "Clementine liturgy" of the Apos. Con., whose Jewish inspiration and roots are evident, and which is an essential link between the archaic liturgies and the great liturgies of the 4th and 5th c. The attribution to Clement has a Jewish Christian feel. The anaphora develops the history of salvation: praise of God, creation of the world, creation of humans, salvation history; all these prepare for the Sanctus. The account of institution is followed by an anamnesis, an epiclesis and intercession for the church. Hamman has demonstrated (in Kyriakon 835-843) the perfect symmetry between the anaphora and the baptismal catechesis (Apos. Con. VII,39,2-5). The prayer opens on the mystery of the *Trinity, which is revealed in the economy, creation and history of salvation, up to its fulfillment. This solemn prayer begins with the Father, moves to the work of the Son, passes on to the ecclesial action of the Holy Spirit and closes with a doxology. Baptismal confession become consecratory thanksgiving, it is faith made into a sacramental mystery and a *sacrament of the whole faith.

The golden age of patristics (4th-5th c.) was the era of the great liturgies, in both East and West. Different liturgical families arose during this period, developing autonomously at *Antioch, *Alexandria, in *Cappadocia, and at *Constantinople. The various churches gradually fixed their own liturgies: each had several formularies of anaphora. The East introduced the Sanctus in the 4th c. (Serapion, Eucol.; Apos. Con.). The *Syriac liturgy (and the *Byzantine, which derives from it) stressed the epiclesis to the Holy Spirit. The epiclesis and the prayers of intercession exchanged places according to liturgical families. The West tended to lose sight of the connection between the preface and the canon, which, as the word implies, was set once and for all. Ambrose cites a fragment of it (De sacr. III,1,5); *Gregory the Great gave it its definitive form. It seems to have been gradually imposed on the whole West during the Carolingian Empire. *Catechesis more than controversy (which was virtually nonexistent) informs us of the sacramental teaching of the Fathers, who insist on Christ's real presence in the Eucharist, on the reality of his sacrifice, actualized in the church's celebration, and on the unity of the faithful with Christ and among themselves in the Eucharist. They also recall the close connection between the word of God and the body of Christ: *Caesarius of Arles, echoing St. Augustine, says that "the Word of Christ is not less than the Body of Christ" (Sermo 78,2); St. Ambrose had already proclaimed that one drinks of Christ from the chalice of the *Scriptures as from the eucharistic chalice (En. Ps 1,33). We have exceptional evidence of the various Greek and Latin Fathers. The catechesis of the *Mass was based on biblical figures and rites. The Hexateuch provided the principal types: *Melchizedek (see Cyprian, Ambrose Augustine, Roman canon) and the manna, which St. John had already used. *Methodius, like Ambrose, brings together three figures: Adam's rib, the rock in the desert, Christ's wound on the cross. To these is added the bread of the Presence (*Cyril of Jerusalem, Cat. 24,6).

To this common background were added the blessing of Judah (Cyprian), which Justin and Irenaeus apply to Christ's passion; Noah's drunkenness, which prefigures sobria ebrietas (Cyprian); the Passover lamb, which represents the passion more than the Eucharist (exceptions: Cyprian, *Commodian, *Gregory of Elvira). We should also mention the psalms, esp. Ps 53. Ps 42 is presented as a eucharistic catechesis (*Gregory of Nyssa). The nuptial image drawn by Ambrose from the *Song of Songs allowed the development of a theology of teleiōsis and ecstasy. *Maximus the Confessor develops a theology of the spiritual life, from Christian initiation to perfection. Besides biblical figures, the Fathers also explain the various rites of the Mass, from preparation to communion and thanksgiving (*Cyril of Jerusalem, Cat. myst.). They emphasize the continuity between the liturgy of the word and the liturgy of the bread. For them, the Eucharist is the sacramentum redemptionis, the sacrament that contains and dispenses all of Christ's redemptive and saving action, from his death to his resurrection. The Antiochenes, like *Theodore of Mopsuestia, less sensitive to biblical typology, see in it above all "the figures of heavenly goods and delights": the eschatological aspect, traditional since the Didache and Serapion's Euchologion (13).

John Chrysostom and Augustine love to develop the ecclesial aspect: "It is your mystery that is placed on the Lord's altar. It is your mystery that you receive. To that which you are, you reply: Amen" (Aug., Serm. 272). St. Gregory the Great, who read and commented on Sacred Scripture with passion and enthusiasm, says of himself that often, reading and rereading a text, he was unable to grasp its meaning, but "putting it before the brothers, I understood it" (In Ez. lib. II, hom. II,1).

The term "mystical body," which originally meant the terminus a quo, ended by designating the terminus ad quem, i.e., the church, as H. de Lubac has shown. Hilary prefers to dwell on incorporation into Christ through the Eucharist, sacrament of the symbiosis between two living things, which makes the member identical with its head. The Eucharist is the sacrament of divinization (*Hilary, ps.-*Dionysius). To explain it the Fathers use the analogies of fire and the body, the body and the members, the bridegroom and the bride. Finally, faithful to the initiatives of the first centuries, the Fathers, Augustine and esp. John Chrysostom, bring out the concrete and social consequences and irradiations of the Eucharist. "The altar is composed of Christ's own members, and for you the Lord's body is the rock of sacrifice" (John Chrys., In 2 Cor hom. 20,3; other texts in Hamman, Vie liturgique, 282-284). Fundamental here is the thought hinted at in the Didache (4,8) and taken up with great frequency in patristic preaching: how is it possible to partake together of heavenly goods, without being able to then share earthly goods with the brothers?

In conclusion, we can summarize that the patristic age took the following lines on the Eucharist: (1) The Lord's Last Supper is called "Eucharist." (2) In the Eucharist, there is a salutaris presence of Jesus Christ in real terms of body and blood. This reality becomes an argument for defending the reality of the incarnation of the Word. The liturgical evidence has no exception on this point (Ambrose, De sacr. 4,14). (3) The Eucharist is understood as oratio prex of the eucharistic species, on the lines of the community's sacrificium offerre. It is the one valid sacrifice that may be offered to God (anti-Jewish and antipagan polemical context) and is not divisible, as though it could be offered by divided and opposed Christian groups, erecting one altar against another (antiheretical and antischismatic context, esp. in Cyprian's time and in the subsequent period of the *Donatist controversy in Africa). It was in the context of the Eucharist, "the one sacrifice," that the Eucharist-church unity relationship was developed. (4) Regarding the historical nature of the sources (e.g., K. Gamber's Codices Liturgici Latini), we must bear in mind that, given the distinct and not always verifiable stratification of these documents, we use the term "historical evidence" with a particular meaning. (5) In the West, the codification of the eucharistic prayers had a mainly christological tone, related in detail to the meeting of the moment; in the East it followed a biblical-historical direction based on creation and on God's love revealed in history.

Texts: J. Quasten, Monumenta eucharistica et liturgica vetustissima, 7 fasc., Bonn 1935–1937; J. Solano, Textos eucarísticos primitivos, 2 vols., Madrid 1952–1954; A. Hamman, Prières eucharistiques des premiers siècles, Paris 1957; Id., La messe. Liturgies anciennes et textes patristiques, Paris 1964; A. Hänggi - I. Pahl, Prex eucharistica, Fribourg 1968; A. Hamman, L'Eucharistie dans l'antiquité chrétienne, Paris 1981; G. Di Nola, Monumenta eucharistica. La testimonianza dei Padri (Bibliotheca Patristica Eucharistica, vols. 1-4) [bilingual ed.], Vatican City 1997–; Segno di unità. Le più antiche eucaristie delle chiese, ed. the monks and nuns of Bose, under the direction of E. Mazza, Bose/Magnano 1996 (the most complete collection). Studies: M. Goguel, L'eucharistie des origines à Justin martyr, Paris 1910; J.A. Jungmann, Missarum solemnia, Vienna 1948 (It. tr. Turin 1953); A. Piolanti (ed.), L'eucarestia, Rome 1957; Var. aus., Convivium Dominicum, Catania 1959; Eucharistie: DSp IV (1961) 1553-1586; M. Righetti, Storia liturgica, vol. III, Milan 1966; L. Bouyer, L'eucharistie, Tournai - Paris 1966 (It. tr. Turin 1969); L. Ligier, De la cène de Jésus à l'anaphore de l'Église: La Maison Dieu 87 (1966) 7-51; A. Hamman, Vie liturgique et vie sociale, Paris 1968; Id., Du symbole de la foi à l'anaphore eucharistique, in Kyriakon. Festschrift J. Quasten, Münster 1970, II, 835-843; B. Botte et al., Eucharisties d'Orient et d'Occident, Paris 1970; W. Rordorf et al., L'eucharistie des premiers chrétiens, Paris 1976; J. Betz, Eucharestie in der Schrift und Patristik: HDG IV,4a, Freiburg 1979; Eucaristia, in D. Sartore - A.M. Triacca (eds.), Nuovo Dizionario di Liturgia, Cinisello Balsamo (Mi) 1984, [3]1988, 482-508; P. Youssif, L'Eucharistie chez Saint Ephrem de Nisibe, OCA 224, Rome 1984; E. LaVerdiere, The Eucharist in the New Testament and in the Early Church, Collegeville, MN 1996; M. Klinghardt, Gemeinschaftsmahl und Mahlgemeinschaft, Soziologie und Liturgie frühchristliche Mahlfeiern, Tübingen 1996; M. Cristiani, Tempo rituale e tempo storico. Comunione cristiana e sacrificio. Le controversie eucaristiche nell'Alto Medioevo, Spoleto 1997; S.A. Panimolle (ed.), Dizionario di spiritualità Biblico-Patristica 20. L'Eucaristia nei Padri della Chiesa, Rome 1998; A. McGowan, Ascetic Eucharists, Food and Drink in Early Christian Ritual Meals, Oxford 1999; P. Carlotti - M. Maritano (eds.), L'Eucaristia nel vissuto dei giovani, Rome 2002, 217-261: L'eucaristia nella vita dei cristiani dei primi secoli; E. Mazza, La celebrazione eucaristica, Bologna 2003.

A. Hamman - M. Maritano

II. Iconography. The Eucharist as a sacramental and liturgical event remained for a long time without a direct representation in early Christian art, though this does not rule out the possibility of the eucharistic motif being included in other iconographical themes.

1. Banquet scenes. We must consider carefully the first depictions of banquets in the 3rd-4th c., long held to be eucharistic solemnities because of the presence of the fractio panis. Thus Wilpert interpreted the banquet scene in the Greek chapel of the catacomb of S. Priscilla: the bishop, as president of the liturgical celebration, does not lie on the stibadium like the other six guests, but occupies the place of honor in cornu dextro. He breaks the bread with a certain solemnity, to distribute it to the others, as he will do with the wine in a two-handled cup near his hand. The woman participating in the banquet has her head veiled, which was rigorously prescribed for eucharistic celebrations, whereas for ordinary banquets it was pointless and unusual. Seven baskets of bread and a plate with two fishes and loaves recall the biblical account of the multiplication of the loaves and fishes (Wilpert, Fractio panis, 5ff.; 8/17).

Against this eucharistic interpretation, others see early Christian banquet scenes as depicting funeral banquets, in close parallel with scenes of similar structure in secular art. Bread and fish are the customary food of the dead; the baskets of bread, which recur frequently, allude to the large number of guests, who were often given loaves as gifts. Heavy consumption of wine is suggested by the lively gestures with which the servers are invited to mix new wine, as we see in several parts of the banquet scene in the area of the Agapai in SS. Pietro and Marcellino (WK 133, 2; 157, 1ff.). The survival of the pagan tradition of the funeral banquet in the early Christian period is amply demonstrated (Dölger, ΙΧΘΥΣ 5, 503/27; A. Stuiber, Refrigerium interim = Theophaneia 11 [Bonn 1957] 124-136). Interestingly, in the banquet scenes in SS. Pietro and Marcellino the servers are usually called Agape and Irene (a recent discovery has revealed the name of a Sabina, RivAC 35 [1970] fig. 22). If these are not simply two very common Christian names, we can obviously see in the funeral banquet the expression of the hope of participation in the celestial feast of the blessed, where Love and Peace will prepare the meal. In any case, the banquet depicted in the hypogeum of Vibia as a realistic funeral banquet is clearly characterized by the captions as a banquet of the blessed: Vibia, introduced into the Elysium by the angelus bonus, takes part in the banquet amidst the bonorum iudicio iudicati (WK 132, 1). Nor is the opinion that the many baskets (or vases) allude to the high number of guests always on target. In cubicle A of SS. Pietro and Marcellino, Christ distributing the wine at Cana is set in the framework of a banquet scene (WK 57). The motif of the multiplication of the bread and wine is set even more integrally in a banquet scene, with the caption ΤΑΣ ΕΥΛΟΓΙΑΣ ΧΥ ΕΣΘΙΟΝΤΕΣ, on the frieze of the apse of the underground basilica of Karmuz at Alexandria (DACL 1, 1127ff. and fig. 279; RBK 1 [1966] 106).

The varied interpretation of proto-Christian banquet scenes marked out the route later followed by research on early Christian iconography. In contrast with the first apodeictic judgments, it is advisable not to determine the spiritual content of the earliest banquet scenes by archaeological means alone. To what extent the memory of the biblical multiplication of the loaves, the hope of participation in the eschatological banquet, and perhaps also the representation of the Eucharist were present in the minds of authors and spectators, remains an open question.

2. Biblical scenes and typological prefigurations of the Eucharist. Whether the OT scenes of *Abraham's sacrifice of Isaac (WK 41; 78), the gathering of the manna (catacombs of Cyriaca [WK 242, 2]), the return of the spies with the cluster of grapes (DACL 8, 1161 and fig. 1157ff. 11ff.), *Habakkuk bringing bread to *Daniel in the lions' den (Rep. 43-5), and finally the depiction of *Abel and *Melchizedek contain eucharistic symbolism is something that cannot as a rule be established with certainty, and is deduced more from patristic interpretations than from the depictions themselves. For the sacrifice of Isaac, e.g., it seems that its interpretation as a type of Christ's sacrifice on the cross and model of Abraham's obedience in faith precedes the eucharistic interpretation, such that eucharistic content can be ruled out of the earliest iconographical repesentations. But the 6th-c. mosaics of the presbytery of S. Vitale in *Ravenna, showing Abel and Melchizedek beside an altar, do express an undeniable eucharistic allegory, given that they are in the apse of the church (Timmers 689, fig. 1); this also goes for the adjacent scenes of Abraham offering hospitality to the three men at Mamre and hastening to sacrifice his son. The two mosaics, with the scenes of Abel, Abraham and Melchizedek, recur in S. Apollinare in Classe as an illustration of the prayer Supra quae of the Roman canon. NT motifs should be considered in the same way. Representations of the multiplication of bread and wine on the oldest sarcophagus friezes are not necessarily derived from the salvific sepulchral symbolism of Jesus' miracles; but they were later linked with the representation of the Last Supper, so that we can no longer rule out a eucharistic meaning (Salerno ivory relief, 11th c., Schiller, fig. 70). The oldest representation of the Last Supper is on the mosaics of the portico of S. Apollinare Nuovo in Ravenna (520–6) (Schiller fig. 67). Here, as in the codex Rossanensis (third quarter of 6th c.), Christ sits at table, in the place of honor in cornu dextro, surrounded by the apostles. In the codex Augustinus (ca. 600), he sits at the center of the table (Schiller fig. 73). In Byzantine art, the so-called communion of the apostles is a representation of the Last Supper transferred to the liturgical plane. From the 6th c. on, a number of representations have come down to us, variously structured, on the silver patenae of Riha (Dumbarton Oaks Collection) and Stuma near Antioch (Schiller fig. 56), in the Rossano codex, and in the codex of Rabbula at Florence (Schiller fig. 57ff.; 61).

3. Characterizing symbols and elements. In many medieval Christian symbols a eucharistic meaning must be acknowledged, esp. in depictions of bread, fish, vines, grape clusters and wine. The eucharistic symbolism of the fish is attested as early as the 2nd-3rd c. by the inscriptions of Abercius and Pektorios (Dölger 2, 486-515). Many see a symbolic representation of the Eucharist in the two figures of fish in the crypt of Lucina in S. Callisto and in the baskets of loaves next to what may be a chalice full of red wine (WK 28, 1ff.), but this remains undemonstrable (Dölger 5, 527-533). The same reservations apply to the lamb multiplying loaves in the new area of the catacomb of Commodilla (RivAC 34 [1958] 35) and on the sarcophagus of Junius Bassus, whose side panels also show gleaning and grape-harvest scenes (Rep. 680, 1-3). Grape clusters and vines, which lend themselves to a vast range of symbolic representations, can refer with certainty to the Eucharist only when the context unequivocally suggests it, as, e.g., on the silver cup of Antioch (5th c.) (Age of Spirituality, 605-608).

J. Wilpert, Fractio panis. Die älteste Darstellung des eucharistischen Opfers in der "Cappella Greca," Freiburg 1895; F.J. Dölger, ΙΧΘΥΣ 1-5, Münster 1928–43; G. Mathew, The Origins of Eucharistic Symbolism: Dominican Studies 6 (1943) 1-11; M. Vloberg, L'Eucharistie dans l'Art, 2 vols., Grenoble - Paris 1946; L. Réau, Iconographie de l'Art Chrétien, vol. 11/2, Paris 1957, 409-426; K. Wessel, Abendmahl: RBK 1, 1-11; Id., Apostelkommunion: ibid. 1, 239-245; G. Schiller, Ikonographie der christlichen Kunst, vol. II: Die Passion Jesu Christi, Gütersloh 1968, 35-51; J.J.M. Timmers, Eucharistie: LCI I, 687-695; E. Jastrzebowska, Les scènes de banquet dans les peintures et sculptures chrétiennes des III^e et IV^e siècles: RecAug 14 (1979) 4-90; Age of Spirituality. Late Antique and Early Christian Art, Third to Seventh Century, ed. K. Weitzmann, New York 1979; J. Engemann, Der Ehrenplatz beim antiken Sigmamahl: JbAC Erg.-Bd. 9 (1982) 239-250; A. Quacquarelli, L'eucaristia e le scene iconografiche dei primi secoli: Civiltà classica and cristiana 6 (1985) 475-488.

E. Dassmann

EUCHERIA (5th-6th c.). Poetess, native of Gaul, lived probably 5th-6th c. One of her poems survives, in 16 distichs (= Anth. Lat. 390 Bücheler - Riese), more epigrammatical than satirical in nature. It is probably a game, with evident reference to verses of Virgil, Horace and Martial. The whole composition proceeds by the frontal opposition of elements diverse and contrary by nature, just as society has a dual classification. For example: "Iungatur nunc cerva asino, nunc tigris onagro; // Iungatur fesso concita damma bovi" (vv. 21-22). The final verse may be a pleasantry or bitter sarcasm: "An uncouth slave aspires to Eucheria's hand!" (Rusticus et servus sic petat Eucheriam!)

CPL 1479; F. Bücheler - A. Riese, Anthologia latina, I, 1, Leipzig 1894, 303-305; PWK VI, 881-882; A. Thomas, Crassantus ou Craxantus: ALMA 3 (1927) 49-58; KLP 2, 402; M. Marcovich - A. Georgiadou, Eucheria's Adynata: Illinois Classical Studies 13 (1988) 165-174; A. Georgiadou, Binary Opposition and Aristocratic Ideology in Anthol. Lat. 386 Shackleton Bailey (= 390 Riese): Acta Classica 40 (1997) 49-61.

L. Dattrino

EUCHERIUS (pseudo) (7th c.?). De situ Hierosolymae is a description of Jerusalem and Judea, erroneously attributed to *Eucherius of Lyons. The work is in the form of a letter addressed, under the pseudonym Eucherius episcopus, to a presbyter named Faustus. These brief pages must predate *Bede, who used them as a source (Bede, Liber de locis sanctis, CSEL, 39, 299-324), and Adomnanus—thus before 680. The author seems to have had no personal experience of the holy places: he cites Jerome's Ep. 129, 5 ad Dardanum as his primary source, and in chs. 16-20; 21-30 includes almost the whole of book III, ch. 6 of *Hegesippus's Histories (CSEL 66, 194-198).

CPL 2326; CPPM 2,2185; PLS 111, 45-48; CSEL 39, 123-134; CCL 175, 235-243; Schanz IV, 1 (1914), 404; Repertorium p. 385f.; RAC 5, 175-176; T. O'Loughlin, The Exegetical Purpose of Adomnán's De Locis Sanctis: CMCS 24 (1992) 37-53; Id., Dating the De situ Hierosolymae: The Insular Evidence: RBen 105 (1995) 9-19.

L. Dattrino - A. Di Berardino

EUCHERIUS Comes (5th c.). This Eucherius (or Euclerius) is thought to have belonged to the 5th-c. Roman nobility. From the content of the short (10-hexameter) poem of which he is considered the author, we deduce him to have been a judge, not a lawyer. Indeed, he turns to Christ to receive the light necessary to search out the secrets of laws and to give fair sentence (. . . inter nebulas legum dignoscere causas). It is unusual to find in this Christian judge such anxiety that, afraid of foundering in the great mass of laws inherited from Roman tradition, he invokes divine aid to avoid errors (. . . qua luce reperta, Fas mihi sit populis reserata resolvere iura). For this reason the brief composition has been called an oratio rather than a carmen.

CPL 1478; PLS I, 779; F. Bücheler - A. Riese, Anthologia Latina, I, 2, Leipzig 1906, 268; M. Manitius, Gesch. d. Christl.-lat. Poesie, Stuttgart 1891, 317; PLRE 2,406.

L. Dattrino

EUCHERIUS of Lyons (d. 449/455). Place and date of birth unknown. With his wife Galla and their sons Salonius and Veranus, both later bishops, he retired to the asceterium of *Lérins soon after its foundation by *Honoratus, between 412 and 420 (Pricoco, L'isola dei santi, 38f.). Honoratus's biographer *Hilary of Arles (Sermo de vita Honorati 22) and *Paulinus of Nola (Ep. 51, 2) attest that Eucherius established residence with his wife on the contiguous islet of Lero. A late, legendary life (Vita Consortiae, AASS Iuni 4, 250a) gives him two daughters as well, and makes him of a senatorial family, a fact which seems to be confirmed by his kinship with one Valerian, to whom he dedicated the epistle De contemptu mundi and whom he celebrates in maximos saeculi apices patre soceroque elatus (Pricoco, 56, lines 23-24), and by an allusion of Hilary (Sermo . . . Hon. 22: [Eucherius] pulcherrime splendidus mundo). We do not know how long he remained at Lérins; according to *John Cassian (Conl. 11, praef. 1), he was on the point of making a journey to *Egypt, home of the great ascetics, but never did so. On the island he wrote De laude eremi and, some years later (430 or 431), De contemptu mundi.

After this date and before 441, the year in which he took part as a bishop in the first Council of *Orange, he was called to the see of *Lyons. Here too, probably, he was associated with ascetic ventures, patronizing nascent monastic communities and circulating the texts of Eastern asceticism (Vita Patrum Iurensium 11; Pricoco, L'isola dei santi, 45f.), esp. Cassian's works, of which *Gennadius makes him the summarizer (Vir. ill. 64). He died in 449 (Chron. Gall. a. 452, 134) or shortly later, between 450 and 455, under *Valentinian and Marcian (Gennad., Vir. ill. 64). He enjoyed great prestige: Cassian dedicated part II of his Conlationes to him and Honoratus (Conl. 11, praef. 1) and praised his merits as an ascetic; *Polemius Silvius dedicated his Laterculum to him (Laterc. a. 449, 518); *Claudianus Mamertus (De statu animae II, 9) celebrated him as the greatest bishop of his time.

Of the many writings attributed to Eucherius, most are not authentic and must be restored to the so-called *Eusebius Gallicanus or later writers. The two opuscola De laude eremi and De contemptu mundi, two treatises of biblical exegesis, Formulae spiritalis intellegentiae and Instructiones, and the Passio Acaunensium martyrum are authentic. De laude eremi is a glorification, in the form of a letter, of the ascetical life and the asceterium of Lérins. Dedicated to Hilary, the future bishop of *Arles, it celebrates his return to the island after having followed Honoratus to Arles, drawn back by love of the eremitic life; it must have been written between the episcopal elections of Honoratus (427–428) and Hilary (429–430). In De contemptu mundi et saecularis philosophiae, also epistolary in form and composed ca. 430 (as the year 1185 from the foundation of Rome approaches, he writes: Pricoco, 94, lines 569-571), the noble dedicatee, Valerian, is exhorted to the Christian life or, more probably, to monastic profession. Worldly goods, whose imminent end is shown by clear signs, are contrasted with heavenly beatitude, with the tightly woven development of arguments and ideas typical of ancient Christian writers.

The Passio Acaunensium martyrum, written at Lyons during his episcopate (if the accompanying letter, in which Eucherius addresses bishop Salvius or Silvius as frater—as an equal—is authentic) and sometimes denied to Eucherius, narrates one of the most contested episodes in the history of the persecutions: the massacre of 6600 Christian soldiers of the *Theban Legion, who suffered martyrdom near Acaunum by order of the emperor *Maximian for refusing to persecute their coreligionists.

The two exegetical works are also from the years of his episcopate. The Formulae spiritalis intellegentiae, dedicated to his son Veranus, interprets numerous biblical expressions, grouped in rubrics (membra domini, terrena, animantia, interior homo, Hierusalem etc.). The Instructiones, dedicated to his son Salonius, is in two books: in the first Eucherius explains a series of difficult biblical passages, from Genesis to Revelation; the second, shorter book clarifies Hebrew and Greek names in *Scripture. Partial researches have shown the lack of originality of these works. As he himself says (Instr. I, praef., CSEL 31, 65, 6-8; 139, 19-20), Eucherius deduces his interpretations from authoritative exegetes who have preceded him, surely from *Jerome in book II of the Instructiones (I. Opelt, Quellenstudien zu E.) and in the part of book I on the Psalms (Curti, Spiritalis intelligentia, 1 n. 2). In the praefatio of the For- mulae, Eucherius illustrates his own exegetical method. He postulates a triplex scripturarum regula, i.e., the literal reading, the moral or tropological reading, and the spiritual or anagogical reading, which he correlates—though purely extrinsically—to the tripartite division of the human being (body, soul and spirit) and of philosophy (physical or natural, ethical or moral, logical or rational). But Eucherius does not apply this theory to his own writings, confining himself to a merely dual exegesis, literal and esp. allegorical (Curti). Eucherius's exegetical works spread widely and had lasting influence, as is proven by the manuscript tradition—much richer and more complex than Wotke has shown—present in the major scriptorial centers of medieval Europe and in almost every century from the 6th to the age of humanism.

CPL 488-498; PL 50, 701-1214 (all the works, including spuria); CSEL 31, ed. C. Wotke, Vienna 1894 (the authentic works, except De cont. mundi); CCL 66, Turnhout 2004, ed. C. Mandolfo; Passio Acaunensium martyrum, ed. B. Krusch, MGH SRM III, Hannover 1896, 32-39; De laude eremi, ed. S. Pricoco, Catania 1965; De contemptu mundi, intr., critical text and comm. by S. Pricoco, Florence 1990; A. Mellier, De vita et scriptis S. Eucherii, Lyons 1877; A. Gouilloud, St. Eucher, Lérins et l'Église de Lyon au Ve siècle, Lyons 1881; Schanz IV, 2, Munich 1920, 518-521; L. Cristiani, Lérins et ses Fondateurs, S. Wandrille 1946; K.F. Stroheker, Der senatorische Adel im spätantiken Gallien, Tübingen 1948, nos. 120, 168; J. Van Berchem, Le martyre de la Légion Thébaine, Basel 1956; C. Curti, La Passio Acaunensium martyrum di Eucherio di Lione: Convivium Dominicum, Catania 1959, 297-327; L. Cristiani, Eucher: DSp IV, 2, 1653-1660; L. Dupraz, Les Passions de S. Maurice d'Agaune, Fribourg 1961; R. Etaix, Eucher de Lyon: DHGE 15, 1315-1317; I. Opelt, Quellenstudien zu Eucherius: Hermes 91 (1963) 476-483; S. Pricoco, Per una nuova edizione del "De contemptu mundi" di Eucherio di Lione, Turin 1967; L. Alfonsi, Il "De laude eremi" di Eucherio: Convivium 36 (1968) 361-369; I. Opelt, Zur literarischen Eigenart von Eucherius' Schrift De laude eremi: VChr 22 (1968) 198-208; S. Pricoco, Barbari, senso della fine e teologia politica. Su un passo del "De contemptu mundi" di Eucherio di Lione: RomBarb 2 (1977) 208-228; C. Curti, Spiritalis intelligentia. Nota sulla dottrina esegetica di Eucherio di Lione: Kerygma und Logos. Festschrift C. Andresen, Göttingen 1978, 15 pp.; S. Pricoco, L'isola dei santi. Il cenobio di Lerino e le origini del monachesimo gallico, Rome 1978; PLRE II, Eucherius 3, 405; S. Pricoco, Eucherio di Lione: un padre della chiesa tra Erasmo e Tillemont: Studi storicoreligiosi 6 (1982) 23-44; F. Prinz, Fühes Mönchtum im Frankenreich, Darmstadt 21988, passim, esp. 66-69; 457-461; R. Nouailhat, Saints et Patrons. Les premiers moines de Lérins, Paris 1988; R. Nurnberg, Askese als sozialer Impuls. Monastische-asketische Spiritualität als Wurzel und Triebfeder sozialer Ideen und Aktivitaten der Kirche in Sudgallien im 5. Jahrhundert, Bonn 1988; C.M. Kasper, Theologie und Askese. Die Spiritualität des Inselmönchtums von Lérins im 5. Jahrhundert, Münster 1991; C. Mandolfo, Eucherii Lugdunensis, Formulae spiritalis intelligentiae, critical ed., Catania 2001.

S. Pricoco

EUCHITES. See *MESSALIANS

EUDOXIA (d. 404). Daughter of the Frankish general Bauto and sister of Arbogast, she married the emperor *Arcadius on 27 April 395. Received the title of Augusta (400), something unusual for empresses. She directly opposed the *Arians, and initially had good relations with the archbishop of *Constantinople, *John Chrysostom. She reacted to his criticism of the tone of life at the court, however, by supporting his condemnation at the Synod of the *Oak (403). Chrysostom was immediately recalled, however, due to popular agitation and the wish of Eudoxia herself. The final break came when Chrysostom protested the dedication of a silver statue to the empress; she reacted by having him exiled for good on 9 June 404. Eudoxia died 6 October the same year and was buried at Constantinople in the church of the Holy Apostles.

PLRE II, Aelia Eudoxia 1, 410; KL 1, Eudokia, 1550; DNP 1, Ae. Eudoxia 4, 168-169; C.A. Balducci, Il dissidio fra S. Giovanni Crisostomo e Eudossia, in Atti del IV Congresso nazionale di studi romani, 1, Rome 1938, 303-310; K.G. Holum, Theodosian Empresses: Women and Imperial Dominion in Late Antiquity, Berkeley, CA 1982, 48-78; J.H.W.G. Liebeschuetz, Barbarians and Bishops: Army, Church, and State in the Age of Arcadius and Chrysostom, Oxford 1990; A. Cameron - J. Long, Barbarians and Politics at the Court of Arcadius, Berkeley, CA 1993.

G. Pilara

EUDOXIA (Eudocia, Eudokia), (ca. 400–460). Originally named Athenaïs from her birthplace, Eudoxia was the daughter of the philosopher Leontius and received a good education. For hereditary reasons she asked protection from *Theodosius II's sister *Pulcheria, who introduced her to court. She had great success and in June 421 married Theodosius II, after having been baptized by *Atticus, patriarch of *Constantinople, who gave her the name Aelia Eudoxia. In 423 she was proclaimed Augusta. She sided with *Nestorius against *Cyril of Alexandria. In 438 she went on pilgrimage to *Jerusalem, returning with relics of St. Stephen. In 442 she was accused of infidelity and exiled to Jerusalem, where she died. *Photius (cods. 183, 184) esteemed her poetry, which in fact was quite modest. She wrote a short poem in honor of Theodosius II, celebrating his victory over the Persians, a metaphrase of the Octateuch and the prophets Zechariah and Daniel, 3 books in hexameters on the martyrdom of Cyprian (PG 85, 832-864), the Praises of Antioch, a speech made during a visit to that city, and the completion of Patricius's Homeric Centos.

CPG 6020-6025; DHGE 15, 1336-1337 (bibl.); PLRE II, Aelia Eudocia (Athenis) 2, 408-409; DNP 4, Aelia Eudokia 1, 220-221; A. Grillmeier - H. Bacht, Das Konzil von Chalkedon, I, Würzburg 1951, 604-608; K.G. Holum, Theodosian Empresses: Women and Imperial Dominion in Late Antiquity, Berkeley, CA 1982, 112-146; A. Cameron, The Empress and the Poet. Paganism and Politics at the Court of Theodosius II: Yale Classical Studies 27 (1982) 217-289.

G. Pilara

EUDOXIUS (d. 370). Native of Armenia, bishop of Germanicia (Syria), he was among the *Eusebians at Serdica (343) and then part of the Eastern delegation that delivered the Ekthesis makrostichos to the emperor *Constans at *Milan in 345. He may have attended the anti-Photinian Council of *Sirmium in 351. In 357, on the death of *Leontius, he got himself elected bishop of Antioch by a coup de main which annoyed *Constantius. At this point he began to support radical *Arian propaganda, which was reviving at that time, and protected *Aetius and *Eunomius. In 357 he presided over a small pro-Arian council at *Antioch, which approved the formula of Sirmium published some months earlier. During this period Eudoxius went so far as to declare the Son unlike the Father in substance and to deny his real generation from the Father. Momentarily struck by the *homoiousian reaction of 358, he soon regained the emperor's favor and, at *Seleucia, was among the minority who withstood the homoiousians. Put on the spot here and in the talks at *Constantinople following the council, he abandoned the radical Arians for a more moderate position and so emerged triumphant, with Acacius, from the Council of Constantinople of 360; he followed up his victory by obtaining a transfer to the see of Constantinople, left vacant by the deposition of *Macedonius. He held it until his death (370), repelling several attacks by the homoiousians after Constantius's death, enjoying *Valens's favor and following, with *Euzoius of Antioch, a moderate pro-Arian policy which led him to a decisive break with the radical Arians. A profession of faith surviving under his name, of doubtful authenticity, professes the logos/sarx Christology, which was Arian before becoming *Apollinarist.

CPG 3405-3410; M. Tetz, Eudoxius Fragmente: SP 3 (TU 78), Berlin 1961, 314-323; DHGE 15, 1337-1340; DTC 5, 1484-1487; Simonetti, passim; E. Cavalcanti, Studi eunomiani, Rome 1976, passim; BBKL I, 1550-1551.

M. Simonetti

EUGENIUS, monk. Native of Clysma in *Egypt (near Suez), after 25 years as a pearl fisher he became a disciple of *Pachomius. Retiring first to Nitria, then to Syria (region of *Nisibis), he founded a monastery on Mt. *Izla, where he had 70 disciples, who in turn founded numerous monasteries. Eugenius (Awgin in Syriac MSS) was the founder of monasticism in Syria, according to the legendary life that appeared in the 9th c. and was spread by numerous MSS. Critical opinion on its historicity varies. J. Assemani, improbably, identifies Eugenius with Aonès (Soz., HE VI, 33-34, calls Aonès one of the founders of monasticism in Persia), J. Labourt explains how Eugenius (Awgin) could be identified with the founder of the Mar Agwin monastery of Izla, and P. Peeters holds that the story of Eugenius belongs to the cycle of legends formed around the monastery of St. *Jacob of Nisibis. His Egyptian origin may simply be a response to the desire to give Mesopotamian monasticism an illustrious ancestry in Egypt, the home of monasticism.

A. Vööbus, History of Asceticism in the Syrian Orient, I, Louvain 1958, 21-220; J.M. Fiey, Aonès, Awun et Awgin (Eugène). Aux origines du monachisme mésopotamien: AB 80 (1962) 52-81; DHGE 15, 1359-1360; DIP 3, 1343; LTK 3, 980.

M.G. Bianco

EUGENIUS I, pope (654–657). Native of *Rome, succeeded *Martin I while the latter was still in exile in Crimea. Immediately upon his election Eugenius began to work for reconciliation between the church of Rome and *Constans II, a supporter of *monothelitism. To this end he sent *apocrisaries to the Byzantine court to inform the emperor of his election, and to reaffirm the orthodox faith and the Roman see's opposition to monothelitism. The patriarch *Pyrrhus, promoter of the Typos, offered to assist the papal legates. Upon Pyrrhus's death a year later, his successor Paul sent Eugenius a letter in which he expressed a somewhat ambiguous position on the monothelite question. The document was repudiated by a meeting of the Roman clergy and people, supported by *Maximus the Confessor. As a result relations between the papacy and the Eastern empire once again became tense, though without a direct conflict, in part due to the weakness of the emperor, who had been defeated at Phoenix by the Muslims in 655. Eugenius died after a pontificate of nearly three years, 6 June 657.

LP I, 341-342; Jaffé I, 234; Hfl-Lecl III, 461-470; Mansi 11, 1-14; DTC V, 1488-1489; D. Mallardo, Papa Sant'Eugenio I, Naples 1943; DHGE XV, 1346-1347; DBI 43 (1993), 483-486 (J.-M. Sansterre); Magi, 223-225; LTK[3] 3, 980 (S. Scholz); EPapi I, 603-606 (J.-M. Sansterre).

M. Spinelli

EUGENIUS FLAVIUS (d. 394). Roman usurper (392–394), Christian. A teacher of rhetoric, he held the post of magister scrinii when Arbogast had him proclaimed Augustus on 22 August 392. He sought an understanding with *Ambrose and *Theodosius, but the latter would not recognize him. Eugenius then leagued himself with the Roman senators headed by Nicomachus Flavianus. He was defeated at the river Frigidus (Vipacco; tributary of the Isonzo) and killed (394).

Letters Addressed to Eugenius: Ambr., Ep. 57; Symm., Ep. 2,81; PLRE I, 293; EC V, 804-805. On Eugenius's coins: J.H.F. Bloemers, Ein spätrömischer Goldmünzenfund aus Obbicht, Prov. Limburg: Berichten van de Rijksdienst voor het Oudheidkundig Bodemonderzoek 19 (1969) 73-80.

E. Malaspina

EUGENIUS of Ancyra (4th c.). Deacon of *Ancyra. Follower of *Marcellus, he bore a letter to *Athanasius containing the Marcellian community's profession of faith: in it the *Arians and *Sabellians are anathematized, and the subsistence of the *Trinity in a single hypostasis is affirmed. The letter, of ca. 371, was probably sent to defend themselves against *Basil's accusations.

CPG II, 2810; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Egypte au IV^e^ siècle (328–373), Rome 1996.

E. Prinzivalli

EUGENIUS of Carthage (d. 505). Perhaps a disciple of *Diadochus, the prologue of *Victor of Vita's Historia persecutionis was addressed to him. He was of Eastern origin. In 480–481, after the *persecutions of the Catholics by the *Vandals, *Huneric, yielding to the pressure of the emperor *Zeno, allowed a bishop to be elected at *Carthage after a vacancy of 24 years; Eugenius was elected (according to Delmaire, in 478–479). His charitable works made him popular. He allowed Arian Vandals to participate in eucharistic celebrations. During the conference of the African bishops of the two confessions, convoked by the Vandal king at Carthage in 484, Eugenius and his Catholic colleagues stood up to the king and wrote a liber fidei catholicae (Vict. of Vita, Hist. 2,56-101) to confirm their orthodoxy. In reprisal they were exiled; Eugenius was taken to Turris Tamalleni (oasis of Mansurah, near Telmine, Tunisia). Recalled from exile by Gunthamund (484–496) in 487, Eugenius was exiled a second time by Thrasamund (496–523) to Albi (Tarn department) in France, where he died in 505. The liturgical books of Albi put his feast on 6 September, perhaps the day of his death. The Calendarium Carthaginense cites him on 5 January. The date of 13 July in the Mart. rom. offers no guarantee. Of Eugenius's works we have the Liber fidei, and a letter Ad cives suos pro custodienda fide catholica (*Greg. of Tours, Hist. Franc. 2,3), written during his first exile in 484.

CPL 799; PL 68, 769-771; BHL 2678-2681; Verzeichnis 451; PCBE 1, 362-365; LACL3 237-238; V. Saxer, Saints anciens d'Afrique du Nord, Vatican City 1979, 194-199; R. Delmaire, La date de l'ambassade d'Alexander à Carthage et l'élection de l'évêque Eugenius: REAug 33 (1987) 85-89; J. Moorhead, Victor of Vita. History of the Vandal Persecution, Liverpool 1992.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

EUGENIUS of Seleucia (6th c.). Bishop of *Seleucia, consecrated by *Jacob Baradeus following the death of *Theodosius of Alexandria (19 June 566). Thanks also to the support of the monk Athanasius, the empress Theodora's grandson (d. 548), he became a promoter of the *monophysite doctrine of tritheism, causing inevitable divisions in the Chalcedonian church. After signing two accords aimed at ending the controversies, in 569 he was condemned and excommunicated by a *Jacobite synod of *Constantinople. He then associated himself with the deposed Arian bishops *Conon and *Theonas ordaining bishops in East and West and so initiating a true and proper tritheist hierarchy, until he was banished to the New Monastery of Jerusalem as a result of Emperor *Justin II's persecution of the monophysites (571). He died after his release in Pamphylia.

A fierce opponent of *John Philoponus, who with the publication of De resurrectione had brought about a kind of schism within the tritheist church itself, Eugenius disputed Philoponus's concept of the *Trinity in a letter written with Conon and Theonas (Ep. ad eorum asseclas); he also ridiculed his doctrine of the *resurrection in an invective written with a certain Themistius and the above-mentioned Conon (Cononitarum tractatus contra doctrinam Philoponi de resurrectione).

CPG 7175, 7177, 7283, 7284a; CSCO 17, 185-186, 198-202; CSCO 103, 129-130, 138-140; A. Van Roey, Les fragments trithéites de Jean Philopon: OLP 11 (1980) 141-143; G. Furlani, Un florilegio antitriteistico in lingua siriaca: Atti del Reale Istituto Veneto di Scienze, Lettere ed Arti 83 (1923–1924), Parte seconda, 671-673; Id., Sei scritti antitriteistici in lingua siriaca, PO 14, Paris 1920; E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie antérieure au VI^e^ siècle, CSCO 127, Subsidia 2, Louvain 1951, 179-187; A. Van Roey, La controverse trithéite depuis la condamnation de Conon et Eugène jusqu'à la conversion de l'évêque Élie, in Von Kanaan bis Kerala. Festschrift für Prof. Mag. Dr. J.P.M. Van der Ploeg O.P., ed. W.C. Delsman et al., Alter Orient und Altes Testament 211, Neukirchen-Vluyn 1982, 487-497; Id., Un traité co- nonite contre la doctrine de Jean Philopon sur la résurrection, in Antidoron. Hommage à M. Geerard, I, Wetteren 1984, 123-139; Id., La controverse trithéite jusqu'à l'excommunication de Conon et d'Eugène (557–569): OLP 16 (1985) 141-165; A. Van Roey - P. Allen, Monophysite Texts of the Sixth Century, Orientalia Lovaniensia Analecta 56 (1994) 106 and 141.

P. Marone

EUGENIUS of Toledo (d. 657). Born at *Toledo, but probably a *Goth. Already a cleric, he went to *Saragossa, where he became a monk and then worked with Bishop *Braulio as archdeacon (Ildef., Vir. ill. 13, 1). At the death of *Eugenius I, King Chindaswinth decided during the VII Council of Toledo (646) to make Eugenius bishop, despite Braulio's tenacious opposition. He was bishop for twelve years and died ca. the end of 657, after having presided over the VIII (653), IX (655) and X (656) councils of Toledo. A timid and delicate soul, of poor health, he achieved a high level of literary formation. At Chindaswinth's request he minutely reviewed the text of Dracontius's cosmogonic poem, so that "the text turned out finer through the skill of the reviser than through the ability of the author" (Ildef., Vir. ill. 13, 4). He was an inspired poet: we have a large collection of his poems (102), in which purely lyrical compositions are set beside epitaphs and short scholastic didactic poems. Also attributed to Eugenius is a series of brief liturgical and canonical texts; it is also very probable that he wrote the Passio or Acta martyrum Caesaraugustanorum, often thought to be the work of Braulio of Saragossa. *Ildefonsus, moreover, attributes to him the De Trinitate, a brilliant treatise with a well-ordered argument, of which we know with certainty only the brief passages cited by *Julian of Toledo (Progn. III,17,24,26).

CPL 1236; Díaz 196-204; PL 87, 369-413; MGH auct. ant. XIV, 27-287; F. Vollmer, Die Gedichtsammlung des Engenins von Toledo: Neues Archiv 26 (1901) 393-409; M. Manitius, Geschichte der lat. Literatur des Mittelalters, I, Munich 1911, 194-197; F. Rivera Recio, San Eugenio de Toledo y su culto, Toledo 1963; G. Bernt, Das lateinische Epigramm, Munich 1968; DHEE 2, 882-883; A.C. Vega, De patrología española. Sobre el opúsculo "de sancta Trinitate" de S. Eugenio II de Toledo: Boletín de la real Academia de la Historia 166 (1970) 63-75; J. Pérez de Urbel, San Eugenio de Toledo, in La patrología Toledano-visigoda, Madrid 1970, 195-214; C. Codoñer, The Poetry of Eugenius of Toledo: Papers of the Liverpool Latin Seminar 3 (1981) 333-342; U. Dominguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, IV, Madrid 1998, 113-155.

P. Marone

EUGIPPIUS (ca. 460–ca. 535). Late Latin Christian writer, born ca. 460 and active in the first part of the 6th c. He is associated with St. *Severinus, apostle of *Noricum, and was probably his young disciple. His origins are uncertain, though some think he was from the region of *Aquileia, and was later at *Lérins for a time. We know for certain only that he was the third abbot, after Lucillus and Marcianus, of the monastic community that his brethren, fleeing Noricum to escape barbarian violence, founded at Castrum Lucullanum (Pizzofalcone) near *Naples, next to the new tomb of St. Severinus, which had been translated there after long wanderings throughout Italy; all this Eugippius himself tells us in his Vita s. Severini, written in 511. Though colored by the marvelous, the Life is a source of prime importance—the only evidence we have of conditions in the Roman Empire's outer provinces at the time of the barbarian impact (Rugi, Heruli, Alamanni, etc.). As a biographer, Eugippius seems esp. to stress the didactic aspect, thus offering a model of virtue and behavior for the monastic community he directed. With the Life we should mention the two epistulae about it exchanged by Eugippius and the Roman deacon *Paschasius. In recent years Vogüé seems to have finally discovered the Rule which, according to some early authors (*Cassiodorus and *Isidore), Eugippius wrote for the monks of the monastery of St. Severinus. He corresponded with the most illustrious personages of his day (*Fulgentius of Ruspe, Paschasius, the deacon *Ferrandus, *Maxentius, Cassiodorus, *Dionysius Exiguus and the Roman virgin *Proba, Cassiodorus's niece). From a remark by Fulgentius (Ep. V, 12) and from a note on a codex at Epternach (Paris, Bibl. nat. lat. 9389), we can assert without doubt that he organized around himself a flourishing library and an active scriptorium. His Excerpta ex operibus s. Augustini, an anthology of passages (348?) drawn by Eugippius from more than 40 of St. *Augustine's works, are very important for establishing Augustine's text. For important evidence and judgments on Eugippius's literary work, see Cassiodorus (Inst. div. 23) and Isidore (Vir. ill. 26).

CPL 676-678, PL 62, 549-1200; PLS 3, 1263; CSEL 9, 1-2 (P. Knoll); R. Noll (- E. Vetter), Eugippius. Das Leben des heiligen Severin, Berlin [2]1963 (with Ger. tr. opposite), Passau 1981; F. Villegas - A. de Vogüé, Eugippii Regula, Vienna 1976 (CSEL 87); Vita sancti Severini, ed. T. Nüsslein, Bamberg 1985; Das Leben des heiligen Severin, new ed. A. Heine, Essen 1986; Eugippe, Vie de saint Séverin, introd., texte Latin, tr., notes & index par Ph. Régerat, Paris 1991 (SC 374). For the Excerpta, the CSEL edition is much criticized (see D. De Bruyne, Miscellanea Agostino II, Rome 1931, 337-339); K. Kramert - E.K. Winter, eds., St. Severin. Der Heilige zwischen Ost und West, Klosterneuberg 1958; L. Bieler - L. Krestan, Eugippius. The Life of Saint Severin (FC 55), Washington, D.C. 1965; I. Bóna, Eugippii Vita s. Severini: Antik Tanulmányok 16 (1969) 265-290 (Hungarian); Fr. tr., ed. by Ph. Régerat, Vie de Saint Séverin, Paris 1991; M. Pellegrino, Il Com- memoratorium Vitae sancti Severini*: RSCI 12 (1958) 1-26; DHGE 15, 1376-1378; P. Siniscalco, Il numero primitivo degli "Excerpta" di Eugippio: REAug 10 (1964) 331-342; A. de Vogüé, La Règle d'Eugippe retrouvée?: RevAscMyst 47 (1971) 233-265; M. van Uytfanghe, Eléments évangéliques dans la structure et la composition de la "Vie de saint Séverin" d'Eugippius: SE 21 (1972/73) 147-158; Id., La Bible dans la "Vie de saint Séverin" d'Eugippius: Latomus 33 (1974) 324-352; A. Quacquarelli, La "Vita sancti Severini" di Eugippio: etopeia e sentenze: VetChr 13 (1976) 229-253; E.M. Ruprechtsberger, Beobachtungen zum Stil und zur Sprache des Eugippius: ROE 4 (1976) 227-299; J.T. Lienhard, The Earliest Florilegia of Augustine: AugStud 8 (1977) 28-30; Die Regel des Eugippius: die Klosterordnung des Verfassers der "Vita Sancti Severini" im Lichte ihrer Quellen, Text, Übersetzung und Kommentar von M. Krausgruber, Thaur bei Innsbruck 1996; G. Wirth, Anmerkungen zur Vita des Severin von Noricum: Quaderni Catanesi 1 (1979) 217-266; R. Pillinger, Bibliographie zur Vita Sancti Severini (1980–1998): Mitteil. zur christl. Arch. 5 (1999) 93-96; W. Pohl - M. Diesenberger (eds.), Eugippius und Severin: der Autor, der Text und der Heilige, Vienna 2001; A. de Vogüé, Histoire littéraire du mouvement monastique dans l'antiquité, Paris 2003, vol. 8, 131-159; 335-373.

V. Pavan

EULALIA of Barcelona, martyr. The Passio and the cult of the virgin Eulalia are attested only from the 7th c., if we allow that the hymn Fulget hic honor sepulchri (PL 31, 449) was in fact composed by *Quiricius, bishop of *Barcelona in 656 (CPL 1273). The various mentions in the 7th-9th-c. martyologies are more certain regarding the date, but pose problems of content. The Mart. hier. puts a Eulalia, native of Italy, on 12 February; *Bede and the anonymous martyrologist of *Lyons (ca. 800) put her on the same date but make her a native of Barcelona; this latter date and place were agreed on by all later martyrologies. In 877 her relics were found outside the city, at S. Eulalia de Campo. At about the same time the Passio of *Eulalia of Mérida was adapted to her, decapitating her instead of burning her alive. But it is open to debate whether she should be identified with Eulalia of Mérida or not.

BHL 2693-2698; AB 102 (1984) 184; Verzeichnis 62; Díaz 316, 352; CPL 2069a; BS 5, 204-209; DHEE 2, 883; M. Dietz, Gebetsklänge aus Altspanien, Bonn 1947, 151-152; R. García Villoslada, Historia de la Iglesia en España 1, Madrid 1979, 39 (bibl.).

V. Saxer - S. Heid

EULALIA of Mérida, martyr. The most famous Spanish martyr. Around 405 Prudentius dedicated ch. III of the Perist. (CPL 1443) to her, mentioning the basilica over her tomb. Eulalia defended her homeland against the Suevians and the *Goths. The Mart. hier. lists her on 10 December: in Spaniis civitate Almeri sanctae Eulaliae virginis et martyris. Her name appears in the Visigothic Orational and the Mozarabic Lectionary (Liber commicus). Her cult spread in Spain from the 4th c.; according to some scholars, her personality was duplicated at Barcelona. Her cult involved the whole peninsula and reached *Africa (Aug., Serm. Morin 2 [PLS 2, 660-662]; Calendarium Carthaginense), *Gaul (basilica of Montday, ca. 455; Ven. Fort., Carm. 8,3,170; Greg. of Tours, Glor. mart. 90; Missale Gothicum), Italy (S. Apollinare Nuovo at *Ravenna) and England (Aldhelm, PL 89, 146, 273). According to *Prudentius and the Passio BHL 2700 of the 6th c. (according to Petruccione 83; 7th-8th c. according to Frede, Verzeichnis 62; it may be even older BHG 2700b), Eulalia voluntarily offered herself to martyrdom at age 12 and was crucified, finally dying at the stake outside the city, 10 December 304. When she died, her soul ascended in the form of a dove (a topos).

BHL 2699-2703; Díaz 311, 376; CPL 2069b; DHEE 2, 883; C. García Rodríguez, El culto de los santos en la España romana y visigoda, Madrid 1966, 284-289; R. García Villoslada, Historia de la Iglesia en España 1, Madrid 1979, 78-80; A. Recio Veganzones, "Baetica" paleocristiana y visigoda. La antigua "Nebrissa" – hoy Lebrija (Sevilla): RivAC 55 (1979) 80-87; J. Petruccione, The Portrait of St. Eulalia of Mérida in Prudentius' Peristephanon 3: AB 108 (1990) 81-104; A.T. Fear, Lives of the Visigothic Fathers, Liverpool 1997 (vitae patrum Meridae); A. Gambasin, Il martirio di Santa Eulalia, Treviso 1997.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

EULALIUS, antipope (418–419). Archdeacon of the Church of Rome, perhaps a native of Greece. Upon *Zosimus's death (27 December 418) he was elected bishop in the Lateran basilica by a small group of Roman deacons in opposition to *Boniface, and like him was consecrated on the following Sunday (29 December). While each believed himself to be the legitimate pontiff, a series of conflicts disturbed the public order. Thus in 419 the emperor Honorius, seeking to end the schism and the many resulting disorders, convened a council at *Ravenna, but without result. Only in the face of Eulalius's complete insubordination against *Achilleus of Spoleto, chosen in the interim to celebrate the *Easter rites at Rome, was Boniface recognized as legitimate. On 7 April Honorius communicated the resolution of the events at Rome to the proconsul of Africa Largo. Eulalius, initially supported by the prefect Symmachus and by the imperial power generally, after 419 was relegated to Campania, where he died in 423.

LP I, 88-89, 227-229; Ep. Imperatorum Pontificum aliorum, Collectio Avellana, CSEL 35/2, 59-80; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana. Recherches sur l'Église de Rome, son organisation, sa politique, son idéologie de Miltiade à Sixte III (311–440), I, Rome 1976, 452-460; S. Christ, Some Notes on the Bonifacian-Eulalian Schism: Aevum 51 (1977) 163-167; H. Chantraine, Das Schisma von 418/419 und das Eingreifen der kaiserlichen Gewalt in die römische Bischofswahl, in Alte Geschichte und Wissenschaftsgeschichte. Festschrift für Karl Christ zum 65. Geburtstag, ed. P. Kneissl - V. Losemann, Darmstadt 1988, 79-94; A. Pollastri, Eulalio antipapa: EPapi I, 404-405.

P. Marone

EULALIUS of Antioch (d. 331). Bishop of *Antioch for a few months, in the context of the disorders that accompanied and followed the deposition of *Eustathius in 327. Eulalias succeeded *Paulinus of Tyre (d. 330), who was elected to replace Eustathius and himself remained in office only a few months. Eulalius was succeeded by *Euphronius.

DCB 2, 279; Fedalto 2, 687.

M. Simonetti

EULOGIA (Greek εὐλογία; Latin eulogia): to speak well; blessing, both by God and of God by human beings; blessing in general. The blessing of something with a solemn prayer. The term εὐλογία also took on other meanings: (1) St. Paul uses it to indicate the *Eucharist (cup of blessing) (1 Cor 10:16); for Christian writers εὐλογία became synonymous with Eucharist (Acts of Thomas 26; 29; Orig., Hom. 19, 13 in Jer. PG 13, 489C; Basil, De Spir. san. 66 PG 32, 188B); the εὐλογία is the Eucharist sent to the absent (Justin, 1 Apol. 67, 5; Euseb., HE V, 24, 15). (2) Besides the blessed meal (agapē), εὐλογία also indicates the unconsecrated bread offered by the faithful for the eucharistic celebration (Apos. Con. VIII, 31, 2; Aug., C. litt. Pet. 3, 16, 19; Ep. 36, 8, 19); or the blessed bread distributed to the sick (Greg. of Tours, Hist. Franc. 5, 14; Gloria conf. 30). (3) A blessed object (fruits, esp. bread) or gifts exchanged in sign of friendship and unity (Paul. Nol., Ep. 3; Greg. Gt., Ep. 13, 45; Ven. Fort., Carm. 10, 1, 9; Radeg. 2, 7; Bened., Regula 54) and, in the Latin Middle Ages, the gift offered by the priest to the bishop (Conc. Meld., can. 45; Leo IV, Ep. 8, 3 PL 115, 668). (4) εὐλογία can refer to any object used for devotion (relics of holy places; lamp oil from Palestine preserved in ampullae; water).

Lampe 569f.; Cath 4, 684-686; RAC 6, 900-928; L. Janssens, Les eulogies: RBen 7 (1890) 515-520; B. Bagatti, Eulogie palestinesi: OCP 15 (1949) 126-166; G. Vermeer, Observations sur le vocabulaire du Pélerinage chez Egérie et Antonin de Plaicence, Nijmegen 1965; M. Paternoster, L'imposizione delle mani nella Chiesa primitiva. Rassegna delle testimonianze bibliche, patristiche e liturgiche, fino al sec. V, Rome 1977, [2]1983; N. Natalucci, Grecismiesotismi nell'Itinerarium di Egeria, in Paideia cristiana. Studi in onore di M. Naldini, Rome 1994, 103-113; M. Piccirillo, Uno stampo per eulogia trovato a Gerusalemme: Liber Annuus 44 (1994) 585-589; J. Engemann, Eulogien und Votive, in Akten des XII. Inter. Kongress f. Christ. Archäologie, I, Münster 1995, 223-233; B. Klausen-Nottmeyer, Eulogie – Transpot und Weitergabe von Segenskraft, in ibid., 922-927.

A. Di Berardino

EULOGIUS of Alexandria (d. 607/608). Native of *Antioch (Chalcedonian), bishop of *Alexandria from 580 to 607/8. Remembered as a friend and correspondent of *Gregory the Great and for his theological polemics against *monophysites and *Novatianists. None of his works survives completely (but see Photius, Bibl., cods. 182, 208, 225-227, 230, 280).

CPL 6971-6979; DHGE 15, 1388-1389; Patrologia V, 392-393; P. Allen, Evagrius Scholasticus. The Church Historian, Louvain 1981, 18, 28, 31, 40, 104, 127, 231; M. Maccarone, Il primato del vescovo di Roma nel primo millennio, Vatican City 1989, 340.

T. Orlandi

EUNAPIUS of Sardis (345/6–ca. 420). *Neoplatonist rhetor, disciple of Chrysanthius, of the school of *Iamblichus. Studied five years at *Athens attending the lectures of the Christian *Prohaeresius and others; he was also initiated into the Eleusinian mysteries, then returned to his homeland and taught rhetoric. Because of his interest in the study of medicine, Oribasius dedicated a work to him (CMG VI,3). At his advice Eunapius continued Dexippus's historical work with 14 books of Historika hypomnēmata, narrating the history of the Roman Empire from ca. 270–404; in the meantime (after 396), on the advice of Chrysanthius, he also write the Vitae sophistarum, beginning with *Plotinus and *Porphyry and continuing with the *Platonists and rhetors of his day, in opposition to Christian hagiographies. We have only fragments of the Historiae: the main one is known by the name Peri presbeiōn (De legationibus). *Photius (cod. 77) tells us that Eunapius praised *Julian and denigrated *Constantine and the Christians of the imperial court; from the surviving fragments, Eunapius's opposition to Christianity seems to turn on the polemic against the monks.

PG 113, 649-661; FHG 4, 11-56; L. Dindorf, Historici Graeci minores. I, Leipzig 1870, 205-274; J.F. Boissonade, Eunapii Sardiani Vitas Sophistarum et Fragmenta Historiarum, 2 vols., Amsterdam 1822; G. Giangrande, ed. Vitae sophistarum, Rome 1956; PLRE I, 296; I. Opelt, RAC 6, 928-936; H. Dörrie, KLP 2,427-428; J.R. Mozley, DCB 2,285-286; A. Cameron, A New Fragment of Eunapius: Classical Review, n.s. 17 (1967) 10-11; R.T. Ridley, Eunapius and Zosimus: Helikon 9-10 (1969–1970) 574-

592; A.B. Breebaart, Eunapius of Sardes and the Writing of History: Mnemosyne 32 (1979) 360-375; R.C. Blockley, The Fragmentary Classicising Historians of the Later Roman Empire. Eunapius . . ., Liverpool 1981; Index in Eunapii Vitas sophistarum, ed. J. & M.M. Avotins, Hildesheim 1983; A. Boldini, Ricerche sulla Storia di Eunapio di Sardi. Problemi di storiografia tardopagana, Bologna 1984; F. Paschoud, Eunapiana, in Bonner Historia-Augusta-Colloquium 1982–1983, Bonn 1985, 239-304.

E. Malaspina

EUNOMIUS of Berea. Late 4th-c. bishop who belonged, with Polemon, to the radical Apollinarists (Synousiasts). The Doctrina Patrum contains two fragments of a letter of his to Zosimus.

Diekamp, 309 and 312; H. Lietzmann, Apollinaris und seine Schule, Tübingen 1904, 153 and 273-277.

K. den Biesen

EUNOMIUS of Cyzicus (d. ca. 394). Native of *Cappadocia, of humble birth, secretary and disciple of *Aetius, Eunomius was the greatest exponent of radical *Arianism (*anomoianism). *Eudoxius ordained him deacon (ca. 357), then in 360 bishop of Cyzicus, but his radical Arian preaching provoked popular protest and his removal. After 362 he collaborated actively with Aetius in the organization of a regular anomoian community with its own bishops, and broke off relations with Eudoxius and *Euzoius, too moderate in his eyes. *Theodosius's Catholic policy signaled the decline of his star; a veteran of condemnations and exiles, he was once again condemned and exiled in 383, first to *Moesia, then to *Caesarea in Cappadocia. He was finally allowed to retire to a property of his own; he died ca. 394. We know he wrote much, but little survives. His Apologia, written in 361, is a complete, organic exposition of radical Arian doctrine. It was refuted in detail in 363–364 by *Basil in his Against Eunomius; Eunomius replied in 378 with an Apologia for the apologia, of which large extracts survive in *Gregory of Nyssa's refutation of it. In 383 at Theodosius's request, Eunomius wrote a rather detailed Confessio (Expositio) Fidei, which clearly summarizes his doctrine. Nothing survives of his Commentary on Romans in 7 books or his letters, of which *Photius (cod. 138) knew 40.

CPG 11, 2455-2460; PG 30, 836-868; Quasten II, 310-312 (bibl.); RAC 6, 936-947; Simonetti 588-589; E. Cavalcanti, Studi Eunomiani, Rome 1976; L. Abramowski, Eunomius: RAC 6, 936-947; A. Ritter, Eusebius von Cyzicus: TRE 10, 525-528; F.X. Risch, Eunomios: LTK[3] 3, 989-990; ODC 572-573; T. Böhm, Eunomius von Cyzicus: LACL (1998) 208-209. Editions and translations: R.P. Vaggione (ed.), Eunomius, The Extant Works, Text and Translation, Oxford 1987; B. Sesboüé et al. (eds.), Basile de Césarée, Contre Eunome I (SC 299), Paris 1982; Id., Contre Eunome II suivi de Eunome. Apologie (SC 305), Paris 1983; 179-299; Gregorius v. Nyssa, Contra Eunomium, ed. W. Jaeger: GNO 1-2, Leiden 1960. Studies: M.F. Wiles, Eunomius: Hairsplitting Dialectician or Defender of the Accessibility of Salvation? in R.D. Williams (ed.), The Making of Othodoxy: Essays in Honour of Henry Chadwick, Cambridge 1989, 157-172; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God, Edinburgh 1988, 611-636; P. Papageorgiou, Plotinos and Eunomios: A Parallel Theology of the Three Hypostases: The Greek Orthodox Theological Review 37 (1992) 215-231; F.X. Risch, Ps.-Basilius. Adversus Eunomium IV-V, Leiden 1992, see intr.; K.-H. Uthemann, Die Sprache der Theologie nach Eunomius: ZKG 104 (1993) 143-175; B. Pottier (ed.), Dieu et le Christ selon Grégoire de Nysse: étude systématique du "Contre Eunome" avec traduction inédite des extraits d'Eunome, Namur 1994; M.R. Barnes, Eunomius of Cyzicus and Gregory of Nyssa: Two Traditions of Transcendent Causality: VChr 52 (1998) 59-87; F. Pilloni, Influssi Eunomiani sull'origine e lo sviluppo della teologia dei Cappadoci, Rome 1998; R.P. Vaggione, Eunomius of Cyzicus and the Nicene Revolution, Oxford 2000.

M. Simonetti

EUNUCHS. Castration was practiced in antiquity for two main reasons: (1) in various religious cults of Asia Minor, Phoenicia and Babylon, eunuchs constituted a class of pure servants of the deity, who could be priests, but also laymen, like the mētragyrtai of the god Cybele (the so-called galli), still in existence in late-4th-c. Rome (Prudentius, Perist. 10,196-200; Paul. of Nola, Carm. 19,185ff.; Jerome, Com. in Osee 14); (2) first in the Persian world and later also in the Hellenistic-Roman world, eunuchs made so as infants for court functions, prostitution, service to women, or simply as servants. They were expensive (Pliny, HN 7,39) and considered semiviri (ibid. 11,110,263) or a tertium genus as a sign of disdain (Hist. Augusta 18,23,27). The castration of slaves was prohibited by emperors beginning with *Domitian (Suetonius, Dom. 7; Ammianus 18,4), esp. by *Hadrian (Dig. 48,8,4,2 [homicidium]) and *Constantine (CI 4,42,1). Under the latter's son *Constantius, however, there was a significant increase in the practice, since eunuchs occupied important positions at court; *Julian, who had been educated by the eunuch Macedonius, got rid of them, but later the phenomenon again reestablished itself (Ammianus 18,4). *Ammianus observes ironically that the emperor Constantius "had a great influence on Eusebius," the head of the cubicularii (18,4,3). Eunuchs had great power at court, occupying very important positions, but could be easily eliminated, since they had neither great families behind them nor descendants. Each successive prohibition of castration increased importation, which was more expensive. The number of eunuchs increased during the Byzantine Empire, meaning that they were not only being imported, but Roman citizens were also being made eunuchs. Mutilation often led to death (Justinian, Nov. 142, prol.). In any case eunuchs were despised by both pagans and Christians: considered vile, venal, servile and effeminate, they evoked physical and moral revulsion (Basil, Ep. 115; Cyril of Alex. PG 77, 1108). Infantile castration altered the male body into a feminine form, creating an ambiguous type.

A significant portion of *Gregory of Nazianzus's discourse 37, proclaimed in the presence of the court, dealt with eunuchs, some of whom were present. He begins ironically: "I want to say something virile about eunuchs" (37,16: SC 318 p. 304). They must not boast of something that is involuntary; there is no merit for something that derives from nature. He asks them not to prostitute themselves, out of love for Christ's divinity (ch. 17 and 18). There must have been Christians among the eunuchs at court, esp. from the late 4th c. (Gerontius, Life of Melania 11).

The church slowly worked out a position, which nevertheless fluctuated according to time and context, though from the 4th c. eunuchism was ordinarily rejected. The Acts of the Apostles mention the *baptism of the eunuch of Candace by Philip (8:27). Justin speaks (1 Ap. 29) of a Christian of Alexandria who wanted to be made a eunuch, presenting a request to the governor Felix, who rejected it. The mid 2nd-c. Apocryphal Acts of John criticize a Christian who mutilated himself after his conversion (ch. 53 and 54), since "it is not the organs that are troublesome to man, but the hidden sources, from which every vile movement has its origin and comes to light." *Melito of Sardis was a eunuch (Eusebius, HE 5,24: PG 20, 696). *Athenagoras speaks of Christian eunuchs (Suppl. 34,1-2); *Tertullian of the spadones voluntarii (De res. 61,6; De virg. vel. 10,1), where the language could indicate the continentes; the anonymous short work De singularitate clericorum criticizes them. The Roman author of the Philosophoumena refers to an elderly Christian eunuch (a priest?) named Hyacinthus, the teacher of Marcia, *Commodus's concubine (6,22. 55; 9,12: PG 16, 3260, 3292, 3382). *Origen castrated himself in youthful enthusiasm (Eusebius, HE 6,8: PG 20, 537), something he later regretted and advised against (Com. in Matth. 15,1-5). At *Diocletian's court there were powerful Christian eunuchs who died as martyrs (Lactantius, De mort. 15,1; Eusebius, HE 8,1,4).

The first canon of the Council of *Nicaea—the argument must have been very important if the conciliar legislation took it up first—prohibits the ordination of voluntary eunuchs and requires the deposition of clerics who are mutilated voluntarily. The Greek text is not very clear, whereas the Syriac version specifies that this regards admission to the clergy (Martin, in Pitra, Analecta sacra 1888, vol. 4, 455). This severe legislation suggests that there were many cases, precisely at the time when monasticism was beginning to develop. Was the intent to oppose a rash asceticism? The legislation pertains only to clergy, not to laymen. There was probably an underlying biblical motivation, since eunuchs were excluded from the priesthood (Lev 22:20) and from the community (Dt 23:2), though they were rehabilitated at a later period (Is 56:3-5; Wisd 3:13-14). *Athanasius tells of the Phrygian *Leontius, a cleric at Antioch who lived with Eustolium, an *agapetae; not wanting to separate from her, he mutilated himself; his bishop *Eustathius deposed him, but the emperor *Constantius promoted him to the episcopate (Apol. de fuga 26: PG 25, 676f.; Theodoret, HE 2,23: PG 82, 1068; Socrates, HE 2,26: PG 67, 265f.). *Palladius mentions another eunuch bishop, of Ephesus, who lived a dissolute life (Dial. 15,55-100).

The Apostolic Canons* establish that involuntary eunuchs can be admitted to the clergy (21; 22); clerics who have castrated themselves must be deposed (23), while laymen must refrain from communion for three years (can. 24). This legislation was applied consistently in the West, even if there may have been occasional exceptions, since the Council of *Arles of 452 still records the prohibition (can. 7). The *Byzantine church was much more flexible, perhaps because there were more eunuchs, including many clergy, monks and even patriarchs, such as Germanus I (715–730) and others after him. The Fathers were against physical mutilation, but insisted on the submission of the body to the will through spiritual castration (Clem. Al., Pedag. 3,4,3; Orig., Com. in Matth. 15,1-5; John Chrys., Hom. in Matth. 662,3; Aug., De virgi. 24: PL 409, 409; Basil of Ancyra, De virg. 60f.).

Frequently in Christian circles disdain for eunuchs underwent a transformation, inspired by the gospel saying reported by Matthew (19:12); the eunuch became the symbol of the pious, chaste and respectable person. Tertullian writes that eunuchs have merited grace and are invited to the kingdom of heaven (De monog. 7). There are various historically certain eunuch martyrs; the late Passiones, on the other hand, tend to consider a martyr they know little about to be a eunuch (Gaiffier and Boulhol - Cochelin), thus increasing their number. Being a eunuch becomes a title of honor; St. *Eleutherus was described as the ideal eunuch (AASS, Aug. I, 555E).

A.D. Nock, Essays 1, Cambridge, MA 1972, 7-15; DACL 2, 2369-2372; 5, 744; RAC 4, 620-650 (Effiminatus); 8, 984-1034 (Gal-los); 20, 285ff. (Kastration); R. Guilland, Les Eunuques dans l'Empire Byzantin: Étude de titulature et de prosopographie byzantines, in Études Byzantines, Paris 1943, vol. I, 197-238; B. de Gaiffier, Palatins et eunuques dans quelques documents hagiographiques: AB 75 (1957) 17-46; R.P.C. Hanson, A Note on Origen's Self-Mutilation: VChr 20 (1966) 81-82; L. Barni, Il recente dibattito sul "logion" degli eunuchi (Mt 19,10-12): SP 34 (1987) 129-151; P. Boulhol - I. Cochelin, La réhabilitation de l'eunuque dans l'hagiographie antique (IVe-VIe siècles), in Memoriam Sanctorum venerantes, Misc. Victor Saxer, Vatican City 1992, 49-76; M. Kuefler, The Manly Eunuch: Masculinity, Gender Ambiguity, and Christian Ideology in Late Antiquity, Chicago 2001; Eunuchs in Antiquity and Beyond, ed. S. Tougher, London 2002; K.M. Ringrose, The Perfect Servant: Eunuchs and the Social Construction of Gender in Byzantium, Chicago 2003.

A. Di Berardino

EUPHEMIA of Chalcedon (d. 303). Euphemia, "she of whom one can only speak well," as her name indicates, suffered martyrdom under *Domitian. The only certain date regarding the saint is that of her death (16 September 303), attested by the Fasti Vindobonenses Priores (MGH, Auct. ant. IX, 290). Her cult developed very quickly: *Egeria (ca. 23) and *Evagrius of Antioch (HE II, 3) attest the existence of a basilica dedicated to her at *Chalcedon, while *Asterius of Amasea documents the celebration of her feast as early as the beginning of the 5th c. and describes a cycle of frescoes depicting four scenes of her martyrdom: she was burned to death after having her teeth extracted (PG 40, 333-337). The old passio (BHG 619d), at least a century later than Asterius's account, differs from it on some points of the story: after having survived a long series of tortures unharmed (wheel torture, hot furnaces, stoning, voracious fish, beating with clubs, etc.), Euphemia was condemned ad bestias (*damnation ad bestias). There was great devotion to her in the 5th c., as proven by the fact that her basilica was chosen as the site of the Council of Chalcedon. Various sources in the succeeding centuries attest how Euphemia was considered a bulwark of orthodoxy: according to Constantine of Tio (BHG 621), Theodorus Vestone (BHG 624) and the so-called Imperial Menologia (BHG 624m), at the conclusion of the council orthodox and *monophysites placed their respective professions of faith in her sarcophagus: after a few days the orthodox text was found on the saint's breast, the other at her feet, as though she had rejected it. This wonder, known as the "miracle of the book," led to the celebration of the martyr as the guardian of orthodoxy on 11 July, included in many Eastern and Western calendars. From the 4th c. the spread of her relics was extraordinary, even in the West: the churches of *Milan, Nola, Rouen, *Ravenna, *Aquileia and Grado preserve her valuable remains, while her cult and the dedication of basilicas in her honor are attested from antiquity in the cities of N Italy, at Rome, Albano, Tivoli, Antioch, Lemno and Constantinople, to where it is said that her body was translated in the 7th c. because of the Persian attacks on Chalcedon. All Eastern and Western calendars and historical martyrologies agree on 16 September as the date of the celebration of her feast, except the *Gelasian Sacramentary, which unaccountably gives the date as 13 April, attested by a very small number of other sources.

AASS, Sept. V, 252-286 (Paris 1866); BHG 619-624n; BHL 2708-2716; BHO 286-287; BS 5, 154-162; Cath. 4, 690-691; DACL 5, 745-746; DHGE 15, 1409-1410; LTK³ 3, 991-992; MGH, Auct. ant. IX, 290; Vies des SS. 9, 338-341; A.M. Schneider, in Das Konzil von Chalkedon, I, Würzburg 1951, 291-302; F. Halkin, Euphémie de Chalcédoine (Subsidia Hagiographica 41), Brussels 1965.

V. Novembri

EUPHEMIUS of Constantinople (d. 515). Consecrated patriarch of *Constantinople in 489, he was a strenuous defender of the Council of *Chalcedon, seeking by all means to return to union with Rome. In 492 he called a synod of bishops to confirm the decrees of Chalcedon (Mansi, VII, 1180), but this merely increased the enmity of the emperor *Anastasius I, a *monophysite despite the orthodox confession of faith he had subscribed, at Euphemius's request, at the time of his election (Evagr., HE III, 32). Having escaped Anastasius's persecutions, Euphemius was condemned, deposed (against the popular will) and exiled to Euchaita in 495. Died at *Ancyra in 515.

DCB II, 292-294; DHGE 15, 1410-1411.

F. Cocchini

EUPHRATAS of Cologne (4th c.), bishop. Took part in the Council of *Serdica (343). He and *Vincent of Capua were entrusted by the council to take a synodal letter to *Constantinople with an account of the council and a plea for *Athanasius and the exiled orthodox bishops. At *Antioch, in an attempt to discredit the mission, Bishop Stephen, a follower of *Eusebius of Nicomedia, introduced a prostitute into Euphratas's room, but the trap was discovered and Stephen was deposed by Constantius (Athan., Hist. Ar. 20; Theodor., HE II, 7-8). The acts of a synod at *Cologne (346) attest the deposition of Euphratas for Photinianism, but their authenticity is disputed.

DHGE 15, 1412-1414.

E. Prinzivalli

EUPHRONIUS of Antioch (d. after 332). One of the bishops who occupied the see of *Antioch after the deposition of *Eustathius. The tradition contains some uncertainties over the order of succession to that see (see Eulalius (4), DCB 2, 279). Euphronius was elected by the Arians, after they had proposed *Eusebius of Caesarea for the see of Antioch, asking *Constantine's support; Eusebius refused, however, appealing to can. 15 of *Nicaea, which forbade the translation of bishops. Constantine then proposed Euphronius, a priest of *Caesarea in *Cappadocia, and George of Arethusa. Euphronius was elected, and governed for a year and a few months.

Eusebius, Vita C. III, 60, 61, 62; Socrates, HE I, 24; Sozomen, HE II, 19; Theodoret, HE I, 22; R. Devreesse, Le patriarcat d'Antiochie depuis la paix de l'Église jusqu'à la conquête arabe, Paris 1945, 116.

A. Pollastri

EUPLUS of Catania (d. 304), commemorated 12 August in the Mart. hier., the historical martyrologies and the Marble Calendar of Naples; 11 August in the Constantinople Synaxarion. His cult was widespread in antiquity, with churches in his honor at Messina, *Rome and *Naples. His feast also appeared in the old Roman Capitularia evangeliorum. P. Franchi de' Cavalieri edited the critical edition of the four recensions of his passion. The oldest is Greek and was compiled on the basis of two primitive court records, perhaps incompletely reproduced with a small number of redactional modifications. From them we learn that the martyr was condemned to death, and executed on 12 August 304.

DHGE 15, 1417; Vies des SS. 8, 207-209; Cath 4, 695; P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, S. Euplo: ST 49, 1-54; F. Corsaro, Studi sui documenti agiografici intorno al martirio di S. Euplo: Orpheus 4 (1957) 33-62; G. Lanata, Gli atti dei martiri come documenti processuali, Milan 1973, 221-226; V. Saxer, Atti dei martiri dei primi tre secoli, Padova ²1989, 204-208; LTK³ 3, 993; G. Philippart, L'hagiographie sicilienne dans le cadre de l'hagiographie de l'Occident, in R. Barcellona - S. Pricoco (eds.), La Sicilia nella tarda antichità. Religione e società, Soveria Mannelli 1999, 179-182; F. Scorza Barcellona, Agli inizi dell'agiografia occidentale, in Hagiographies. Histoire internationale de la littérature hagiographique latine et vernaculaire en Occident des origines à 1550, sous la direction de G. Philippart (CC. Hagiographies III), Turnhout 2001, 52-55.

V. Saxer

EUPREPIUS (4th c.). Bishop of Paltos (*Syria). *Severus of Antioch preserves a fragment of a memo addressed by Euprepius to *Paulinus of Antioch, against the *Messalians.

CPG II, 3440.

E. Prinzivalli

EURIC. King of the *Visigoths (466–484). Son of Theodoric I, he murdered his brother Theodoric II at *Toulouse and assumed power, sending notice to the emperor *Leo I and to the Suevi, *Vandal and *Ostrogoth kings. He defeated the Breton leader Riothamus, conquered Auvergne and in 476 *Arles and *Marseille, after concluding an accord with the emperor Julius Honorius through the mediation of *Epiphanius, bishop of Pavia. Having enlarged his kingdom in *Gaul and *Spain, Euric made war on the *Burgundians. An *Arian, he persecuted Romans of *Nicene faith, but also used the services of competent people such as Leo of *Narbonne, his adviser, speech editor and legal counselor (Sidonius, Epist. VIII,3,3). The beginning of the written redaction of the so-called Codex or Edictum Eurici, a compilation of Roman laws supplemented by Gothic traditions, goes back to Euric. He died at Arles in 484 and was succeeded by his son Alaric II.

Codex Eurici: CPL 1802; MGH Legum sectio I: leg. nat. Germ. I, 1902, 1-32 (K. Zeumer); A. d'Ors, El Código de Eurico. Edición, Palingenesia, Indices: Estudios visigóticos, II, Madrid - Rome 1960; PLRE II, 427-428; DCB II, 300, 302; DHGE XV, 1420-1421. E.A. Thompson, The Visigoths from Fritigern to Euric: Historia 12 (1963) 105-126; A. Gillett, The Accession of Euric: Francia 26/1 (1999) 1-40; I. Gualandri, Figure di barbari in Sidonio Apollinare, in Il Tardoantico alle soglie del Duemila. Diritto religione società, ed. G. Lanata, Pisa 2000, 105-129.

E. Malaspina

EUSEBIAN CANONS. A sort of concordance of the four gospels made by *Eusebius of Caesarea, according to the canons of Alexandrian pagan philology. A first concordance of the gospels was made by *Ammonius the Alexandrian (3rd c.), based on Matthew's gospel, to which were added the parallel passages from the other gospels. This method, however, allowed for the lectio continua of only Matthew's gospel. Eusebius's technique, which he explained in a letter to Carpianus, is more refined. First he divided the gospels into brief sections, to which he assigned numbers; he then prepared a table of ten canons, each containing a list of passages, in the following order: passages (1) common to the four gospels; (2) common to the synoptics; (3) common to Mt, Lk and Jn; (4) common to Mt, Mk and Jn; (5) common to Mt and Lk; (6) common to Mt and Mk; (7) common to Mt and Jn; (8) common to Mk and Lk; (9) common to Lk and Jn; (10) unique to each gospel, in the order of Mt, Mk, Lk and Jn. In the text of the gospels, a number indicates the canon and another indicates the parallel passages. Eusebius's system is transmitted in Syriac and Latin manuscripts.

Nestle-Aland, Novum Testamentum Graece [27]1993, 84-89; LTK[3] 3, 1005-1006; C. Nordenfalk, Die spätantiken Kanontafeln, Göteborg 1938; J. Leroy, Nouveaux témoins des Canons d'Eusèbe illustrés selon la tradition syriaque: CArch 9 (1957) 117-140; Id., Recherches sur la tradition iconographique des Canons d'Eusèbe: CArch 12 (1962) 173-204; H.H. Oliver, The Epistle of Eusebius to Carpianus: NT 3 (1959) 138-145; DACL 2, 1950-1954.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

EUSEBIANS. By this term, which properly indicated the partisans of *Eusebius of Nicomedia, *Athanasius also indicated the followers of *Arius, with no distinction from the term Arian. But since, after Arius's death, Eusebius distanced himself from Arius's more radical statements in favor of a more traditional and moderately *subordinationist doctrinal formulation, around which much of the Eastern episcopate rallied against the upholders of the *Nicene Creed, modern scholars use the name Eusebian to indicate this alignment, in which genuine Arians coexisted alongside representatives of a much more moderate theology.

A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IV[e] siècle (328–373), Rome 1996, passim.

M. Simonetti

EUSEBIUS, pope, saint (d. 308). Feast 17 August; initially 26 September. His episcopate was very brief—a few months during 308—when *Maxentius was emperor at *Rome; some think the year was 309 or 310. According to the Liberian catalog, composed ca. 336 and inserted in the *Chronography of 354 (ed. Mommsen, Chronica Minora, 76), he was pope from 18 April until 17 August of an unspecified year. He succeeded Pope Marcellus, who died 16 January 308, after a vacancy of three months and eight days. Some of the sources disagree on some chronological data; some do not mention Pope Marcellus. The information in the Liber pontificalis is not very reliable; in it the author draws on a legendary text in circulation at the time (Duchesne LP, 1, XIX; LX; III, 56).

Our main reliable source remains an epigram, of only eight verses, of Pope *Damasus (ICUR IV, 9515; Diehl 963; Ferrua n. 18; 18[1]; 18[2]; Reekmans p. 699). From it one can partially reconstruct the chaotic and extremely tense situation at Rome at the time of his election and pontificate, since the Roman community was split into two partes (*Marcellus, pope), with the opposition led by one *Heraclius: Heraclius vetuit lapsos peccata dolere (Ferrua n. 18, v. 1). The emperor *Maxentius intervened, sending both Heraclius and Eusebius into exile. Heraclius led the pars that wanted to readmit the lapsi* after the persecution, whereas Eusebius demanded, according to custom and as his predecessor Marcellus had required, an appropriate penance (Eusebius miseros docuit sua crimina flere). Eusebius died at Syracuse; his body was brought back to Rome and buried in S. Callisto. The decretal letters, clearly spurious, are attributed to Eusebius (PL 6, 1101-1109); they are nonetheless very interesting regarding ecclesiastical discipline and canon law.

AASS Sept. Anversa 7,265-271, II ed., 26-27; II,690-732; PL 6, 25-26 (a brief biography with sources); Jaffé 1885, nn. 163-170; G.B. De Rossi, Roma sotterranea, Rome 1864, vol. I, 201-210; L. Duchesne, Liber pontificalis vol. 1, Paris 1886, CVII-CIX; 8-10; 74-75; 167; vol. 3 ed. C. Vogel, Paris 1957, 284; I. Carini, Le catacombe di S. Giovanni in Siracusa e le memorie di papa Eusebio, Rome 1890; BS 5,246-248; E. Caspar, Die Geschichte des Papstums, I, Tübingen 1930, 43; 99f.; 128f.; A. Ferrua, Epigrammata Damasiana, Vatican City 1942, 129-136 and 181; R. Valentini - G. Zucchetti, Codice tipografico della città di Roma, II, Rome 1942; D. De Decker, La politique religieuse de Maxence: Byzantion 38 (1968) 472-562; G.L. Falchi, La signficativa motivazione di un decreto di papa Eugenio, 311–312, in T. Ladu, La datazione della Sindone. Atti del V Congresso Nazionale di Sindonogia, Quartuccio, Cagliari 1990, 439-442; L. Reekmans, Les tombeaux des papes Gaius (283–296) et Eusèbe (309 ou 310) et des martyrs Caloncerus et Parthenius dans la catacombe de Callixte. Aperçu d'une recherche, in Memoriam sanctorum venerantes. Miscellanea V. Saxer, Vatican City 1992, 689-709; EPapi I, 313-316.

A. Di Berardino

EUSEBIUS GALLICANUS. Conventional name given to a collection, made in *Gaul, of 76 homilies containing material of disparate origin: *Cyprian, *Novatian, *Ambrose, *Augustine, *Faustus of Riez. The origin of the collection seems to go back to *Caesarius, but it was systematized and reworked by an unknown hand in the 7th c. As we have it, it reveals the presence of different hands, as well as literal borrowings from several sources. The basic order is that of the liturgical year: Christmas, *Epiphany, Lent, *Easter, *Ascension, *Pentecost, with intercalated homilies on martyrs and saints; other homilies on various subjects follow, including 10 addressed to monks, with a strong ascetical focus. For the most important feasts, several sermons of varied argument are grouped together. Properly scriptural developments are rare: even when the homily begins from a passage of *Scripture, the main interest is not exegetical, but moral and practical, to edify and instruct at an elementary level. All in all, the collection seems to have been made with care and kept in mind the low religious and cultural level of the people of that time: the form is simple, too much repetition is avoided, and texts of a mainly moral and ascetical interest are chosen.

CPL 966; CCL 101, 101A, 101B; J.-P. Weiss, La descente du Christ aux Enfers et le thème de la lumière dans les "Homélies pascales" de Pseudo-Eusèbe le Gallican: BLE 101 (2000) 338-366.

M. Simonetti

EUSEBIUS of Alexandria (mid 3rd c.): deacon of *Dionysius of Alexandria, identified by *Eusebius of Caesarea, perhaps mistakenly, with *Eusebius of Laodicea.

DHGE 15, 1433-1434; 1465-1466; BS 3, 655-657.

S.J. Voicu

EUSEBIUS of Alexandria (pseudo) (late 5th c.–early 6th c.): under this name goes a collection of 21 or 22 Greek homilies that had considerable circulation in Latin and Eastern languages. The collection is now thought to be homogeneous, though the author's identity remains problematical: the Life of Eusebius (BHG 635) by John the notarius has him as the immediate successor of *Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444), but this is clearly untenable, since no Eusebius is attested in the see of *Alexandria before the 11th c. Exegesis of the homilies shows specific affinities with the Syro-Palestinian area. Nor can it be ruled out that the homilies and the Life are by the same author. Some terminological traits and a 6th-c. papyrus allow us to fix the chronology of the corpus with sufficient precision. Various topics are addressed: festive homilies, antipagan polemics and ascetic didascalie, often in reply to questions put by a disciple named Alexander. The use of Eusebius's homilies in the Latin world produced the so-called *Eusebius Gallicanus.

CPG 5510-5533; BHG 635-635z; DTC 5, 1526-1527; DSp 4, 1686-1687; PG 86, 297-300 (Life); 313-536 (homilies); G. Lafontaine, Les homélies d'Eusèbe d'Alexandrie, Louvain 1966 (diss.); F. Nau, Notes sur diverses homélies pseudépigraphiques et sur les œuvres attribuées à Eusèbe d'Alexandrie . . . : ROC 13 (1908) 406-434; J. Leroy - Fr. Glorie, "Eusèbe d'Alexandrie" source d'"Eusèbe de Gaule": SE 19 (1969–70) 33-70; G. Lafontaine, Le sermon "sur le dimanche d'Eusèbe d'Alexandrie," version arménienne et version géorgienne: Muséon 87 (1974) 23-44; Id., La version arménienne du sermon d'Eusèbe d'Alexandrie "Sur la venue de Jean aux Enfers": Muséon 91 (1978) 87-104; Id., La version arménienne du sermon d'Eusèbe d'Alexandrie "Sur la trahison de Judas": Muséon 91 (1978) 335-353; J.M. Sauget, La version arabe de l'homélie "Sur la trahison de Judas" d'Eusèbe d'Alexandrie: Muséon 92 (1979) 5-23; Id., La version syriaque de l'homélie "Sur l'Ascension de Notre-Seigneur" d'Eusèbe d'Alexandrie: Augustinianum 20 (1980) 299-317; D. Sheerin, St. John the Baptist in the Lower World: VChr 30 (1976) 1-22; M. Gronewald, Kein durchtriebener Räuber . . . : ZPE 34 (1979) 22-25; M. van Esbroeck, Version géorgienne de l'homélie eusébienne CPG 5528 sur l'Ascension: OCP 51 (1985) 277-306; L.S.B. MacCoull, Who Was Eusebius of Alexandria?: Byzantinoslavica 60 (1999) 9-18.

S.J. Voicu

EUSEBIUS of Bologna (4th c.). Bishop of Bologna ca. 380, took part in the anti-*Arian Council of *Aquileia and supported *Ambrose in accusing *Palladius of Ratiaria and Secondianus of Singidunum of Arianism.

DHGE 15, 1435; BS 5, 250f.; BBKL XVI, 470; PCBE II/1, 698-700.

M. Simonetti

EUSEBIUS of Caesarea (Cappadocia) (d. 370). A wealthy, respected layman of *Caesarea, he held municipal office when, still unbaptized, he was unwillingly forced to become bishop (362) by the people. The election displeased *Julian the Apostate, who was even more annoyed when Eusebius called *Basil, whom he esteemed for his piety and doctrine, to the clergy. Envy soon poisoned his relations with Basil, however, such that the latter chose to leave the city. But in 365, when *Arianism, supported by *Valens, again became dangerous, Eusebius recalled Basil through the intervention and mediation of *Gregory of Nazianzus. Basil, humble and respectful as he was, became Eusebius's adviser and coadjutor and succeeded him at his death (370).

Gregory of Nazianzus, Orat. 18, 33f.; 43, 28-43; Ep. 16-19: DHGE 15, 1436f.; R. Van Dam, Families and Friends in Late Roman Cappadocia, Philadelphia 2003.

A. De Nicola

EUSEBIUS of Caesarea (Palestine) (ca. 265–339)
I. Life - II. Historical works - III. Apologetic works - IV. Biblical and exegetical works - V. Dogmatic works.

I. Life. Born in Palestine, perhaps at *Caesarea, ca. 265; educated in that city, seat of the school and famous library founded by *Origen. His teacher was *Pamphilus, the most learned of Origen's disciples, for whom Eusebius's gratitude and veneration were so deep that he assumed the name Εὐσέβιος τοῦ

Παμφίλου. To him Eusebius owed his scientific training and his devotion to Origen; together they composed the Defense of Origen and restored and reordered the library of Caesarea. During *Diocletian's persecution, of which Pamphilus was a victim (6 February 310), Eusebius escaped death by fleeing to *Tyre and from there to the Egyptian desert of the Thebaïd; arrested and imprisoned, he was soon able to return to Palestine thanks to *Gallerius's Edict of Tolerance of 311. Raised to the see of Caesarea (ca. 313), he was involved from the start in the Arian controversy; he sided with *Arius, but did not share his more extreme doctrinal ideas. Averse to the ὁμοούσιος (= the Son of the same substance or essence as the Father), which smacked to him of *Sabellianism, in 325 he was excommunicated by the Synod of *Antioch for refusing to adhere to a formula condemning Arius's teaching. Despite this, he participated later in the same year in the Council of *Nicaea, where he had an opportunity to rehabilitate himself by subscribing Arius's condemnation and the formula of faith, though his decision was determined more by the intention of complying with *Constantine's expressed wish than by intimate conviction. But the position Eusebius took at Nicaea—certainly not consistent with his doctrinal orientation—was temporary: after the council, he continued to work on behalf of Arius and his party, and collaborated with the heresiarch's ardent supporter *Eusebius of Nicomedia in deposing bishops who defended the Nicene Creed: *Eustathius of Antioch, *Athanasius, *Marcellus of Ancyra. His friendship with and devotion to Constantine, architect of the peace between church and empire, were sincere and boundless: he celebrated the 20th and 30th anniversaries of his accession with official addresses. He died soon after the emperor, ca. 339–340.

Eusebius's literary work was vast and took in various fields: historiography, exegesis, philology, theology, apologetics, etc.: his doctrine is profound enough to be on a level with Origen's, though he is inferior to Origen as a thinker and writer. *Photius, while acknowledging his great erudition, called his style neither pleasing nor brilliant. Modern scholars have found imprecisions and defects of various kinds in his works, but an unprejudiced judgment cannot fail to recognize that without his research we would know little about the first centuries of Christianity. His historical writings are his best work and the source of his imperishable fame.

II. Historical works. The Chronicon, composed before 303, comprises two parts. The first, almost an introduction to the second, summarizes the history of the most famous peoples of antiquity: Chaldeans, Assyrians, Hebrews, Egyptians, Greeks and Romans; the second part provides synchronous tables arranged in parallel columns and accompanied by brief notes on the main facts of sacred and profane history, from the birth of Abraham (2016–2015 BC) to AD 303. The Greek original is lost, save a few fragments and extracts; an Armenian version (ca. 600) is preserved entire, as is a Latin version of part II by *Jerome, who enriched the text by continuing it up to 378 and adding notes on Roman history and literature. Both versions were made from a revision of the original text, which continued the narrative up to the 20th year of Constantine (325). The work's apologetic intention—to show that the Jewish religion, forerunner of Christianity, was older than other religions—was not new: other apologists, e.g., *Theophilus of Antioch, had done the same. Even the design was not new: something similar had already been successfully tried by *Julius Africanus, whom Eusebius probably used as a source. Yet Eusebius greatly excels his predecessors by his more marked critical and philological sensitivity, shown both by his choice of sources and by his rejection of Adam as the starting point of history—judging his date to be not historically ascertainable—and of millenarism as the final phase, still present in Julius Africanus.

By far his most important historical work is the Ecclesiastical History in 10 books, from the beginning of the church to Constantine's victory over Licinius (324) and the reunification of the empire under Constantine. It seems certain that the work had more than one redaction. Schwartz (Codex Vaticanus gr.) distinguishes four: the first, comprising books I-VIII and written in 312–313; the second, which adds book IX, in 315; the third, with book X, in 317; the fourth in ca. 323. Other hypotheses have been formulated that bring forward the publication of books I-VIII, and the latest studies place them in the years preceding *Diocletian's persecution (303). We have three versions: the first in Syriac, probably made in the 4th c., which served as the basis for an Armenian version; *Rufinus translated it into Latin and continued it up to 395. The apologetic intention is evident: the final victory of Christianity over the adverse powers of the state is tangible proof of its divine origin and legitimacy. But beyond this very specific intention, various defects have been pointed out in the History: it lacks a personal reworking of the sources and an organically combined historical framework; disproportion has been noted in the treatment of the material, superficiality in the solution to some questions, partiality in judgment. Nonetheless, with all these faults, the work has indisputable merits: it acquaints us with otherwise unknown texts and documents and provides valuable information on the history of the primitive church, on episcopal successions, martyrs, heretics, etc.

Often inserted in the surviving MSS of the Ecclesiastical History, between books VIII and IX or sometimes after book X, is an opusculum on the Martyrs of Palestine, which relates the glorious deeds of these martyrs, often from eyewitnesses or first-hand information. Thanks to this work we have more detailed information on the violence of the persecution in Palestine and the number of executions there than for any other province of the East. Two redactions exist: a short one, surviving in the original Greek, and a longer one, surviving in a Syriac version.

The Life of Constantine, in 4 books, has aroused and continues to arouse heated debate, resulting in diametrically opposed theories: from an authentically Eusebian work, it came to be considered apocryphal. Argument has fastened particularly on the 15 documents that the author incorporated, which have been considered either absolutely genuine or the manipulations of a forger. Today the theory of authenticity wins increasing consensus, without ruling out the Life having undergone various revisions. The work is a *panegyric and, as such, adheres to the canons of the genre, skillfully keeping quiet about its hero's negative and reprehensible aspects and exaggerating positive particulars: in Eusebius's eyes, Constantine is as the "friend of almighty God" and a "new Moses." Exaggeration, reticence and an encomiastic tone are the work's characteristic motifs. Based on it, ancients and moderns have constructed the image of a courtier bishop, always loyal to the emperor's orders, at times going so far as to doubt the sincerity of Eusebius's feelings for him. But to evaluate Eusebius's attitude fully, we must remember the age in which he lived, which, after having experienced the fury of the persecution, saw an unhoped-for peace and, for the first time, the new religion openly favored by the emperor. In this light we can understand how Constantine would have appeared to Eusebius as God's instrument in casting down his enemies, and why he considered him almost as Christ's earthly representative and saw in his empire the image of the heavenly kingdom.

Added to the Life in the MSS is an Address of the Emperor Constantine to the Assembly of the Saints, which sometimes appears as book V, but in fact is like an appendix to book IV: it is a defense of the Christian religion, centering on a demonstration of the divinity of Christ, to whom Constantine gives credit for his successes in war. Regarding its authenticity, here too scholarly opinion is divided. After the Address, the MSS of the Life transmit the Praise of Constantine, two works joined under the same title. Chs. 1-10 contain the official address pronounced by Eusebius in 335 for the 30th anniversary of Constantine's reign; chs. 11-18 are a work presented by Eusebius to the emperor for the dedication of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

III. Apologetic works. A certain apologetic tone is present in all of Eusebius's literary work, but some works belong more specifically to this genre. The earliest of these seems to be the Elementary General Introduction in 10 books, of which we possess books VI-IX, which go under the title of Prophetic eclogues, and fragments of books IV and X. The four surviving books contain a collection of an essential commentary on the OT Messianic prophecies. Against Hierocles, written ca. 303 (Harnack, Barnes) or ca. 312 (Schwartz, Forrat, Borzì), refutes the Philalēthēs (*Hierocles Sossianus) demonstrating the untenability of Philostratus's portrait of Apollonius of Tyana, the superiority of Christ over Apollonius, and a providential vision of the world, according to which human nature cannot raise itself to the divine nature. Lost except for some fragments is the treatise Against Porphyry in 25 books, repelling the attacks launched by that *Neoplatonist philosopher against Christianity. Equally lost is the Refutation and Defense in 2 books, of which two redactions were known in *Photius's time. Of the Apology for Origen in 6 books, in whose composition Eusebius collaborated with Pamphilus and added book VI after the latter's martyrdom, only book I remains in Rufinus's version.

Eusebius's most important apologetic works are undoubtedly the Preparation for the Gospel and the Proof of the Gospel, written one after the other, after 312 and probably before 320, and both dedicated to *Theodotus of Laodicea. The Preparation, in 15 books, all preserved in the original text, takes up the customary themes of Greek and Latin apologetic: falsity of polytheistic religions (books I-VI); superiority to pagan religion in both content and antiquity of Jewish monotheism, and even more so of Christian monotheism (books VII-XIII); contradiction of the Greek philosophers and principal errors of their doctrines (books XIV-XV). But no apologist before Eusebius had given so much space to the treatment, or supported the demonstrations by such a wealth of argument or with such profound erudition, the latter proven by the numerous extracts from earlier authors that Eusebius, following the ratio already used in the History, incorporated into the work. Of the *Proof*s 20 books, I-X and part of XV are preserved. In the 10 surviving books, Eusebius replies to the Jews, who accused the Christians of having distorted and corrupted their religion. He demonstrates the temporary nature of the Mosaic law, which constituted almost a moment of transition between the age of the patriarchs and Christ's coming, and how the OT prophecies were fulfilled in Christ, in his incarnation, passion and *death. Programmatically, the Preparation and the Proof are addressed respectively to the pagans and the Jews, but they also take aim at *Porphyry's treatise Against the Christians, though, adopting a procedure different from that of Origen in Contra Celsum, Eusebius does not address Porphyry's objections point by point. It is not improbable that his systematic refutation of his opponent's thesis was contained in the lost Against Porphyry.

From the last years of Eusebius's life comes the Theophany, a popular work, rhetorically constructed, in 5 books: the original text survives in fragments and the whole in a Syriac version. It gives an account of the manifestations of the Logos in the creation and preservation of the universe, in human conscience and in the incarnation, reworking much material already used in the two great apologetic works.

IV. Biblical and exegetical works. Eusebius's name is also attached to his labors on the Bible, though more as a scholar and philologist than as an exegete proper. With Pamphilus he worked on the text of the two Testaments, and also wrote popular works. Of an extensive treatise on biblical geography and topography in four parts, we possess, in the Greek text and a Latin translation by Jerome, only part IV, the famous Onomasticon or book of places mentioned in *Scripture. From the preface we can gather the subjects of the lost parts: (1) a Greek interpretation of the ethnological terms in the Hebrew Scriptures; (2) a topography of Judea; (3) a plan of Jerusalem and the temple. The work was written certainly before 331 (probably between 326 and 330), since Bishop *Paulinus of Tyre, whose suggestions Eusebius took into account, died in that year. The Evangelical Canons, dedicated to Carpianus, offer a rapid synoptic vision of the four gospels by means of ten tables, each containing a list of parallel passages. Eusebius was inspired by *Ammonius of Alexandria, who had pioneered this system in his Evangelical Concordance or Sections. The Gospel Questions and Solutions, surviving in extensive Greek and Syriac fragments, comprise two parts: the first resolving some apparent contradictions in the gospel accounts of Christ's infancy; the second explaining divergences on his *resurrection. The *catenae give us an extensive fragment of the work On Easter, which dealt with the date of its celebration and the relation between the Christian *Easter and the Jewish Passover.

In exegesis, Eusebius is indebted to Origen—a dependence that is undeniable, though it has often been exaggerated to the point of making Eusebius a slipshod and inept pillager. This conviction has been favored by the fragmentary state of the exegetical texts of both of them, and by the uncertain authenticity of the passages reproduced in the current editions under both names. Eusebius's "theoria" can briefly be summarized as follows: he distinguishes the literal sense (πρὸς λέξιν, καθ' ἱστορίαν, κατὰ τὴν πρόχειρον διάνοιαν) from the spiritual sense, which he ordinarily calls διάνοια or θεωρία: for him the former is something imperfect, while the latter is the only sense capable of perceiving the true spirit of the sacred text. While recognizing the importance and validity of literal exegesis, which is certainly more consonant with the historical narratives, he rarely claims that it exhausts the meaning of the text, while he frequently proposes the spiritual interpretation as the only one possible. His position is essentially halfway between the positions of Alexandria and Antioch, but leans more toward the former: he does not disregard the more obvious, literal, sense, but in practice prefers the spiritual sense, while avoiding exaggerations of it. Very little remains of his vast exegetical output.

Of the ponderous Commentary on the Psalms, only about a third has been saved entire (on Ps 51–95:3), fortunately handed down directly in the 10th-c. MS Coislin 44; the commentary on Ps 37 has also come down by direct tradition, confused with Basil's work (PG 30). This part is certainly genuine: it was first transcribed by Montfaucon, if not always faithfully, from the Coislinian codex, and is reproduced in PG 23. Of the rest of the work, relating to Ps 1–50 and 95:4–150, fragments of unequal length have been taken from catenae that generally inspire little confidence, such that the current editions (those of Montfaucon and Mai, PG 23 and 24, and that of Pitra, Analecta Sacra III) offer, alongside authentic material, much that is doubtfully Eusebian or downright spurious. The Commentary on the Psalms seems to have been one of Eusebius's last works, though at this point we cannot assign it an exact date. It was highly regarded in Christian antiquity for erudition and doctrine; *Hilary of Poitiers and *Eusebius of Vercelli made two Latin versions, now lost. To the catenae we also owe the recovery of numerous fragments, not all certainly authentic, of the Commentary on Isaiah. Jerome mentions it, but contradicts himself on its division into books; in the preface to his own Commentary on Isaiah he gives it 15 books, in De viris illustribus he gives it 10. He judges the work severely, though he used it in his own commentary: despite promising to give equal space to both the literal and the spiritual sense, Eusebius made excessive use of allegory. Short passages from a commentary on Luke's gospel have also been extracted from the catenae, but they seem to come from other works by Eusebius rather than from a presumed exegetical work on that gospel.

V. Dogmatic works. In theology too Eusebius depends on Origen, but takes up only certain aspects of his doctrine while neglecting others, clearly more important, such as the doctrine of the apokatastasis* and that of the Son's coeternity with and generation from the Father. In trinitarian matters, Eusebius's convictions are permeated with Arianism, though he did not accept the doctrine's more extreme theses and more than once refuted its proposition that the Son was created from nothing. But he also kept his distance from the doctrinal positions of Arius's opponents, denying the equality of the Father and the Son in dignity and honor and affirming a hierarchical (and Origenian) conception of the *Trinity, in which the Son is subordinate to the Father and the Holy Spirit is subordinate to the Son, whose creature he is. In the doctrinal field, Eusebius's activity was confined to refuting a work of unspecified title by Bishop *Marcellus of Ancyra, aimed against the leaders of the Arian party and particularly the sophist *Asterius. To this argument Eusebius dedicated his Against Marcellus in 2 books and Ecclesiastical Theology in 3 books, probably written respectively in 336 (the year of Marcellus's deposition by the Arian synod of Constantinople) and 337. Marcellus's work is lost but, thanks to Eusebius's minute refutation of it and esp. thanks to the numerous passages he cites, we can partly reconstruct its contents. Citing the Bible at every step, Eusebius rebuts Marcellus's imputations against Asterius and the charge of *Sabellianism, i.e., of following that form of *monarchianism that denied the personal subsistence of the Son, considering him a mode of manifestation of the Father.

Two of the three letters that survive entire out of Eusebius's vast correspondence are concerned with dogmatic questions: one, dedicatory, to *Flacillus of Antioch, in which Eusebius briefly relates his argument with Marcellus and presents his Ecclesiastical Theology, and the other, addressed to his diocese, on the conclusion of the Council of Nicaea. In the letter, preserved by Athanasius in his Decrees of the Council of Nicaea, Eusebius endeavors to justify his attitude to Nicaea, esp. his adherence to the ὁμοούσιος. The third complete letter, to Carpianus, deals with biblical matters and is like an introduction to the Evangelical Canons. Of other letters written before the Council of Nicaea we have only reports, as well as extracts of one sent to Constantine's sister *Constantia, whom Eusebius rebukes for asking him about an image of Christ, calling the custom of sculpting and painting the Deity idolatrous.

CPG 3465-3507; PG 19-24; GCS various volumes; SC 31, 41, 55 and 73 (Storia ecclesiastica); 206, 228, 262, 266, 215, 292 (Preparazione evangelica); G. Bardy, La Littérature Patristique des "Quaestiones et Responsiones" sur l'écriture sainte: RBi (1932) 210-236; 341-369; 515-537; F.J. Foakes-Jackson, Eusebius Pamphili. A Study of the Man and His Writings, Cambridge 1933; H. Berkhof, Die Theologie des Eusebius von Caesarea, Amsterdam 1939; Id., Kirche and Kaiser, Zürich 1947; J. Moreau, Zum Problem der V.C.: Historia 4 (1955) 234-245; D.S. Wallace-Hadrill, Eusebius of Caesarea, London 1956; J. Sirinelli, Les vues historiques d'Eusèbe de Césarée, Dakar 1961; A. Weber, Arché. Ein Beitrag zur Christologie des Eusebius von Caesarea, Rome 1964; R. Farina, La teologia di Eusebio e la "svolta di Nicea": Salesianum 27 (1965) 666-671; Id., L'impero e l'imperatore cristiano in Eusebio di Cesarea, Zürich 1966; C. Curti, Due articoli eusebiani ("Commentarii in Psalmos"), Noto 1971; G.C. Stead, Eusebius and the Council of Nicaea: JTS 24 (1973) 85-100; C. Curti, Il linguaggio relativo al Padre e ai Figlio in alcuni passi dei "Commentarii in Psalmos" di Eusebio di Cesaria: Augustinianum 13 (1973) 483-506; M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome 1975; C. Andresen, Siegreiche Kirche im Aufstieg des Christentums. Untersuchungen zu Eusebius von Caesarea and Dionysios von Alexandrien: ANRW II, 23, 1 (1979), 387-459; C. Luibhéid, Eusebius of Caesarea and the Arian Crisis, Dublin 1978; E. des Places, Eusèbe de Césarée commentateur. Platonismus et Écriture Sainte [Théol. Hist. 63], Paris 1982; M. Simonetti, Esegesi e ideologia nel Commento a Isaiah di Eusebio: RSLR 19 (1983) 3-44; C. Curti, La cronologia dei Commentarii in Psalmos di Eusebio di Cesarea: QC (= Quaderni Catanesi) 2 (1990) 53-65; F. Winkelmann, Euseb von Kaisarea. Der Vater der Kirchengeschichte, Berlin 1991; Var. aus., Eusebius, Christianity and Judaism, ed. H.W. Attridge - G. Hata, Leiden 1992; S. Calderone, Storia e teologia in Eusebio di Cesarea, in E. dal Covolo - R. Uglione (eds.), Cristianesimo e istituzioni politiche, Rome 1997, 81-94; R. Farina, La concezione della pace nel IV secolo. Costantino il Grande ed Eusebio di Cesarea: Cristianesimo e istituzioni politiche, ibid., 95-105; R.W. Burgess, Studies in Eusebian and Post Eusebian Chronography, Stuttgart 1999; J. Ulrich, Euseb von Caesarea und die Juden (PTS 49), Berlin - New York 1999; A. Strutwolf, Die Trinitätstheologie und Christologie des Euseb von Caesarea, Göttingen 1999; V. Lombino, La fede in Eusebio di Cesarea, in La fede nei Padri della Chiesa (Dizionario di Spiritualità biblico-patristica 22), Rome 1999, 210-247; A. Kofsky, Eusebius of Caesarea against Paganism [Jewish and Christian Perspectives, Series 3], Leiden 2000; S. Borzì, Sulla datazione del Contra Hieroclem di Eusebio di Cesarea. Una proposta: Salesianum 65 (2003) 158-160; A. Carriker, The Library of Eusebius of Caesarea, Leiden - Boston 2003; Eus., Commentary on Isaiah, Eng. tr. and intro. J. Armstong, ACT, Downers Grove, IL 2013.

C. Curti

EUSEBIUS of Cremona (d. after 418). Native of Cremona from a well-off family (ca. mid 4th c.); he held some public responsibilities, which he abandoned in a conversion to the monastic life under the influence of *Jerome, whom he met at *Rome. He became Jerome's disciple, following him to Palestine (392), where he was ordained priest before his return to Rome in 398. Jerome praised his character (Ep. 53,11) in a letter addressed to *Paulinus of Nola, whom Eusebius had known years earlier. Jerome dedicated to him his commentaries on Matthew and Jeremiah (414/416). In 398 Eusebius returned to Italy, going first to Rome, where he also linked up with *Pammachius. In the controversy that arose between *Rufinus and Jerome he openly sided with his master, both at Rome and in N Italy. He met Rufinus at *Milan, who accused him of having falsified his translation of *Origen's De principiis. He wrote to *Cyril of Alexandria to denounce the Pelagian *Valerian (Coll. Avellana 49: CSEL 35,1, p. 114). Eusebius died perhaps at Cremona.

CPL 1602. In the Collectio Avellana (CSEL 35, 1, 113-115, n. 49) is reproduced a letter to Cyril, attributable to Eusebius. Jerome, Ep. PL 22: 53, 10, 549; 57, 2, 569; 74, 1, 682; 143, 2, 1181; Rufinus, Apol., PL 21: I, 19, 556-557; II, 44, 620; J. Labourt, S. Jérôme, Lettres, Paris 1953, III, Appendice C, 239-241; BS V 253-254; Patrologia III, 223-224; Y.-M. Duval, Le Liber Hieronymi ad Gaudentium. Rufin d'Aquilée, Gaudence de Brescia et Eusèbe de Crémone: RBen 97 (1987) 163-186; PCBE 2, 700-703.

L. Dattrino

EUSEBIUS of Dorylaeum (d. after 451). He was a highly-placed layman (rhetor and advocate) at *Constantinople when he first publicly opposed Nestorius's statements against Mary's title of theotokos (430). In 448 we find him bishop of Dorylaeum (*Phrygia), still in the role of an accuser: this time of *Eutyches, who had given an overly monophysite emphasis to *Cyril's teaching. Eusebius contributed to the archimandrite's condemnation at the Council of Constantinople in November 448. The subsequent pro-Eutychian reaction was aimed particularly against him: he was not allowed to speak at the Council of *Ephesus of 449 and was deposed there. Imprisoned, he managed to escape and fled to *Rome. In 451 he appeared before the Council of Chalcedon, which reinstated him. We know nothing of him after this date.

CPG III, 5940-5944; ACO I, 1, etc. (see CPG); DTC 5, 1532-1537; BBKL I, 1564-1565.

M. Simonetti

EUSEBIUS of Emesa (ca. 300–before 359). Born at *Edessa ca. 300, of Syrian stock but Greek education; he was a pupil of *Eusebius of Caesarea and *Patrophilus of Scythopolis, before completing his education at *Antioch and *Alexandria. Connected with influential members of the *Eusebian party, he was offered the see of Alexandria after *Athanasius's expulsion, but turned it down. Elected bishop of *Emesa soon afterwards, he was accused of astrology and had to abandon the see. He returned through the intervention of *George of Laodicea, and died before 359. *Jerome, who considered him an *Arian (Chron. ad anno 347) but appreciated his learning (Vir. ill. 91), records many of his works, including one Against Jews, Pagans and Novatians and Homilies on the Gospels. We know of a Commentary on Galatians and a work against the *Marcionites and *Manicheans. Besides numerous exegetical fragments, we have a corpus of 29 homilies in Latin translation, almost all on doctrinal subjects: free will, the incorporeity of God and the soul, the trinitarian controversy. While fighting on the Eusebian and anti-Nicene front, his homilies avoid overly technical treatments; he often appeals to peace and concord, preaching adherence to the Scriptural data. He argues against the opposite extremes of *Sabellian and Marcellian *monarchianism and radical Arianism, following *Eusebius of Caesarea in a trinitarian presentation that stresses the Son's subsistence, his real generation from the Father and therefore his divinity, though subordinate to the supreme divinity of the Father, with whom his dynamic unity of willing and action is stressed. This conception, which attenuates the *subordinationism of Eusebius of Caesarea but preserves his main lines of thought, had great influence on *homoiousian theology. Eusebius's exegetical Hom. 11 opposes excessive *allegorism in interpreting *Scripture: without excluding it altogether, he criticizes those who use it to avoid the difficulties of the literal text. His surviving fragments display an exegesis with a strongly literalist tendency.

CPG II, 3525-3543; Quasten II 351-354; DHGE 15, 1462-1463; E.M. Buytaert, L'héritage littéraire d'Eusèbe d'Emèse, Louvain 1949; Id., Eusèbe d'Emèse, Discours conservés en latin, I-II, Louvain 1953-1957; R. Devreesse, Les anciens commentateurs grecs de l'Octateuque et des Rois (ST 201), Vatican City 1959, 55-103; Simonetti 192-197; BBKL I, 1565; R. Barend, A Syrian in Greek Dress: The Use of Greek, Hebrew and Syriac biblical texts in Eusebius of Emesa's "Commentary on Genesis," Louvain 1997.

M. Simonetti

EUSEBIUS of Heraclea (d. after 431). Bishop of Heraclea in *Bithynia, among the signers of *Nestorius's sentence of deposition in the first session of the Council of *Ephesus (431); author of a homily, surviving only in an Ethiopic version, celebrating Nestorius's deposition in veiled but sufficiently understandable terms.

CPG 6143; A. Dillmann, Chrestomathia Aethiopica, Leipzig 1866, 102-103 (new edition ed. E. Littmann, Berlin 1950; Darmstadt 1968). S. Grébaut, Traduction de la version éthiopienne d'une homélie d'Eusèbe, évêque d'Héraclée: ROC 16 (1911) 424-425; Bardenhewer IV, 200.

F. Scorza Barcellona

EUSEBIUS of Laodicea (d. 270). Deacon of the church of *Alexandria under St. *Dionysius (247–264), he distinguished himself during *Valerian's persecution (257). Since the bishop was forced to remain hidden, Eusebius helped imprisoned Christians and buried the dead, risking his life to do so (Dionysius's letter to Domitius and to Didymus: PG 10, 1293). In the course of the civil war that followed on Valerian's death (259), Emilian declared himself emperor at Alexandria, and for this was besieged in the Bruchium quarter by the general

*Theodotus (who sided with *Gallienus) was quickly reduced to hunger. Eusebius, acting with his friend Anatolius to spare the neighborhood the terrible consequences of the siege, helped many inhabitants, including many Christians, leave the area by night, providing them with shelter, food and medicine.

In 264 Eusebius took part in the Council of *Antioch (gathered against *Paul of Samosata), perhaps representing Bishop Dionysius. At the conclusion of the council the Syrian faithful acclaimed him bishop of Laodicea, a see vacant since Socrates's death. With all probability, in the immediately succeeding years he took part in two other councils against Paul of Samosata, who was finally deposed in 269. Eusebius died in 270.

Tillemont, IV, 304; AASS Iulii, I, Venice 1746, 642; E. Venably: DCB 2, 359; Eus. Caes., Historia Eccl., VII, 11, 32, ed. G. Bardy, SC 41, II, Paris 1955, 179-186, 222-231; P. Nautin, DHGE 15, 1465-1466 (expresses perplexity over Eusebius of Caesarea and hypothesizes that Eusebius of Laodicea and his successor Anatolius are confused with two unknown homonymous bishops of Laodicea); LTK[3] 3, 1010-1011 (W.A. Bienert).

M. Spinelli

EUSEBIUS of Milan (d. 462?). Bishop of *Milan, consecrated in 451, succeeding Lazarus, who died in March 451. Shortly after his election and before the Council of *Chalcedon (October 451), he celebrated, perhaps at Milan, a council of 20 bishops and two pontifical legates. During the council Leo's letter condemning *Eutyches and professing the two natures in Christ was read. Eusebius then wrote to Pope *Leo to tell him of the meeting's success and to confirm his christological orthodoxy and his adherence to the pope's letter. He rebuilt the church of S. Tecla (Ecclesia maior), destroyed by fire during *Attila's invasion (452). If *Gennadius's information is true (Vir. ill. 34; PL 58, 1078 B), Eusebius also wrote some pamphlets (De crucis Domini mysterio, et apostolorum, praecipueque Petri constantia . . .), now lost. It seems that it was this Eusebius who consecrated *Avitus, the emperor who was defeated in 457, as bishop of Piacenza. He died 8 August, perhaps in 462. Eusebius was celebrated for his charity by Ennodius of Pavia (Carm. 2,84).

CPL 1656; PL 54, 945-950, Ep. 97; DHGE 15, 1466; LTK 3, 1200; BS V 257-258; PCBE 2, 704f.

L. Dattrino

EUSEBIUS of Nicomedia (d. ca. 341). Disciple of *Lucian of Antioch. *Arius, in the letter he wrote to Eusebius from *Palestine shortly after his expulsion from *Alexandria (Theodor., HE 1, 4; Epiph., Haer. 69, 6), calls him a "co-Lucianist." Soon made bishop of Berytus (Beirut) in Phoenicia, shortly before 318 Eusebius obtained a transfer to the see of *Nicomedia, where the emperor *Licinius was residing. *Alexander of Alexandria, in the encyclical letter Henos sōmatos, reproved him thus: "Eusebius, the present bishop of Nicomedia, who, ever since he left Berytus and satisfied his greed with the church of Nicomedia without being punished for it, considers himself in charge of the church's affairs" (Socr., HE 1, 6). In fact as soon as Eusebius arrived at Nicomedia he used the protection invoked by Arius as a pretext to launch a campaign of letters against Alexander, to whom he also wrote personally. We have only his letter to *Paulinus of Tyre (H.G. Opitz, Athanasius Werke, III, 1), written ca. 321. Licinius, after a second defeat by *Constantine (ca. summer 324), fled to Nicomedia and sent Eusebius to deal with the victor. Before the Council of *Nicaea, Eusebius held a synod in *Bithynia, favorable to Arius. At the start of the Council of Nicaea, in May 325, he read an exposition of his doctrine on the Son of God, which was judged blasphemous (Athan., Decr. 3; Ambr., De fide, 3, 15; Theodor., HE 1, 6, reporting the reaction of *Eustathius of Antioch).

It seems, however, that he did subscribe the profession of Nicene faith, at least avoiding a judgment against himself in that solemn setting. Ancient historians disagree on his position, but do not mention him among those proscribed by Nicaea. His opposition to the Nicene homoousios, his collaboration with the Alexandrian Arians despite the sentence of exile passed against Arius and his followers, and finally his great familiarity with *Constantia, *Licinius's widow and *Constantine's half-sister, procured him exile some three months after the council. For the occasion, in November or December 325, Constantine sent a bitter letter to the faithful of Constantinople (Opitz, Urk. 27). Eusebius was replaced by *Amphion (Athan., Apol. 7 - Opitz 93, 18), but after three years, again thanks to Constantia, he was able to return after presenting Constantine with a written declaration of his sentiments, judged sufficiently orthodox to legitimate the act of clemency. Eusebius's rehabilitation was read during the Council of Nicaea's "second session": even today the attitude of that session remains controversial. From that moment, Eusebius used all his credit with the emperor to serve the Arian cause.

From 329, he obtained the deposition of *Eustathius of Antioch, the most virulent opponent of Arian doctrine at Nicaea (Theodor., HE 1, 20; Socr., HE 1, 24; Soz., HE 2, 19). Having gained Constantine's complete confidence, Eusebius worked for the removal of *Athanasius, *Alexander of Alexandria's young successor after 328. Arius, recalled from exile, had for his part presented a profession of faith that favored his rehabilitation. Eusebius then persuaded the emperor to ask for a similar profession from the new bishop of Alexandria. Athanasius's persistent refusal gave Eusebius the opportunity to unite a large number of Eastern bishops against Athanasius, with the emperor's consent. He also exploited to this end Athanasius's difficulties with the *Meletian schismatics. A first synod of the *Eusebians, at *Caesarea in Palestine (ca. 333), had little effect; but the Synod of *Tyre, in 335, apparently in conformity with the canonical statues of Nicaea and under the emperor's protection, decided upon Athanasius's deposition and exile to Trier. The synod celebrated in December 335, on the occasion of the dedication of the basilica of the Holy Sepulchre built by Constantine in *Jerusalem, crowned Eusebius's offensive by readmitting Arius and his followers to communion. *Marcellus of Ancyra, a Nicene from the start and friend of Athanasius, was in turn deposed by a Eusebian synod held at Constantinople. Despite the threat of another synod, Eusebius failed to cause the aged *Alexander of Constantinople to yield. He baptized the dying Constantine (d. 22 May 337) and may have been the trustee of his will (Philost., HE 2, 16).

Distantly related to the imperial family, according to *Ammianus Marcellinus (Ann. 22, 9, 4), between 339 and 342 he easily contributed to the religious education of *Julian, *Constantius II's nephew and eventual successor. In late 338 or early 339, at the start of Constantius II's reign in the Eastern part of the empire, Eusebius managed to take possession of the see of Constantinople, aided by the conflict between *Paul and *Macedonius, the two local candidates to succeed Alexander (Athan., Ap. c. ar. 6; Dagron, 427-428). In 337 or 338 he had already begun to protest, with *Theodore of Heraclea, the election of the "Nicene" Paul. In 339 he presided over a council at Antioch which once more deposed Athanasius, replacing him with *Gregory the Cappadocian. Gregory's installation, supported by the military, provoked serious riots, but Athanasius managed to escape and took refuge at Rome under the protection of Pope *Julius I, to whom Eusebius himself turned to obtain ratification of the decisions of Tyre (335) and acceptance of Gregory's election. The pope thought of calling a full council that would bring together and pacify all the litigants, but waited in vain for 18 months and had to be content with a small synod, which rehabilitated Athanasius and *Marcellus of Ancyra. Eusebius died before receiving the letter in which the pope, probably during winter 341/42, communicated his decisions to the Eastern bishops.

Before his death, Eusebius had had close contacts with the *Goths. In 341 at Constantinople he consecrated Bishop Ulfila, in order to entrust to him the semi-Roman Christian community, composed of deportees and prisoners outside the bounds of the empire. Eusebius's successor Eudoxius continued and strengthened these contacts, while also extending the influence of his see as far as Bithynia, which was removed from the civil diocese of Pontus.

H.G. Opitz, Athanasius Werke III, I, Berlin 1934, 15-17, Urkunde 8; G. Bardy, Recherches sur Lucien d'Antioche et son école, Paris 1936; A. Lichtenstein, Eusebius von Nikomedien. Versuch einer Darstellung seiner Persönlichkeit und seines Lebens, under besonderer Berücksichtigung seiner Führerschaft im arianischen Streit, Hale 1903; M. Spanneut, DHGE 15, 1466-1471; P. Nautin, Note critique sur la lettre d'Eusèbe de Nicomédie à Paulin de Tyr (Théodoret, HE I, 6, 2): VChr 17 (1963) 24-27; G. Dagron, Naissance d'une capitale. Constantinople et ses institutions de 330 à 451, Paris 1974; C. Luibheid, The Arianism of Eusebius of Nicomedia: ITQ 43 (1976) 3-23; BBKL 1, 1566-1568; LACL 248f.; M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome 1975; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search of Christian Doctrine of God, the Arian controversy 318–381, Edinburgh 1988, 27-32; O. Nordreval, The Emperor Constantine and Arius: Unity in the Church and Unity in the Empire: Studia Theologica. Scand. Journal of Theology 42 (1988) 113-150; G.C. Stead, Athanasius' Earliest Written Work: JTS 39 (1988) 76-91; S. Hagith, Ulfila's Own Conversion: HTR 89 (1996) 373-386; Storia del cristianesimo II, 639 (index).

Ch. Kannengiesser

EUSEBIUS of Samosata (ca. 310–379/380). In 361 he was already a bishop of great moral authority; a *homoian by origin, he contributed to *Meletius's election at *Antioch and then protected him against the Arianism of the emperor *Constantius. After *Julian's death (363) he took the initiative in approaching *Athanasius. A faithful ally to Meletius in exile and a spiritual father to *Basil during his priesthood, he promoted Basil's election at *Caesarea and was his best support in his policy of unity in Nicene orthodoxy; he was exiled to Thrace ca. 373. *Peter of Alexandria and *Damasus attacked him in a Refutation (CPG 2242; PG 28, 85-88), but numerous letters of Basil and *Gregory of Nazianzus (perhaps also the latter's Or. 33, 5), *Socrates, *Sozomen and *Theodoret testify in his favor. Returning to his see on *Valens's death, he played an important role in the restoration of Nicene faith and was assassinated by a fanatical Arian (BHG 2133-2135; BHO 294).

F. Halkin, Une Vie grecque d'Eusèbe de Samosate: AB (1967) 5-15; P. Devos, Le dossier syriaque de S. Eusèbe de Samosate: ibid. 195-240; Id., La vie syriaque de S. Eusèbe de Samosate: AB (1972) 360-362; R. Van Dam, Families and Friends in Late Roman Cappadocia, Philadelphia 2003.

J. Gribomont

EUSEBIUS of Thessalonica (6th-7th c.). Bishop of *Thessalonica ca. 600. According to *Photius (Bibl., 162), a certain Eusebius, "in rank a bishop, in faith orthodox," wrote a work in 10 books against an "*aphthartodocetist" monk named Andrew. *Gregory the Great wrote two letters to Eusebius, one disciplinary (in 593), the other concerning the disturbances arising from the monk Andrew's falsification of letters and texts; Eusebius is thought to have written his 10 books to refute an opusculum of Andrew's. These books are lost, but we know from *Photius, who gives a good verdict on them, that his style was clear.

G. Ladocsi

EUSEBIUS of Vercelli (d. 371). Born in *Sardinia, he went for a time to *Rome (Ambr., Ep. 63), where he was a companion of the future Pope *Liberius and probably knew *Athanasius (339–342). He remained there until his election as bishop of Vercelli (345). When *Constantius II tried to wring a condemnation of Athanasius out of the bishops convened at *Milan for the council (355), Eusebius opposed him. Exiled, he went to *Scythopolis (Palestine) (355–360), subject to the pro-Arian bishop *Patrophilus. Transferred to *Cappadocia, he was finally taken to the Thebaid. Freed by Constantius's death, he took part in the Council of *Alexandria (362). He then went to *Antioch to settle the schism among the orthodox, but failed due to the intransigence of *Lucifer of Cagliari. Back in Italy, he continued his anti-Arian activity with *Hilary of Poitiers (Y.-M. Duval, Vrais et faux problèmes concernant le retour d'exil d'Hilaire . . . : Athenaeum 48 [1970] 267-275). He died some time in 370–371. *Jerome cites his translation of *Eusebius of Caesarea's Commentary on the Psalms (Vir. ill. 96). Preserved at Vercelli is the Codex Vercellensis of the gospels, a pre-Hieronymian Latin translation perhaps by Eusebius. Recent critics reject the authenticity of the ps.-Athanasian De Trinitate. Of his letters, Ad Constantium Augustum (PL 12, 947; CCL 9, 103) and Ad presbyteros et plebem Italiae (PL 12, 947-954; CCL 9, 104-109) are considered authentic.

CPL 105ff.; PL 12, 959-968; 62, 237-286; CCL 9, 1-205, 451-419; F. Savio, Gli antichi vescovi d'Italia fino al 1300, Piemonte, Turin 1899, 412-420, 514-554; F. Lanzoni, Le origini delle diocesi d'Italia, Faenza 1927, 1031-1038; E. Crovella, S. Eusebio di Vercelli, Vercelli 1960; BS 5, 263-210; L. Dattrino, La lettera di Eusebio al clero e al popolo della sua diocesi: Lateranum n.s. 45 (1979) 60-82; M. Capellino, Spiritualità di S. Eusebio, Vercelli 1986; T. Bosco, Eusebio di Vercelli nel suo tempo pagano e cristiano, Leumann (Turin) 1995; M. Capellino (ed.), S. Eusebio di Vercelli (Documenti and osservazioni storico-teologiche), Vercelli 1996; P. Meloni, Eusebio di Vercelli "natione Sardus" vescovo, confessore, monaco: Sandalion 19 (1996) 133-159; M. Simonetti, Scritti di e attribuiti a Eusebio di Vercelli: Cassiodorus 3 (1997) 37-48; Eusebio di Vercelli e il suo tempo, ed. E. dal Covolo - R. Uglione - G.M. Vian, Rome 1997; M. Capellino (ed.), Il Rito Eusebiano, Vercelli 1999; M. Capellino (ed.), Testo evangelico del codice "Eusebiano" e della Neovolgata, Vercelli 2001; Y.-M. Duval, La place et l'importance du Concile d'Alexandrie ou de 362 dans l'"Histoire de l'Église" de Rufin d'Aquilée: REAug 47 (2001) 283-302; PCBE 2, 692-697.

L. Dattrino

EUSTATHIUS, monk (6th c.). A *Chalcedonian, he is the author of an Epistola ad Timotheum scholasticum de duabus naturis (CPG 6810; PG 861, 901-942). Otherwise unknown, Eustathius abundantly cites the works of *Severus of Antioch, accusing him of *Docetism and contradictions, and must have lived slightly later than he.

P. Allen, Eustathii Monachi Epistula de Duabus Naturis, in Diversorum Postchalcedonensium Auctorum Collectanea I, CCG 19, Turnhout - Louvain 1989, 391-474; Id., Greek Citations from Severus of Antioch in Eustathius Monachus: OLP 12 (1981) 261-264; Id.: CCG 19, 395-409; Patrologia V, 149-150.

J. Gribomont

EUSTATHIUS of Antioch (d. after 343). Native of Side (Pamphylia), he was first bishop of *Aleppo (Beroea), then of *Antioch (324). An intransigent opponent of the Arians, he played a prominent role in the Council of *Nicaea (325). He later disputed with *Eusebius of Caesarea. During the anti-Nicene reaction that began soon after the council, he was accused by a council that met at Antioch in 327 under Eusebius's presidency, condemned and deposed for reasons not doctrinal, but presumably disciplinary (immorality? abuse of power?). Exiled to Trajanopolis (*Thrace), we hear no more of him, such that he is thought to have died before *Constantine's death (337). Some fragments of a work of his against Photinus, however, which seem to be authentic, would prolong his activity up to ca. 343–345. In any event the account by *Socrates (HE IV, 14) and *Sozomen (HE VI, 13) of his anti-Arian activity at *Constantinople in 370 does not seem credible. Only a few fragments have reached us of the various anti-Arian treatises named by Jerome (Vir. ill. 85): Against the Arians, On the Soul, On Pr. 8,22, etc.

A *monarchian, but a moderate one, Eustathius distinguishes in the divine nature the prosopa of Father and Son, but considers the prosopon merely a mode of appearance or presentation of the divinity and strongly insists on the perfect unity of the Father and the Son, the Logos and wisdom of the Father. In this initial phase of the Arian controversy, he was the only one to argue against the Arians' logos/sarx Christology, derived from Alexandria, in favor of a logos/man conception that preserved the integrity of the humanity assumed by the divine Logos. The stress he puts on this concept shows Eustathius's Asiatic approach and, in fact, his christological terminology has significant points of contact with that of *Paul of Samosata, though without sharing the adoptionist excesses that led to Paul's condemnation. Eustathius's one surviving work is On the Witch of Endor (1 Sam 28), strongly polemical against *Origen, whom Eustathius accuses of having allegorized the whole of *Scripture. From all we know of him, he appears as one of the last representatives of the Asiatic tradition, some of whose tendencies would be continued by the school of Antioch: in this sense his opposition to Arianism is part of the wider context of the Asiatic reaction to the spread of Alexandrian culture in Syrian lands.

CPG II, 3350-3673; E. Klostermann, Origenes, Eustathius v. Antiochien und Gregor v. Nyssa über die Hexe von Endor (KT 83), Bonn - Berlin 1912, 16-62; M. Spanneut, Recherches sur les écrits d'Eustache d'Antioche avec une édition nouvelle des fragments, Lille 1948; Quasten II, 301-309; DHGE 16, 13-23; R.V. Sellers, Eustathius of Antioch, Cambridge 1928; Simonetti 589; Eustathius von Antiochien: BBKL I (1975) 1570; Eustathius, St. Bp. of Antioch: ODC (1997) 576; T. Fuhrer, Eustathius von Antiochien: LACL (1998) 218-219. Editions and translations: M. van Esbroeck, L'homélie d'Eustathe d'Antioche en géorgien (CPG 3394): OC 66 (1982) 189-214; J.H. Declerck, Eustathii Antiocheni, Patris Nicaeni, opera quae supersunt omnia (CCG 51), Louvain 2002. Studies: M. Spanneut, La position théologique d'Eustathe d'Antioche: JTS 5 (1954) 220-224; M. Simonetti (ed.), Origen, Eustathius, Gregory of Nyssa, La maga di Endor, Florence 1989; J.W. Trigg, Eustathius of Antioch's Attack on Origen: What Is at Issue in an Ancient Controversy?: Journal of Religion 75 (1995) 219-238.

M. Simonetti

EUSTATHIUS of Berytus (d. after 451). Sided with *Cyril and the *monophysites in the christological controversies of the first half of the 5th c. In 448 was part of a commission which, at *Tyre and Berytus (Beirut), judged *Ibas of Edessa, accused of being a partisan of *Nestorius. At the Council of *Ephesus of 449, he was against *Flavian of Constantinople and, in Cyril's name, upheld the monophysite doctrine. At the Council of *Chalcedon (451) he still upheld Cyrillian monophysitism, but tried to present it in a way not incompatible with the doctrine of the two natures, and retracted on the validity of Flavian's condemnation in 449.

DHGE 16, 23; CPG 6718; Patrologia V, 183-184.

M. Simonetti

EUSTATHIUS of Epiphania (early 5th c.).*Syrian author of a lost Chronicle. Mentioned and praised more than once by *Evagrius Scholasticus in his Historia Ecclesiastica, he is also cited by the *Suidas, by *John Malalas and in the prologue of the Slav Malalas. According to *Evagrius (HE V, 24; PG 86, 2, 2841), Eustathius's work was divided into two parts: the first went up to the Trojan War, the second—Suidas speaks only of this part and mentions a division into nine books—included events up to the 12th year of the reign of *Anastasius (502–503) and was broken off, perhaps, in its treatment of the destruction of Amida by the Persians under King Cabades. According to Evagrius (HE 3, 37; PG 86, 2, 2676) and John Malalas (PG 97, 589 C), Eustathius died without finishing the work, although the fact that he stopped without describing the events of 502–503 should not necessarily lead us to conclude that he died in that year (Th. Mommsen, Zosimus: ByzZ 12 [1903] 533). Eustathius's sources were numerous, in Evagrius's judgment (HE V, 24): among them were Charax (for fabulous history), *Zosimus and *Priscus. An inventory of the library of Patmos, compiled in 1201, mentions a MS that may have contained the Chronicle.

C. Müller, FHG IV, Paris 1851, 138-142; L. Dindorf, Historici graeci minores I, Leipzig 1870, 353-363; L. Jeep, Quellenuntersuchungen zu den griechischen Kirchenhistorikern: JKPh, 14 Suppl., Leipzig 1885, 53-178 (cf., esp., 159-161); C. Benjamin, Eustathios: PWK VI, 1 (1907) 1450-1451; W. Schmid, Geschichte: HAW 7, 2, 2, 1034; P. Maas, Eine Handschrift der Weltgeschichte des Eustathios von Epiphaneia: ByzZ 38 (1938) 350; M.E. Colonna, Gli storici bizantini dal IV secolo al XV secolo I, Naples 1956, 44-45; G. Moravcsik, Byzantinoturcica, Berlin [2]1958, I, 483; G. Garitte, Eustathe d'Epiphanie: DHGE 16, 24-26; ODB 2, 1065; P. Allen, An Early Epitomator of Josephus, Eustathius of Epiphaneia: ByzZ 81 (1988) 1-11; Evagrius Scholasticus, Storia ecclesiastica, Rome 1998.

A. Labate

EUSTATHIUS of Sebaste (ca. 300–ca. 380). Initiator of *ascetism in Asia Minor, probably born at *Caesarea in *Cappadocia. The main events of his life are known through the closing address of the Arian Council of *Constantinople (360) and from the letters of *Basil of Caesarea, in particular letters 244 and 263. The son of Bishop Eulalius (of Sebaste?), Eustathius was educated in *Egypt, where he knew *Arius when he was still at peace with the church. Back in Caesarea, he made a profession of orthodoxy and was ordained (to what is not known) before 325 by Bishop *Hermogenes. He took the lead in controversial groups and was therefore deposed more than once—the first time by his father, for wearing a habit inappropriate for a cleric (Socrates, HE 2,43). In the 340s he exercised a great social and reforming influence on *Macedonius, then a candidate for the see of Constantinople; he was also *Aetius's teacher (Basil, Ep. 130,1). *Eusebius of Nicomedia, having obtained the see of Constantinople for himself through the emperor's favor, had Eustathius's extreme asceticism denounced to the Armenian bishops at the Council of *Gangra, and then deposed him at the Council of *Antioch (340 and 341). He was made bishop of *Sebaste before 357 by the Arians: his name appears in a list of the Arian priests of Antioch (Athanasius: PG 25, 553B). This ecclesiastical promotion and the building of a model hospice drove an even more radical wing, led by a certain Aerius, to oppose Eustathius, but at the same time a group led by Basil adhered to him, accepting his ascetic tradition but bringing to it an evangelical and philosophical contribution. At the Council of Constantinople of 360 he was deposed, but in 362 returned to his see thanks to the emperor *Julian's amnesty. With Basil, Eustathius stood out for his opposition to *Eunomius, and then, at the time of the Council of *Lampsacus (364), for his adherence to the faith of Nicaea and communion with Rome.

Eustathius also inspired the ascetical and pastoral work of Basil, who founded a charitable institution at Caesarea, the Basileiad. Eustathius remained quite cold, however, toward *Meletius of Antioch, who had occupied the see of Sebaste after one of Eustathius's depositions; Meletius now intended to prove his orthodoxy (placed in doubt by Athanasius and the West) by openly proclaiming the worship of the Holy Spirit. Basil tried in vain to reach an agreement, meeting with him for two days in 362, but was himself accused of *Sabellianism by one of Eustathius's priests. After reaching an oral agreement, Eustathius retracted; Basil was attacked by Eustathius himself in 373, and two years later it was impossible to keep the breach hidden. It was then that Basil published his treatise On the Holy Spirit, whose essential nucleus was the reconstruction of his dialogue (373) with his old teacher. At the Council of Phargamos of June 373 Basil again sought to defend Eustathius (Ep. 128) and succeeded in having him sign a declaration of faith (Ep. 125; cf. 224 and 244), but Eustathius's accusations of heresy against Basil brought about a complete break in 376. After Basil's death, his friends and witnesses deliberately kept quiet about the influence of this teacher-become-enemy-and-heretic: it is precisely this influence, however, that explains the dogmatic and ascetic evolution of the great bishop of Caesarea. We possess no written works of Eustathius, but we see an echo of the groups directed by him in the Cappadocians and, probably, in ps.-Macarius. Eustathius preached an original asceticism, but was not as intransigent as some of his disciples; he attempted to link ascetical practice to the demands of the ecclesial community, including through charitable and assistance institutions such as the ptōchotropheion of Sebaste.

DHGE 16, 26-33; DSp 4, 1708-1712; J. Gribomont, Eustathe le Philosophe et les voyages du jeune Basile de Césarée: RHE (1959) 115-124; Id., S. Basile et le monachisme enthousiaste: Irénikon 53 (1980) 123-144; DHGE 16, 26-33 (Gribomont); DSp 4, 1708-1712 (Gribomont); TRE 10, 547-550; BBKL 1, 1750-1751; S. Mongelli, Eustatio de Sebaste, Basilio e lo scisma macedoniano: Nicolaus 3 (1975) 455-469; C. Frazee, Anatolian Asceticism in the Fourth Century. Eustathios of Sebastea and Basil of Caesarea: Catholic Historical Review 66 (1980) 16-33; J. de Churruca, L'anathème du Concile de Gangres contre ceux qui sous prétexte de christianisme incitent les esclaves à quitter leurs maîtres: RD 60 (1982) 261-278; N.G. Garsoïan, Nerses le Grand, Basile de Césarée et Eustathe de Sébaste: REArm 17 (1983) 145-169; M.G. Haykin, And Who Is the Spirit? Basil of Caesarea's Letters to the Church at Tarsus: VChr 41 (1987) 377-385.

J. Gribomont

EUSTOCHIUM (before 370–before 418/419). Roman noblewoman, daughter of St. *Paula, sister of *Blesilla and Paulina, sister-in-law of *Pammachius. At a very young age she formed an attachment with St. *Jerome, followed him to *Bethlehem and lived as a nun and a scholar. Many of Jerome's letters (esp. Ep. 22, the famous treatise on virginity) and some of his commentaries and translations are dedicated to her, either alone or in association with her mother. She took part in the master's scientific and literary activity. *Palladius mentions her in his Historia Lausiaca, 41.

DHGE 16, 43-45; P. Antin, DSp IV, 1715-1718; BS 5, 302-304; G. Del Ton, S. Paola, Milan 1950, passim; J.N.D. Kelly, Jerome, London 1975, passim; St. Rebenich, Hieronymus und sein Kreis, Salzburg 1992; Ch. Krumeich, Hieronymus und die christlichen feminae clarissimae, Bonn 1993; L. Mirri, La dolcezza nella lotta: donne e ascesi secondo Girolamo, Bose 1996; P. Laurence, Jérôme et le nouveau modèle féminin: la conversion à la "vie parfaite," Paris 1997; PCBE 2, 713-718.

J. Gribomont

EUSTORGIUS of Milan (4th c.). Bishop of *Milan from 343 to ca. 350. Two ancient documents mention him: a poem written in his praise, perhaps dating to the 6th or 7th c., and his legend, probably attributable to Landulf (11th c.). Eustorgius is mentioned by *Athanasius, who numbers him among the most illustrious Catholic bishops (Ep. Aeg. Lyb. 8), and by *Ambrose, who calls him a confessor (C. Aux. 18).

F. Savio, Gli antichi vescovi d'Italia dalle origini al 1300 descritti per regioni. La Lombardia, I, Milan - Florence 1913, 108-114, 718-720; P. Church, s.v. Eustorgio, in Il grande libro dei Santi, ed. C. Leonardi - A. Riccardi - G. Zarri, Cinisello Balsamo 1998, I 640-641; PCBE 2,719.

S. Zincone

EUSTRATIUS of Constantinople (6th c.). Author of an encomium of *Eutychius of Constantinople (d. 582; BHG 657), of a revision of the life of St. Golinduch (BHG 700-702b) and of a treatise De statu animarum post mortem, which is particularly interesting for the problem it treats and its abundance of patristic citations. Of his De anima et angelis, only fragments remain.

CPG 7520-7523; DSp 4, 1718-1719; P. Peeters, Sainte Golindouch, martyre perse . . . : AB 62 (1944) 74-125; H.-G. Beck, Kirche and theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich, Munich 1959, 410-411; PG 86, 2273-2390; A. Papadopoulos-Kerameus, Analekta hierosolymitikēs stachyologias, ē, Syllogē anekdotōn kai spaniōn hellēnikōn syngraphōn peri tōn kata tēn Heōan orthodoxōn ekklēsiōn kai malista tēs tōn Palaistinōn, 5. vols., Brussels 1963, 4, 149-174; 5, 392,396; L. Allacci, De utriusque Ecclesiae occidentalis atque orientalis perpetua in dogmate de purgatorio consensione, Rome 1655, 319-580 [partial ed.]; Av. Cameron, Eustratius's Life of the Patriarch Eutychius and the Fifth Ecumenical Council, in Kathegetria: Essays Presented to Joan Hussey for Her 80th Birthday, ed. J. Chrysostomides, Camberley, Eng. 1988, 225-247; C. Laga, Eustratii presbyteri Vita Eutychii patriarchae Constantinopolitani (CCG 25), Turnhout - Louvain 1992; N. Constas, An Apology for the Cult of Saints in Late Antiquity: Eustratius Presbyter of Constantinople, On the State of Souls After Death (CPG 7522): JECS 10 (2002) 267-285.

S.J. Voicu

EUTHALIUS (4th c.?). Editor of a considerable part of the NT books (Acts of the Apostles, Catholic epistles, the Pauline corpus), presenting the text στιχηδόν, in phrases aligned by cola and commata and with a division into chapters (κεφάλαια) and shorter subdivisions (μερικαὶ ὑποδιαιρέσεις) indicating the beginning and end of liturgical pericopes (ἀναγνώσεις). Nothing certain is known of Euthalius's life, times and work.

His recensio of the NT is attested in particular by codex H, unfortunately incomplete and dismembered, of the letters of St. Paul (Coislinianus 202, 6th c.). It was thought that the στιχηδόν recensio of the Acts of the Apostles was the work of *Pamphilus of Caesarea, *Eusebius's illustrious friend, among whose works it was published (PG 10, 1549-1557). But it is certain that Acts, the Catholic epistles and the Pauline corpus show the work of a single editor, who began with the recensio of the Pauline epistles and then took on Acts and the Catholic epistles (PG 85, 629). Euthalius was neither the first nor the last to undertake such a work. Eusebius had done something similar for the gospels, and Euthalius himself, in the preface to the Pauline corpus, claims to imitate a "very wise follower of Christ" who had done something similar before him (PG 85, 708 A). Euthalius's date is much discussed; 4th c. is most probable (J.-A. Robinson, Euthaliana, Cambridge 1895, 28ff.). It is difficult to accept the hypothesis that he lived in the 7th c., perhaps at *Antioch, where he made his edition of St. Paul's letters (H. von Soden, Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments, I, 1, Berlin 1902, 608f.) and, after being exiled to *Sardinia, was made bishop of Sulci. There is no way to ascertain whether, as the codices attest, Euthalius was a deacon (Egyptian or Syrian?) and then bishop of Sulci (or Sulca?, the codices call him ἐπίσκοπος Σούλκης), or whether these facts are just the hypotheses of late copyists.

CPG 3640-3642; PG 10, 1549-1558; PG 85, 628-789; A. Vardanian, Euthalius' Werke. Untersuchungen und Texte (Kritische Ausgabe der altarmenischen Schriftsteller und Übersetzungen 3,1), Vienna 1930; G. Bardy, DBS 2, 1215-1218; L.C. Willard, A Critical Study of the Euthalian Apparatus (Dissert. Yale Univ., 1970), Ann Arbor, MI 1971; S.P. Brock, The Syriac Euthalian Material and the Philoxenian Version of the NT: ZNTW 70 (1978) 120-130; J.N. Birdsall, The Euthalian Material and Its Georgian Versions: OC 68 (1984) 170-195; M.G. Bianco, LTK³ 3, 1018-1019; BBKL 14, 962-964.

M.G. Bianco

EUTHALIUS of Sulci. Known only from his confession of trinitarian and christological faith, in which he accepts the five ecumenical councils and the synod of *Rome under *Martin I (648), and rejects the homologia composed by John, exceptor of the duchy, against Maximus of holy memory (i.e., *Maximus the Confessor [d. 662]), which he acknowledges to have imprudently subscribed in the past. It is chronologically impossible to identify this bishop of Sulci in *Sardinia with the deacon *Euthalius, editor of sacred texts (A. Boscolo, La Sardegna bizantina e altogiudicale, Sassari 1978, 52-53).

CPG 7742; H. von Soden, Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments, 1, 1, Göttingen ²1911, 637-682; EI 14, 651.

D. Stiernon

EUTHERIUS of Tyana (5th c.). Bishop of *Tyana, metropolitan of Cappadocia II, and throughout his life an ardent supporter of *Nestorius. Before the start of the Council of *Ephesus, *John of Antioch denounced *Cyril of Alexandria's anathemata to him as *Apollinarist (PG 83, 1311; see also ACO I,4, 147, lines 20-23), which led him to take a position he would never reconsider or alter. At Ephesus, he at first subscribed the report of Nestorius and those with him, who had written the emperor *Theodosius II regarding Cyril's (unilateral) open meeting, held without the consent of the imperial commissary (ACO I,1,5, 13-15; ACO I,4, 30-31); he then took part in the anticouncil held by John of Antioch, subscribing this also (ACO I,1,5, 124; ACO I,4, 38). This brought his condemnation by the Cyrillian meeting (ACO I,1,3, 13,25, 26, 31), a condemnation that was never revoked, despite the good offices of *Paul of Emesa (ACO I,1,4, 32; I,1,7, 164). When the two opposing fronts did everything they could to bring about a rapprochement, he declared himself permanently opposed to any attempt at agreement that did not involve the prior condemnation of Cyril's anathemata and the rehabilitation of Nestorius. His position hardened to the point of provoking his separation, once peace had been reached, from John of Antioch and the other Easterners who had agreed, regarding them all as traitors. He was finally deposed by *Maximian, Nestorius's successor at Constantinople, and by the endemousa Synod (ACO I,1,7, 153,29, ibid.; 154,16). Exiled from *Scythopolis, he fled to *Tyre, where he died at an unspecified date.

Just as with all our information about him, his surviving writings are also inextricably tied up with the *christological question that troubled the East in the first half of the 5th c. The Synodicon of the deacon *Rusticus preserves five of his letters, addressed to John of Antioch, Elladius of Tarsus, *Alexander of Hieropolis, *Theodoret of Cyrrhus and Pope *Sixtus III, all regarding the peace to be concluded or that was concluded with Cyril, written probably between 432 and 433 (PG 84, 681-685; 726-731; 815-826; ACO, I,4, 109-112; 144-148). Also attributable to him is another work that refutes some Cyrillian expressions, written apparently after the Council of Ephesus and under the impression of those events—the Confutationes quarundam propositionum, preserved under *Athanasius's name and under that of Theodoret of Cyrrhus (PG 28, 1337-1394). In his monograph on the bishop of Tyana, Ficker published another fragment of particular interest in which, before Theodoret, eucharistic *dyophysitism is distinctly expressed (P. Batiffol).

CPG III (1979) 197-198, nn. 6147-6153; PG 28, 1337-1395; PG 84, 727-731; ACO I, 4, 109-111; 145-148; 213-221; ACO IV,3,1, 230; J.L. Schultze - J.A. Nosselt, Beati Theodoreti episcopi Cyri opera omnia, Leipzig 1774, 1113-1174; G. Ficker, Eutherius von Tyana. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des ephesenischen Konzils, Leipzig 1908; P. Batiffol, Nouvelles études documentaires sur la sainte eucharistie: Revue du clergé français (1 déc. 1908) 531-534; G. Bareille, Eucharistie d'après les Pères, DTC V (1924), cols.1165-1166; J. Lebon, Severi Antiocheni Liber contra impium grammaticum, CSCO 94, Louvain ²1952, 207; M. Tetz, Eine Antilogie des Eutherios von Tyana, Berlin 1964; A. Van Roey, Euthérius de Tyane, DHGE 16 (1967) 50-51; Hfl-Lecl II, 369-461; Fliche-Martin IV, 24-248; LTK² 3, 1208-1209; Ch. Fraisse-Coué, Il dibattito teologico nell'età di Teodosio II: Nestorio, in Storia del cristianesimo 2, 500-518; Id., Da Efeso a Calcedonia: "La Pace Illusoria" (433-451), in Storia del cristianesimo 3, 40-43.

E. Zocca

EUTHYMIAN HISTORY, Greek legend (6th c.). An etiological legend that takes its name from the unknown monk Euthymius, inserted in *John of Damascus's 2nd Homily on the Assumption. The empress *Pulcheria asks *Juvenal, patriarch of *Jerusalem, for the body of Mary for the new church of Blacherne in Constantinople. Juvenal, based on *Dionysius the Areopagite's testimony, says that Mary's body is not in her tomb on Gethsemane, and sends Mary's garments to the capital, which are then deposited in the church of Blacherne. The text is the earliest testimony regarding Mary's tomb on Gethsemane.

CANT 104; BHG 1056e; SC 80, 1961, 168-175; B. Kotter, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos, 5, Berlin 1988, 504f. (Gr. text); M. van Esbroeck: Parole de l'Orient 6-7 (1995) 479-491 (Arabic text); the Georgian text is not yet published.; tr.: It. Erbetta 1/2, 526-528; Pol., Starowieyski 832-834; S. Mimouni, Dormition et l'Assomption de la Vierge, Paris 1995, 552-584.

M. Starowieyski

EUTHYMIUS the Great, saint (377–473). His mother, a widow and deaconess, offered him at the age of three to Bishop Otreius of Melitene, who immediately baptized him and made him a lector. Priest and prior of some monks at age 19, in 405 he went to the laura of Pharan near *Jerusalem, founded by St. *Charito; at first he spent each Lent in solitude, then he retired to a cave where, ca. 428, his disciples built the laura that bears his name. His prestige spread throughout Palestinian monasticism; he converted some Arab nomads and led the empress *Eudoxia back to Chalcedonian orthodoxy. *Cyril of Scythopolis wrote his biography (ed. E. Schwartz, TU 49, 2, Leipzig 1962; tr. A.J. Festugière, Les moines d'Orient, III, 1, Paris 1962). Feast 20 January.

DSp 4, 1720-1722; D.J. Chitty, The Desert a City, Oxford 1966; L. Perrone, La Chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980; B. Flusin, Miracle et histoire dans l'oeuvre de Cyrille de Scythopolis, Paris 1983; BBKL 14, 964-966; Patrologia V, 291-293; D. Hombergen, The Second Origenist Controversy: A New Perspective on Cyril of Scythopolis' Monastic Biographies as Historical Sources for Sixth-Century Origenism, Rome 2001, passim.

J. Gribomont

EUTROPIUS of Orange (d. ca. 494). Born at *Marseille, he was bishop of Orange from ca. 463 until his death (after 475, perhaps in 494). According to the biography written by *Verus, a 6th-c. successor of his, Eutropius was converted by his wife and, left a widower, was taken on as a deacon by *Eustathius, bishop of Marseille. After becoming bishop of Orange he continued his life of prayer and mortification, worked various miracles and took part in various regional synods (*Arles in 463 and 475). He corresponded with Pope *Hilarus (Jaffé I, 557) and *Sidonius Apollinaris (Ep. VI,6), and was a friend of *Faustus of Riez. He was buried in the church of St. Julian; part of his epitaph was found in 1801. Feast 27 May.

BHL 2782; AASS (1688) Mai, VI, 693-694; Duchesne, Fastes I (1907) 265; Vies des SS. 5 (1947) 529-531; Cath 4 (1956) 733; E. Griffe, Gaule, II (1966) 205-207; BS 5 (1964) 345; DHGE 16 (1967) 82-83; DBF 13 (1975) 281-282; LTK³ 3, 1023.

M. Maritano

EUTROPIUS of Saintes (3rd c.?). Honored as the first bishop of Saintes (perhaps 3rd c.) and as a martyr (from the mark of an axe blow on his skull). *Venantius Fortunatus (Carm. I,13)—who does not call him a martyr—reports that the basilica built in his honor over his tomb was restored by Bishop *Leontius of *Bordeaux. *Gregory of *Tours (In gloria mart. 56) says that he was sent to *Gaul by Pope Clement, and after spreading Christianity with his preaching, was beheaded; these statements have no historical foundation, however. Feast 30 April.

BHL 2784-2788; AASS (1675) Aprilis, III, 733-736; L. Audiat, S. Eutrope, premier évêque de Saintes dans l'histoire, la légende et l'archéologie, Paris 1887; Vies des SS. 4 (1946) 745-747; Cath 4 (1956) 733-734; BS 5 (1964) 345-347; DHGE 16 (1967) 83-84; LTK³ 3, 1023.

M. Maritano

EUTROPIUS of Valencia (6th c.). In the late 6th c. this Spanish bishop wrote a short treatise in epistolary style, De octo vitiis, in which he presents the (by then standard) eight capital sins as connected with one another as cause and effect, such that the struggle against one is effective against all the others as well. In another letter, De districtione monachorum et ruina monasteriorum, he insists on the need for strong discipline in monasteries and shows the defects and weaknesses that were already threatening the purity of monastic life.

CPL 1095-1096; Díaz 38; PL 80, 9-20; DHGE 16, 84-86; M.C. Díaz y Díaz, Anedocta Wisigothica, I, Salamanca 1958, 20-35; A. Robles Sierra, Eutropio de Valencia, su figura y su doctrina: Teología espiritual 21 (1977) 302-322; Patrologia IV, 69-70.

M. Simonetti

EUTROPIUS the Eunuch (d. after 399). Of Persian origin, after being freed from slavery he became part of the imperial palace at *Constantinople, where in 393 he attained a position of the highest rank. In 395, when *Theodosius died leaving the Eastern Empire to his son *Arcadius, who was still a child, he assumed command with *Rufinus. Anxious to increase his power, Eutropius convinced the young emperor Arcadius to marry *Eudoxia instead of Rufinus's daughter, and after Rufinus had been killed (thanks partly to Eutropius's collaboration with *Stilicho), wanting to pursue Theodosius's earlier probarbarian policy, between 395 and 396 he conceded to *Alaric the title of magister militum per Illyricum, making him an ally. But in 399, following Gothic revolt, he fell into disgrace and was soon imprisoned and condemned to death, as two dramatic speeches of *John Chrysostom testify (Homiliae in Eutropium, PG 52, 391-414).

CPG 4392, 4528; Claudian, In Eutropium, ed. Fargues, Paris 1933; PLRE II, 440-442.

P. Marone

EUTROPIUS the Presbyter (4th-5th c.). Late 4th- or early 5th-c. writer, probably from the NE Iberian peninsula, although often thought to be from Aquitaine. According to *Gennadius (Vir. ill. 49), Eutropius wrote two epistolary treatises to console two sisters whose father had deprived them of their inheritance for having professed religious life. Scholars have identified the letters with those De contemnenda haereditate and De vera circumcisione, which have reached us under various names, including ps.-Jerome. He also wrote a letter "On the perfect man," and the important work De similitudine carnis peccati, initially attributed to *Pacian of Barcelona. His good literary and theological training is clear in these works, whose authorship has recently been definitively established.

CPL 565-567; PL 30, 45-50, 188, 210; 57, 933-958; PLS I, 529-556; J. Madoz, Herencia literaria del presbítero Eutropio: EstEcl 16 (1942) 27-54; F. Cavallera, L'héritage littéraire et spirituel du prêtre Eutrope: RAM 24 (1948) 60-71; P. Courcelle, Un nouveau traité d'Eutrope, prêtre aquitain vers l'an 400: REA 76 (1954) 377-390; H.S. Eymann, Eutropius Presbyter und sein Traktat "De similitudine carnis peccati," Frankfurt 1985; U. Dominguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, II, Madrid 1998, 72-74.

M. Díaz y Díaz

EUTYCHES (ca. 378–454). Having become a monk near *Constantinople very early—in 448 he claimed to have led a monastic life for 70 years (ACO II, 2, 1, 34; II, 4, 144)—he was ordained priest and elected archimandrite of a large monastery. He was a friend of *Cyril of Alexandria and those connected with him (Mansi 6, 628.631.713), of his successor Dioscorus (from 444), and especially of *Theodosius II's powerful eunuch Chrysaphius, for which Eutyches was highly esteemed and influential in both ecclesiastical and political circles. Intending to combat the *Nestorians, he likened them to the upholders of the two natures in Christ: the sources consider Eutyches ill-educated and imprudent. On 8 November 448 *Eusebius of Dorylaeum accused him before *Flavian, patriarch of Constantinople. Invited to defend himself, Eutyches appeared only at the third request and was condemned in the permanent synod on 22 November. He then wrote to Pope *Leo and other important bishops, and had the support of Chrysaphius and indirectly of Theodosius II, with the result that he was restored during the so-called latrocinium of *Ephesus of 449. With the death of his two political protectors (450) Eutyches also lost ground, and his doctrine was condemned by the Council of *Chalcedon of 451. He was exiled, and was still alive in 454 (Leo Gt., Ep. 134: PL 54, 1095). For doctrinal events and his theology, see *monophysitism.

CPG 6937-6940. DTC 5,1582-1609; DHGE 16, 86-91; TRE 10, 558-565. E. Schwarz, Der Prozess des Eutyches, Munich 1929; R. Draguet, La Christologie d'Euthyches d'après les actes du synode de Flavien: Byzantium 6 (1931) 441-457; B. Lemmi, Leone ed Eutiche: Angelicum 29 (1952) 3-42; CGG I, 229-242; II, 197-222, 224-228; G. Grillmeier, Gesù Cristo nella fede della Chiesa, Brescia 1982, I, 929-944; II,1, 1996, passim; G. May, Das Lehrnerfahren gegen Eutyches in November des Jahre 448: AHC 21 (1989) 1-61.

A. Di Berardino

EUTYCHIANUS, pope (275–283). Succeeded *Felix I. The LP calls him a native of Luni, an Etruscan city near the mouth of the Magra river from which the surrounding region of Lunigiana gets its name. The same source attributes to Eutychianus the ordination of 40 priests and five deacons and the consecration of nine bishops; he also buried 342 martyrs and instituted a special blessing of broad beans and of grapes (LP I, 159-160). He does not appear to have been martyred. According to the Liberian catalog he died 7 December, while in the Depositio episcoporum* his dies natalis (*birthday) is 8 December. He was buried in the Crypt of the Popes of the cemetery of S. Callisto; his epitaph was found in the 19th century by G.B. De Rossi.

Eus., HE VII, 32, 1; LP I, 6-7, 10, 70-71 and 159-160; III, 75; F. Podestà, S. Eutichiano papa, Florence 1916; G. Sforza, La patria di papa Eutichiano: Atti della Reale Accademia delle Scienze di Torino 55 (1920) 539-548; BS V, 317-319 (A. Amore); C. Bonfigli, Il primo papa ligure: Bollettino Ecclesiastico di La Spezia 45 (1975) 212-219; M. Guarducci, Epigrafia greca IV, Epigrafi sacre pagane e cristiane, Rome 1978, 547-549; LTK[3] 3, 1024 (G. Schwaiger); EPapi I, 298-300 (G.M. Vian).

M. Spinelli

EUTYCHIUS of Constantinople (ca. 512–582), patriarch, saint. Born at Theium (*Phrygia) ca. 512, Eutychius was hieromonachos and archimandrite (catholicos) at *Amasea, whose bishop sent him to *Constantinople in 552 as his representative at the proposed council. There *Justinian designated him to succeed the patriarch *Menas (d. 21 August 552); as patriarch, he presided over the sessions and subscribed the acts of the fifth ecumenical council (Constantinople II, May-June 553), Pope *Vigilius being present on the Bosporus. Deposed by *Justinian (late January 565), whose *aphthartodocetism he had criticized, he retired in exile to his old monastery at Amasea. After the death of Patriarch *John III he was restored by *Justin II (3 October 577). He died 5-6 April, after repudiating his earlier opinion on the incorruptibility of risen bodies, which had opposed him to the deacon Gregory (future Pope *Gregory I), then papal *apocrisiarius at Constantinople. We have the text of his libellus to Pope Vigilius (6 January 553) on communion of faith with the apostolic see and on the need to resolve in council the issue of the *Three Chapters; also a homily on the *Eucharist and an Armenian version of a treatise De differentia naturae et hypostaseos. His is the earliest preserved seal of a patriarch of Constantinople. His Life was written by a disciple, the presbyter *Eustratius, between 582 and 602. The Byzantine Synaxaria commemorate him 6 or 20 April.

PG 86, 2392-2405, 2273-2390; ACO IV, 1 passim; Grumel, Regestes I, 244-249, 260-263; P. Anannian, L'opuscolo di Eutichio, patriarca di Costantinopoli sulla "Distinzione della natura e della persona": Armeniaca. Mélanges d'études arméniennes, Venice 1969, 316-382 (with It. tr.); V. Laurent, Le corpus des sceaux de l'empire byzantin, V, 1, Paris 1963, 3n, n. 1; BHG 657; CPG 6937-6940; BS 5, 323-324; DHGE 16, 94-95; CE 5, 643; L. Magi, La Sede Romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e patriarchi bizantini (VI-VII sec.), Rome - Louvain 1972, 148-160; RGG4 2, 1687; Patrologia V, 47, 84-85, 88-90, 95, 97, 672-673; P. Van den Ven, L'accession de Jean le Scholastique: Byzantion 35 (1965) 320-352; S.S. Arevshatyan, Le "Livre des êtres" et la question de l'appartenence de deux lettres dogmatiques anciennes: REArm 18 (1984) 23-32; Grillmeier 2/2, 10-11, 440, 442, 469-472, 474, 490-492; C. Laga (ed.), Eustratii presbyteri vita Eutychii patriarchae constantinopolitani (CCSG 25), Turnhout - Louvain 1992.

D. Stiernon

EUTYCHIUS of Eleutheropolis (d. after 365). This bishop of *Palestine during the 360s was the main supporter of *Acacius in the controversy against *Cyril of Jerusalem. There had long been a rivalry of influence between *Jerusalem and Caesarea, cloaked at this period in a doctrinal difference: against Cyril, a supporter of the homoiousios, Acacius rejected any use of the word ousia* and recommended calling the Son homoios with the Father. At the Council of *Seleucia of 359, Eutychius subscribed the profession of faith proposed by Acacius and was condemned with him by the *homoiousians, who had a majority at the council. But the next year Acacius and Eutychius went to the emperor Constantius at Constantinople where, on the occasion of the dedication of the church of Hagia Sophia, a new council was held which condemned the homoiousians. After Constantius's death, when the Nicene homoousios triumphed under his successor *Jovian, Acacius and Eutychius accepted it at the Council of Antioch of 363, though specifying that they meant it in the sense that the Son was homoios with the Father in everything (Socr., HE III, 25).

DHGE 16, 95-97; H. Horst, Eutychios und die Kirchengeschichte – Das Erste Konzil von Nikaia (325): OC 74 (1901) 52-167.

P. Nautin

EUZOIUS of Antioch (d. ca. 375). Deacon of *Alexandria, very attached to *Arius though quite a bit younger than he was, Euzoius was with him throughout the entire first phase of the controversy. Exiled with Arius following the Council of *Nicaea, he was later recalled, and with Arius wrote a profession of faith to *Constantine, following which he was rehabilitated at the Council of *Jerusalem (335). He long outlived his teacher: in 359 he took part in the Council of *Seleucia, siding with the pro-Arian group. In 360 he was elected bishop of *Antioch to replace the deposed *Meletius, and from then on was the leader, with *Eudoxius, of the moderate Arians. In 361 he baptized the emperor *Constantius at the point of death. In 362 he held a small council of pro-Arian bishops at Antioch to reinstate *Aetius, but he and Eudoxius finally broke with the radical Arians. He remained bishop of the Arian community of Antioch until his death (ca. 375).

DHGE 16, 98-101; Simonetti 589; G. Fernández, Algunos problemas en torno al obisbo Euzoio de Antioquía: Espacio, Tiemp y Forma 13 (2002) 321-323.

M. Simonetti

EUZOIUS of Caesarea (d. 381). A moderate Arian, elected bishop of *Caesarea in Palestine in place of *Gelasius, who ca. 370 was exiled as a result of *Valens's pro-Arian policy. After *Acacius, Euzoius worked to reorganize and restore *Origen's old library. *Jerome (Vir. ill. 113) mentions various works of Euzoius (all lost), but gives no titles.

Quasten II, 351; DCB 2, 418; Fedalto 2, 1015; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IVe siècle (328–373), Rome 1996, passim.

M. Simonetti

EVAGRIUS, monk (4th-5th c.). Native of S *Gaul, known through *Gennadius (Vir. ill. 51 [50]). Ceillier proposes to identify him with the disciple of *Martin of Tours who, according to *Sulpicius Severus, retired to solitude (Dial. 3, 1; 4, 2, 8). The identification is likely, though disputed by Harnack. He wrote ca. 430 the Altercatio legis inter Simonem Iudaeum et Theophilum Christianum, a kind of dialogue intended to harmonize OT monotheism with trinitarian and christological doctrine. *Tertullian uses it (Adversus Iudaeos), as does *Cyprian, in particular in the Testimonia (Ad Quirinum). The dialogue has points of contact with *Gregory of Elvira's Tractatus Origenis.

CPL 482; PL 20, 1165-1172; TU 1, 3 (1883) 1-136; CSEL 45 (1904) 1-54; CCL 64, 255-302; A.L. Williams, Adv. Iudaeos. A Bird's Eye View of Christian Apologia until the Renaissance, Cambridge 1935; E. Schulz-Flügel, Gregorius Eliberitanus, Freiburg 1994, 256-302.

A. Hamman

EVAGRIUS of Antioch (ca. 320 – ca. 394). A noble Antiochene (it seems of a Latin military family), perhaps a friend of *Libanius (the identity is uncertain), he married and followed an official career until 362, when he followed *Eusebius of Vercelli on his return to Italy after exile. He translated the Life of Anthony, a text of Athanasian propaganda (CPG 2101). Friendly with the emperor *Valentinian, he was able to help *Damasus in his difficulties; he protected the young *Jerome, taking him to *Antioch and visiting St. *Basil at Caesarea on the way (Basil, Ep. 156). He adhered to *Paulinus's "little church," favored by Rome; he introduced Jerome to *Chalcidian monastic circles, but made him accept priesthood in Paulinus's service; he defended Paulinus's cause (and that of *Maximus the Cynic?) at the Council of *Aquileia of 381. He allowed the dying Paulinus to lay hands on him and thus became his successor, but on his death the dissident community joined *Flavian's orthodox church. Evagrius is a fine example of a Latin-minded Easterner, important for understanding Jerome.

F. Cavallera, Le schisme d'Antioche (IVe-Ve s.), Paris 1905; DHGE 16, 102-107.

J. Gribomont

EVAGRIUS of Constantinople (4th c.). Elected bishop of *Constantinople (370) by a college of Nicene bishops, but the emperor *Valens, who had approved the Arian *Demophilus, did not recognize him and exiled him to *Egypt, where he died before Valens (378). Baronius introduced his name into the Mart. rom. (6 March).

DHGE 16, 107; CE 5, 645.

D. Stiernon

EVAGRIUS of Epiphania (Scholasticus) (d. after 594). 6th-c. ecclesiastical historian (born at Epiphania in *Syria, ca. 527 [Epiphaneia, on the Orontes]; died at *Antioch, post-594), author of a Historia ecclesiastica in 6 books and other lost works (discourses, dialogues, letters). After studying law at *Constantinople, he returned to Antioch, where he practiced law (hence his name Scholasticus) and held various public offices, including the honorific position of exconsulate of the emperor Maurice (582–602); he was Patriarch *Gregory's (570–593) legal advisor. In this capacity he accompanied Gregory to Constantinople in 588 and defended him before the imperial tribunal and the synod against accusations by the comes Orientis, Asterius (HE VI, 7). After Gregory's death (593 or 594) he retired to private life and wrote his history. The work, conceived as a continuation of the Histories of *Socrates, *Sozomen and *Theodoret, encompasses the period 431–594 and ends with Patriarch Gregory's death, in the twelfth year of the emperor Maurice (August 593 – August 594). Without neglecting political and civil history, Evagrius is most interested in dogmatic questions, and his work is our most important source for the history of the 5th-6th-c. *Nestorian and *monophysite controversies. An impartial and reliable historian, Evagrius has good critical judgment (despite his credulity in the marvelous and miraculous) and uses good sources (Agathias, *Procopius, John of Epiphania, *John Malalas, *Zacharias Scholasticus), in many cases eyewitness accounts. His rigorous orthodoxy does not lead him, as often happened at that time, to summary and superficial condemnations, just as his Christianity does not prevent him admiring Hellenism. His literary model is Thucydides, whose language and style he imitates, giving his work, as *Photius observed, a not ungraceful Atticizing tendency (Bibl., cod. 29).

CPG III 7500; PG 86/2,2405-2906 (= ed. by Valesius, 1673, revised by W. Reading, 1713); Critical ed. by J. Bidez - L. Parmentier, The Ecclesiastical History of Evagrius with the Scholia, London 1898 (Amsterdam ²1964); Evagrius, Histoire ecclésiastique, ed. A.J. Festugière, Byzantion 45 (1976) 188-471 (Fr. tr.); It. tr. ed. F. Carcione, Storia ecclesiastica, Rome 1998; Eng. tr.: W. Whitby, The Ecclesiastical History of Evagrius Scholasticus, Liverpool 2000. K. Krumbacher, Geschichte der byzantinischen Literatur, Munich ²1897, 245-247; W. Gass - G. Krüger: PWK V, 649-650;

O. Bardenhewer, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur, V, Freiburg i. Br. 1932, 119-121; Gy. Moravcsik, Byzantinoturcica, I, Berlin ²1958, 257-259; DHGE 16, 1495-1498; G.F. Chesnut, The First Christian Histories. Eusebius, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, and Evagrius, Théol. Hist. 46, Paris 1977; P. Allen, Evagrius Scholasticus the Church Historian, Spicilegium Sacrum Lovaniense 41, Louvain 1981; V.A. Caires, Evagrius Scholasticus, A Literary Analysis: ByzF 8 (1982) 29-50; E. Dovere, La Storia di Evagrio Scolastico per la storia del diritto romano: SDHI 58 (1992) 376-385; I.V. Krivushin, La révolte de Monocarton vue par Évagre, Théophylacte Simocatta et Théophane: Byzantion 63 (1993) 154-172; E. Dovere, Tracce di prassi costituzionale nella narratio storiografica di Evagrio: SDHI 61 (1995) 531-556; Patrologia V, 227-228; L.M. Whitby, Evagrius on Patriarchs and Emperors, in The Propaganda of Power: The Role of Panegyric in Late Antiquity, ed. M. Whitby, Leiden 1998, 321-344.

S. Leanza

EVAGRIUS of Pontus (ca. 345–399). Born at Ibora in *Pontus, he joined St. *Basil and was ordained lector, but preferred the philosophy of *Gregory of Nazianzus, whose deacon he was. Soon after Gregory's retirement, he took refuge at *Jerusalem with Melania, even more of a "mystic." Around 383 he settled in the desert of *Nitria and two years later at Cellae (Kellia), in friendship with the two Macarii, Ammonius and other Origenians. The esteem of Patriarch *Theophilus, who supported him, turned to hostility some months after Evagrius's death. Already controversial during his lifetime, as his esoteric prudence demonstrates, in 553 Evagrius was condemned in the context of the second Origenist controversy for some speculations that, though referring primarily to spiritual reality, were understood as ontological assertions. The main points were the preexistence of souls before the creation of the material world (with certain implications for the relation between the eternal Logos and the incarnate Christ) and that of the apokatastasis, i.e., a universal restoration, including Satan, at the end of time. The condemnation in 553 was probably pronounced by a synod at *Constantinople, called by *Justinian shortly before the great ecumenical council (Constantinople II), when its participants had already gathered at the capital.

At that time much of Evagrius's writings in the original Greek disappeared; they are preserved primarily in Syriac and Armenian versions (in some cases retouched). The best parts of his spiritual doctrine, however, profoundly influenced *Rufinus, *John Cassian, *Palladius, *John Climacus, *Maximus and many others, esp. Easterners. His work is vast (CPG 2430-2482). The treatises addressed to a wider public have been preserved in Greek, either under his name (the Practical Treatise, ed. A. and C. Guillaumont, SC 170-171, Paris 1971; the Sentences to monks and those to virgins, ed. H. Gressmann, Nonnenspiegel und Mönchsspiegel des Euagrios Pontikos; TU 39, 4, Leipzig 1913; Rerum monachalium rationes, PG 40, 1252-1264, and other sentences, ibid. 1264-1269) or under that of Nilus (Ad Eulogium; De vitiis quae opposita sunt virtutibus; De malignis cogitationibus; De octo spiritibus malitiae; De oratione . . ., PG 79, 1093-1240; De mal. cogit. also: ed. A. and C. Guillaumont - P. Géhin, SC 438, Paris 1998). Among his most important esoteric works are the six centuries of Kephalaia gnostica (ed. A. Guillaumont, PO 28, 1, Paris 1958), the Gnostic (A. and C. Guillaumont, SC 356, Paris 1989) and the letters, esp. one to Melania (ed. W. Frankenberg, Evagrius Ponticus, Berlin 1912, 564-619; also G. Vitestam, Seconde partie du traité qui passe sous le nom de "La grande lettre d'Évagre . . . ," Lund 1964). For the rest of his works, whose authenticity is not always certain, see CPG 2430-2482; CPG/Suppl. 2430-2483.

Evagrius's doctrine begins from an acute observation of the psychology of the solitary, the vices which threaten him, and the *ascesis that purifies his heart and thoughts and leads him to the knowledge of God (gnōsis). This background explains the Evagrian conception of the world and of the spiritual life. The nous, created pure, fell from the cosmic Unity of divine contemplation. God then created the material world where the nous, diffused into a human soul and joined to the body, is redeemed through the successive phases of the spiritual life. In ascetic practice (praktikē) the soul fights against evil thoughts and the vices to purify itself of the passions and acquire the virtues. In this way it reaches the state of impassibility (apatheia), the necessary condition for passing to the phase of knowledge (gnōstikē). Starting at this point from the contemplation of creatures (physikē), it passes through various levels and reaches the highest degree of contemplation, that of the *Trinity (theologikē), its proper goal.

It is disputed whether Evagrius didn't transgress the limits of orthodoxy in expressing his ideal of mystical union, esp. on the christological and eschatological levels, though the author continually reviewed his own thought and sought to avoid *pantheism. Later, in fact, some of his Palestinian and Syrian followers—the so-called Origenists, went further than he had. But it is also likely that the condemnation of 553 was due, at least in part, to hostile interpretations by the anti-Origenists in the extremely complicated events that preceded the ecumenical council. In any event, Evagrius is certainly much more useful when read dialectically and as a stimulus to the spiritual life, as is often done.

DSp 4, 1731-1744; BS 5, 356-363; I. Hausherr, Les leçons d'un contemplatif, Paris 1960; A. Guillaumont, Les "Kephalaia gnostica" d'Évagre le Pontique et l'histoire de l'origénisme chez les Grecs et les Syriens, Paris 1962; A. Levasti, Il più grande mistico del Deserto: Evagrio il Pontico: Riv. di ascetica and mistica 13 (1968) 242-264; G. Bunge, Évagre le Pontique et les deux Macaire: Irénikon 56 (1983) 215-227, 323-360; Id., Evagrios Pontikos, Briefe aus der Wüste, Trier 1986; Id., Origenismus-Gnostizismus. Zum geistesgeschichtlichen Standort des Evagrios Pontikos: VChr 40 (1986) 24-54; J. Driscoll, The "Ad Monachos" of Evagrius Ponticus: Its Structure and a Select Commentary, Rome 1991; E. Clark, The Origenist Controversy: The Cultural Construction of an Early Christian Debate, Princeton, NJ 1992; S. Rubenson, Evagrios Pontikos und die Theologie der Wüste, in Logos. Festschrift für Luise Abramowski, ed. H. Brennecke - E. Grasmück - C. Markschies, Berlin 1993, 384-401; R. Sinkewicz, Evagrius of Pontus. The Greek Ascetic Corpus, Oxford 2003; J. Driscoll, Evagrius Ponticus, Ad monachos, translation and commentary, New York 2003.

J. Gribomont - D. Hombergen

EVANGELISTS

I. In the Fathers - II. Iconography.

I. In the Fathers. The term evangelist was used of the first Christian preachers (Acts 21:8; Eph 4:11; 2 Tim 4:5), although it had already fallen into disuse by the time the Didache* was composed. Sources from the first half of the 2nd c. give widely varied evidence of knowledge of particular gospels; but while for the most part traditions linked to the synoptic tradition were used, these traditions were nonetheless not incorporated into the first three gospels. Among the gospels known and used, it seems that Mark's was the most highly regarded, whereas very little was known of John's, though its use in some regions is certain (p^{52} is from the first quarter of the 2nd c.). Most of the communities at that time had the use of only one gospel. Initially the gospels were used as a source for traditions about the Lord, though they were not considered "Sacred *Scripture" on par with the OT. At the beginning "gospel" was not a literary concept, but was used to refer to the content of preaching; gradually the Lord's authority was transferred to the writings that handed down his words (Schneemelcher, 13-14). When the word gospel came to designate a book, it became common to call its author an "evangelist" (Hipp., Antichr. 56; Tertull., Adv Prax. 21, 23).

The ecclesiastical tradition attributes the first gospel to the apostle Matthew, named among the twelve by the synoptics (Mt 10:3 par.); also, Mt is the only gospel to cite Matthew in the account of the call of the publican, whereas Mk and Lk call him Levi (Mt 9:9 par.). Eusebius (HE III, 39, 16; V, 8, 2) holds that Matthew evangelized the Jews and wrote his gospel in the "Hebrew language," citing *Papias and *Irenaeus as sources to confirm this statement (HE III, 24, 5-6). According to *Eusebius (HE VI, 25, 4), *Origen also accepted this tradition, which was later repeated by *Cyril of Jerusalem, *Epiphanius, *John Chrysostom and *Jerome. The oldest statement on the author of Mk is a note of Papias's (Euseb., HE III, 39, 15), who links him to Peter. *Justin's (Dial. 106) reference to Peter's "memoirs" is probably also a reference to Mk. In our sources, Irenaeus (Adv. haer. III, 41, 1) is the first to mention Luke, whose gospel he knows well; in this passage he links Luke with Paul. But not until Epiphanius (Pan. II, 51, 11) do we find any identification of Luke with one of the 72 disciples of Lk 10:1. The Muratorian *Canon and the Anti-Marcionite Prologue, like Irenaeus, make Luke a companion and disciple of Paul. As for the traditional account of the life and literary activity of the apostle John, it first appears in Irenaeus (Adv. haer. II, 22, 5; III, 3, 4). Before him, Justin, who could have known the fourth gospel, says nothing about its author, though he attributes the apocalypse to him. The four gospels had canonical value, but their apostolic authorship did not play a decisive role in this process. For the authors of Mk and Lk, the construction of a relationship of discipleship with the apostles probably began when their respective gospels were already highly thought of, and certainly under these names.

From the last quarter of the 2nd c. the four canonical gospels were associated with the four cherubim of Ezek 1:4-14 and the four living creatures of Rev 4:6-8. It was the persistent attraction of many Christians and "heretics" to a single written gospel (a synthesis or otherwise), as much as the objections of critics, that moved Irenaeus to write what seems to be the first complete defense of the fourfold gospel. He (Adv. haer. III, 11, 8) asserts that there can be no more and no fewer than four gospels, and gives them the characteristics of the four living creatures. These are four aspects that, for Irenaeus, represent the fourfold way in which the eternal Logos works. The lion symbolizes the royal office and effective power of the Son of God; the bull, his sacrificial and priestly character; the face of the man, his coming in human nature; the soaring eagle recalls the gift of the Spirit that descends on the church. Although the ancient writers differ in how they apply the symbols to the four Evangelists, this difference is greater regarding Mark. For Irenaeus, he is the eagle; for *Augustine, the man (De consensu Ev. I, 6, 9). For *Ambrose (Virg. 114; Abr. II, 54) and in Jerome's preferred schema, he is the lion. The authority of Jerome (In Ezech. I, 1; Comm. in Mt., prol.) established them once and for all: for John, the eagle (for the sublime heights of the prologue); for Mark, the lion (for the Baptist's voice in the wilderness); for Luke, the bull (for Zechariah's sacrifice); and for Matthew, the man's face (for his genealogy); this schema prevailed in the Middle Ages.

W. Schneemelcher, Haupteinleitung, in Id., Neutestamentliche Apocryphen, I, Tübingen [5]1987, 1-61; G.N. Stanton, The Fourfold Gospel: NTS 43 (1997) 317-346.

R. TREVIJANO

II. Iconography. The oldest figurative evidence of the Evangelists is probably recognizable in a fresco of the catacomb of SS. Marco and Marcelliano at Rome (mid 4th c.) (Wp pl. 162, 2), where the Evangelists, dressed in tunic and pallium, are shown on either side of Christ, who sits enthroned with an open volumen in his left hand; at his feet is the significant presence of a capsa containing four scrolls. In funerary plastic art, the Evangelists can be recognized with certainty by their names, incised above their heads, in the sarcophagus of Apt (France) (Ws pl. 37, 2-3), or written on the scrolls in their hands, on the sarcophagus of Concordius at *Arles (Ws pl. 34, 3). Distinctive and thus far unique is the depiction on a fragment of a sarcophagus lid of the Museo Pio Cristiano: in a boat, symbol of the church, the image of Christ as pilot is associated with three oarsmen named as Marcus, Luca, Iohannes; Matthew must have been on the missing part of the lid, indicated by his name (Diehl 1965 adn.).

The symbolic representation of the four Evangelists in the form of a tetramorph does not begin to appear in Christian art until the 5th c. It is directly connected with the vision of Ezek 1:4-14 and the corresponding Johannine vision of Rev 4:6-8, where, according to the agreed-upon interpretation of the Fathers, the four figures of the lion, calf, eagle and man correspond respectively to Mark, Luke, John and Matthew. The four Evangelists were depicted in this form esp. in mosaic decorations in church buildings: e.g., a baptistery at *Naples (early 5th c.); the apse of S. Pudenziana (5th c.) and triumphal arch of S. Maria Maggiore (5th c.), *Rome; at *Thessalonica, in the apse of Hosios David, with *Ezekiel and *Habakkuk (5th c.); and at *Ravenna, the mausoleum of Galla Placidia (5th c.) and basilicas of S. Apollinare Nuovo (6th c.) and S. Vitale (6th c.), where the human figures of Luke and John are accompanied by their respective symbols.

The only evidence we have in painting is a fresco in the catacomb of Gaudiosus at Naples, datable to the late 5th to early 6th c., in which we again find a cruciform schema with the symbols of the evangelists set at the four corners of the vault of a cubicle, with the bust of Christ in the center (M. Schmauder, Das sogennante Cubiculum des hl. Nostrianus in der Gaudiosus-Katakombe. Zur spätantiken Malerei in Neapel: JbAC 39 [1996] 225-262). The four rivers of paradise that flow from the mount on which Christ stands in the form of a lamb must also be recognized as an allusion to the four Evangelists, as we can see in a 5th-c. fresco in the cemetery of SS. Pietro and Marcellino (Wp pl. 252 = Deckers - Reinhard Seeliger - Mietke, Die Katakombe, no. 3); also symbols of the Evangelists are the sheep with Mar(cus) and Ioan(nes) written beside them on a sarcophagus fragment in Mus. Naz. Rom. (Ws pl. 36, 1).

DACL V, 845-852; U. Nilgen, LCI I, 696-713; J.G. Deckers - H. Reinhard Seeliger - G. Mietke, Die Katakombe "santi Marcellino e Pietro." Repertorium der Malerein, Vatican City - Münster 1987; M. Minasi: TIP 174-177.

C. CARLETTI

EVANGELIZATION (spread of Christianity). From the beginning the primitive Christians worked intensely to spread the gospel message, conquer for the faith and establish the church. The ease of communication in the 1st and 2nd c. AD, the self-assertion of the "middle class" against the senatorial class, the decentralization that brought with it a more balanced network of commerce and exchange, all aided the transmission of the gospel. The philosophical humanism admired by the emperors of the time, despite being an ideal reserved for the few, created a cultural and linguistic unity that allowed a dialogue of confrontation and encounter between opposing parties. Some Christians were aware of the privileged situation in which the work of proselytism took place: the earliest evidence of this is in *Melito of Sardis, who observed in ca. 170 that the Christian "philosophy" that began to spread in the reign of *Augustus arose and developed together with the empire (Euseb. of Caes., HE IV, 26, 7ff.). Later *Irenaeus and *Origen took up the same theme, with different emphases.

The gospel was taken to the nations from *Jerusalem, and its first steps were in *Palestine and the surrounding regions. From the NT we know of the existence of roughly thirty primitive communities (founded ca. 30–70) at Lydda, Joppa/Jaffa, *Caesarea, *Tyre, Sidon, *Damascus and *Antioch; in Anatolia we have information of the communities of Derbe, Iconian Lystra, Pisidian Antioch, *Philippi and Troad, Colossae and *Ephesus, *Smyrna, Pergamum and Philadelphia; in Greece, those of *Thessalonica, Berea, *Athens and *Corinth; more to the W or NW we know of the communities of *Malta, Pozzuoli and *Rome. One of the first great routes beyond Palestine traveled by Christ's apostles and disciples was the road which, going back to remotest antiquity, began at *Alexandria of *Egypt and ended at Hellespont, the so-called way of the sea: it linked Egypt with Palestine, where it passed through the Azotus, Jaffa, Lydda, Caesarea, Ptolemais, Tyre and Tripoli, as far as Syrian Antioch: all centers in which a Christian presence is attested before *Trajan's time. To the NW of Antioch, sometimes winding along the coast and sometimes further inland, it reached *Tarsus and, past the Cilician Gates, arrived first at Perga, then at Miletus, Ephesus and Smyrna. Here ended another important route, which linked *Galatia and *Phrygia to Lydia and Caria. Along its margins and in its immediate neighborhood were centers like Derbe, Lystra, *Iconium, Antioch of Pisidia, Colossae and Laodicea, as well as Hieropolis, Philadelphia and Sardis: an area in which Christianity spread with surprising speed by the end of the 1st c. The "way of the sea" then went N through Pergamum, Troad, *Nicomedia and finally touched the Bosporus: beyond which, in Europe, the Via Egnatia led to Dyrrachium on the Adriatic sea, on whose other shore was Italy, with the Via Appia that led to Rome. Along this great route we can prove the existence of the great majority of the oldest Christian communities. In the 2nd c. Christianity developed along the road that led E from Asia Minor to Mesopotamia (*Caesarea in *Cappadocia, *Edessa, Carrhae); to the W, following the S Mediterranean coast, it spread in Egypt and N Africa; finally to the NW, esp. through maritime traffic, it established itself on the coasts of S and central Italy and, further away, in *Gaul, along the Rhone valley, and in *Spain.

The crisis of the 3rd c.—which, among other things, reduced the volume of traffic, contracted business and exchange, ruined commercial houses, and forced decreased maintenance (and sometimes abandonment) of important roads—seems also to have affected evangelization: the spread of Christianity changed from being extensive to intensive, and greatly accelerated: from the greater centers it extended to the lesser, and from these to the villages (see, e.g., Origen, C. Cels. III, 9). In this way many churches carried out a process of consolidation (in Africa, central and S Italy, Spain), which is shown by episcopal lists, synodal subscriptions, martyrological and literary documents, epigraphy, and archaeological finds. It was in this period that the increased number of conversions that accompanied years of peace for the Christians also brought the church surprises and problems, as seen in the violent *persecutions of *Decius and *Valerian in the mid 3rd c., and the apostasies that followed.

The "Christianization" of the empire at the start of the 4th c. obviously facilitated the spread of Christ's message within its borders, but even outside those borders it continued to expand. It is probable that the work of evangelization usually depended on casual means: e.g., fugitives, Roman exiles or barbarians who, after having fought in the imperial armies and been converted to the new religion, spread it on their return home. Merchants played a considerable role, as they had from the start: it may have been a merchant who told Frigitil, queen of the Marcomanni (settled between the Elbe and the Oder), about *Ambrose, which led to her desire for Christian instruction, her conversion and her journey to *Milan to meet the bishop, who by then, alas, was dead (397). Elsewhere it was prisoners taken by the barbarians during raids and sacks who introduced Christianity among them: thus the *Goths, who we know were represented by a bishop at the Council of *Nicaea (325). In those same years Ulfila (ca. 311–ca. 383), first in Gothic territory N of the Danube and then in lower *Moesia, became the evangelizer of the *Visigoths, bringing them an Arian confession of faith. The religious influence and cultural dissemination exercised by his Gothic translation of the Bible was immense.

Further S, on the shores of the Red Sea beyond the borders of the empire, in Homerite *Arabia and Aksumite Ethiopia, we know of the work of *Frumentius and Aedesius: two young Christians, sole survivors of a voyage of exploration, who sowed the first Christian seed, and in the mid 4th c. obtained the free exercise of their religion. Other cases could be mentioned, like *Gregory the Illuminator (257–332), traditional founder of Christianity in Armenia: son of a Parthian prince, taken to *Cappadocia during the Persian occupation, he became a Christian, returned to Armenia and converted King Tiridates (ca. 305), with the result that the religion of Christ was declared the state religion.

In the 5th c. and later, the movement of evangelization showed original elements alongside the traditional ways and developments, in part due to changed historical conditions. First, expansion from Christian centers continued: thus the theological school of Edessa, later of *Nisibis, contributed in the 5th c. to the rise of the (Nestorian) church of *Persia; this in turn extended its mission to Kurdistan, India (Malabar), the isles of Socotra and Ceylon (Sri Lanka) and parts of central Asia. In a similar way in the Aksumite kingdom, Christianity took root and further established itself in the 5th and 6th c.; there the long work of translating the Scriptures into Ge'ez, the old Ethiopic language, led to a national liturgy and a Christian art. Even the lands E of the Jordan and the Dead Sea saw a flowering of Christianity: in the mid 6th c. there were 100 monastic centers in the area, all *monophysite, born of the tradition of the see of Alexandria and its christological theology.

Second, we see another phenomenon, first on the E and N borders of the empire from the Danube to the Rhine, and then throughout Europe, linked to the barbarians and their migrations. Between the late 4th and 6th c., the Western church found itself in a new situation and was obliged, in a way, to start from scratch: contact with Greco-Roman paganism moved to the background, while the problems of the conversion of the pagan Germans and their passage from *Arianism to orthodoxy became urgent. At the same time, Christian penetration into the rural areas of central Europe posed not a few problems. The devastated scene of the empire was dominated by a series of exceptional men who, each in their own way, spread and consolidated the gospel message in a wholly new situation: from Genoveffa at *Paris to *Severinus in Noricum, from *Lupus of Troyes to *Germanus of Auxerre in *Britain, from *Epiphanius of Pavia to Victor of Turin in Burgundy, from *Remigius of Reims (who played a considerable role in the conversion of *Clovis and the *Franks to *Catholicism in 496) to *Sidonius Apollinaris, from *Caesarius of Arles to *Leander of Seville, from the monks of *Lérins to *Benedict of Nursia. Thus it happened that the Latins of the West, conquered by the pagan or heretical Germans, by remaining firm in their faith succeeded in converting their conquerors and thus carried on the evangelistic mission in the heart of Europe.

Third, another dimension, independent of the first two, appears: leading figures, esp. monks, natives of areas at the far corners of the empire or outside it, became preachers of Christ to pagans and Christians: we think of *Patrick (ca. 389–461), a native of *Britain, whose religious work was in *Ireland, a land that had escaped the rule of Rome and knew only pagan cults in the original forms of the country; with him we think of his collaborators and successors (Gauls, Franks, Bretons, Romans) who founded many monasteries (where Latin was taught) on the island. Soon after, the Irish monk *Columba (521–597), of noble lineage, established monastic communities at Denny, Durrow and later on the isle of Iona, and introduced the gospel to the Scots and Picts, converting their king. In 590 his confrère and contemporary *Columbanus (ca. 543–615) crossed over to Gaul, where he founded the monastery of Luxeuil, then went on to Switzerland and finally to Italy, more precisely to Milan, to Agilulf and Theodelinda (when the Longobards finally abandoned Arianism and embraced Catholicism); from there he settled at Bobbio, where he ended his life in the monastery built in those years, destined to become a famous center of faith, art and culture.

So, starting from a point on the periphery of the empire (Palestine), evangelization in the first centuries found the most fertile ground for development within the empire's borders; but while inevitably following the historical vicissitudes connected with the empire, it did not forget the broader horizon for which its message was destined; at times accelerating, at times with hesitation and delays, it went beyond the sphere of the Roman Empire to engage other lands and peoples in a history that continues to our day.

A. von Harnack, Die Mission und Ausbreitung des Christentums in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten, 2 vols., Leipzig [4]1924; K.S. Latourette, A History of Expansion of Christianity. The First Five Centuries, I, New York - London 1937; B. Koetting: RAC 2, 1138-1159, s.v. Christentum, I (Ausbreitung); P. Siniscalco, Le vie di commercio e la diffusione del cristianesimo, in Var. aus., Mondo greco-romano e cristianesimo, Rome 1982. Historical atlases are useful on the theme, such as K. Piper, Atlas Orbis Christiani antiqui, Düsseldorf 1931 (sources and indexes in various languages); F. van der Meer - C. Mohrmann, Atlas de l'Antiquité Chrétienne, Paris 1960 (Ger. ed., Gütersloh 1959; Eng., London 1959); H. Jedin - H. Latourette - J. Martin, Atlas zur Kirchengeschichte, Freiburg 1970; E.G. Hinson, The Evangelization of the Roman Empire. Identity and Adaptability, Macon, GA 1981; R. MacMullen, Christianizing the Roman Empire(AD 100–400), New Haven, CT 1984; J. Guyon, I primi secoli della missione cristiana, in Storia dell'Italia religiosa, I: L'Antichità e il Medioevo, ed. A. Vauchez, Rome - Bari 1993, 79ff.; J. Comby, Deux mille ans d'évangélisation: histoire de l'expansion chrétienne, Paris, 1992, (It. tr.) Duemila anni di evangelizzazione. Storia dell'espansione cristiana, Turin 1994, 3ff.; L. Tescaroli, Evangelizzare o rievangelizzare. Storia dell'evangelizzazione, Rome 1998, 9ff. For a rapid historiographical summary of the theme, see P. Siniscalco, L'evangelizzazione dei popoli del Mediterraneo nei primi secoli cristiani, in Il cammino dell'evangelizzazione. Problemi storiografici, ed. G. Martina and U. Dovere, Bologna 2001, 41-72.

P. Siniscalco

EVARISTUS, pope (97–105). Succeeded *Clement perhaps in 97 (88–97; Iren., Adv. haer. III, 3, 3; Euseb., HE III, 34; IV, 1) and lived under the emperor *Trajan. According to the LP, which says he was a Jew from *Jerusalem, it was Evaristus who attributed the various tituli to the Roman presbyters and who first ordained seven deacons to help the bishop in preaching. This information should be received cautiously, however, and perhaps places these events too early. The LP also reports that Evaristus died a martyr, perhaps in 105, and is buried on the Vatican hill near Peter. The Roman Martyrology confirms this, fixing his feast on 29 October. Ps.-Isidore (PL 130, 81-90) attributes two decretals to Evaristus: one for the Egyptian bishops, on Christ, head of the church and the church, Christ's body; the other for the African bishops, on the ordination of deacons and *catechesis. The attribution, however, is unfounded.

LP I, CXXXVII-CXLI, 54-55 and 126; AS [. . .] Octobris, XI, Brussels 1864, 799-804; BS V, 372-373 (I. Daniele); EPapi I, 212-213 (F. Scorza Barcellona).

M. Spinelli

EVIL. The theme of evil was treated by the Fathers esp. in relation to *gnosticism, *Marcionism and *Manicheism, but sometimes also in relation to the conceptions of the pagan philosophers, both *Stoic and *Neoplatonist. The 2nd-c. *apologists had to confront both gnostic conceptions and, very similar but distinct, those of Marcionism. For the gnostic, human salvation was closely linked to the knowledge of the origin of evil, with which the soul struggles in this world. They respond to the question unde malum with a mythical account that narrates the passage from the original pneumatic world—constituted of more or less numerous spiritual realities, called aeons and emanations of a transcendent, unknown God—to the creation of the physical world, the work of a second god, the demiurge, and the consequence of a prior sin committed by the last of the aeons, Sophia. It is therefore the demiurge, identified with the God of the OT, who is most directly responsible for evil, since he created the world out of preexistent matter, as well as people of various categories with respect to salvation: hylic or somatic, psychical, and spiritual. Marcion also speaks of two gods, identified with the God of the OT and that of the NT, but with no reference to the pneumatic world or to a prior fault. The God revealed by Jesus Christ is the good God, who wants to save people, whereas the OT god is a just god, but also choleric and cruel: it is he who created the world out of preexisting matter, and thus he is the author of evil, since matter is the origin of all evils.

The first author to oppose these conceptions was the martyr and philosopher *Justin, author of a book Against Marcion (lost). From the Dialogue with Trypho we know that Justin affirmed the unicity of God and directly related the salvation brought by Christ to Adam's transgression and the consequent fall of humanity under a sentence of death (Dial., 88; PG 6, 685-686). He writes that the Word "became man through the Virgin, so that the disobedience caused by the serpent would be dissolved in the same way that it was begun. Eve in fact, who was a virgin and incorrupt, received the word of the serpent and gave birth to disobedience and death" (Dial. 100; PG 6, 1081-1082). Though with different accents, other apologists such as *Tatian, *Theophilus of Antioch and the great *Irenaeus of Lyons referred to the sin of Adam and Eve as the origin of evil. The antignostic and anti-Marcionite polemic of these authors rests on some common principles: there is one God and not two; evils were not willed by God, nor were they produced by a fault that is prior to the creation of the world, nor are they caused by matter, which too was created by God; evil is the inheritance of the condemnation of the sin of the first human couple, Adam and Eve, who, created in a state of integrity, were deceived by the devil and committed an act of disobedience to the Creator, who is both good and just. A strong accent on the sin of Adam and its disastrous consequences for humanity is in the *Easter homily of *Melito of Sardis, also from the 2nd c. (De Pascha 48-49: SC 123, 86).

Origen's position is more complex. De principiis, on the one hand, advances the hypothesis of the preexistence of souls and of their prior fault, as the cause of their fall into bodies and of the different types of people; on the other hand, against gnostic determinism of the three natures of people, it defends personal freedom, having recourse to divine foreknowledge to explain their varied earthly condition and different callings. In other works, however, Origen too speaks of the sin of Adam, appealing to biblical testimony, such as Ps 50:7 and Job 14:4, to explain the condition of sin into which each person is born, the reason why the church customarily baptizes infants (In Lev. Hom. 8,3). In Origen, however, with the hypothesis of *apokatastasis—i.e., with the theory of the return of all things to God and the consequent final salvation of all, including the devil—an optimistic vision prevails, which would later be accepted by few and criticized by many.

Among the Latin authors, Justin and Irenaeus are explicitly appealed to by the Carthaginian priest *Tertullian, who also wrote a treatise Against Marcion, divided into five books and exercising a great influence on all Western authors, in particular St. *Augustine. To the Marcionites, who relied heavily on the verse of the prophet Isaiah: Ego sum qui condo mala (Is 45:7) to attribute to the OT creator God the evils that afflict humanity, Tertullian responded by calling attention to the ambiguity of the word evil, which could refer to two types of evil: mala delicti and mala supplicii, or, using other words, mala culpae and mala poenae. If one bears this distinction in mind, observed Tertullian, it becomes clear that the ancient prophet wanted to attribute to God not delicta or culpae, i.e., sins, which come from the devil, but only supplicia or poenae, inflicted by God and which in no way compromise his justice. The evils inflicted by God, in fact, "are undoubtedly evil for those who are punished, but in themselves they are good, because they are just and defenders of the good, the enemies of crimes and in this order worthy of God" (Adv. Marcionem 2,22,4: PG 7, 784).

Manicheism too is a gnostic and dualistic conception. It responds to the basic question, unde malum, with a mythological cosmogony, divided into three stages. In the beginning existed two substances or coeternal principles, contrary and totally separate from one another: one totally good, that dwelt in the land of light, the other totally evil, that dwelt in the land of darkness. With the invasion of the kingdom of light by the kingdom of darkness, and the defensive response of the former, began the stage of mixture and battle between the two substances, first in the cosmos and then in man. At the end will be the final separation of the two contrary substances.

The first to respond to the threatening spread of Manichean dualism were the Christian theologians of the regions near Persia: Syria and Palestine. The main names are *Hegemonius, *Titus of Bostra, *Diodore of Tarsus and *Serapion of Thmuis. Hegemonius wrote the Acta disputationis Archelai cum Manete, a fictitious discussion between the bishop Archelaus and a disciple of Mani, written in Syria in the late 3rd c. and very soon translated from the Greek into Latin. Titus of Bostra lived at the time of the emperor *Julian; he wrote a treatise, in four books, entitled Against the Manichees. According to information reported by *Photius, Diodore of Tarsus also wrote a work Against the Manichees, a full 25 books. A treatise Against the Manichees was also written by St. Athanasius's friend Serapion of Thmuis. The anti-Manichean polemic of these authors aimed to reject the dualism of the two eternal and contrary principles of good and evil, attributing the whole creation to the work of the one God and forcefully rejecting the idea of a natural evil: only sin, fruit of the creature's free will, is evil properly speaking, whereas physical evils (sickness, death, etc.) are not true evils, but natural phenomena, which are at times even useful; nothing is said of the sin of Adam, or it is seen simply as a bad example given to his descendants.

Among the other Eastern Fathers, *Basil of Caesarea follows the Syro-Palestinian anti-Manichean line (see his homily, God is not the author of evil, PG 31, 341 and Hexaemeron, Hom. II, 5: SC 26, 161), but most of them continued to follow the tradition that attributed human evils to Adam's sin: *Methodius of Olympus (De resurrectione II, 6: PG 41, 1161D); *Gregory of Nyssa (De beatitudinibus 6: PG 44, 1273A); *John Chrysostom, for whom the sin of Adam was so grave as to include in the condemnation the whole human race, such that from the angelic life of the earthly paradise it fell under the yoke of death and concupiscence (Ep. ad Olymp. 10,(3): SC 13, 156); *Didymus the Blind (In Iob X, 15: PG 39, 1145B); *Hesychius of Jerusalem (In Leviticum V, 15-16: PG 93, 974D-975B).

In the West the problem of evil became central in the reflection of St. Augustine, due to his long experience in the Manichean sect and the many friends it had led into error. Augustine, however, in addition to Manicheism also opposed pagan conceptions of evil as early as the dialogue De ordine, written before his *baptism; while taking some points from *Neoplatonism, he refutes *Plotinus's assertion that evils are necessary for the perfection of the universe. This idea is expressly rejected in De libero arbitrio: "Neither sins nor misery are necessary for the perfection of the universe, but souls as souls" (Lib. arb. 3,9,26). In De civitate Dei, he also explicitly rejects the *Stoic and Plotinian conception that considers only moral evils to be true evils, while underestimating the seriousness of evils suffered by human beings, considering them to be natural occurrences, easily controllable by the wise person (Civ. Dei XIX, 4,4-5). With regard to the anti-Manichean polemic, St. Augustine follows the line indicated by *Ambrose: on the one hand he emphasizes the Neoplatonic notion of evil as a privation of good; on the other he accepts the tradition that stresses the biblical account of Adam's sin, relying heavily on Tertullian. At the beginning of De libero arbitrio, in fact, the twofold distinction between evil and its author made by Tertullian in Adversus Marcionem is recalled: "We call evil what one does that is evil, and what one suffers of evil. Since we believe that in a world governed by divine providence no one can suffer an evil unjustly, we must conclude that the evils that we suffer are just punishments of God and that God would be the author of these evils that human beings undergo. Of the other type of evil, however, each is the author of his own wicked actions, which could not be punished by God, if they were not done willfully" (Lib. arb. 1,1,1). Confirming Tertullian's influence, in De moribus Manichaeorum Augustine returns to the phrase: ego facio bona et condo mala (Is 45:7), used by the Marcionites to attribute evils to the Creator, explaining it in the sense of an ordinatio iudiciaria, already suggested in De ordine: God does not create evil, but once it has been committed by man, he integrates it into the order, punishing it according to justice (Mor. Eccl. cath. et man. 2,7,9).

It is superfluous to add that in the West, after Tertullian and before St. Augustine, all the Fathers saw the origin of human evils in the sin of Adam. The first to oppose this tradition were the *Pelagians, who came to deny any negative inheritance of the sin of Adam in his descendants, except for his bad example. Finally, it is interesting to note how the Pelagian bishop *Julian of Eclanum opposed the Augustinian doctrine of original sin, common to the whole Western tradition and a good part of the East, by referring explicitly to an anti-Manichean treatise of Serapion of Thmuis, cited in his work under the name of Basil (C. Iulianum 1,5,16-17), and thus taking inspiration from the Syro-Palestinian anti-Manichean tradition. Like Serapion, Julian too attributed no importance to Adam's sin to explain the evils in the world; he considers sin alone, the work of the free human will, to be evil true and proper, while the other evils that human beings suffer are seen as natural phenomena, which can even be useful.

R. Jolivet, Le problème du mal d'après St. Augustin, Paris 1936; A. Sertillanges, Le problème du mal, Paris 1951 (It. tr. Il problema del male. La storia, Rome 1951); Ch. Journet, Le mal. Essai théologique, Bruges 1961; A. Kreiner, Gott im Leid. Zur Stichhaltigkeit der Theodizee-Argumente, Freiburg i. B. 1997; N. Cipriani, Il problema del male in S. Agostino, in Agostino non è (il) male, ed. G. Fidelibus, Chieti 1997, 27-41; Id., La polemica antiafricana di Giuliano d'Eclano: artificio letterario o scontro di tradizioni teologiche?, in Cristianesimo e specificità regionali nel mediterraneo latino (sec. IV-V), SEA 46, 147-160.

S. Folgado Flórez - N. Cipriani

EVODIUS (pseudo). Author of a 6th-c. Coptic Marian homily. Under the name Evodius (Copt. Euchodios)—archbishop of Rome, spiritual son of St. Peter and eyewitness of events related to the death and assumption of *Mary—there is a homily that describes these events. It is written for the feast of the death (21 Tobi = 16 Jan) and resurrection of Mary (16 Mesori = 9 Aug). The text is important for mariology. Also under Evodius's name are a Homily on the Passion and an Encomium of the Apostles.

CANT 133; BHO 667; T. Orlandi, Coptic Encyclopaedia 3, 1078f.; P. de Lagarde, Aegyptiaca, Gottingae 1883, 38-66; It. tr.: Erbetta 1/2, 539-601; Testi mariani per il primo millenio, 4, ed. G. Gharib, Rome 1991, 702-713; S. Mimouni, Dormition et l'Assomption de la Vierge: Théol. Hist. 98, Paris 1995, 195-201.

M. Starowieyski

EVODIUS of Antioch (1st c.). First bishop of *Antioch, saint. Feast 6 May in the East, 29 April in the West. The date of his elevation is uncertain, perhaps ca. 44. We know nothing of his life, his personality being obscured by that of his successor *Ignatius. Nicephorus Callistus attributes some surely spurious writings to him, including a letter of which he cites a fragment (HE II, 3).

DHGE 16, 133.

E. Prinzivalli

EVODIUS of Uzalis (d. after 422). Compatriot, disciple and friend of *Augustine, he was present at *Monica's death (Conf. 9,12,31). He became (ca. 395–401) bishop of *Uzalis (Africa Proconsularis), where he founded a monastery. He was an active participant in the struggle against the *Donatists and was the first to spread St. *Stephen's relics in *Africa. He built a Memoria in honor of St. Stephen at Hippo and translated his relics to Uzalis; the *De miraculis S. Stephani was composed at his initiative (ca. 420). He appears in Augustine's youthful dialogues (De quantitate animae, De libero arbitrio) and in the latter's correspondence of 414–415 (Ep. 158-164, 169); he is also thought to be the author of the ps.-Augustinian work De fide contra Manichaeos. Died ca. 422–427; his cult, feast 16 October, is late and without historical basis.

CPL 389-391a; BS 5, 396-397; PCBE 1, 366-373; LACL[3] 257-258; A.D. Fitzgerald, Augustine Through the Ages, Cambridge 1999, 344; M. Baltes, Platonisches Gedankengut im Brief des Evodius an Augustin (Ep. 158): VChr 40 (1986) 251-260; AugL 2,1158-1161; F. Decret, Le traité d'Evodius "Contre les Manichéens." Un compendium à l'usage du parfait controversiste: Augustinianum 31 (1991) 387-409; Y.-M. Duval, Note sur la lettre d'Evodius à l'abbé Valentin d'Hadrumète (CPL 389): REAug 49 (2003) 123-130.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

EXAMPLE (Exemplum). The idea of exemplarity is fundamental in patristic theology, connected as it is with the basic themes of the human being as God's image; of Christ as teacher; of prophecy (λόγος – τύπος). Deeply rooted in the NT, which speaks of the imitation of God, of Jesus and of the just (see Heb 12), it took on new shades of meaning in the Greco-Roman context. In rhetoric, παράδειγμα and exemplum (similitudo) served demonstrative and persuasive eloquence; philosophy developed the causa exemplaris; in the Roman tradition, exemplum maiorum was understood as auctoritas. Its true meaning was therefore not limited to that of a moral model; it also indicated a past event as a reason for hope, indeed a principle that bore the imitators along with it, like the exemplum resurrectionis, which is simultaneously an incitement to spiritual life and the principle of the *resurrection of the dead.

DSp 4, 1886-1892; RAC 6, 1229-1257; Lampe, s.v.; B. Studer, "Sacramentum et exemplum" chez s. Augustin: RecAug 10 (1975) 87-141; W. Geerlings, Christus exemplum, Mainz 1978; J. Klein, Exemplum: HWRhet 3 (1996) 60-70.

B. Studer

EXCOMMUNICATION. Excommunication resulted in being placed outside *communion with the community and therefore it incurred the prohibition of continuing to being part of it. Within Christianity it was an inheritance from Judaism both in the moral sense for the transgressions of the Mosaic law and for the concrete ban (in Talmudic literature one finds the nidduy, i.e., the small excommunication, and the ḥerem, i.e., the large excommunication). Moses Maimonides collected in the Talmud more than 24 cases of excommunication which, in general, were against heretics, sectarians and liberals. If one died excommunicated, a pertinent statement in this regard was placed on one's sepulchral stone. In Mt 18:16 one has, as in the Jewish practice, an example of coercion by means of excommunication. In the Christian community excommunication was very much connected to penitential practice, expressed by the terminology of excommunication-peace (reintegration into the community occurred through the rebestowing of peace on the one excommunicated) and was inflicted on account of grave sins, for example, persistence in heresy or disobedience to authority. In general, excommunication was issued by a bishop or was dependent upon synodal or conciliar decisions. To be inflicted with excommunication was, in ancient Christianity, a truly great disgrace, from which one was released only with great difficulty. Excommunication was a public intervention and, as such, it placed public discredit upon the one to whom it pertained.

J. Wiesner, Der Bann in seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung auf dem Boden des Judentums, Leipzig 1864; J. Döller, Der Bann im AT und im späteren Judentum: ZKG 37 (1913) 1-24; J. Gaudemet, Notes sur les formes anciennes de l'excommunication: RSR 23 (1949) 64-77; W. Doskocil, s.v. Exkommunikation: RAC 7, 1-22; Id., Der Bann in der Urkirche, München 1958; G. Folliet, Une collection anonyme "Pro causa iniustae excommunicationis" des VII^e-VIII^e siècles: Augustinianum 25 (1985) 295-309.

V. Grossi

EXEGESIS, PATRISTIC. Christianity, like Judaism, is a religion of the book, in that Holy *Scripture, considered an expression of God's revelation to his people, occupies a central place, and every action in the life of God's people, from doctrine to discipline to liturgy (both collective and individual), must be brought into conformity with it. And given that the Jews had had to submit the Bible to an assiduous work of interpretation and adaptation in order to conform every action of their life to its dictates, it was natural for the believers of the nascent church to take from Judaism, along with the OT, the relevant hermeneutical procedures and ways of presentation: the homily, e.g., an important moment in the community liturgy, was derived from the synagogue liturgy. But Jews and Christians were divided precisely by their fundamental evaluation of the sacred text: Jews read in it the expectation of the Messiah, Christians the demonstration that the awaited Messiah had come in the person of Jesus. The ensuing polemics pushed Christians to a further examination of the OT, to which they began to give a christological reading. This reading not only prompted the interpretation that the traditional messianic prophecies were fulfilled in Christ, but also suggested to *Paul and his followers the idea of reinterpreting the law christologically—i.e., spiritually, in the light of the opposition of letter and spirit—and led them to see OT episodes as the anticipation and symbol of facts about Christ and the church (typological interpretation of the OT), through the use of an allegorical interpretation of the text. This procedure was not unknown to Palestinian Jews, but earlier used mainly by pagans to interpret myths and Homeric tales and later by Hellenized Jews (Philo, etc.). Thus Paul in 1 Cor 10:1-11 interpreted the crossing of the Red Sea and the cloud in the desert as symbolizing *baptism); in Gal 4:22-24 he saw Isaac and Ishmael symbolizing Christians and Jews, etc. During this same period Christian interpreters also started making the first collections of Testimonia, i.e., OT passages grouped in homogeneous series for didactic, polemical, apologetic and liturgical ends. So although Paul and other Christians still used the OT on the basis of Jewish hermeneutical procedures (use of midrash, pesher etc.), the spirit of their interpretation was by now essentially new.

The different interpretative tendencies begun in the apostolic age continued in the subapostolic age. *Clement of Rome applied the OT to the new needs of the Christian community without breaking away from its literal sense, whether illustrating his discourse with examples (1 Clem. 4.7.9-12: citations of Cain, Esau, Moses, Jonah, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, etc.) or expressing his religious feelings in prayer (59-60). From the 2nd c., Christian OT apocrypha (3 and 4 Esdras, 3 and 4 Maccabees, etc.) put new content into literary forms typical of the OT: this literal appreciation acclimatized the church to the OT as the norm of the moral law, codified, e.g., in book III of *Cyprian's Testimonia ad Quirinum alongside the NT, while Jewish Christians of a radical tendency contested even the lawfulness of interpreting Scripture allegorically (Ps.-Clem., Recogn. X, 42). Against this, ps.-*Barnabas continued to broaden the typological interpretation of the OT (chs. 6 and 12, the Promised Land and Joshua as symbols of Christ), while also radicalizing the spiritual reading of the law, whose efficacy was denied to the Jews precisely because of their merely literal understanding of the sacred text (10, etc.).

But neither Paul nor Barnabas, though reading the OT with non-Jewish eyes, denied its validity for the Christian church. This denial was the work of the *gnostics, whose negative evaluation of the material world led them to devalue its creator, the God of the Jews, and consequently the OT, his revelation. So although their religious experience was rooted in certain OT passages, esp. in the creation account, profoundly reworked to bring out the distinction of various natures in human beings (spiritual, psychic, hylic), their overall evaluation of the OT reflected the influence of their basic approach: literal interpretation of anthropomorphisms and of entire episodes, in order to bring out the distinction between the just God of the OT and the good God of the NT (examples in Orig., Princ. II, 5, 1); positive evaluation of facts and people presented negatively in the OT as hostile to Yahweh (sin of Adam and Eve, Cain, Sodom and Gomorrah, etc.); but also allegorical interpretation, e.g., in ps.-Hipp., Refut. V, 16, 4-13 (Peratae), so as to connect various OT episodes (Cain, Joseph, Nimrod, etc.) in a sort of gnostic salvation history. Meanwhile other gnostics were less monolithic in their rejection of the OT: *Ptolemy the *Valentinian, in the Letter to Florus, distinguishes in the Mosaic law between parts that are imperfect but not bad, others of symbolic value, perfected and fulfilled by Christ, and still others abolished; and Valentinians and other gnostics saw the Logos already at work, in a hidden way, in the OT, and so distinguished between prophecies inspired by the Demiurge (= God of the OT) and others inspired by the Logos (Iren., Haer. I, 7, 3; I, 30, 11).

The gnostics opposed the just God of the OT with the good God of the NT: in this sense they were the first to use the NT books on a vast scale, considering them divinely inspired and therefore normative. The Commentary on John by the Valentinian *Heracleon, only fragments of which survive, is to our knowledge the first certain exegetical work dedicated to a NT book. The interpretation of the NT given by the gnostics, in this case the Valentinians, was strongly allegorizing and tended to force the text in the direction of typically gnostic doctrines: Ptolemy found the Valentinian ogdoad in John's prologue (Iren., Haer. I, 8, 5-6) and Heracleon saw the Samaritan woman and the son of the basilikos (Jn 4:46) as symbols of spiritual and psychic people (Heracleon, Comm Jn., frr. 17-24.40).

The antignostic reaction in the late 2nd and early 3rd c. concentrated mainly on the defense of the OT. And if *Justin, in polemic with the Jews, confined himself to broadening its typological interpretation, *Irenaeus organized it in a specifically antignostic sense in such as way as to present the OT revelation as a progressive education of humanity, readying it to accept the supreme revelation of the NT (Adv. haer. IV, 13, 3; 20, 8; 21, 3): between OT and NT there is progress, not a break. In this antignostic milieu Irenaeus's exegetical ratio varies, not just because he combines simple typologies with very elaborate ones (V, 8, 3), but also because, alongside a typological interpretation of the OT, for other passages he gives a literal one: thus he interprets, e.g., the account of the creation and of human sin (V, 15, 4; 23, 1, etc.), as does *Theophilus (Autol. II, 10ff.). Even for the NT, which Irenaeus uses systematically together with the OT, the interpretation varies: sometimes, alongside the prevalent literal interpretation, he gives the allegorical one (Adv. haer. IV, 22, 1; V, 25, 4). But precisely because of this varied way of interpreting, guided by no precise rule, Irenaeus finds himself in difficulties in opposing the gnostics' allegorical interpretation of Scripture: he accuses it of being distorting (I, 3, 6) and refutes it in an eschatological sense (V, 35, 2), but to find a criterion of distinction between true and false allegory, he can do nothing but appeal to the church's official tradition (III, 1-4, etc.). *Tertullian's attitude is the same, brought out even more prominently by the fact that he polemicizes on several fronts, against gnostics, Jews and pagans: he rejects the pagan allegory of myths and gnostic allegory (Ad nat. II, 12, 17; Adv. val. I, 3), but he uses allegory against the Jews and against Marcion (Adv. Mar. III, 5, 3-4); in the end he too takes refuge in the argument from authority: only the Catholic Church gives the authentic interpretation of Scripture (Praescr.).

The authors whom we have so far looked at used and interpreted Scripture for polemical and catechetical ends, not for exegesis in the strict sense.

With *Hippolytus (late 2nd–early 3rd c.), the Catholics too arrived at the exegetical treatise proper, i.e., explanation dedicated to the systematic illustration of large parts of the sacred text, in particular the OT (commentaries on Daniel, *Song of Songs, the Blessings of the patriarchs, of Moses, etc.). In the Commentary on Daniel, typological interpretation alternates with literal, but elsewhere it clearly prevails, with a wholly *christological reading of the texts: Hippolytus is the first Christian to attest the interpretation of the bride and groom of the Song of Songs as typoi of Christ and the church, a Christian transposition of the Jewish interpretation that saw them as symbols of Yahweh and Israel. Despite this exegetical effort, Hippolytus feels no need to fix precise rules of interpretation, and this lack of method is felt more than once in his pages, in which simple typologies alternate with other very elaborate ones, and which are not always consistent in their evaluation of the letter of the text.

In the more demanding cultural milieu of *Alexandria, in polemic esp. with gnostics, Christian exegesis of Sacred Scripture between the late 2nd and mid 3rd c. broadened its range of activity and fixed precise norms. *Clement, who left little that is specifically exegetical but who used Scripture throughout all his works, recognizes various senses in it (historical, doctrinal, prophetic, mystical) and brings them out using a prevalently allegorical method. Indeed he saw the symbol as a means of expression for the passage from the sensible to the intelligible, and hence characteristic of religious language, which tends to present its contents in a covert way, not immediately accessible to the profane (Strom. V, 21). He thus extended the boundaries of the traditional allegorical interpretation of the sacred text, putting alongside the typological interpretation the cosmological one, which saw earthly realities as the typos of heavenly ones (the temple of Jerusalem as typos of heaven, Strom. V, 32ff.), and the moral one (Hagar and Sarah symbols of worldly knowledge and wisdom, Strom. I, 30), both strongly influenced by *Philo. From here he also deduced hermeneutical procedures that would become typical of Alexandrian exegesis: the symbolic value of numbers, animals, plants, etc., and allegory drawn from the etymology of Hebrew names.

*Origen brought to Alexandrian exegesis a greater wealth of interests and a more rigorous method of research. His innumerable exegetical works, grouped by the ancients into Scholia (collections of explanations of passages of particular interest), Homilies and Commentaries, looked not just at the traditionally more studied books (Genesis, Psalms, Prophets, Gospels, Paul), but also at others previously neglected (Joshua, Judges, Job, Proverbs, etc.). His method of research, while particularly valuing the spiritual (allegorical) interpretation, also took a systematic interest in the literal, which he saw as the initial stage of exegesis, which allowed the most important part, the allegorical, to be addressed in a nonarbitrary way. For this reason Origen gave special care to textual criticism by means of the Hexapla, in which the Greek translation of the OT normally used in the church, known as the Septuagint (LXX), was systematically checked against the Hebrew text and Greek translations. In Princ. IV, 1-3, he gives the first treatise on scriptural exegesis. Here (IV, 2, 4) he distinguishes three levels of interpretation for nearly every passage of Scripture: literal, spiritual (= typological), moral (= psychological). An outstanding example of this type of exegesis is the Commentary on the Song of Songs, in which the three interpretations follow each other systematically, passage by passage, and the royal spouses are seen first as typoi of Christ and the church, then of the Logos and the believer's soul. But at other times Origen proposes two levels of interpretation, letter/spirit, correlated with the distinction of Christians into simple and perfect (or rather, becoming perfect): to the literal interpretation he adds, as the climax of the exegesis, a single, allegorical interpretation, which may assume various contents. In fact, on one hand Origen broadens the traditional typology (OT as typos of NT) by adding another which sees the NT as typos (Ap. 14,6) of the eternal gospel, i.e., to be fulfilled at the end of the world; on the other, like Philo and Clement, he is led to see earthly realities as the symbol of heavenly realities. Finally, he makes use of the moral dimension, i.e., the application of the sacred text to the existential experience of the individual believer. This multiform allegory is put to work through all the hermeneutical procedures that we have seen as typical of Philo and Clement. Beyond the distinction into two, three or even four senses, it finds unity and maximum density in the conviction that the word of God has an inexhaustible fecundity that no interpretation can circumscribe or exhaust: continual study allows us to know it ever better in its inexhaustible plurality of meanings (Hom. Ex. 1, 1).

Origenian exegesis spread widely in the East in the second half of the 3rd c., part of a vaster cultural initiative broadly open to the values of *Platonism; it met with favor, but also aroused reactions in areas dominated by Asiatic culture. While *Methodius of Olympus was influenced by Origen's allegorism, *Eustathius of Antioch (early 4th c.) reacted harshly to it: he accused Origen of allegorizing the whole of Scripture, and criticized the abuse of allegories drawn from the etymologies of Hebrew names (PG 18, 656-657). During the same period in *Syria and *Palestine, Origenism was represented by *Eusebius of Caesarea, whose historical and antiquarian interests helped him appreciate the philological and literalist component of the master's hermeneutic, and led him to make use of the historical, as well as the traditional christological, aspect of the OT books he interpreted (Psalms, Isaiah). Gospel passages, also, that posed interpretive difficulties were resolved according to the letter of the text, without recourse to allegory (Quaestiones et solutiones to Stephen and Marinus).

Eusebius already felt the fresh air that began to blow through every aspect of Christian life with the Constantinian change, which led to a great literary flowering, including in exegesis. In the East this novelty made itself felt in a progressive use of the letter of the sacred text, to the detriment of allegorical interpretation, which was warned against in some quarters as excessive and artificial in its generalized application to the whole of Scripture, typical of the Alexandrians. Two contributions to this change of direction—which never succeeded in prevailing—were the criticism of the pagan *Porphyry, who had accused Christian exegetes of having recourse to allegory to avoid the difficulties posed by the letter of the biblical text, and the spread of historical sensibility and interest, which led to the OT being read not just as a christological anticipation of the NT, but as a work of history, the history of the relationship between Yahweh and Israel.

The center of this anti-Alexandrian reaction in the late 4th and early 5th c. was the so-called school of Antioch. Its remote origins must be seen not in *Lucian of Antioch, of whose exegetical ratio we know nothing, but in the above-mentioned interest in the literal appreciation of Scripture, noted in Syria and Palestine in the course of the 4th c. It was contributed to, on one hand, by the literalistic strand we referred to, alongside the allegorical, in Asiatic exegesis (Irenaeus, Theophilus), and on the other by the Eusebian exploitation of the literalist and philological component of Origen's exegesis. *Acacius of Caesarea, *Eusebius of Emesa, *Apollinaris of Laodicea, despite the little that remains of their work, well attest this use of literal interpretation of OT and NT: in Eusebius of Emesa's observation (Hom. 11, p. 261 Buytaert) that we should not have recourse to allegory to resolve the difficulties of a passage, we seem to hear Porphyry's criticism reechoed.

Among the Cappadocians, if *Gregory of Nyssa remained faithful to the letter and spirit of Origenian exegesis, whose spiritual dimension he particularly utilized (Commentary on Song of Songs, Life of Moses), *Basil's Hexaemeron shows traces of the new way of evaluating the OT: not so much in its isolated attacks on allegorism (Hexaem. 3, 9), as in its reading the biblical account of creation in a spirit of scientific erudition (7 and 8 on the creation of the animals). His commentary on certain psalms also restricts their christological meaning in favor of moral teaching, following a tendency favored by preachers of the time. The founder of the school of Antioch—a reality quite different from the Alexandrian school, as it was not controlled by the local bishop—was *Diodore of Tarsus (second half 4th c.); its greatest representative was his disciple *Theodore of Mopsuestia, since *John Chrysostom's interests were mainly in oratory, though in the context of a literalist Antiochene exegesis. *Theodoret of Cyrrhus (first half 5th c.) closes the series of these great exegetes: unlike his predecessors, he left a bit of room for traditional typology. The literalism of Diodore (of whom only fragments remain, to which has recently been added a Commentary on the Psalms) and Theodore was fed by historical interests and was openly polemical against Alexandrian allegorism and its hermeneutical procedures, against which they also wrote (lost) theoretical works. In theory, Theodore maintained the hermeneutical principle that certain OT passages were to be understood as typoi of Christ, and he even established rules to identify them (PG 66, 320-321), but in practice he restricted the application of the rule as much as possible: he interpreted only four psalms (2, 8, 44, 109) christologically, and he denied any christological meaning to the Song of Songs, seeing it only as a profane love song. Typology tended to link OT and NT; but Theodore saw more break than continuity between them. For this reason he was a good exegete of Paul, while his programmatic literalism cut him off from the symbolic riches of John's gospel.

A near-contemporary of Theodore was the Alexandrian *Didymus, whose vast exegetical output (partially restored by the Tura papyri) attests the persistence of the Origenian tradition at Alexandria: everything in him is derived from his master, from theoretical principles to the whole baggage of hermeneutical procedures, with a tendency to a spiritualistic type of interpretation sensitive to the needs of monastic life. But with *Cyril of Alexandria the unity of the Alexandrian exegetical ratio entered a crisis: on the one hand, an evident historical interest led him to make use of the literal sense of the OT books he interpreted, esp. when they concerned the historical vicissitudes of Israel; on the other, he felt the weight of the Antiochene criticisms of excessive allegorism and he expressly declared that the christological reading of the OT should not be indiscriminately extended to the whole text, as Origen and Didymus wished, but should be limited to certain passages (PG 71, 600-601). Consequently his OT commentaries (Isaiah, Minor Prophets) show a mixture of letter and allegory that is less open to Antiochene criticism, but which lacks the compactness of the traditional interpretation. Even his commentary on John, a text so well suited to symbolic interpretation, suffers from his limiting stance toward allegorism.

In the East the fashion for patristic *florilegia, compiled for the demands of theological polemic, had already begun in Cyril's day. They reflect a general literary exhaustion which, in the specific field of exegesis, was expressed in the composition of *catenae, i.e., commentaries made by bringing together, in the margin of a biblical text, verse by verse, a number of interpretations of famous exegetes. This convenient system of compilation, begun by *Procopius of Gaza in the 6th c., has preserved interpretations taken from now-vanished texts, but it also facilitated their disappearance, since the summary proved more handy than the original. But even in the 7th c. we note the effective survival of the methods of Alexandrian exegesis in *Anastasius the Sinaite, and in the 6th c. the first Greek commentaries, by *Oecumenius and *Andrew of Caesarea, on the Apocalypse, a book much neglected in the East as a result of antimillenarian polemic.

In the field of exegesis the West lagged perceptibly behind the East. Tertullian, *Novatian and Cyprian use many biblical passages in their works, but had no specific exegetical interests. Hippolytus of Rome (to be distinguished from the Eastern author of the commentaries on Song of Songs, Daniel, etc.), part of whose commentary on the Psalms has survived (though attributed to him not without reservation), did have exegetical interests; but he still wrote in Greek. For the first Latin exegetical works we must await the late 3rd and early 4th c.: *Reticius of Autun, author of a lost commentary on Song of Songs, and *Victorinus of Petovium (Pettau), whose surviving commentary on the Apocalypse reveals millenarian sympathies. Only in the second half of the 4th c. did this type of literature begin to be cultivated with interest, both in homilies and in commentaries intended only for reading: for this latter genre, we mention *Hilary (commentaries on Matthew and Psalms), for the former *Ambrose, whose many OT commentaries and that on Luke are derived from collections of homilies: we know how much his preaching influenced *Augustine. In fact both Hilary and Ambrose made the Alexandrian type of exegesis known in the West, its hermeneutical principles prevailing with the spread of Platonic philosophy (Origen, Plotinus, Porphyry) in the West. It was this type of strongly allegorizing exegesis that allowed certain harsh OT anthropomorphisms to be presented in a way accessible to the sensibility of educated people, while the composition of verse paraphrases (*Juvencus, *Sedulius, etc.) sought to make up for the insufficiencies of language and style in the too-literal Latin translations of Scripture from the Greek text. Special mention must be made of *Tyconius and *Marius Victorinus. Tyconius, a *Donatist sui generis, wrote the Liber regularum, in which he presents some hermeneutical rules aimed at facilitating an allegorical understanding of the sacred text, and a fundamental commentary on the Apocalypse, lost but for large fragments. In the latter he downplayed the work's eschatological tension, referring it not just to the end times, but to the whole time of the church; he also spiritualized its interpretation in an antimillenarian sense and softened its anti-Roman animus. This work inspired subsequent Western commentaries on the Apocalypse, and indeed from them we can reconstruct the Tyconian exegesis. Marius Victorinus, the famous grammaticus slightly earlier than Tyconius and a convert to Christianity in his old age, was the first Westerner to comment on some of Paul's epistles (those on Galatians, Philippians and Ephesians survive). Standing outside the patristic tradition, he comments on them in a rigidly literal way according to the rules of scholastic commentary on classical authors, bringing out well the Pauline opposition between law and grace.

These commentaries of Marius Victorinus suggest two considerations of a more general nature: (1) it is clear that Victorinus knows little or nothing of the OT; we see almost the same ignorance earlier in *Lactantius; the fact that some preachers of this time (Ambrose, *Zeno, *Gregory of Elvira) insist particularly on OT themes argues that this was something their flocks needed to be instructed on, proof of a fairly generalized ignorance of the OT in the West. (2) Interest in Paul did not remain confined to Victorinus but developed greatly in the late 4th and early 5th c., esp. at Rome, related to the increased interest in the problems of the relation between divine grace and human free will, as various commentaries attest (*Ambrosiaster, Jerome, *Pelagius, Origen-Rufinus on Romans, an epistle that particularly interested Augustine). If Jerome depended closely on Origen and so was happy to allegorize, Ambrosiaster and Pelagius preferred a literal interpretation, proof of the spread, in the West too, of the literalistic tendency that we noticed in the East in the course of the 4th c. This tendency, which culminated in *Julian of Eclanum (commentaries on some minor prophets), closely dependent on Theodore of Mopsuestia, was decidedly surpassed by the allegorizing tendency, though not without an awareness of the danger of an exaggerated allegorism.

The acme of Western exegesis was in the late 4th and early 5th c., with Jerome and Augustine. Jerome was trained exegetically in the East, at Didymus's school and on Origen's books, and his first experiments (on Ecclesiastes, Galatians, Ephesians, etc.) are little more than paraphrases summarizing Origenian commentaries. But gradually, through the effect of the Origenist controversy, Jerome distanced himself from the master's allegorism, while appreciating more and more his philological and critical rigor. The main fruit of this rethinking was the Latin version of the OT, based on the original Hebrew with the help of Greek translations; this was a new and sensational phenomenon for Latin culture, usually deaf to the needs of philological criticism, so much so that Jerome encountered difficulties in getting his translation accepted, though ultimately his fame rocketed. His mature exegesis, dedicated mainly to the major and minor Prophets, was in theory frequently critical of allegory (Ep. 53, 7), though he continued to support Origen's tripartite interpretation (Ep. 120, 12). His procedure combines the dictates of philology with those of allegory: he critically discusses each passage he examines, comparing the Hebrew text and the Greek translations, esp. that of the LXX; then the literal and spiritual (allegorical) interpretations follow, the latter taken from Origen and Didymus. Even the commentary on Matthew, his one mature exegetical work dedicated to the NT, though programmatically literal, is still variously indebted to Origenian allegorism.

As for Augustine, even his personal life interests the history of exegesis: we must suppose many educated people of the time to have shared his initial distaste for the OT because of its many anthropomorphisms and the bad form of the Latin translation, as well as his overcoming of this distaste thanks to Ambrose's allegorical and spiritualistic exegesis. On the strength of this experience, the early Augustine was strongly allegoristic in his explanation of Genesis against the Manicheans. But his allegorical fervor decreased with time (De Genesi ad litteram), though he always preferred the spiritual type of interpretation to the literal. His activity was expressed both in commentaries made for reading—returning several times to the book of Genesis—and in both isolated and serial preaching (Enarrationes in Psalmos, Tractatus in Iohannem), aimed at drawing from the biblical text the greatest possible spiritual nourishment for his rough hearers, to whose level he sought to adapt the tone of his discourse. His great theoretical work in four books, De doctrina christiana, made Scripture the sole foundation of Christian culture and gave rules of interpretation, in part taken from Tyconius, which fully respected the demands of philology and spirituality as well as the freedom of the interpreter: a difficult text allows of different interpretations, as long as they are not contrary to recta fides (III, 27).

The general decline of Christian letters in the West caused by the barbarian invasions had ruinous repercussions on exegesis: the few works dedicated to it from the mid-5th to the 7th c. were mostly content to repeat, usually abbreviating, the interpretations of the great exegetes of the past, esp. Jerome and Augustine (*Isidore of Seville, *Julian of Toledo), while commentators on the Apocalypse, a work much read because it was felt to be in tune with those dramatic times, went back to Tyconius (Caesarius, Apringius, Primasius, in the 6th c.). The manuals of exegetical theory by *Eucherius and *Junilius sanctioned the preeminence of allegorical interpretation, which found in *Gregory the Great, at the end of the 6th c., an exegete capable of reviving in a new and personal way the suggestions inherited from Augustine and others (Moralia in Iob, etc.). *John Cassian (early 5th c.) attests (Coll. 14, 8), alongside the old norm of three senses of Scripture, that of four senses, destined for great popularity in the Middle Ages: to the three traditional senses (literal, spiritual [typological], moral [psychological]), he adds the anagogical, which sees earthly realities as the symbol of heavenly realities.

G. Bardy, Commentaires patristiques de la Bible: DBS 2, 73-103; The Cambridge History of the Bible I (1970) 412-586; B. de Margerie, Introduction à l'histoire de l'exégèse I, Paris 1980; M. Simonetti, Profilo storico dell'esegesi patristica, Rome 1981; M. Fiedrowicz, Exegese: LACL (1998) 226-228; M. Simonetti, Lettera e/o Allegoria. Un contributo alla storia dell'esegesi patristica, Rome 1985; K. Froelich (ed.), Biblical Interpretation in the Early Church, Philadelphia 1985; J.N. Guinot, *La typologie comme technique herméneutique: Figures de l'Ancien Testament chez les Pères*m Cahiers de Biblia Patristica 2, Strasbourg 1989; E. Norelli, La Bibbia nell'antichità cristiana 1. Da Gesù a Origene, Bologna 1993; C. Kannengiesser, Die Bibel in der frühen Kirche: CoeD 27 (1991) 25-30; A. Quacquarelli, Esegesi biblica e patristica tra tardo antico e altomedioevo, Bari 1991; C. Schäublin, Pagane Prägung der christlichen Exegese, in J.V. Oort - U. Wickert (eds.), Die christliche Exegese zwischen Nicaea und Chalcedon, Kampen 1992, 148-173; S. Felici (ed.), Esegesi e catechesi nei

Padri (secc. II-IV), Rome 1993; secc. IV-VII, Rome 1994; M. Canévet, Bible et les Pères: NRTh 116 (1994) 48-60; J.V. Banning, Allegorische Schriftauslegung: ZKTh 117 (1995) 265-295; C. Moreschini (ed.), Esegesi, parafrasi e compilazione in età tardoantica: Atti del III convegno dell'associazione di Studi Tardoantichi, Naples 1995; G. Schöllgen (ed.), Stimuli. Die Exegese und ihre Hermeneutikin Antike und Christentum. Festschrift f. E. Dassmann, Münster 1996; M. Fiedrowicz, Prinzipien der Schriftauslegung in der Alten Kirche, Bern 1997; L'esegesi nei Padri Latini. Dalle origini a Gregorio Magno. XXVIII Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Roma, 6-8 May 1999, 2 vols., Rome 2000; Ch. Kannengiesser, Handbook of Patristic Exegesis, Leiden 2004.

M. Simonetti

EXHORTATIO DE PAENITENTIA. A collection of biblical passages on the theme of *penance. The title probably derives from the text's beginning, which speaks of remission of sins for those who turn to God with a sincere heart. The invitation to do penance (agere paenitentiam) is in fact defined as the act of returning to God (convertere ad Dominum, Sir 17:23). The text essentially takes up the teaching of the prophets, calling God's people to conversion, revertere considered a synonym for convertere (Is 31:6; Jer 3:12, 14, 22; Ezek 18:30; Zech 1:3; Hos 14:2; Sir 17:23). The author presents various texts of the prophets to convince the sinner to trust in divine mercy (Is 54:8), since the hour has arrived to return to the Lord, whose justice does not leave the sinner to die in his sin. Many NT passages are also adduced, e.g., from Acts (8:19), St. Paul (2 Cor 7:10; 2:10; 12:20; 13:2; 2 Tim 2:16) and Revelation (Rev 2:5). The texts' silence on gospel passages concerning conversion is curious. This does not diminish its literary value, in which the choice of the many *Scripture verses confirms the connection between them, so as to create a dialogue between God and the sinner. Although *Cyprian was considered a possible author, this hypothesis has been abandoned for insufficient evidence. The African Latin version of the Bible was already widely circulated in Cyprian's time and had many editions. Nor can we indicate with certainty the date of this text.

CPL 65; PL, 4,1153-1158; Patrologia I, 601; B. Capelle, Le texte du psautier latin en Afrique, Rome 1913, 51, n. 2.

M.W. Libambu

EXODUS

I. The Fathers of the first 2 c. - II. The Greek Fathers from the 3rd c. - III. Writers in Syriac - IV. The Latin Fathers.

I. The Fathers of the first 2 c. Great attention was given to the Exodus from the start. *Clement of Rome's Letter to the Corinthians uses the Exodus to exhort the faithful to obedience, seeing the Mosaic institutions as a typological figure of the church's ministries (esp. chs. 40-43, 53). The *Epistle of Barnabas emphasizes the break with the OT: what matters in the Exodus is its spiritual and allegorical interpretation (chs. 4, 12, 14-15). *Justin's Dialogue with Trypho contains many typological interpretations of the Exodus (DSp IV, col. 1974). *Irenaeus says that the typology of the Exodus is a tradition received from the Presbyters, which we have no right to ignore (Adv. haer. IV, 30-31; examples in DSp IV, 1974). The Homily on Easter, published under the name of *Melito of Sardis, is a parallel between the first Passover and the passion.

II. The Greek Fathers from the 3rd c. *Clement of Alexandria was very interested in the Exodus, often in dependence on Alexandrian Jewish traditions, and esp. on *Philo (J. Daniélou, Sacramentum Futuri, Paris 1950, 191-193; C. Mondésert, Intr. to SC 30, 36-37). The first works explicitly dedicated to the Exodus are those of *Origen: Homilies on Exodus and Scholia on Exodus, preserved in the catenae (Devreesse, 41-44), to which we must add two books On Easter, perhaps part of the eight Homilies on *Easter mentioned by Eusebius (ed. O. Guéraud and P. Nautin, Origène, Sur la Pâque, Paris 1979), as well as numerous pages from other works of Origen, esp. his Homilies on Numbers (Eng. tr., T.P. Scheck, ACT, Downers Grove, IL 2009), Leviticus and Joshua, and the Scholia on these books. In the Exodus Origen sees, besides the historical sense, three others: an allegorical sense (applied to Christ and the church), a moral or tropological sense (applied to the life of each Christian) and an anagogical or eschatological sense (reserved for the consummation of the ages) (see *Exegesis, patristic): see H. de Lubac, Histoire et Esprit. L'intelligence de l'Ecriture d'après Origène, Paris 1950; Exégèse Médiévale, I, Paris 1959, 198-207. Also see the main references in DSp IV, 1976–1979. *Eusebius of Caesarea's works contain many teachings on the Exodus; see esp. the important fragment De solemnitate paschali (CPG 3479), which applies the prescriptions concerning the Jewish Passover to the Christian life; but also numerous other passages: DSp IV, 1979. Some texts of *Didymus of Alexandria on the Exodus are preserved in the catenae (Devreesse, 172); an edition of new texts discovered at Tura was made by P. Nautin and L. Doutreleau (CPG Suppl. 2546). Of the Cappadocians, apart from some passages in *Basil and *Gregory of Na-zianzus, we must cite mainly *Gregory of Nyssa's Life of Moses, composed of two parts: one historical, but also based on extrabiblical traditions; the other allegorical, containing a description of the perfect life using the patterns of the Exodus (J. Daniélou, Sacramentum Futuri, 191-203; W. Völker, Gregor von Nyssa als Mystiker, Wiesbaden 1955). *Cyril of Jerusalem's Catechesis and John of Jerusalem's Mystagogical Catechesis contain numerous parallels between the Christian situation and the events of the Exodus: III, 5; XII, 28; XIII, 20-21; XVI, 25; Myst. I, 2-3. Some fragments of *Diodore of Tarsus on the Exodus are preserved in the Greek catenae or in a Latin translation published by Pitra (CPG 3815 and 3817). Important fragments of Eusebius of Emesa are also preserved in the catenae (Devreesse, 82-94). Numerous passages in the works of St. John Chrysostom treat of the Exodus, in particular in his Homilies on 1 Cor 9 (PG 61, 190-193) and 1 Cor 10 (PG 51, 241-252); for other references see DSp IV, 1980ff. Theodore of Mopsuestia comments abundantly on the Exodus in his Commentary on Psalm 77 (ed. Devreesse, 517-541). Much of the teaching of these authors recurs in Theodoret of Cyrrhus's Questions on the Exodus. Of *Severian of Gabala we must cite esp. the Homilia de Serpente. A scholium of *Hesychius of Jerusalem on Ex 3:8 (Devreesse, 181) clearly indicates his principle of interpretation, which he applies in the Commentary on Leviticus: the events of the Exodus apply to the church. We can draw abundantly on Cyril of Alexandria's Glaphyra in Pentateuchum and other passages in his works, esp.: De ador. et cultu in spiritu et verit. 1 and 5; Comment. in Joan. 3, 6; Hom. 60 in Lc. (CSCO 140, 155-156); his interpretation follows Origen. We must also mention an extract of *Gennadius of Constantinople on Exodus 26 (CPG 3970), a sermon of *Basil of Seleucia on Moses (CPG 6656, 9) and two pseudo-Athanasian homilies on Easter, probably by the same author (CPG 6657-6658). In ps.-*Dionysius, as in Gregory of Nyssa, Moses's ascent of Mt. Sinai becomes a model of spiritual ascent (Ep. 8, 1; Mystical theology 1). Many details concerning the Exodus can be found in the work of *Severus of Antioch: see the fragments cited by Devreesse (187-201) and the Cathedral Homily 67 on the Virgin Mary (PO 8, 349-367). In *John Climacus's Scala Paradisi, the Exodus is interpreted in terms of the monastic life: see esp. Steps 1 and 2 (PG 88, 632ff.).

III. Writers in Syriac. *Aphraate's Demonstrations 11 and 12 apply to Christians the prescriptions of the Exodus on the Passover and those on the crossing of the Jordan (PS I, 501-502 and 505ff.). *Ephrem makes numerous references to the Exodus and gives great prominence to the figure of Moses; see esp. his Commentary on the Exodus (CSCO 152-153), whose interpretation is mainly christological and ecclesial. In the Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles, preserved in Armenian, there are also many texts referring esp. to 1 Cor 10 and Hebrews. For *Jacob of Sarug, see esp. his Homily on Moses's Veil. *Philoxenus of Mabbug systematically uses the Exodus to describe the Christian's spiritual journey; see esp. Homilies 7, 9 and 13 in E. Lemoine's translation (SC 44).

IV. The Latin Fathers. For *Hippolytus of Rome, see esp. his commentary on the Blessings of Moses; but numerous other citations are scattered throughout his works (DSp IV, 1975). For *Tertullian, we must cite esp. books 2-4 of Adversus Marcionem, chs. 1-6 of Adversus Judaeos and the treatise De Baptismo, very important for sacramental typology. For a Christian interpretation of the Exodus, *Cyprian's Testimonia ad Quirinum are a first-rate source. Along the same lines, we must point out St. *Hilary's Tractatus mysteriorum, *Zeno of Verona's Tractatus or Sermones 1 and 2, and *Gregory of Elvira's Tractatus de libris scripturarum. St. Ambrose is one of the richest sources for the spiritual interpretation of the Exodus, esp. from the liturgical perspective: see De sacramentis, De mysteriis, as well as many of his commentaries on the psalms (DSp IV, 1983). See also *Gaudentius of Brescia's first 6 Tractatus on the Exodus and some of Ambrosiaster's Quaestiones Veteris et Novi Testamenti. To St. *Jerome's homily De Exodo in vigilia Paschae we must add Ep. 22, 68 and esp. Ep. 78 to *Fabiola, which applies the stages of the desert to the Christian life, taking inspiration from Origen's Homily 27 on Numbers (see A. Méhat, in SC 29, 13-16 and 48-64). Of *Paulinus of Nola, we may mention Carmen 26. Cyprianus Gallus's 5th-c. poem Heptateuchos (ed. R. Peiper, CSEL 23, Vienna, 1891) is a historical summary of the exodus story (cf. *Sedulius's Paschale Carmen and Opus Paschale).

St. *Augustine's work is very rich in references to the Exodus. The main traditional themes are grouped in the following passages: Contra Faustum 12, 29-30; De catechizandis rudibus 20; Sermones 352 and 363; In Johannis Evangelium 26, 12 and 28, 9. The Exodus is usually interpreted in terms of the life of Christians, freed from slavery to sin and pilgrims in search of the promised land. Many texts consider the Paschal lamb and the Passover (main references in M. Pontet, L'exégèse de S. Augustin prédicateur, Paris 1945, 360-361; to them we must add Ep. 55, 2.3.9.17.30). The Quaestiones in Heptateuchum are generally confined to the literal historical sense. Some particular themes are the crossing of the Red Sea (Serm. Wilmart 5, 2), Mara (Quaest. in Heptat. 2, 57), the water from the rock (Contr. Faust. 16, 15-17; Civ. Dei, 13, 21), the bronze serpent (Serm. 6, 7), Moses's fast (Ep. 55, 28; Serm. 205, 1; 210, 8; cf. M. Pontet, ibid., 302), etc. On the theophanies to Moses, see J. Lebreton, S. Augustin théologien de la Trinité. Son exégèse des théophanies, in Misc. Agost. 2, 821-836. De promissionibus et praedictionibus Dei, probably by Quodvultdeus, bishop of Carthage, contains a commentary on the events of the Exodus which depends on Origen, as does the ps.-Ambrosian treatise De XLII mansionibus filiorum Israel.

With *John Cassian, the Exodus becomes the image of the monastic life, the direct and certain way, the main road leading to God (Conlat. 24, 24-25; cf. J. Leclercq, La voie royale: Vie Spir. Supp. 7 [1948] 347ff.). In the Exodus are found models for the monastic vocation (Conlat. 3, 3-4), lessons for resisting temptation (3, 7), for spiritual combat (5, 14-16), etc. (DSp II, 235). Along the same lines, *Eucherius, a monk at *Lérins before becoming bishop of *Lyons, praises the desert in his De laude heremi: it is the place where we meet God, like Moses and the people who left Egypt. The same teachings, but with a much wider perspective, recur in *Gregory the Great: the Moralia in Iob frequently compare the problems of the spiritual life with the episodes of the Exodus (DSp IV, 1986-1987); a fine parallel between the first Passover and the *Eucharist is in Hom. 2 in Evangelia 7-9. An important series of sermons by St. *Caesarius of Arles concerns the Exodus: Serm. 95-116. The author depends mainly on Origen, but also on Augustine and Gregory of Elvira, and applies the main teachings of the Exodus to daily Christian life. In *Cassiodorus's Expositio Psalmorum, see esp. psalms 77, 94, 104, 105, 113, 134, 135. *Isidore of Seville's Quaestiones in Vetus Testamentum contain a rich spiritual explanation of the Exodus, influenced by Origen but also by Jerome's Letter to Fabiola. Besides the commentaries attributed to him, *Bede wrote De mansionibus filiorum Israel (Epist. 14) and De tabernaculo et vasis eius ac vestibus sacerdotum, influenced by Isidore and Origen.

CPL 5, 118; LCI 2, 436-442; 3, 282-297; RAC 7, 22-44; F.J. Doelger, Der Durchzug durch das Rote Meer als Sinnbild der christlichen Taufe: AC 2 (1930) 63-69; Id., Der Durchzug durch den Jordan als Sinnbild der christlichen Taufe: ibid. 70-79; H. Scheidt, Die Taufwasserweihegebete im Sinne vergleichender Liturgieforschung untersucht, Münster 1935; P. Lundberg, La typologie baptismale dans l'ancienne Église, Uppsala 1942; J. Daniélou, Sacramentum Futuri, Paris 1950, 131-256; Id., Bible et Liturgie, Paris 1951; F. Hofmans, De profet Mozes in de Apologie van sint Justinus martelaar: EThL 30 (1954) 416-439; R.M. Tonneau, Moïse dans la Tradition Syrienne, in Moïse, homme de l'Alliance, Paris 1955, 245-265; J. Daniélou, Moïse, exemple et figure chez Grégoire de Nysse, ibid. 267-282; A. Luneau, Moïse et les Pères latins: ibid. 283-303; O. Rousseau, Les mystères de l'Exode d'après les Pères: Bible et vie chrétienne 9 (1955) 31-42; R. Devreesse, Les anciens commentateurs grecs de l'Octateuque et des Rois, Vatican City 1959; P. Prigent, L'Epître de Barnabé et ses sources, Paris 1961, 60-141; R. Le Déaut - J. Lécuyer, s.v. Exode: DSp IV, 1961, 1957-1995; J. Rousse, s.v. Lectio divina: DSp IX, 472-481; P.M. Guillaume, s.v. Moïse: DSp X, 1464-1471; H.J. Sieben, Exegesis Patrum, Rome 1983, 22-25; G. Rinaldi, Biblia Gentium, Rome 1989, 264-281; M. Sæbø (ed.), Hebrew Bible/Old Testament 1. The History of Its Interpretation 1-2, Göttingen 1996–2000; D. von der Nahmer, Agiografia altomedievale e uso della Bibbia, Naples 2001; J.T. Lienhard (ed.), Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy (ACCS, Old Testament, 3), Downers Grove, IL 2001.

J. Lécuyer

EXORCISM - EXORCIST. The Latin word exorcismus (sometimes exorchismus) derives from the Greek ἐξορκισμός, and designates the action exercised by pagan priests, in the name of the ancient deities, to cast out impure or evil spirits (actio exorcizandi, actio expellendi). In this sense the practice was widespread in pagan antiquity, using magic formulas, dance and purification rites. In Christian Latin a theological specification was added: the action of casting out demons in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. This new semantics was enriched by the reading of the gospels. Indeed, some spoke of exorcismum agere (Tert., Praescr. 41; Spect. 26; Cyp., Sent. 37; Aug., C. Iul. 3, 9,18). This action came to be increasingly part of the liturgy, esp. *baptism, which required confirmation on the part of the church by a minister called precisely an exorcist (Cyp., Ep. 23; Isid., Eccl. Off. 2, 13). The Cod. Theod. 16, 2, 24 lists him after the subdeacon (presbyteros, diaconos, subdiaconos, adque exorcistas et lectores, ostiarios etiam et omnes perinde, qui sunt, personalium munerum expertes esse praecipimus) (ibid.). The exorcist received from the bishop the power to lay hands on the sick and on catechumens (potestatem inponendi manus super inergumenos sive catecumenos) (Isid., Eccl. Off. 2, 13). Outside of the context of the baptismal liturgy, *Augustine recognizes in the exorcist one who can understand the sounds of the words spoken by a person tormented by the devil (cum daemon in eis loquitur ea passione, cui exorcista requiritur, sciunt, quid loquantur: quanto minus ille intellegeret verborum sonos) (Gen. litt. II, 36). So, it was in the context of a rite of exorcism (ritus exorcizandi in ecclesia Christi ante baptismum) that this power was used in word and in action.

The conception of exorcism in Christian antiquity derives basically from Jewish faith in the divine power to cast out demons and unclean spirits. In the early church, the fruitfulness of the practice of exorcism was a consequence of the Lord's command in the gospels; indeed, casting out demons was a sign that announced the coming of the kingdom of God (Mk 16:17; Mt 18:19). The disciples were conscious of and convinced that they were continuing Jesus' messianic work in the world. In the apologetic context, exorcism quickly became an argument apt for proving and demonstrating the truth of the Christian religion, which many passages of the apologists confirm.

In the East, the Greek Fathers stand out for their claim of the superiority of Christians vis-à-vis magic and the pagan gods. In other words, Christians, even if less educated, were able to perform these acts because of their faith in God, who renders effective his grace, inherent in their religion (C. Cels. 4, 1). During this period it can be said that exorcism was a part of the church's daily life. At the church's beginnings, however, exorcism properly speaking did not yet exist. The presence of this power in laypeople, men or women, was not ruled out. In fact all Christians, esp. those who had the charism, could use this power according to need, even with all the risks of abuse. *Athanasius insists on the fact that the Christian religion had freed human beings from their servitude to the lies of paganism, casting out the demons' deceptions by the *cross (Incarn. Verbi 47). Indeed, one of the novelties of exorcism in the patristic period in the East was the Lord's cross as a symbol of God's victory over the powers of evil. St. *Epiphanius speaks of healing through faith and the sign of the cross. But at the same time, the church attended to prebaptismal exorcism through *catechesis. Among the Eastern Fathers, *Cyril of Jerusalem gave particular attention to this liturgy, showing the link between exorcism and Sacred *Scripture, and esp. its link with the mystery of the cross. In any case, beyond its function in the propagation of the new religion, the Fathers linked exorcism to the question of health, emphasizing a theology of integral salvation, since the health of a person possessed by the devil was often compromised due to the consequences of their sins. *Gregory of Nyssa, recounting the life of St. *Ephrem, stresses the fact that a possessed person was freed from demons after confessing his sin of avarice and cupidity to the saint, who healed him through prayer and the laying on of hands.

In the West also, the first evidence of exorcism had primarily an apologetic purpose. *Minucius Felix says that demons are inferior to the power of the one God (Octavius 27). *Tertullian uses exorcism as a testimony to the true religion in his apology against the pagans, saying that the order given by Christians causes demons, who had falsely proclaimed themselves gods, to flee. The novelty here was undoubtedly the fact that Christians could exercise this power of Christ freely, as opposed to the pagans who demanded payment for their services (Apol. 33). The stress on the theology of divine power, probably a result of interpretation of the first article of the Creed (Credo in Deum Patrem omnipotentem), also appears in *Cyprian, when he tries to convince his interlocutor, Demetrianus, about the demons' flight during exorcism (Demetr. 14, 15). Here the bishop of *Carthage wants to emphasize the dramatic victory of the divine power over his enemy, the devil; he stresses the fact that the devil groans and shrieks before being cast out. This is not an unimportant detail: many other Latin Fathers take it up in their descriptions of exorcism, to underscore the collapse of the pagan gods, incarnated in the demons who have been cast out. On the whole, the evidence highlights the actualization of the divine power through human words and gestures, in particular through the laying on of hands. Nonetheless, it was rightly held that the divine power was not limited to a particular human gesture or word. St. *Martin, for example, prayed silently during an exorcism without touching the possessed person.

Considering the seriousness of this mission, the early church insisted on spiritual preparation—prayer and fasting—before performing an exorcism. But with the passage of time, the practice of exorcism was subjected to the oversight of episcopal authority, so as to avoid the abuses and dangers associated with this ministry. Thus exorcism had to be recognized as a ministry of the church, and the exorcist, being part of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, had to refrain from any private employment (law of 5 March 377). This arrangement was insisted upon so that exorcism, like all other ministries, would be exercised within the church, full time, and apart from any financial interest. Hence the practice of exorcism as an ecclesiastical ministry was no longer left to the spontaneity of the faithful, but had to follow at least a certain order recognized by the church, since it involved an authoritative prayer: the command to the demon to depart. The ritual, in fact, was composed mainly of formulas of prayer imitating Jesus' words in the gospels; the power of these words could make those possessed by demons shout and tremble. *Hilary testifies to this in Psalm 64, as does *Sulpicius Severus regarding St. Martin (Dialog. III, 6). Simplicity was insisted on in the formulas—not too much refinement or rhetorical enhancement. Some elements of the rite were accepted only after many years: breathing on the person, *anointing with oil, use of a cross (as *Athanasius and *Cyril of Jerusalem testify). A certain freedom must be recognized both in the choice of formulas and in the order of the elements of the ritual, since exorcism was not only a ministry, but also a charism linked to a specific person. St. Euphrasia (d. 410), for example, used her mother superior's staff to strike at and cast out the demons. One of the oldest rituals of exorcism is Egyptian in origin: it used the explicit formula of authority to cast out the demon, after invoking the names of the patriarchs, the saints and Christ.

To sum up, we can say that the practice of exorcism began in private houses, to later enter into the churches through the liturgy, esp. the baptismal liturgy. At this time Christians began to distinguish the exorcism of a possessed person from the exorcism of the unbaptized. Certain liturgical acts therefore came to be fixed: prayer, laying on of hands, use of oil. In Augustine the word exorcismus, though it appears rarely, is used in the context of the fight against *Pelagianism. As a rite of purification done by the minister during the baptism of infants, exorcism became a strong argument not only regarding the universality of original sin, but also concerning the will of Christians to break every tie with the devil (Pecc. meritis et remissione de bapt. parvul. 1, 34, 63).

RAC 7, 44-117; LTK³ 3, 1125-1126; ThLL 5, 1554-1558; DACL, 5, 964-978; DTC, 5, 1762-1780; ibid., 1780-1786; DDC 5, 668-671; F.J. Dölger, Der Exorzismus im altchristlichen Taufritual, Paderborn 1909; A. Blaise - H. Chirat, Dictionnaire Latin-Français des auteurs chrétiens, Strasbourg 1954, 331; A. Adnès - P. Canivet, Guérisons miraculeuses et exorcismes dans l'Histoire Philothée de Théodoret de Cyr: RHR 171 (1967) 53-82, 149-179; O. Boecher, Christus exorcista, Stuttgart 1972; B. Kleinheyer, Keine Handauflegung zur Weihe von Exorzisten: RBen 90 (1980) 141-147; H.A. Kelly, The Devil at Baptism. Ritual, Theology, and Drama, Ithaca 1985; R.J.S. Barrett-Lennard, Christian Healing After the New Testament. Some Approaches to Illness in the Second, Third and Fourth Centuries, Lanham - New York - London 1994; A. Destro - M. Pesce, Paolo, l'esorcismo e la magia secondo gli Atti degli Apostoli, in Atti del II Simposio di Tarso su s. Paolo Apostolo, Rome 1994, 89-116; A. Monaci Castagno, Il diavolo e i suoi angeli. Testi e tradizioni (secoli I-III), Florence 1996; W. Cotter, Miracles in Greco-Roman Antiquity, A Sourcebook, London 1999; T.M. Finn, Exorcism and Social Analysis: The Second Century Roman Christians and Survival: SP 18/3, 141-153; AugL 2, 1188-1193 (ample bibliography); R. Wisniewski, Suspended in the Air. On the Peculiar Case of Exorcism in Late Ancient Christian Literature, in Euergesias Charin, Studies Presented to B. Bravo and E. Wipszycka by Their Disciples, ed. T. Derda et al., Warsaw 2002, 363-380.

M.W. Libambu

EXPIATION. In patristic theology the concept of expiation is found mainly in the soteriological context, and in this case too it develops from biblical categories and images. In the OT, the word that the Vulgate and modern versions render expiatio (purification) or propitiatio (Jerome, Dan. 8,16) corresponds to the Hebrew kipper. This means primarily the action of purifying persons and things to make them once more acceptable to God. It takes place primarily through *sacrifices offered by the priest, but also by other means, such as intercession, suffering (Is 53) and esp. conversion, without which, according to the prophets, there is no expiation (Moraldi, on the OT and Judaism). But this fundamental theme should be considered along with other complementary ones: the doctrine of sin to be expiated, the restoration of the covenant or reconciliation with God, and the pardon of God who, according to the prophets, himself brings about conversion. The NT, esp. Paul and John, takes up this group of themes to describe the saving significance of Jesus' death. More than the OT and Judaism, Paul stresses that God himself reconciles human beings to himself (1 Cor 5:19) in the blood of Jesus Christ, the place of his forgiveness (Rom 3:25; 1 Jn 4:10). Moreover, it is natural for the NT to see God's expiatory work in a christological perspective, putting Jesus' free death above any other means of expiation (see esp. Heb).

This is the line followed by patristic soteriology, which is largely a presentation of the respective biblical themes. In fact Jesus' death, freely offered by him and accepted by his Father for our sins, takes a prominent place in the patristic church (see the creeds). The consideration of Jesus' death as a sacrifice obviously varies according to periods, regions and authors. It would be an exaggeration to consider this approach as typically Western, since it does not appear only in the Latins, nor does it stand out as something exclusively theirs (Turner, Jésus le Sauveur, 101ff.). So if it is true that the Apostolic Fathers see Christ mainly as teacher and moral model, they are also interested in the properly Jewish theme of blood (1 Clem. 7,4; Barn. 5,1); nor do they ignore Christ as priest (1 Clem. 64). The *Apologists, who present Christianity as true philosophy, insist on illumination through the Logos, but do not overlook Jesus' sacrificial death (Just., Dial. 13,1ff.; 40-41; Apol. 1,32,7). *Irenaeus, keeping to the Pauline idea of recapitulation, includes in it reconciliation with God, obtained by obedience unto death (Adv. haer. V,16,3). The *Alexandrians, alongside the theme of true knowledge of God, linked to that of likeness with him, develop their popular theory of the tricking of the devil, and in their works explicitly attest Christ's expiatory death (Orig., Cels. 1,69; Athan., Ar. 2,76; Incarn. 20; Greg. Naz., Or. 30,5; Greg. Nyssa, Apoll.

17; Cyr. of Jer., Cat. 13; cf. Kelly, Doctrines, 377-386). Among *Origen's disciples, *Basil is particularly clear in declaring that only the God-Man, Jesus Christ, could offer an expiation sufficient for all human beings (Hom. Ps. 48, 4).

It is natural that, in the more historical approach of *Antiochene theology, the theme of Jesus' expiatory death found a still more important place (John Chrys., Hom. in Gal. 2,8; Theodor., In Dan. 9,24; cf. Kelly, Doctrines, 385-386, 395-396). In the West, where Christianity was seen primarily as the new religio, and where there was a greater sense of Adam's sin as felix culpa—thematized under the legalistic categories of reatus culpae et poenae—and a greater awareness of the OT law but also of the true justice inculcated by Paul, it is to be expected that the soteriology of sacrificial expiation should be more widespread than in the East (Turner, Jésus le Sauveur, 103-107). Though the themes of Christ's victory and redemption were present everywhere, the Latins were particularly interested in the death that Jesus freely (without debitum mortis) accepted, bearing our sins (Is 53), indeed undergoing our condemnation (1 Cor 5:21; Gal 3:13). If *Tertullian hardly explores soteriological thought—though he affirms that Christ came, free from all sin and perfectly holy, to die for sinners (Pud. 22, Turner 108-109)—his disciple *Cyprian is more explicit on the death undergone for our sins (Turner 109). Even more important is the evidence of *Hilary and *Ambrose (Turner 109-113). According to Hilary, the Son of God accepted death without any necessity to satisfy the obligation for punishment (Ps 53:12; 129–130: Ipse pro peccatis nostris et propitiatio et redemptio et deprecatio est iniquitatum nostrarum). Ambrose, commenting on 2 Cor 5:21, says that God pardoned us, not sparing his Son and making him sin for us (Ps 37:6; Fug. 7,44). Finally, *Augustine, who is distinguished by a very complex soteriology (Ench. 41,108), not only stresses that the sacrifice of the cross, commemorated in the eucharistic *sacrament, has fulfilled and replaced all the sacrifices of the OT (Faust. 20,21), but returns continually to 2 Cor 5:12—which means, according to him, that Christ was made an expiatory sacrifice for us (Lyonnet - Sabourrin, Sin, 211-225). Yet Augustine presents a very spiritual concept of sacrifice (Civ. Dei 10,6). Understanding sacrifice as the unifying action of the one mediator, he does not just answer his Neoplatonist interlocutors, but puts himself in the biblical perspective of conversion, the basis of all expiation.

To evaluate fully the patristic doctrine of Christ's expiatory death, we must bear in mind the following facts. Very soon there was a clear displacement of the expiatory and reconciliatory action, attributed to God himself, to an almost exclusively christological consideration. This is particularly attested by exegesis of 2 Cor 5:19 in which "God" is no longer referred to the Father, but to the Word present in Christ (Iren., Adv. haer. III, 16,9; Greg. Nyssa, Apoll. 18,45; Aug., En. Ps. 67,23; Leo, Serm. 69,4). Moreover, the Fathers, even those who, like Augustine, define sacrifice as an act of love, make little attempt to describe Jesus' expiatory action as supreme love for the Father. Finally, bearing in mind the biblical premises, in particular what is said of Christ as high priest (intercession), spotless victim and just sufferer, it is not surprising that the life of Christians themselves should be, in some way, likened to Jesus' expiatory action. Their whole existence must be a sacrifice pleasing to God (Rom 1:1) (cf. 1 Clem. 36,1; 59,2; Orig., C. Cels. 8,64,2). With the apostle they are called to complete what is lacking in Christ's sufferings for the church (Col 1:24). This goes especially for the sacrifice of martyrdom (Ign., Rom. 2,2); for the sacrificium humilitatis, which penitents must fulfill with the help of priests and faithful (Tertull., Pat. 13; Paen. 9-10); and also for fasting and *ascesis, esp. during Lent (Tertull., Ieiun. 15; Leo, Serm. 12,4; 39,2). Moreover the *Eucharist itself, sacramentum passionis Christi, is also celebrated for the remission of sins (Cypr., Ep. 63,13-14; Ambr., Sacr. IV,6,28; 5,24). It must also be recognized, however, that in sacrificial contexts the idea of expiation in a strict sense (purification or reconciliation through blood) is not made explicit to the same degree. In fact, the Latin tradition of 1 Jn 2:2 attests this, where hilasmos is translated not only as expiatio, but also as deprecatio or placatio (W. Thiele, Vetus Latina 26/1, 262).

J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines, London 1960 (It. tr. Bologna 1972); DSp 4/2, 2026-2045 (Bible); F.H. Kettler, Versöhnung: RGG 6 (1962) 1373-1378; H.E.W. Turner, Jésus le Sauveur, Paris 1965; S. Lyonnet - L. Sabourrin, Sin, Redemption and Sacrifice, Rome 1970; B. Studer, Soteriologie der Kirchenväter: HDG III/2a, Freiburg 1978; B. Studer - J. Werbick, Versöhnung, III: LTK[3] 10, 723ff. (bibl.); C. Gestrich, Sühne, V.: TRE 32 (2001) 348-355 (bibl.).

B. Studer

EXPOSITIO FIDEI CATHOLICAE. Profession of faith (Incipit: Secundum sacramentum sancti symboli Dei) that has reached us in two versions: by an unknown author, in a MS it is attributed to a certain Ambrose, bishop of Chalcedon; but it was also passed down in the works of *Julian of Eclanum (PL 45, 1732-1736; 48, 509-526). Scholars attribute it to various authors: a work of *Pelagian origin (Nuvo-lone, DSp 12, 2922), Ambrose of Altinum (Lanzoni), an author from the region of *Antioch (Bardy), *Ambrose of Milan (Richard). *Theodoret of Cyrrhus cites it as the work of Ambrose of Milan (PG 83, 181-184). One notes dependencies and similarities with the pseudo-Ambrosian De Trinitate (CPPM A/2 27) and with Pelagian works. After a profession of trinitarian faith, the author expounds at length on Christology, on the rejection of *Arianism and on the *incarnation, which occurred non permutatione deitatis; he affirms the two perfect natures in Christ: ex duobus substantiis plenismus. The anthropological part follows: the necessity of *baptism, including for infants, sinful humanity and salvation (it does not mention original sin).

CPL 778; CPPM II/A, 16 and 1225a; PLS 1,1683-1685; (cf. CPL 1771); F. Lanzoni, Le diocesi di Italia, II, Faenza 1927, 909-911; A. Pertusi, Le antiche traduzioni greche delle opere di S. Ambrogio e l'Expositio fidei a lui falsamente attribuita: Aevum 18 (1944) 184-187; G. Bardy, L'Expositio fidei attribué à S. Ambroise, in Miscellanea G. Mercati, ST 121, I, Vatican City 1946, 199-218; M. Richard, Notes sur les florilèges dogmatiques du V^e et du VI^e siècle, in Actes du VI^e Congrès intern. d'études byzantines, Paris 1950, 307-318 (esp. 314-316 = Opera Minora, vol. III, Turnhout 1976, n. II); DSp 12, 2922; C. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Rome 1976, 940-944.

A. Di Berardino

EXTRA ECCLESIAM NULLA SALUS. An axiom which, with slight modification, derives from Cyprian ("salus extra ecclesiam non est": Ep. 73,21,2). Rightly understood, it has biblical roots: Christ is the unique and universal mediator of salvation, and the Christian, through *baptism (Mk 16:16; Jn 3:5), is inserted in a community comparable to the saving ark (1 Pt 3:20-21). The necessity of the church for salvation is therefore based on the unique salvific mediation of Christ. The axiom is anticipated in *Ignatius of Antioch (Phil. 3,2-3), *Irenaeus of Lyons (Adv. Haer. 3,24,1), *Clement Al. (Paed. 1,6,27,2), *Hippolytus of Rome (Com. in Dan 1,17). *Origen, applying typological exegesis to Rahab's house being spared destruction (Josh 2:18-19), expresses himself in a way similar to the classical formulation: "extra hanc domum, id est extra ecclesiam, nemo salvatur" (Hom. Iesu Nave 3,5). *Cyprian also reiterates this idea in Ep. 4,4,3; 55,24,1-2; 74,11,3 and in De unit. 6, declaring that one who does not have the church as a mother cannot have God as a father (see also Ep. 74,7,2; De Laps. 9). These expressions must be set in their historical context: since the Christian community was threatened by schism and heresy, Cyprian defends the church's unity, insisting on the fact that in it are found the means of salvation—in the first place *baptism, which incorporates into the church. He is thus not presenting a principle regarding the eternal salvation of all people, but exhorting his community to be united around Christ and the church, his bride, which participates in the divine plan of redemption. Far from a rigoristic and restrictive interpretation, Cyprian's axiom meant to reassure the faithful that salvation is attained through the church. *Lactantius also echoes Cyprian's axiom: one who does not enter through the church has no part in the hope of life and of eternal salvation (Div. Inst. 4,30,11).

Other Fathers insist rather on the culpability of those who voluntarily exclude themselves from salvation: Ambrose says that they deprive themselves of their own accord of a good offered to all (In Ps 118, sermo 8,57). For *Gregory of Nyssa, those who refuse the gift of faith are to be blamed (Or. Cat. 30), and *Chrysostom holds that there is no salvation for those who do not want to accept Christ (In 1 Tim 2 Hom. 7,2). For *Cyril of Alexandria, "mercy cannot be obtained outside of the holy city" (*In P*s. 30,22).

*Augustine takes up Cyprian's axiom, but inserts it into a precise ecclesiological vision: the bond of unity in the church is the virtue of charity, and whoever breaks it is guilty of grave sin and removes himself from salvation, as he writes of the *Donatists: "One who is an enemy of unity cannot be a partaker of divine charity. Consequently, those who are outside the church do not have the Holy Spirit" (Ep. 185,5; see also Ep. 141,5). One who is outside the Catholic Church can have everything except salvation (Serm. ad Caes. eccl. 6; see also Bapt. 4,17,24: heretics, though they receive baptism validly, derive no benefit from it). There is no cult outside of the Catholic Church capable of purifying the soul of the passions (as e.g., theurgic rites): there is no human redemption that parallels that of Christ (Sermo Dolbeau 26). Exclusion from salvation therefore results from the misuse of freedom and from culpably rejecting the faith that is offered (Spir et litt. 33,58; see also Adv. Iud. 10,15). Those who are not freed by the grace of Christ are justly condemned, since they have some sin (Nat. et grat. 4-5). Among Augustine's followers, *Prosper of Aquitaine held that even the pagans are not denied help (Vocat. 2,17), such that "those without grace are to be blamed for their wrong willing" (ibid. 2,19). *Fulgentius of Ruspe, on the other hand, gives a rigid and exclusivist interpretation of the axiom: only in the Catholic Church can baptism be of any use (De Fide 43-44 and 79-80 [36-37]), and those who "end this life outside of the Catholic Church will go to the eternal fire" (De Fide 81 [38]).

In the course of history the axiom "extra ecclesiam nulla salus" has at times been removed from its proper context and improperly absolutized, in a way that fails to harmonize it with other texts expressing God's universal salvific will (1 Tim 2:4). The original sense of the phrase is that of exhorting the members of the church to fidelity, recognizing that our salvation is brought about only by Christ (Acts 4:12): he makes himself present among us in the church, to which all people, in various ways, are ordained.

Y. Congar, Hors de l'Eglise pas de salut: Cath 5 (1962) 948-956; J. Ratzinger, Il nuovo popolo di Dio, Brescia 1971, 365-390; P. Fietta, L'assioma "extra ecclesiam nulla salus" nel contesto della dottrina ecclesiologica di S. Cipriano: Studia Patavina 22 (1975) 376-416; Id., "Salus extra ecclesiam non est." Indagine storico-teologica sul significato dell'assioma nel pensiero di San Cipriano, Padova 1976; M. Bévenot, "Salus extra Ecclesiam non est" (St. Cyprien), in Fides Sacramenti. Sacramentum Fidei, ed. H. Auf der Maur et al., Assen 1981, 97-105; F.A. Sullivan, Salvation outside the Church? Tracing the History of the Catholic Response, New York 1992; M.T. Marshall, No Salvation Outside the Church? Lewinston 1993; G. Gäde, "Extra Ecclesiam nulla salus"? Ein patristisches Axiom und der heutige religiöse Pluralismus: Catholica 55 (2001) 194-214; R. Dodaro, Agostino d'Ippona, Sermo Dolbeau 26 e la questione della "salus extra ecclesiam": Lateranum 68 (2002) 259-266.

M. Maritano

EXULTET. Various texts exist of the praeconium paschale or blessing of the *Paschal candle. Bishop *Ennodius of Pavia composed two (CSEL 6, 415-422), the Gelasian *Sacramentary gives a brief, simple text of blessing, the *Hispanic Missale mixtum contains two, the *Ambrosian missal one (Schmidt, Hebdomada Sancta, II, 627-628). But the most popular was the *Gallican Exultet, introduced to Rome by the 8th-c. Gelasian Sacramentaries.

The Exultet's origin is uncertain, but it is clear that it was inspired by *Ambrose. Textual analysis shows, if not Ambrose's hand, at least his mind: e.g., "non prodesset nasci nisi redimi profuisset" (Exp. in Luc. 2, 41: CCL 14, 49), or "Felix ruina quae reparatur in melius" (In Ps. 39, 20, 1: PL 14, 1116). The part of the Exultet that speaks of bees was inspired by Virgil, Georg. IV, 56-57: e.g., "ingentis animo augusto in pectore versant" or "aliae purissima mella stipant, et liquido distendunt nectare cellas." In his letter to Praesidius (Morin, Pour l'authenticité), Jerome derides this praise of the bees as entirely out of place in the *Easter liturgy.

The text of the Exultet has three main parts: introduction, thanksgiving and peroration. The introduction begins with the joy of the angels over Christ's *resurrection, the earth's participation in this joy and the church's role in proclaiming it. Typical of the Franco-German mentality is the deacon's apologia, "qui me non meis meritis." The second part deals with the Paschal thanksgiving and the praise of God, who worked marvels on Easter night. Particular stress is put on the typology of the *Exodus and on the image of the bees, who virginally produced the Paschal candle just as Mary conceived and bore Christ. The peroration sums up the Paschal praise and closes with a universal petition.

From the end of the 4th c. the singing of the praeconium paschale was the task of deacons. The Liber pontificalis records that Pope *Zosimus gave deacons permission to bless the Paschal candle in parishes (Lib. Pont. [ed. Perovsky], II, 95). The Angoulême Gelasian Sacramentary (ca. 800) tells us that Augustine sang the praeconium paschale as a deacon: "adhuc diaconus cum esset et cecinit feliciter." Augustine himself composed a blessing "quod in laude quadam cerei breviter versibus dixi" (Civ. Dei XV, 22: CSEL 40, 2, 108). Important sources of the text of the Exultet are the Gallican Sacramentaries (Missale Gothicum, ms. Vat. Reg. lat. 317; Missale Bobbiense, ms. Paris. lat. 13246; Missale Gallicanum vetus, Cod. Vat. Pal. lat. 493), the 8th-c. Gelasian Sacramentaries (Sacram. Gelasianum Gellonense, Paris B.N. lat. 12048; Sacram. Gelas. Engolismense, Paris B.N. lat. 816; Sacram. Gelasianum Fuldense, Göttingen, Universitätsbibl., Cod. theol. 231) and the Gregorian Sacramentaries (Sacram. Gregorianum Ottoboniense, ms. Vat. Ottob. lat. 313; Sacram. Gregor. Reginense, ms. Vat. Regin. lat. 337).

G. Morin, Pour l'authenticité de la lettre de S. Jérôme à Présidius: BALAC 3 (1913) 52-60; H. Schmidt, Hebdomada sancta, Rome 1962; G. Cavallo, Rotoli di Exultet dell'Italia meridionale, Bari 1973; H. Doutei - F. Vongrey, Exultet-Rolle, Graz 1975; U. Perovsky (ed.), Liber pontificalis, Rome 1976 (Studia Gratiana, 22); A.J. MacGregor, Fire and Light in the Western Triduum, Collegeville, MN 1992; A.J. MacGregor, Easter Candle, in The New Westminster Dictionary of Liturgy and Worship, London 2002, 161-162.

A. Chupungco

EXUPERIUS of Toulouse (d. after 412). Bishop of *Toulouse at the start of the 5th c., Exuperius completed the basilica of the bishop and martyr *Saturninus begun by his predecessor Silvius (Passio S. Saturnini), consecrating it 1 November 402 and solemnly depositing in it the relics exhumed from the original grave. He received a letter from Pope *Innocent I (20 February 405) in response to his questions on ecclesiastical discipline and the canon of *Scripture. *Jerome dedicates to him the Commentary on Zechariah, on this occasion praising his munificence toward the monks of *Palestine, *Egypt and *Libya. In Letter 123 (409) Jerome praises him for protecting Toulouse from the *Vandals in 407–408, and, in Letter 125 (411–412), for his charity toward victims of the invasion. *Paulinus, future bishop of Nola, puts him as first among the saintly bishops of S *Gaul, all of whom were testimonies of faith and religion in those difficult times. Some local traditions have him born at Arreau in the Aure valley (Hautes Pyrénées) and die at Blagnac in the immediate vicinity of Toulouse. His feast is 28 September, assigned him by Usuard (late 9th c.).

Sources: Epistola of Innocent I: PL 20, 495-502; AASS Sept. VII, 623-630; Jerome, Ep. 4; 10; 11; 54; 95; 125; Jerome, Comm. in Zachariam, prologues to books I and II; Greg. Turon., Historia Francorum 2,13; E. Griffe, Exupère: DHGE, 16,263-264; H. Crouzel, S. Jérôme et ses amis toulousains: BLE 73 (1972) 129-138.

H. Crouzel - L. Odrobina

EZANA (ʿĒzānā, Αἰζάνας; 4th c.). First Christian king of *Aksum. His conversion is deduced from two series of epigraphs: one in which he declares himself "son of Mahrem (= Mars)," the other in which he professes himself a Christian. His conversion is traditionally ascribed to *Frumentius, a link denied by Altheim and Stiehl, who put Ezana in the 5th c.

E. Littmann, Sabaische, griechische und altabessinische Inschriften (Deutsche Aksum-Expedition 4), Berlin 1913; F. Anfray - A. Caquot - P. Nautin, Une nouvelle inscription grecque d'Ezana, roi d'Axoum: Journal des Savants (1970) 260-273; F. Altheim - R. Stiehl, Christentum am Roten Meer, I, Berlin - New York 1971, 402-412; E. Dinkler, New Questions Concerning King Ezana of Axum: Études et travaux 9 (1976) 6-15.

S.J. Voicu

EZEKIEL (iconography). The most widespread episode relating to Ezekiel in the early Christian figurative repertoire is his vision in the valley of the dry bones (Ezek 37:1-10), which is also explicitly mentioned by St. *Jerome (In Ezech. 37). Ezekiel was thus held to prefigure Christ, and was included in the fresco cycle of the synagogue of *Dura Europos, before 256, but does not appear in early Christian painting. The episode is attested on some Roman sarcophagi (Ws 184, 1; 194, 4, 9; 206, 7; 215, 7; 219, 1), and on a Spanish one from Gerona (Ws 112, 2), all from the Constantinian era to the early 5th c. Ezekiel, young and beardless, in tunic and pallium, brings the virga close to a small naked figure lying on the ground, its head resting on a skull. In some cases we see other small-scale figures, already risen. The same scene appears among OT scenes on a gold-glass from Cologne, now in the British Museum (early 4th c.): Ezekiel, in the usual dress, with virga, is surrounded by scattered members coming together. Other scenes relating to the prophet are much rarer: among mss., in the codex of Rabbula, f.7b., Ezekiel, with David and Christ, is freeing a female demoniac (a. 586), while the Maiestas Domini, understood as Ezekiel's vision (Ezek 10), is depicted in the apse mosaic of the church of Hosios David at *Thessalonica (5th c.).

DACL V, 1050-1052; LCI II, 716-718; J. Klinkenberg, Die Kunstdenkmäler der Stadt Köln, Cologne 1906, 273, fig. 110; C.H. Kraeling, The Excavations at Doura Europos. The Synagogue, New Haven 1956, 178-194, plates LXIX-LXXI; Volbach-Hirmer, 87, figs. 133-135; Cecchelli, Rabb. Gosp., 59; E. Dassmann, Sündervergebung durch Taufe Busse und Martyrerfürbitte in den Zeugnissen frühchristlicher Frömmigkeit und Kunst, Münster 1978, 60, 70, 220-221; F. Bisconti, Un coperchio di sarcofago paleocristiano nel cimitero Maggiore, in "Quaeritur inventus colitur." Miscellanea in onore di p. U.M. Fasola, Vatican City 1989, 23-49; M. Perraymond, Sogni, visioni e profezie nell'antico cristianesimo: Abramo, Giacobbe, Ezechiele, Pastore d'Erma, Felicita e Perpetua, in Augustinianum - Atti del XVII Incontro di studiosi dell'Antichità Cristiana - Rome 5-7 May 1988, Rome 1989, 549-563; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, Frammento di sarcofago cristiano da Vescovio (Forum Novum) presso Torri in Sabina: RivAC 59 (1990) 121-140; J. Dresken-Weiland, Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarcophage - Band II, Mainz am Rhein 1998, n. 11; M. Perraymond, s.v. Visioni, in F. Bisconti, Temi di iconografia paleocristiana, Vatican City 2000, 303.

M. Perraymond

EZNIK of Kolb (bishop of Bagrewand, first half 5th c.): traditionally one of those disciples of *Mesrob who translated the *Scriptures and many patristic works from the Greek. After a stay at *Constantinople, from where he brought the authentic acts of the Council of *Ephesus (431), he became a bishop and took part in the Synod of Astisat (449). Eznik is the first original Armenian author. Of him we know, besides a fragmentary letter, a long treatise, composed ca. 441–448, which expounds the true doctrine on the nature of God and man: the problem of *evil, angels, human free will, in effect a kind of summa theologica. Eznik debates various groups of opponents: *Marcionites, *Manicheans, Zoroastrians, *pagans and Greek *philosophers, and thus the treatise, untitled in the only known ms., in modern editions is called De Deo or Against the Sects. The work, which is contemporary with the translation of the Scriptures, is a sort of model of the classical Armenian language. It has been shown that in many points Eznik depends materially (though with much originality) on Greek sources: esp. *Methodius's De libero arbitrio, but also on *Epiphanius, *Hippolytus, *Basil of Caesarea, Ephrem and the Didascalia. He may also have known *Irenaeus, *Diodore of Tarsus and *Aristide's Apologia.

RAC 7, 118-129; Bardenhewer V, 209-216; K.M. Schmid, Des Wardapet Eznik von Kołb Wider die Sekten, Vienna 1900; L. Mariès, Le De Deo d'Eznik de Kołb connu sous le nom de "Contre les sectes." Études de critique littéraire et textuelle: REArm 4 (1924) 113-205; 5 (1925) 11-130; L. Mariès - Ch. Mercier, Eznik de Kolb, De Deo. I-II: PO 28, 3-4 (Paris 1959) 411-776; S. Weber, Ausgewählte Schriften der armenischen Kirchenwäter, I, Munich 1927, 1-180; V.K. á alojan, Eznik Kokhbaci Kniga oproverzenij (o dobre i zle), Erevan 1968; M. van Esbroeck, Le passage d'Eznik (P. 241) dans le "De universo" d'Hippolyte: Muséon 87 (1974) 441-444; M. Minassian, Le manuscrit actuel de l'ouvrage d'Eznik est - il celui de la première édition? in T.J. Samuelian - M.E. Stone, Medieval Armenian Culture (University of Pennsylvania Armenian Texts and Studies 6), Chico 1984, 240-249; L. Van Rompay, Eznik de Kolb et Théodore de Mopsueste. A propos d'une hypothèse de Louis Mariès: OLP 15 (1984) 159-175; A. Orengo, Eznik di Kołb, Confutazione delle sette (Ełc Aładoc'). Intr., tr. e note (Progetti linguistici), Pisa 1996; M.J. Blanchard - R.D. Young, A Treatise on God Written in Armenian by Eznik of Kołb (floruit c. 430 - c. 450). An English Translation, with Introduction and Notes (Eastern Christian Texts in Translation 2), Louvain 1998.

S.J. Voicu

EZRA. See *ESDRAS (Ezra) (apocryphal)

F

FABIAN, pope (236–250). Fabian was elected pope 10 January 236, succeeding *Anterus, who had lasted barely a month in office and had died the week before (3 January 236); he died a martyr in the *persecution of *Decius on 20 January 250. According to a legend reported by *Eusebius (HE 6, 29,3), as the Roman community was reunited to elect the successor of Anterus, "a dove descended suddenly from the sky and landed on his [Fabian's] head," although Fabian was almost unknown and no one was considering him. During his episcopate, under the emperors Gordianus and Philip the Arab, the church enjoyed a period of peace, therefore Fabian could dedicate himself to organizing the structure of the Roman community. According to the Chronography of 354 (MGH, Auct. ant. IX-1, 75 = LP I, 148), Fabian assigned the various regions of Rome to deacons: probably two of the 14 Augustan regions for each deacon, of whom there were 7 (canonical number for the city of Rome), aided by 7 subdeacons (Eus., HE 6, 43,11). Fabian also intervened in *Africa with a letter—lost to us—in order to condemn *Privatus of *Lambaesis, already condemned by 90 African bishops (Cypr., Ep. 59,10); *Origen wrote him a letter to demonstrate to him the *orthodoxy of his doctrine (Eus., HE 6, 36,4; Jer., Ep. 84,10: PL 22,751). He probably ordained Novatian a priest, making an exception to the rule that the clinici could not be ordained, against the judgment of many (Eus., HE 6, 43,17). According to the Liber pontificalis (I, 145) he arranged to bring back to Rome the body of his predecessor *Pontianus, who died condemned to the mines in *Sardinia, although this was prohibited by law (see Digesto 48,24,2) (did he receive authorization for this?). He finished many construction projects in the *cemeteries (Chronogr., 75). Fabian's authority must have been great, if at his death the emperor Decius "would have been willing to hear with greater patience and tolerance that someone who challenged him for power had risen against him, rather than to learn that a bishop had been elected in Rome" (Cypr., Ep. 55,9). For this reason Fabian was among the first victims of the persecution of Decius (20 Jan. 250) and his death was communicated to other communities by the Roman clergy with a letter praising his life and death highly, praises in which *Cyprian of Carthage participated (Ep. 3,1). He was buried in the cemetery of *Callistus, next to Pontianus and Anterus, in the crypt that was the tomb of many popes of the 3rd c. The sepulchral inscription has been discovered (Diehl 955). A long vacatio of the Roman throne followed Fabian's death, due to difficulties in electing his successor, who was *Cornelius, elected only in March 251.

DHGE 16, 317-318; DACL 5, 1058-1064; EC 5, 941-942; BS 5, 426-429; L. Duchesne, Les régions de Rome au Moyen Âge: MEFR 10 (1890) 126-149; F. Grossi Gondi, San Fabiano, Rome 1916; EPapi I, Rome 2000, 265-268.

A. Di Berardino

FABIOLA (d. 399). A Roman noblewoman, married to a debauched husband, divorced and entered a second marriage; at the death of her second husband, she did public penitence and adopted an austere life. In 394 she went to *Bethlehem to visit *Jerome and his saintly women, and began the study of the sacred *Scriptures. Jerome dedicated to her the commentary on the stages of the people of God in the desert and also that on the vestments of the high priest. Fabiola is famous for her generosity toward the poor; she served them personally in the hospital founded by her in Ostia. (cf. Jerome Ep. 64; 77; 78).

A. Penna, S. Gerolamo, Turin-Rome 1949, 205-209; J.N.D. Kelly, Jerome, London 1975, 210-212; DHGE 16, 319-320; St. Rebenich, Hieronymus und sein Kreis, Salzburg 1992; Ch. Krumeich, Hieronymus und die christlichen feminae clarissimae, Bonn 1993; PCBE 2, 734-735.

J. Gribomont

FABIOLA (1st half 5th c.). A noble, pious and charitable lady, perhaps Roman, who had received and supported the refugee Antoninus of Fussala in his appeal in Rome against *Augustine first with Pope *Boniface (d. 4 September 422), who had declared in his favor, and then with Pope Celestine (elected 10 September). Augustine wrote her a long letter, after Boniface's death, narrating in detail his dealings with Antoninus and the numerous wicked deeds committed by the latter (20 Divjak). He also wrote to Pope Celestine about the same case (Ep. 209) to entreat him not to receive Antoninus. It is uncertain if this is the same Fabiola, also a noblewoman, but African, to whom Augustine wrote letter 267, in 402, responding to a (now-lost) letter from her, to console and encourage her in her life in the world. *Jerome dedicated the first two books of the Commentary to Ezekiel to this Fabiola. The identification could be favored by the fact that the Fabiola residing in Rome was known to Antoninus. Furthermore a Fabiola, deceased 2 November 452, is buried in the Vatican (CIL 6, 31974).

PCBE 2, 735-736; PLRE 2, 448, no. 3.

A. Di Berardino

FABIUS of Antioch (d. 252/253). Followed *Babylas, martyr in the persecution of *Decius in 249, as bishop of *Antioch. During this *persecution many Christians had bowed to the imperial edict and had sacrificed. Was it possible to grant them pardon and reintegrate them into the church? Like *Novatian in the West, Fabius in the East preached intransigence. The metropolitans of three neighboring provinces—*Helenus of *Tarsus (Cilicia), *Firmilian of *Caesarea in Cappadocia and *Theoctistus of *Caesarea in Palestine—requested the support of the bishops of Rome and Alexandria against him (Eus., HE 6,46,3). *Cornelius of Rome wrote a long letter to Fabius in the attempt to make him hear reason (6,43,5-21), and *Dionysius of Alexandria did the same (6,41,42.44). These are important documents, not only for the history of the persecution and of the crisis that followed in the church, but also for the Christian institutions and the liturgy of the time (composition of the clergy at Rome, clinical *baptism, viaticum, etc.). Fabius died in 252 or 253.

P. Nautin, Lettres et écrivains chrétiens, Paris 1961, 143-156, 164-165; DHGE 16, 320-321.

P. Nautin

FACUNDUS of Hermiane (d. 571). An African bishop, he found himself in *Constantinople when *Justinian published the edict of condemnation of the *Three Chapters. Facundus, like almost the entire African episcopate, opposed this and, to confirm in this direction the wavering Pope *Vigilius, wrote a large work before the publication of the Iudicatum (11 April 548) on the part of the pope. Because the work took an anti-Justinian direction, Facundus had to find a refuge, probably in Africa, to flee the wrath of the emperor. From here he intervened again in the matter; he was still active in 568. The large work mentioned above, in 12 books addressed Ad Iustinianum and commonly known as Pro defensione trium capitulorum, is a defense of the Three Chapters based on an enormous documentation related to the various phases of the complicated christological controversy starting from the 4th c. (*Apollinariansm, *Nestorianism, *monophysitism) and reveals an unusual capacity to grasp the significance of the affair in its historical dimension. To defend *Theodore of Mopsuestia, condemned post mortem, Facundus maintained that error in good faith is not enough to make a heretic, which reflects perseverance in an error that had become known; and he reveals himself aware that the christological dogma was defined only gradually, so that the ancient theologians could not be blamed for errors revealed only by later reflection. Facundus kept to the Chalcedonian theology, integrated, acc. to the decision of Justinian, with the *Theopaschite formula Unus de Trinitate passus est. In two later writings, much shorter, the Liber contra Mocianum Scholasticum and the Epistula fidei catholicae in defensione trium capitulorum, he supported the legitimacy of the schismatics, who continued defending the Three Chapters even after the condemnation of Pope Vigilius, and considered everyone who condemned them as heretics.

CPL 866-868; PL 67, 527-878; CCL 90A; SC 471 (2002); 478 (2003); 484 (2004); 499 (2006); DTC 5, 2066; W. Pewesin, Imperium, Ecclesia universalis, Rom. Der Kampf der Afrikanischen Kirche um die Mitte des 6. Jahrhunderts, Stuttgart 1937; R.B. Eno, Doctrinal Authority in the African Ecclesiology of the Sixth Century. Ferrandus and Facundus: REAug 22 (1976) 95-113; M. Simonetti, Haereticum non facit ignorantia. Una nota su Facondo di Ermiane e la sua difesa dei Tre Capitoli: Orpheus n.s. 1 (1980) 76-105; BBKL I, 1592; A. Placanica, Facondo Ermianense e la polemica per i Tre Capitoli: Maia 43 (1991) 41-46; P. Bruns, Zwischen Rom und Byzanz. Die Haltung des Facundus von Hermiane und der nordafrikanischen Kirche während des Drei-Kapitel-Streits (553): ZKG 106 (1995) 151-178.

M. Simonetti

FAITH
I. Old Testament - II. Judaism - III. New Testament - IV. Jewish-Christian writings - V. The Apostolic Fathers - VI. The apologists and antiheretical writers - VII. The golden age of patristics.

The fathers of the church were interested in the content of the faith, die Heilsgeschichte, more than in the analysis of the act of faith itself (Aubert 13-14). This article will examine primarily their theology of faith, while the contents of the faith will be treated under various other entries. Concerning faith in non-Christian Greek and Roman literature, see Lührmann 51-55; Wolfson 112-119.

I. Old Testament. The Hebrew root used most frequently to express the faith of Israel in God is ʾmn: it indicates stability, certainty, faithfulness, trustworthiness. The verb ʾaman expresses firmness (hence truth), as in Is 7:9: "If you will not believe [taʾaminu], you will not have stability [teʾamenu]"; the words ʾemunah and ʾemet signify fidelity. The notion of faith also includes trust, as in Gen 15:6: "He believed the Lord, who accounted it to him as righteousness." In the OT believing is an ontological question, "being/not being" (cf. Is 7:9; 28:14-16) rather than an epistemological one, "knowing/not knowing" (De Bovis 539), as in the NT: "If you know me, you will also know my Father" (Jn 8:19; cf. Jn 4:42; Eph 1:17; 1 Jn 4:16) and in the use of Is 7:9 LXX, in the fathers of the church: "If you will not believe, you will not understand [intelligetis]."

II. Judaism. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Moses are pointed out as models of faith: Sir 44:19-23; 1 Mac 5:52; Jdth 8:22-29; Jubilees 6:19; 18:1-19; 21:2; Psalms of Solomon 16:14. It is a recurrent theme in the Fathers: *Cyprian, Ep. 63,4; *Ambrose, De Patriarc., De Abr., De Isaac et an., De Jac. et vita bea.; *Augustine, Serm. 2; Civ. Dei 16,32; *Gregory of Nyssa, De vita Moysis; *Gregory the Great, Moral. 27,10,7. In *Philo of Alexandria faith is included within the frame of *Hellenistic Judaism. Faith is believing that God is one (Θεὸς εἷς ἔστι) and having trust in his "*providence," πρόνοια, and "providential care" (Opif. 170-172; Virt. 216). This requires believing in his promises (Leg. All. 3,208; Abr. 275; Mut. Nom. 166) and turning one's back on that which is destined to perish (Praem. Poen. 28). Thanks to the mediation of faith, one is freed from doubt and hesitation and vested with certainty and trust (Confus. 31). Salvation is through faith, as for Abraham (Migr. 44; Abr. 268-273).

III. New Testament. Faith has a central role here. The expression "believe in Christ" (πιστεύειν εἰς Χριστόν) appears often: Mk 9:42; Mt 18:16; Acts 10:43; 19:4; in John more than thirty times between 2:11 and 17:20. To "believe in him" (Jn 3:15; 6:29; 20:31) is to "come to him" (Jn 5:40; 6:35; 7:37), "receive him" (Jn 1:12; 5:43), "love him" (8:42; 14:15; 16:27). In Mk 1:15 the μετάνοια preached by Jesus is intimately connected with faith: "Change your life and believe the gospel." Faith is trust and confidence in Jesus (Mk 9:23-24). In the letters of *Paul, faith is closely connected with the Heilsgeschichte. The apostolic kerygma* inclines the listeners to faith, to *conversion and to the return to God (Rom 10:9). Paul opposes the Jewish position of justification through the works of the law, of which he points out the impotence because of slavery to *sin (Rom 7:7ff.; 8:1-4). For the writers of the NT, Abraham is the model of the true believer (Rom 4; Gal 3; Heb 11; Jas 2:20-24), and "those who are of faith" are by that very fact made children of Abraham (Gal 3:7; Rom 4:16) and receive their blessing only in union with this "believer" (Gal 3:9) in whose faith they are walking (Rom 4:12), inasmuch as they believe in him who raised Jesus, "author and perfector of the faith" (Heb 12:2), from the dead (Rom 4:24).

IV. Jewish-Christian writings. 1. Didache. Πίστις appears three times: 10,2, where thanks are given for the γνῶσις, πιστίς and ἀθανασία; 16,2, "the entire time of your faith," indicates the time since conversion; faith separates from *pagans and Jews. Perseverance in the faith leads to salvation: 16,5, "'as many as remain solid' in their faith will be saved" (cf. Mt 10:22; 24:13).

2. The Letter of Barnabas. Compare Did. 16,2 with Barn. 4,9: "The time of your life and of faith." "Hope in God, in Jesus, in the name, in the cross" (19,7c; 6,9; 11,11; 8,5; 12,2; 16,8; 11,8) means the same as "to believe" in God, in him (16,7; 16,3); *hope and faith are often juxtaposed (1,6; 4,8; 6,3; 11,8; 12,7) (see Kraft 30). Faith is fullness and perfection in the Old Testament (3,6; 9,3; 16,7). Abraham, "for having believed, he alone" is the model of "our people" (13,7); the object of this faith is Christ (6,2-4). Faith comes from hearing (11,11). Barnabas writes in order that the Christians, in addition to their faith, may have "perfect knowledge" (ἵνα μετὰ τῆς πίστεως ὑμῶν τελείαν ἔχητε καὶ τὴν γνῶσιν 1,5), "wisdom, understanding, science and knowledge" (21,5; cf. 2,3). This is the first hint in Christian literature of the Augustinian crede ut intelligas (Kleist 168n.13). On "*gnosis" in Barnabas, see Kraft 22-24.

3. The Shepherd of Hermas. The principal theme of the teaching of *Hermas concentrates on the faith with which one believes in God (Mand. 1,2) and which guides the believer in service of the Lord and flight from sin (Mand. 1; cf. 6,1,1). The Christian must "clothe himself in faith" because it is strong and completes everything (Mand. 9,7,10; Sim. 6,1,2), it is the first of the good works (Mand. 8,9) and the mother of the other *virtues (Vis. 3,8,2ff.). Listening leads to faith and faith to metanoia and to the confirmation of the faith itself in *baptism (Mand. 4,3,1). Faith is the necessary prerequisite for life and adherence to the church (Vis. 3,8,1-3). Faith is believing in the Son of God (Sim. 8,3,2). In Hermas, faith-trust is displayed rather than faith-knowledge. In consequence, Hermas warns: "If you bear the name and do not carry its power, you will have borne the name in vain" (Sim. 9,13,2).

V. The Apostolic Fathers. 1. First Letter of Clement. *Clement praises the Corinthians for their "excellent and solid faith" and for their "perfect and profound knowledge [gnosis]," i.e., their profound comprehension of the mysteries of the Christian faith. It is an expression dear to St. Paul (2 Cor 4:6; Phil 3:10; Gal 4:9; Eph 3:19). Faith and knowledge hold hands. Clement speaks of "searching out the depths of the divine knowledge" (40,1; cf. Rom 11:33; 1 Cor 2:10). Through Christ "we taste immortal knowledge" (36,2). "Greater knowledge" implies greater responsibility (41,4). "May each one be faithful, each one capable of explaining the deep knowledge" (48,5; cf. the theme of faith and knowledge in the Odes of Solomon 4,7,8). Knowledge makes faith perfect. Sanctification comes from faith, a free gift of God, which includes works as a consequence of the faith (1 Clem. 32 and 33).

*2. Ignatius of Antioch. Object and foundation of the faith is the christological kerygma, as it is reflected particularly in St. Paul (Trall. 2,1; 9,2; Phil. 8,2; 9,2; cf. Magn. 1,1: "In the faith of Jesus Christ"). Against the *Docetists, he recommends "firmness in faith" (Eph. 10,2) and "harmony in your faith" (Eph. 13,1; 20,2). "The knowledge of God is Jesus Christ" (Eph. 17,2); he is the true gnosis and gives immortality (ibid.; cf. Magn. 6,2). "Faith is the beginning and love is the end" of Christian life (Eph. 14,1).

*3. Polycarp of Smyrna. Faith is "mother of us all" (Phil. 3,2-3; cf. Gal 4:26). The fruits of faith are salvation and resurrection from the dead (Phil. 5,2). Faith consists in "believing in him who made our Lord Jesus Christ rise from the dead and gave him glory" (2,1; cf. 1 Pet 1:21).

VI. The apologists and antiheretical writers. *1. Justin. He was one of the first Christian writers who tried to reconcile faith and reason. The *resurrection, prophecy and the theology of the Logos are the foundations of the faith (Escribano-Alberca 26-31). Given that God can create a human being from a seed (1 Apol. 19,2-3), it is not irrational to believe that God can re-create bodies after these have been dispersed in the earth (19,5). Prophecy is truth testimony—historic realization which offers proofs of the faith also for the pagans. (1 Apol. 30-50; Dial. 28,32). Gnosis is "the grace to understand" the meaning of the prophecies (Dial. 58,1; 92,1; 112,3; 119,1), knowledge of God and of Christ (Dial. 14,1; 28,4; 39,5; 69,4; 88,6, cf. Camelot 512). Christ, the divine Logos, is universal reason, the "seminal logos" in which all rational beings participate (1 Apol. 46; 2 Apol. 10; Dial. 128-129). Faith is "believing that the crucified Jesus is the Christ of God" (Dial. 46,1). The Christians are "the descendants of Abraham, who was blessed because of his faith" (Dial. 11,5); they are "regenerated through water, faith and wood" (Dial. 138,3) because "they have believed through the baptism of penitence and the knowledge of God" (Dial. 14,1).

*2. Irenaeus. First among Christian writers to interpret Is 7:9 (LXX) in terms of the problem of faith-knowledge. "The fulfillment [of these commandments] is the acquisition of the faith because 'if you will not believe,' Isaiah says, 'you will not understand' (Is 7:9, LXX); and the truth provokes faith, because faith has as its object that which really exists (see Heb 11:1), in such a way that we believe in the things which are precisely because they are and thus, believing in the things because they are, we maintain our perpetually firm conviction regarding them" (Dem. 3; SC 62,33; cf. n. 3). The true gnosis, which is the doctrine of the *apostles (Adv. haer. IV, 33,8), consists of faith (Adv. haer. I,10,3). Irenaeus contrasts the unity of the faith with the diversity of the gnostic doctrine and of the gnostic "succession." There is a single and identical faith, preached by the apostles, which remains in the church thanks to the uninterrupted succession of the *bishops (Adv. haer. III, 3,1-3). The faith of Abraham and that of the Christian are "one and the same" (Adv. haer. IV, 21,1). Opposing gnostic determinism, Irenaeus argues that the assent of the intellect to the faith is free: "In faith the freedom of human choice is preserved by God under his own control" (Adv. haer. IV, 37,5). His doctrine is rooted "in the development of the salvation oikonomia of the faith" ("die heilsökonomische Entfaltung des Glaubens"; Escribano-Alberca 32-38): the ἀνακεφαλαίωσις or restoration of humanity in the incarnate Logos by means of a progressive education.

*3. Clement of Alexandria. The foundation of the faith is the Logos, "Teacher of the little ones" (Paed.

I, 1,1; SC 70,108). Faith in God means listening to the Logos (Protr. 84,3; SC 2,151). "He who has remained incredulous at the voice of the Logos has not believed in God" (Strom. II, 12,1; SC 38,42). In Clement we find a biblically oriented theology of faith, on the base of Is 7:9 (Strom. I, 1,8,2: SC 30,49; II, 2,8,2: SC 32,38; II, 4,17,4: SC 38,45; IV,21,134,4: GCS 15,308,1); Hab 2:4; cf. Rom 1:17; Gal 3:11; Heb 10:38; 11:1-2, 6 (Strom. II, 6,29; II, 2,8: SC 38,38.56) (see Camelot in SC 38,12-19). Clement defines and defends his concept of faith in confrontation with philosophers: "The faith which the Greeks denigrate as futile and barbarous is in fact a premise [πρόληψις] freely adopted, an assent [συγκατάθεσις] given with reverence—'the foundation of that which is hoped for and demonstration of things unseen,' acc. to the apostle. Without faith it is impossible to please God (Heb 11:1-2, 6). Others have defined it as an intellectual assent [συγκατάθεσις] for a reality not manifest, just as a demonstration is an assent to a reality as yet unknown. . . . The study of the faith applies itself to these things in order to become knowledge [ἐπιστήμη] based on a solid foundation," in other words, gnosis (Strom. II, 2,8-9: SC 38,38-39) (see Daniélou, Gospel 318). Clement explains: "Nothing can be learned without faith because nothing can be learned without a previous intellectual concept [ἄνευ προλήψεως]. As the prophet says (Is 7:9, LXX): 'If you will not believe, you will not understand'" (Strom. 11,4,17: SC 38,45).

Clement combines the Aristotelian definition of faith with the Stoic one of assent (συγκατάθεσις) and the Epicurean one of πρόληψις, previous knowledge (Wolfson 120-121). Responding to the *Valentinian idea of the "faith of the spirituali who adhere to gnosis and not to the 'mere faith' of the psychici*," Clement insists that "there is neither gnosis without faith, nor faith without gnosis" (Strom. V, 1,3: GCS 15,328). In contrast with *Basilides, who held that "God is known by nature (φύσει)," Clement repeated that "faith is the rational assent of the soul which exercises its *free will, not an undefined beauty which supposedly belongs immediately to the creature" (Strom. V, 1,3: GCS 15,327). He concludes: "Nothing remains for us but to discern the unknowable (ἄγνωστον) through the grace of God and through that logos alone which proceeds from him" (Strom. V, 12,82: GCS 15,381).

4. Origen. The source of faith is the word of the *Scripture which leads, as it were, to a spiritual marriage of the believing soul with the "Logos-Scripture" (Hom. in Gen. 10,5: GCS 6,99, 24-26). The wells in Genesis (24 and 29) are figures of the Scripture: at wells the patriarchs encounter their spouses (see Escribano-Albenca 64). Origen (C. Cels. 5,20; In Joh. 19,3: GCS IV, 182, 15) distinguishes between simple faith (ψιλὴ πίστις; πιστεύειν μόνον) and faith joined with knowledge (πιστεύειν ἐγνωκέναι); the latter is of greater importance (C. Cels. 1,13). After the resurrection, the disciples will remember what Jesus had said (Jn 2:22), "and they will believe: along with their knowledge, also their faith will be made perfect" (In Joh. 10,37: GCS 10,211,24 5.; cf. Völker 80). Faith produces assent (C. Cels. 3,39) and is sufficient for the greater part of humankind (C. Cels. 1,9).

VII. The golden age of patristics. 1. The East. The version of Is 7:9 in the Septuagint, "if you will not believe, you will not understand" (instead of the Hebrew "you shall not be established"), continued to create theological and psychological problems for the Fathers: does faith precede the act of the intelligence, or follow it? In the Ep. ad Amphilochium (235), Basil asks: "Which is first, knowledge or faith? We say that, all things considered, in the case of the sciences faith precedes knowledge; but in our instruction, even if someone says that knowledge begins before faith, we agree—provided that a knowledge commensurate with human comprehension be understood. In the case of the sciences, we must first believe that the letter 'A' is really called that and later, after having learned the letters and their pronunciation, also reach an accurate notion of the meaning. But in what concerns our faith in God, the idea that God exists comes first, and we conclude this from his works . . . faith follows this knowledge, and adoration follows this faith." And on Ps 115:1, he declares: "Faith must precede any discourse on God, faith and not demonstration (ἀπόδειξις), faith which bends the mind to assent more than the methods of reason, faith which is not born from geometric principles, but from the action of the *Holy Spirit." Given that all knowledge is preceded by a type of belief, the Christian faith also must precede knowledge, not exactly as a common and elementary notion, but as a demonstrative knowledge (ἀπόδειξις). According to the Fathers, first of all there is a natural knowledge of God which comes from the creation; the gift of faith follows, finally the scientia knowledge of the content of the faith, *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, in Graecarum affect. curatio 1 (PG 83,813 D-816A), presents an optimal summary of Greek patristic thought: "Let no one speak against faith. After all, Aristotle calls faith the criterion of science. Epicurus says that faith is an anticipation (πρόληψις) of the mind and that this anticipation becomes first of all cognition (γνῶσις) and then comprehension (κατάληψις). Furthermore, as we define it, faith is a voluntary assent (συγκατάθεσις) of the mind or contemplation (θεωρία) of secret things and concentration on that which really is and understanding of invisible things. . . . Faith needs knowledge, just as knowledge needs faith. But faith precedes knowledge, and knowledge follows faith."

Greek theology remains fundamentally within this outline. Theodoret uses a series of terms coming from the gnoseological vocabulary of Greek *philosophy—συγκατάθεσις, θεωρία, κατάληψις—which indicate clearly the intellectual character of the faith. In brief, first of all there is an initial knowledge of God and of the fact of revelation, verified by the miracles; then faith, under the influence of grace, accepts the truth without questions; finally comes the dialectical investigation into the depths of the revealed truth: this is Christian gnosis, i.e., theology (Parente 188-189).

2. The West. Augustine. From Is 7:9 (LXX) Augustine derived the aphorism: "Crede ut intelligas." Later informed of a *translation closer to the Hebrew, he noted that there was "something precious in both the translations (ex utroque magnum aliquid insinuatur). . . . The essence of knowledge is the vision of God, while faith feeds us like children. . . . But if we do not walk in faith, we cannot reach the vision, which does not disappear, but continues through our intellect, once it has been purified through union with the Truth" (De doc. chr. II, 12). The path of knowledge is authority and reason: Christ is this supreme authority (C. Acad. III, 20,43). Authority has only a temporal priority, reason enjoys the primacy by right (De ord. II, 9,26). "Authority demands faith and prepares humanity for reason. Reason leads to comprehension and to knowledge." It is reason that indicates "who must be believed" (De v. relig. 24,45). Every certainty begins with faith, including the certainties of human origin (Util. cred. 12,26).

The De Mag. lays out the intellectus fidei through the interlacing of Is 7:9 LXX with Mt 23:8-10. Faith has the role of warning and outer call, so that one is inwardly oriented toward Christ and illuminated by the "inner Truth" (De Mag. 14,46) (Cf. Du Roy, L'intelligence 214) because "the Son of God has become Son of man in such a way as to receive in himself our faith (ipse in se exciperet fidem nostram) and lead us to his truth" (Trin. 4, 18,24). Augustine combines the gnoseological outline, faith-authority-reason-understanding, with the theological outline of the *incarnation and the *Trinity (cf. Du Roy, CE I, 1052). In Trin., "Augustine distinguishes two paths of his theology: the dogmatic path or justification of the faith, and seeking the understanding of the faith" (Bourassa 685). According to Augustine, first there is a certain knowledge of the fact of revelation (De fid. rer. invis. 7, 10; C. ep. Man. 4,5; Civ. Dei 22, 5), then the assent of faith under the influence of grace (De praed. sanct. 2, 5; De spir. et litt. 21,54), finally the reflection on what is believed, which leads to a more profound comprehension (Ep. 120, 1, 3-4). A complete summary is found in En. in Ps. 118 s. 18,3: NBA 27, 1272: "No one, without understanding at least something, can believe in God: but it is also true that to believe the revelation in all its fullness one must be healed by the same faith with which one began to believe. In reality there are things which, if they are not understood, are not believed: just as there are others which, if they are not believed, are not understood. Faith comes from listening and listening comes in turn from the proclamation of Christ (cf. Rom 10,17). Now, how could anyone believe someone who proclaims the faith if he, aside from other matters, does not know the language of the preacher? On the other hand, if no truths existed which we cannot understand if we have not first believed, the Prophet would not have said: 'If you will not believe, you will not understand' (Is 7:9 LXX). In conclusion, our intellect progresses by penetrating the believed truths ever deeper: the faith progresses similarly by succeeding in believing what it has understood; the mind finally progresses in the very act of understanding, and that because it penetrates ever deeper into the same things proposed by faith." Augustine says of himself: "Quaesivi te et desideravi intellectu videre quod credidi" (Trin. XV, 28,51).

General conclusion. "From Justin on, the history of the dogma of Christ is full of tension between faith as the hearing of the kerygma and the effort for an understanding of the faith" (Grillmeier 617). Intellige ut credas, crede ut intelligas.

J.P. Migne, Index de fide, PL 220 (1891) 571-576; M. Grabmann, Die Geschichte der scholastischen Methode, Freiburg i.B. 1909, I, 125-143; ThLL 6.1, 661-693: fides; W. Völker, Das Vollkommenheitsideal des Origenes, Tübingen 1931; DTC 6, 78-82, 98-99, 109-115, Tables Générales 1538; P. Parente, La teologia patristica della fede e il testo d'Isaia 7,9: Doctor Communis I (1948) 185-190; J. Kleist, The Epistle of Barnabas: ACW 6 (1948); EC 5, 1094-1097; J. Daniélou, Abraham dans la tradition chrétienne: CahSion 5 (1951) 160-179; M. Löhrer, Der Glaubensbegriff des hl. Augustinus in seinen ersten Schriften bis zu den Confessiones, Einsiedeln 1955; R. Aubert, Le problème de l'acte de foi, Louvain [3]1958; H. Wolfson, The Philosophy of the Church Fathers, Cambridge, MA 1956 (It. tr. Brescia 1978); RGG[3] II (1958) 1588-1600; TWNT 6, 174-230 (TDNT 6, 174-228); DSp 5, 530-619; R. Kraft, The Apostolic Fathers III, New York 1965; O. Du Roy, L'intelligence de la foi en la Trinité selon saint Augustin, Paris 1966; P.-T. Camelot, Gnose chrétienne: DSp 6, 509-523; CE 5, 792-797; A. Di Berardino, Cristo e la fede nei discorsi di S.A. sul Vangelo di S. Giov., Naples 1967 (datt.); Lampe col. 1082-1088, s.v. πιστεύω/πίστις; J. Daniélou, Gospel Message and Hellenistic Culture, London 1973; I. Escribano-Alberca, HDG, Band I, fasc.

2a: Glaube und Gotteserkenntnis in der Schriflt und Patristik (1974); F. Bourassa, Théologie Trinitaire chez saint Augustin: Gregorianum 58 (1977) 685; A. Trapè, Ragione e fede in S.A., Patrologia III, 382-383; A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche, I, Freiburg i.B. 1979; D. Lührmann, Glaube: RAC 11, 48-122 (bibl. 119-122); RAC 14, 626-648 (fides as inheritance); A. Schindler, Augustin: TRE 4 (1979) 662-666; 13, 275-305; R. Mortley, Gnosis I (Erkenntnislehre): RAC 11, 501-516; A. Le Boulluec, Clément d'Alexandrie, Stromates, V, I and II, SC 278/279 (1981); G. af Hällström, Fides simpliciorum According to Origen of Alexandria, Helsinki 1984; El diálogo fe-cultura en la antigüedad cristiana, ed. D. Ramos-Lissón et al., Pamplona 1996; G. Theissen, Come cambia la fede. Una prospettiva evoluzionistica, Turin 1999; La fede nei Padri della Chiesa, ed. S. Panimolle, Rome 1999; AugL 3, 1334-1340 (TeSelle); M.-É. Boismard, À l'aube du christianisme. Avant la naissance des dogmes, Paris 1998 (It. tr. Casale Monf. 2000); O. Casel, Fede, gnosi e mistero. Saggio di teologia del culto cristiano, Padova 2002.

R.J. De Simone

FAITHFUL. The term "faithful" (fidelis = πιστός) includes several meanings: (a) it can designate "one who believes," i.e., one who puts his *faith in another, or through this binds himself to something; (b) adherence to a teaching, etc.; (c) adherence to God who inspires absolute trust: fidelis homo est credens promittente Deo (Augustine, Enar. in Ps. 32,2,1,9). The opposite is incredulus. (d) "Faithful" is also applied to God, not only as "he who is worthy of faith," but also as "he who is faithful to his promises": fidelis Deus est exhibens quod promisit homini (Augustine, op. cit.); God himself chooses in order that they be fideles. Finally, (e) the word, as a substantive, was habitually used to indicate the baptized, who as such had full participation in the *liturgy and in the life of the Christian community, in contrast with the term christianus, which also included the *catechumens, who believe in Christ but do not yet have full participation in his mystery (Lact., Istitut. 4,13,26; Jer., In Is. 22,15; Aug., In Ioh. 14,2; Enar. in Ps. 48,1,3; 52,1; sermones 235,3; 361,6: christiani, inquiunt, sumus. Fideles ergo estis? Baptizati estis? Baptizati, inquiunt, sumus; [Sermo 151,2,2]). *Augustine often uses the double term christianus fidelis (Ep. 227; 268,2; Conf. 9,3,5; 8,2,5). The same meaning is common in Christian inscriptions of the first centuries. Consider the example of an *epigraph dedicated to a child dead at the age of two years and some months, baptized, born from baptized parents: fidelis ex fidelibus (pistos ex pistōn: Rome, Museo Pio Cristiano in Vaticano, III century, DACL 5, 1587).

DTC 5, 1586ff.; DACL 5, 1586-1594; ThLL s.v. fidelis; EC 5, 1106-1107; Lampe 1087; É. Lamirande, "Fidelis" et l'ecclésiologie de s. Augustin. Un thème étrangement négligé: Augustinianum 41 (2001) 169-200; AugL 2, 1330-1333.

L. Dattrino

FALSIFICATION. Falsification is as old a practice as writing, and it was widespread up until the time when the moral and legal concept of literary property and the rights of the author triumphed in the modern era. The author of a work can be falsified (in which case one has *pseudepigraphy) or the text of the work itself can be falsified via interpolations, imitations, plagiarism, and the creation of forgeries. Here we are concerned with falsification of works. Almost every literary genre has been falsified. We have, therefore, false papal letters, false decretals, false Acts of councils, false disciplinary canons, false Acts of the martyrs, false liturgies (e.g., Lit. clementina, Const. Ap. VIII), false lives of saints, false diplomas, false charters (the most famous is, perhaps, that of Alaon), false testaments, false inscriptions, false donations, false graffiti. The phenomenon is not limited to antiquity, nor is it a particularity of religious literature, even if it is present there with notable frequency. Falsification is born from various motives. One can distinguish fraud of the devout (the Acts of Paul are due to a follower of the *apostle), the fraud of *apologists, the fraud of *heretics (which is the most recurrent and virulent). Fraud is not limited to the text, but also extends to the *translations, which can be tendentious. It is sufficient to compare a translation by *Jerome with one by *Rufinus. There were workshops specializing in forgery. One was organized at Alexandria by the prefect of the city, which, acc. to Anastasius the Sinaite, employed twelve copyists. The latter confessed to having personally falsified the Tomus ad Flavianum. Fraud invaded religious literature to such an extent that the 6th Council of *Constantinople in 680 dedicated itself largely to demasking interpolated MSS and fictitious letters: this earned it the nickname "council of antiquarians and paleographers." The *Apollinarians were considered masters in the falsification of texts (Photius, Bibl., cod. 229). *Apollinaris attributed his own works to various authors, including *Athanasius. *Cyril himself was a victim of Apollinarian falsifications, which invaded a series of christological writings. The *Luciferians followed their example in the 4th and 5th c. The *Pelagians did so as well.

DACL 5, 1213-1246; RAC 7, 236-277 (bibl.); L. Saltet, Fraudes littéraires des schismatiques lucifériens: BLE 7 (1906) 300-321; G. Bardy, Faux et fraudes littéraires: RHE 32 (1936) 5-23, 275-302; W. Speyer, Die literarische Falschung im heidnischen und christlichen Altertum, Munich 1971.

A. Hamman - F. Gori

FAMILY

I. Relations between spouses - II. Parents and children.

I. Relations between spouses. The law that regulates the cohabitation of married persons contains a complex of reciprocal rights and duties, whose principal aspects are well developed in the doctrine of the *Fathers. Two principles regulate the relations between spouses: in the conjugal life, these are on a level of parity; in the familial society, on the other hand, which demands an order, a directive unity and therefore a hierarchy, naturally the husband is the head; and yet, the division of duties that the familial community imposes, acc. to the respective qualities of each of the spouses, does not imply any legal inequality.

a. Conjugal life. Christian doctrine affirms that man and woman are perfectly equal before God in dignity and value. *Philosophy of the imperial period already had a very noble understanding of matrimony as a perfect union of *bodies and *souls, which creates a spiritual community unique in its kind, founded on reciprocal concern and dedication without reserve. The Fathers repeat the arguments of this philosophy: they affirm the moral equality of the sexes, the natural equality of the two in the areas of intellectual and spiritual life; they reinforce these arguments with personal considerations of the innate equality of all people, children of God, brothers and sisters in Jesus Christ. In light of these principles, Christian morality proclaims the duty of identical and reciprocal fidelity on the part of the spouses; it condemns with equal severity all that betrays it—not only acts but also conscious desires and guilty thoughts. As opposed to ancient customs and rights, which were extremely indulgent toward the man's infidelity, the Fathers—following the apostle (1 Cor 6:12-20; cf. Heb 13:4)—condemn with the same force the infidelity of the woman and that of the man. They establish the equal obligation of fidelity on the part of the spouses to the law of God which, from the beginning, instituted monogamous marriage (Arist., Apol. 15,6; Just., Dial. 93,1-2; Ign. Ant., Ad Polyc. 5,2; Theoph. Ant., Ad Autol. III, 25; Didascalia VI, 22,10; Lact., Inst. VI, 23). Little by little over time, the churches struggled to eradicate adultery from society, forecasting eternal punishments that would strike the guilty and establishing very severe canonical sanctions: in particular perpetual or temporary excommunication. The penitential treatment reserved for adulterers varied from one region to another and evolved acc. to the times. From the patristic era, the situation of the divorced who remarried constituted one of the most difficult pastoral problems; the hesitations of St. Augustine attest to its complexity. If the spouses are held to a perfect reciprocal fidelity, this means that they also have the right to request conjugal relations, jointly with that of granting them. The Fathers repeat the teaching of the apostle (1 Cor 7:3-4): fulfilling this duty is an obligation of justice; refusing it, through a desire for excessive asceticism, although animated by the best intentions, could bring—acc. to *Origen—serious risks to the stability of the couple.

The ecclesiastical writers recommend taking advantage of matrimony with moderation; avoiding the egotistical search for pleasure (Clem. Al., Strom. III 58,62; Sextus, Sent. 231): this is a theme common to the philosophical and rabbinical tradition (Preisker, 74). These refer constantly to the natural end of marriage, and demand that every conjugal act obey the law of procreation (as a result, relations with pregnant women are excluded, with women during their periods, after menopause, etc.). For that matter, the Jewish conception of matrimony influenced the patristic teaching and, more precisely, the custom of observing periods of voluntary continence for religious or penitential purposes. The apostle also had explained this principle (1 Cor 7:5); the tendency to *encratism, extremely developed in certain writers in the 2nd and 3rd c., would lead to the imposition of conjugal continence before every religious act, and in particular before the fast and reception of the *Eucharist. The practice of spiritual matrimony (total abstinence from conjugal relations) and chaste cohabitation with ascetics (the agapetoi) are other aspects of this tendency.

b. The familial society. The Fathers affirm the absolute equality of the spouses concerning the rights and duties of conjugal life, but admit their inequality within the familial community. Following the apostle, they underline the authority of the man and the duties of submission and of respect of the woman toward her husband (Tit 2:5; Eph 5:21-25; 1 Pet 3:1; Ign. Ant., Ad Polyc. 5; Iren., Adv. haer. IV, 20,12; V, 9,4). The ps.-*Clementine homilies trace the ideal image of the happy family: modest, reserved, the woman considers her husband as lord and master; she shares with him joys and sorrows, trials and deprivations. The Syriac Didascalia offers married women similar counsel, which clearly shows the effect of paternalistic Eastern customs and the longtime domination on the part of the man: a good wife respects and fears her husband; is always quick to serve him; stays in the most hidden part of the house and, working with wool and linen, hides herself from the view of every outsider. Many factors favored this custom: the literary genre of the domestic "mirrors"; the difference in age between the spouses, sometimes considerable; social conditions; restrictions and prejudices. To justify the duty of submission of the woman, the writers sometimes invoke the argument (very common among the Greek philosophers) of the natural inferiority of the woman, not only from a physical point of view, but also psychological (less resistance to the temptations of vanity, pleasure and frivolous seductions; see Clem. Al., Paed. II, 33,2; 117, Letter of Aristeas 250). Along the lines of 1 Tim 2:14, *Tertullian and Origen repeat rabbinical commentaries on the first chapters of *Genesis, traversed by an accentuated misogyny: the woman was the first to abandon the law of God, and pushed *Adam to *sin.

Authors who describe the domestic obligations of the husband are rare; this fact underlines the irreplaceable role of the woman, placed beside the man to be his help in everything (cf. Gen 2:18).

II. Parents and children. The patristic doctrine combats all factors that lead to the dissolution of the familial society; combats without compromise abortion, infanticide and the ancient practice of exposing newborns. The church also concerns itself with the orphan. The Syriac Didascalia writes that the role of tutor of the orphans of the community is a duty of the bishop; he must insure their religious and moral education and should make them learn a trade, so that they can earn their living in a dignified way. There are many recommendations of the Fathers on the duties of parents and children: they continue the wisdom tradition and the gospel teachings (Eph 6:1-3; Col 3:20-21; 1 Tim 5:4). The Apostolic Fathers emphasize the fear of God, which should be at the base of all moral formation. Among the *virtues that must be exercised in youth, they mention in particular filial love, obedience and respect toward parents. Education toward purity, through the formation of character and the flight from wicked company, also has an important place in their recommendations. Finally, they recall the duty of assistance and support on the part of children toward their parents in need.

B. Biondi, Il diritto romano cristiano, III, 1-57; 102-106; J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'empire romain, Paris 1958, 548-561; RAC 4, 1190-1219; 7, 286-358; H. Preisker, Christentum und Ehe in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten, Berlin 1927; LTK 3, 1167-1172; T.A. Sabattini, La famiglia cristiana nell'Apologetico di Tertulliano: Rivista di Studi Classici 23 (1975) 51-66; Ch. Munier, Divorce, Remariage et pénitence dans l'Église primitive: RSR 52 (1978) 97-117; Id., L'Église dans l'Empire Romain (IIe-IIIe siècles), III, Église et Cité, Paris 1979, 3-71; O. Vannucchi Forzieri, La risoluzione del matrimonio nel IV-V secolo. Legislazione imperiale e pensiero della Chiesa: Atti e memorie dell'Accademia Toscana La Colombaria 50 (1985) 65-172; O. Pasquato, Eredità giudaica e famiglia cristiana. La testimonianza di Giovanni Crisostomo: Lateranum 54 (1988) 58-91; Ch. Munier, Matrimonio e Verginità nella Chiesa Antica, It. tr., G. Ranella, Turin 1990; R. Westbrook, Property and the Family in Biblical Law, Sheffield 1991; J.F. Gardner, Family and Familia in Roman Law and Life, Oxford 1998; S.G. Nathan, The Family in Late Antiquity. The Rise of Christianity and the Endurance of Tradition, London-New York 2000; A. De Francesco, Il diritto agli alimenti tra genitori e figli: Labeo 47/1 (2001) 28-62.

Ch. Munier - G. Pilara

FASTIDIOSUS the Arian (2nd half of 5th–early 6th c.). An African who lived in the *Vandal era and moved from *Catholicism to *Arianism. We know him because *Fulgentius refuted one of his sermons, the text of which has reached us along with the Fulgentian refutation. This sermon is very short, addressed first against the Catholics and then against the *Donatists: Against the Catholics he repeats the traditional Arian arguments intended to reduce the dignity of Christ to the level of a creature, arguments updated a little in the light of the christological controversy of the 5th c. Against the Donatists, Fastidiosus exalts the value of *baptism, referring to the Augustinian teaching on original *sin and *grace.

CPL 708; PL 65, 375-377; CCL 91, 280-283; DHGE 16, 674-675; PCBE I, 382.

M. Simonetti

FASTIDIUS (1st half 5th c.). Pelagian, *Gennadius speaks of him in De viris ill. (56-57) as Britannorum episcopus and author of De vita christiana. There is no other mention of him from antiquity. Studies related to Pelagianism mention him frequently, considering him the author of the Corpus Pelagianum (writings attributed to *Pelagius) and the De vita chr. Ascetic-moral writings of the 4th-5th c. are attributed to him (De vita chr., De divitiis, De malis doctoribus, De castitate, Qualiter religionis or De possibilitate non peccandi: ed. Caspari, Christiania 1890, 114-119).

J. Baër, De operibus Fastidii, Britannorum episcopi, Nürnberg 1902; I. Kirmer, Das Eigentum des Fastidius im pelagianischen Schrifttum, St. Ottilien 1938; G. Plinval, Pélage. Ses écrits, sa vie et sa réforme. Étude d'histoire littéraire et religieuse, Lausanne 1943; R.F. Evans, Pelagius. Fastidius and the Pseudo-Augustinian De vita christiana: JTS 13 (1962) 72-98; J. Morris, Pelagian Literature: JTS 16 (1965) 25-60; E. TeSelle, Rufinus the Syrian, Caelestius, Pelagius: Augustinian Studies 3 (1972) 61-62; V. Grossi, Patrologia III, 441-442.

V. Grossi

FASTING and ABSTINENCE

I. Ascetic and social significance - II. Liturgical and canonical tradition.

I. Ascetic and social significance. "Eating" is the road to death. In the ancient world the mythic poets thought that the gods nourished themselves on aromas to preserve their immortality. Fasting was the rite that prevented the powers of death, deep-seated in food, from penetrating human beings—a therapy of purification, serenity and freedom. The Hebrews knew ritual, funereal, medicinal and ecstatic fasts. By requiring a fast on the Day of Atonement (Lev 16:29), God revealed its ethical and liturgical significance, abolishing its magical meaning. The faithful Israelite knew that "*prayer with fasting is a good thing, as is *almsgiving with *justice" (Tob 12:8). As a sign of repentance and abandonment to God, fasting is a purification that leads to the recovery of oneself, and it disposes the *soul to love of fellow believers and justice toward the poor (Is 58:1-11). For *Moses and *Elijah fasting was a preparation for *theophany. Jesus inaugurated his theophany with the fast in the desert, and revealed that his food is the will of the Father (Mt 4:2; Jn 4:24); he recommends cheerfulness when fasting, and feasting in the bridegroom's presence (Mt 6:16-18; 9:14-15). *Paul proclaims freedom, since all food is a gift of God (Rom 14:1-22; 1 Cor 10:23-31; 1 Tim 4:1-5).

Christians practiced fasting as a participation in the paschal mystery of Christ. Liberation from the formalisms of Jewish abstinence increased their sympathy for this daily martyrdom that strengthened prayer and works of charity (Acts 13:3; 14:23; 2 Clem. 16:4; Polyc., Phil. 7:2; Min. Fel., Oct. 8,4). The Didache* transforms the "pray" of Mt 5:44 into "fast for your persecutors" (1.3): to pray and fast means to love to the point of giving one's life. The prebaptismal fast disposes the believer to illumination and grafts one into Christ's death in view of the *resurrection (Did. 7.4; Just., Ap. 11.61; Tertull., Bapt. 20; Hipp., Trad. ap. 20; Aug., Fid. et op. VI 8). Paschal significance inspired the choice of days and times: Wednesday and Friday, Lent and Holy Week (Did. 8.1). Sunday was a feast, as was the whole period from *Easter to *Pentecost (Tertull., Cor. 3).

The Christian above all fasts spiritually by abstaining from evil (Hermas, Sim. V 1.5; cf. Emped. fr. B 144) and by observing the commandments, trusting in God and serving him with a pure heart. Fasting from food must be to the advantage of the poor: "on the day of fasting, eat only bread and water and, calculating the cost of the food you would have eaten, give the same amount to a widow, an orphan, a needy person" (Sim. V 3.7; cf. Cypr., Or. 32-33); "the whole *family will participate in the fast with joy: Observe these things with your children and with all your household: in this way you will be happy" (Sim. V 3.9). Abstinence is a partial fast, esp. from the meat and wine by which we survive so as to be able to fast again (Clem. Al., Paed. II, 1,1ff.; Tertull., Cult. Fem. II 9,7; Orig., In Jer. 20,7; Eus., HE 5,3,2 and Dem. ev. 3,5; Jerome, Jov. 5,18). Abstinence is *ascesis, not aversion to diabolical foods (Can. Ap. 50 and 52). Some groups abstained from particular foods: *encratites, *Ebionites, *Marcionites, *Manicheans, *Priscillianists, who seem to have considered Jesus a vegetarian (Iren., Haer. I 2,1, Tertull., Ieiun. 15,1; Epiph., Haer. 30, 18ff. and 47,1; Aug., Haer. 25.46.70). Some claimed that Peter "ate only bread, olives and herbs" (Ps. Clem. rec. VII 6,4; cf. Greg. Naz., Or. 14,4). The *Montanist *Tertullian condemned the "perpetual abstinence" of Marcion and *Tatian, but also the laxity of pleasure-loving Christians who "hate fasts"; he argues that fasting expiates the primordial *sin, nourishes prayer, obtains pardon, conquers evil, introduces one to the mysteries (Ieiun 1,1; 3,4; 7; 15; Paen. 9,4). Jesus' saying "blessed are the hungry" is an invitation to fasting, to detachment from earthly goods, to consuming only what one needs: the rich man Dives was punished for not having fasted. The true food that leads to the resurrection is the Father's will: "a lighter body will rise more rapidly" (Ieiun. 15,6-17,7 and Orat. 6,2-3; cf. Novat., Cib. 6; Aug., Util. ieiun. 1,1).

*Clement of Alexandria, with recourse to *Scripture and *philosophy, recommends frugality and temperance to free oneself from matter (Paed. II 1,1–2,34; III 12,90). For *Origen fasting is an experience of freedom, not an obligation in view of Pythagorean *metempsychosis (C. Cels. 5,49 and 8,30); mortification of the flesh puts the person in communion with Christ, raising him from human existence to the divine life (In Lev. 10,1-2; cf. Ambr., In Ps. 40,1; Greg. Nyss., Beat. IV; Aug., Util. ieiun. 1,1). Fasting assures *peace in the world and in families, because it frees from selfishness (Basil., Ieiun. hom. 2,5; cf. Crom., Serm. 35,4 and In Mt. 29). It is an angelic life which leads us back to *paradise, where "sin entered through food"; in fact "those who do not believe in the afterlife indulge in food and drink" (Ambr., Hel. 3,4; 4,7; Ep. 63,17).

*Monasticism raised the ascesis of fasting to almost unattainable heights. *Anthony ate bread, water and salt (Athan., Ant. 7,6). *Pachomius fasted, but did not want the monks to lack food (Vita Pach. 25). For *Jerome, the monk should always be a little hungry: "If you want to be perfect, it is better to fatten the soul than the body" (Jov. 2,6; Ep. 54,105). *Basil in his Homily on Fasting recommends balance, sincerity and respect for each person's condition: "Satiety pleases the stomach, fasting is a gain for the soul. . . . Anoint your head and wash your face (Mt 6:17). . . . Show yourself as you are! Don't appear gloomy and somber so as to be known as an ascetic. . . . Fasting done for show bears no fruit for the future life" (Basil., Ieiun. 1): this is the inclination to discretio (cf. Cass., Coll. 21,13ff. and Inst. coen. 5,5ff.; Hipp., Trad. Ap. 25; Epiph., Haer. 3; Exp. fid. 23; Theodoret, Haer. fab. 5,29). The Rule of Benedict recommends that one "love fasting," but practice it with discretion (4, 39-41,49). The monastic East deepened the personal aspect of fasting, while the West focused on its social value; *Leo the Great, who dedicated thirty treatises to fasting (12-20; 39-50; 86-94), proclaimed forcefully: "the abstinence of one who fasts must become the nourishment of the poor" (Serm. 13,1).

II. Liturgical and canonical tradition. The Christian week was consecrated by two days of fasting, called "station days" (Tertull., Orat. 19,1; Hermas, Sim. 5,1-2): Wednesday and Friday, instead of Monday and Thursday, the days observed by the Jews (Did. 8.1; Tertull., Orat. 19; Ieiun. 2,3; 14,2-3). Wednesday was the day of the Lord's betrayal, Friday the day of his crucifixion (Tertull., Jejun. 14; Didasc. Ap. 21; Aug., Ep. 36,13,30); from the 3rd c. they became obligatory fast days (Const. Ap. V 14; Epiph., Expos. fid. 22). In the West it was the custom to fast on Saturdays: not so in the East, except for the Saturday before Easter (Const. Ap. V; Basil., Hom. I de Ieiun.; Aug., Ep. 36,13,31). The earliest Easter fast was limited to Good Friday, later extended to include Holy Saturday. The Easter fast caused lively controversies among 2nd-c. Christians (Eus., HE 5,23-25; Socr., HE V,22; von Campenhausen, 114-138). *Irenaeus (Eus., HE 5,24) says that some recommended one day (Good Friday), others two (Good Friday and Holy Saturday), while some fasted continuously for 40 hours (the time during which Christ's body remained in the tomb). Ps.-*Hippolytus, Trad. ap. 33, prescribes a fast of two days, from Friday until the end of the Easter evening *Mass, antequam oblatio fiat (Botte [SC 11bis], 78; cf. Tertull., Ieiun. 2,4). From the 3rd c. it became customary to fast during the whole of Holy Week (Dionysius Al., Ep. ad Basilidem, can. 1: PG 10, 1277; Didascalia 21). At Rome a fast of three weeks was observed before Easter (Socr., HE V, 22), but Christians had to interrupt their fast on the Sundays before Easter (Statue of St. Hippolytus: ἀπονηστίξεσθαι δὲ δεῖ οὐ ἄν ἐνπέσῃ κυριακή Guarducci 539; cf. Tertull., De Cor. 3,4; Aug., Ep. 36,12,29; Cass. Inst. II 18).

In the East, *Athanasius of Alexandria, Ep. 1,10 (329), speaks of a fast of six days before Easter, but later, Ep. 3,1 (331), says that the traditional fast is 40 days. The older Holy Week fast was thus gradually incorporated, from the 4th c., into the Lenten fast in imitation of Christ, Moses and Elijah, though the theoretical distinction between the two was maintained (see John Chrys., Hom. 30 in Gen. 2,1). At Rome from the 7th c., Ash Wednesday was designated as the beginning of the Lenten fast: "Feria IIII: caput de ieiuniis" (Sacrament. Gelasianum, 49: ed. Mohlberg, 39). The Didache 7,4 enjoins fasting on candidates for *baptism, on the one who baptizes and on the community. Fasting was part of the immediate preparation for baptism (Just., 1 Apol. 61; Tertull., Bapt. 20; ps.-Hippolytus, Trad. ap. 20; Aug., Ep. 54,10). The earliest evidence of a eucharistic fast is from the 3rd c. Tertullian (Ad uxorem II 5,2) asks the Christian wife of a pagan: "Will your husband not know what [the Eucharist] is on which you feed secretly before taking any other food [ante omnem cibum gustes]?" And ps.-Hippolytus (Trad. ap. 36) states: "Every believer, before touching food, hastens to receive the Eucharist. If he receives it with faith, no mortal thing will be able to harm him." For the oldest explicit legislation, see the councils of *Hippo of 393 (can. 28) and *Carthage of 397 (can. 29: Mansi III, 885, 923).

R. Abersmann, Das Fasten bei den Griechen und Römern, Giessen 1929; DSp 1, 122-133; 8, 1164-1179; RAC 7, 447-524; A. Guillaume, Jeûne et charité dans l'église latine des origines au XIII[e] siécle, en particulier chez saint Léon le Grand, Paris 1954; Th. Pichler, Das Fasten bei Basileios dem Grossen und im antiken Heidentum, Innsbruck 1955; M. Righetti, Manuale di storia liturgica, Milan 1955–1956, II, 104-111; III, 516-519; H. Musurillo, The Problem of Ascetical Fasting in the Greek Patristic Writers: Traditio 12 (1956) 1-64; var. aus., Redécouverte du Jeûne. Sagesse du corps, Paris 1959; H.F. von Campenhausen, Ostertermin oder Osterfasten? Zum Verständnis des Irenäusbriefs an Victor (Eus. Hist. Eccl. 5,24,12-17): VChr 28 (1974) 114-138; M. Guarducci, Epigrafia greca, IV, Rome 1978; J.F. Wimmer, The Meaning and Motivation of Fasting according to the Synoptic Gospels, Rome 1980; A. Grün, Digiunare, Cinisello B. 2003.

P. Meloni - R.J. Desimone

FATHER, FATHERS of the CHURCH

I. Father - II. The Fathers in the Middle Ages - III. The Fathers during the Renaissance.

I. Father. In *Judaism and in the *Bible, the term father refers to an ancestor (a transmitter of life and above all the deposit of divine promises) and also a teacher, inasmuch as he is a "spiritual parent" of the disciple; the rabbi belongs to this category, so too the Pythagoreans and the Cynics considered the one who initiates students into *philosophy to be a father. *Paul uses this image when dealing with Christians begotten by him through the gospel (1 Cor 14–15). In the postapostolic age, Christian writers use the term "Fathers" to refer to the great figures of the Old Testament, the models of the *faith and *virtue (1 Clem. 30:7; 60:4); and also the *apostles (1 Clem. 62:2; see esp. the *apocryphal acts: Act. Jo. 81; Act. Andreae et Mathiae 17); the founders of a philosophical school or *gnostic system (see Justin, Dial. 2,2; 3,7; 35,6; Clem. Al., Protr. V, 66,4; cf. II, 13,5). The *pagans referred to *Polycarp as "the teacher of Asia and the father of Christians" (Mart. Pol. 12,2). The faithful of *Lyons sent their letter to *Eleutherius *bishop of *Rome, calling him "father" (Eus., HE 5,4,2). Above all, the bishops were referred to as father, inasmuch as they were teachers of faith. *Irenaeus writes: "the one who has received a teaching from the mouth of another is called the 'son' of the one who has instructed him, and the latter is called 'father'" (Iren., Adv. Haer. IV, 41,2; see also Clem. Al., Strom. I, 1,2,1; I, 1,1,3).

The Latin Fathers (*Cyprian, *Ambrose and *Augustine) apply to the *bishop the word "papa," a title derived from familial language (a title that will later be reserved for the *pope, Supreme Pontiff, the bishop of Rome). By extension, they also applied the title to priests (Chrysostom, In Illud: Paulus vocatus, hom. 4,1) and, in *monasticism, to *abbots and *ascetics (*Palladius, Hist. Laus. 17).

From the mid-4th c. onward, Christian writers applied the term to bishops, defenders of *orthodoxy and *discipline, who joined together at the Council of *Nicaea (see Basil, Ep. 140,2; Greg. Naz., Or. 35,15). During the course of the great theological controversies of the 4th and 5th c., the conformity, or lack thereof, of a doctrine to the teaching of the "Fathers" is a proof of orthodoxy or *heresy. At the Council of *Ephesus, *Cyril of Alexandria ordered that a dossier of patristic citations be read (Mansi IV, 1183-1195; E. Schwartz, ACO I, 1,1, pp. 31-44, etc.). By that time, the term simultaneously designated both conciliar fathers (texts in E. Wiest, Institutiones patrologiae, Ingolstadt 1795, 530-534) and individual bishops whose doctrinal agreement provides a guarantee of orthodoxy. This last aspect would take on special importance throughout the course of history.

*Augustine in his controversies with the *Donatists and with the *Pelagians elaborated several ideas that further nuanced the concept and the authority of the "Fathers of the Church." *Cyprian belongs to this category because he provided a standard and because of his approved actions in recourse to the church (see Aug., Bapt. 4,5,7; 5,25,36); against the Pelagians, he cites various patristic texts, even *Jerome's, who was not a bishop (Aug., C. Iulian. I,7,34), and he affirms that the invididual testimonies of the Fathers have value inasmuch as they agree with the testimonies of the other Fathers, who, because of this agreement, are the voice of the church. *Vincent of Lérins calls the Fathers magistri probabiles, "recognized teachers" (Comm. 3). He would then add that these men, aside from having the prerogative of antiquity, "lived, taught and remained in the faith and the Catholic *communion in a holy, wise and constant way and earned the honor of dying faithful to Christ and to give their lives for him" (ibid. 28, 6; see also 2,5; 3,4; 29,6; 33,2). Therefore, he excludes writers such as *Tertullian and *Origen, despite their skill (Comm. 17 and 18). The apocryphal decree attributed to Pope *Gelasius, De libris recipiendis et non recipiendis, at last establishes a catalog of recognized authors in the *Catholic Church and lists the received and rejected *books. Notwithstanding its spurious character, this decree exerted considerable influence on the transmission of texts.

Four requirements have been traditionally established to characterize the fathers of the church: (1) orthodoxy: in the sense of remaining faithful in communion with the church in the true teaching, at least on the whole; (2) a holy life: the result of a life in conformity to the gospel and a coherent witness with one's teaching; a witness that often took one to the point of *martyrdom; (3) approbation from the church: which manifests itself both directly and openly with the citation of texts, but more often than not implicitly with allusions or reference to the thought of the author; (4) antiquity: pertains to those who lived in the first Christian centuries. Although these requirements are still valid, they should not be considered exhaustive and absolute. Authors lacking any of the first three requirements were referred to more specifically as "ecclesiastical writers" (just as Jerome had already defined them, Vir. ill. prol.; Ep. 112,3).

J. Madoz, El concilio de Éfeso, ejemplo de argumentación patrística: Estudios eclesiásticos 10 (1931) 305-338; I. Backes, Der Väterbeweis in der Dogmatik: ThQ 114 (1933) 208-221; L. Dürr, Heilige Vaterschaft im antiken Orient: Heilige Überlieferung, ed. O. Casel, Munster 1938, 1-20; H. Emonds, s.v. Abt, RAC 1 (1950) 45-55; Lampe 1051; A. Bénoit, Attualità dei Padri della Chiesa, Bologna 1970, Ital. trans; E. Bellini, I Padri nella tradizione cristiana, Milan 1982; E. dal Covolo, A. M. Triacca (eds.), Lo studio dei Padri della Chiesa oggi, Rome 1991; J.-L. Quantin, Le catholicisme classique et les Pères de l'Eglise. Un retour aux sources (1669–1713), Paris 1999; L. Dattrino, Padri e pastori per una nuova umanità: in: M. Maritano (ed.), Historiam perscrutari, Miscellanea Pasquato, Rome 2002, 611-624.

M. Maritano

II. The Fathers in the Middle Ages
1. General introduction - 2. The Early Middle Ages and the Carolingian Renaissance - 3. The Renaissance of the 12th century - 4. The 13th century.

1. General introduction. The influence of the fathers of the church is a dominant characteristic of the intellectual and spiritual life of medieval Europe. As E. Amann underscores: "Il suffit d'ouvrir les Sentences de Pierre Lombard ou le Décret de Gratien, ces deux 'trésors' du Moyen Âge, pour voir la place qu'y tient l'érudition patristique," "One simply need open Peter Lombard's Sentences or Gratian's Decretum, the two 'treasures' of the Middle Ages, to see the place that 'patristic learning' holds therein" (Amann, col. 1204). Although it is clear that there was a "patristic influence," the details of such influence differ considerably from century to century, from place to place, and from one author to the next, with respect to the sources used, the relative authority of each Father and the method of interpretation. Medieval authors inevitably chose certain auctoritates, and there was often the problem of evaluating one authority with another or the need for reconciling authorities in apparent disagreement.

*Augustine, as usual, enjoyed special honor among medieval authors, as Notkero Balbulo (d. 912) underscores: Si Augustinus adest, sufficit tibi, "If Augustine is present, that should be sufficient for you" (De interp. div. script. 5, PL 131, 998). In Peter Lombard's Sententiae, e.g., 680 citations come from Augustine, which are rivaled only by the 66 from *Ambrose (Bougerol 1997, p. 115). In *Gratian's Decretum the proportions are similar: in fact, the Decretum is a primary source for the Sententiae, providing 236 citations, esp. in the fourth book of the Sentences, which treats the sacraments. Peter Lombard's auctoritates are derived primarily from the Latin Fathers, among whom are Ambrose, *Hilary, Jerome, *Gregory the Great, *Ambrosiaster, *Fulgentius, *Bede, *Isidore, *Leo the Great and *Gennadius, but also from the Greek Fathers: *John of Damascus, *John Chrysostom and *Origen. Citations of extracts, however, did not necessarily correspond to the actual works of the Fathers. Peter Lombard, Bougerol (ibid. 115) observes, knew only four of Augustine's works firsthand; the rest of his knowledge about his works derived from the Glossa ordinaria and Florus of Lyons's Expositio.

The influence of the Greek Fathers varied acc. to the availability of the translations and the specific theological predilections of medieval authors. First of all, medieval authors inherited a corpus of Latin translations from ancient Christianity that included the works of Origen, the Cappadocian Fathers, John Chrysostom and others (Gribomont 1978). That corpus of texts grew substantially in the 9th c. when John Scotus Eriugena translated some works by ps.-*Dionysius, *Gregory of Nyssa and *Maximus the Confessor; and in the 12th and 13th c. when John the Saracen translated the Greek Fathers (he lived in the middle of the 12th c. and was the author of a new translation of ps.-Dionysius's work), Burgundio of Pisa (d. 1193; author of translations of works by John of Damascus, John Chrysostom and *Nemesius of Emesa) and Robert Grosseteste (d. 1253; author of the translation of the Epistulae of Ignatius of Antioch, the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, John of Damascus and a new version of ps.-Dionysius). In each case, the new translations were the product and, at the same, the nourishment of the renewed interest in patristic texts both in the context of monastic piety and in the nascent scholastic movement of the cathedral schools and the emerging universities. Henri de Lubac, in his magisterial study on biblical interpretation in the medieval period, heavily underscores the central importance of Origen: "l'un des pricipaux éducateurs du moyen âge latin," "one of the primary teachers of the Latin Middle Ages" (de Lubac 1959, 219); and Jean Leclercq emphasizes Origen's importance in the theology and the monastic spirituality of the 12th c., esp. among the Cistercians (Leclercq 1957). But enthusiasm for Greek sources never led to an isolation or opposition toward the Latin Fathers; instead, it represented an enrichment of that patristic tradition from which, as Bernard of Clairvaux reiterates, Augustine and Ambrose are the "two pillars" (De baptismo II c.8, PL 182, 1036C). According to Étienne Gilson, Ambrose's spiritual exegesis of the *Song of Songs is in fact the chief source of the "Socratisme chrétien" (Christian Socraticism) that pervades the entire theology of Bernard of Clairvaux and other Cistercian teachers (Gilson 1947, 92).

In the albeit complex history of scholastic and mystical theology of the 2nd half of the 12th and the entire 13th c., ps.-Dionysius became the chief Greek patristic authority; the same applies to other very diverse figures such as Bonaventure (d. 1274), Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) and Meister Eckhart (d. 1328); but Eckhart was always interpreted in a context that was profoundly Latin and Augustinian. Without a doubt, that assessment holds true for Bonaventure and Eckhart, but also for Thomas Aquinas, concerning whom Leo Elders correctly emphasizes that "indeed, throughout the Summa theologiae, Augustine is the Father of the Church who enjoys the greatest authority and is quoted most, over four times more than Gregory and over five times more than Dionysius. One may say that Thomas composed his works in an uninterrupted dialogue with Augustine" (Elders 1999, 364). Although the great scholastics and mystics were all deeply tied to the authority of the Fathers, Dante (d. 1321), a generation after Bonaventure and Thomas Aquinas, appealed to the Italian cardinals, lamenting the fact that the leaders of the church, by devoting themselves to the earthly ends, have set aside the great Fathers in favor of the decretalists, among whom he names Ambrose, Augustine, Dionysius, John of Damascus and Bede (Ep. XI, "Cardinalibus ytalicis Dantes de Florentia").

2. The Early Middle Ages and the Carolingian Renaissance. It is not easy to draw a line marking the end of Christian antiquity and the beginning of medieval Europe. Although Max Manitius's classic Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittlelalters marked the beginning of the Middle Ages with *Boethius (d. 526) and *Cassiodorus (d. 580), modern scholars of church history have moved the end of the patristic era to Isidore of Seville (d. 636) and the Venerable Bede (d. 735). From the perspective of medieval history, these first two centuries essentially appear to be a period of assimilation of the patristic inheritance, characterized by florilegia, excerpta, collections of sententiae*, which began already the Liber sententiarum of *Prosper of Aquitaine—earning him the title "The first representative of Medieval *Augustinianism" (Cappuyns 1929)—and the Excerpta of Vincent of Lérins (written in 434). But the period was also a time of evaluation, consolidation and, at times, even disputation over patristic authorities, as occurred esp. during the "*semi-Pelagian" controversy, when *Fulgentius of Ruspe (d. 532) and *Caesarius of Arles (d. 543) defended Augustine's position against the teachings of *Faustus of Riez (d. ca. 490); two popes (*Gelasius and *Hormisdas) confirmed Augustine's authority, as did the Second Council of *Orange in 529. *Boethius stood alone in his search for an explanation of the patristic teaching (esp. ex Augustini scriptis semina rationum, Trin., prol.) by means of the principles of *Aristotelian and *Neoplatonic logic; his contemporaries apparently ignored his project, but it achieved utmost importance in the following centuries, esp. in the 12th, the so-called Aetas Boetiana (Chenu 1957, ch. 6). These centuries also witnessed the strengthening of the Benedictines (Monte Cassino, 529), the educators of Europe in the Early Middle Ages, who expanded knowledge about the Fathers throughout the centuries of the Middle Ages (Leclerq 1957, ch. 6).

Nevertheless, only in the 9th c. did the influence of the Fathers attain its utmost flourishing during the course of the "Carolingian Renaissance," a resurrection of the learning that was promoted by the great emperor and guided by *Alcuin of York (d. 804), "the teacher and creator of the new Carolingian civilization" (Cristiani 1987, p. xi). Einhard, the biographer of Charlemagne, tells us that the emperor himself loved the works of Augustine, esp. the City of God (Vita Karoli Magni, 24), a work from which many readers deduced principles for political theology (Contrini 1999, 124-129). And "in an age replete with iconoclastic, predestinarian, christological, trinitarian and other stormy controversies, Augustine's works served all sides" (ibid., p. 126). Thus, the controversy between John Scotus Eriugena and Gottschalk of Orbais was primarily a debate over the correct interpretation of Augustine. Similarly, in the controversy between Radbertus (d. ca. 860) and his disciple Ratramnus (d. after 868), both authors supported their position by using patristic authorities (esp. Ambrose and Augustine) but disagreed on the interpretation of their writings.

In the context of the Carolingian theological controversies, undoubtedly the most interesting and important interpreter of the Fathers was John Scotus Eriugena, an Irish immigrant and teacher at the court of Charles the Bald; he was well noted for his use of Greek patristic sources: Basil and Origen as much as for his translation of *Gregory of Nyssa, ps.-*Dionysius and *Maximus the Confessor, and for his blending of such Greek sources with his Latin cultural formation in the "most brilliant and ingenious arrangement of an imposing amount of patristic material that the Early Middle Ages had ever known" (Cristiani 1987, p. xxx). Modern historians have done quite a bit of study on questions regarding Eriugena's exact sources and the proportions of his synthesis of the patristic East and West. In one of his works, De divina praedestinatione, all the explicit patristic references are Latin-based (esp. from Augustine), but certain scholars believe that one can already see in it the influence of Greek sources (Mainoldi, 2003, pp. xlvi-li) and in the Periphyseon the citations of *Origen, *Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, ps.-Dionysius and Maximus the Confessor are extensive. Eriugena almost always finds that his Greek authors are in harmony with the Latin tradition (esp. the Augustinian tradition): nec inter se dissonant, nisi in significationibus vocabulorum, "and they do not disagree among themselves, save only in regard to the meanings of words" (Periphyseon V, 31). Where there seems to be a disagreement, he brings Ambrose into the controversy to mediate a solution (D'Onofrio 1994, 118-119).

Eriugena's synthesis of the Eastern and Western tradition is of great importance for the history of medieval patristic interpretation. As W. Otten maintains: "it is in his establishment of a connection between Dionysius and Augustine that Eriugena showed tremendous foresight. For it is precisely through its fascination with these different but not divergent Christian-*Platonic strands of the patristic tradition in Eriugena that Carolingian theology became firmly linked to the intellectual revival of 12th-c. Europe" (Otten 1997, 43). Although the question regarding the immediate influence of Eriugena remains partially unclear (see O'Meara synthesis 1988, 198-212), such influence becomes rather evident in that movement E. Jeauneau describes as the "Eriugenean Renaissance" of the 12th c. (Jeauneau 1987), in which, as M.-D. Chenu observes, Ambrose, Origen and Augustine unite in Eriugena to nourish "la mentalité symbolique" of 12th.-c. theology (Chenu 1957, 174).

3. The Renaissance of the 12th century. The history of the influence of the Fathers in the 12th c. is extremely complex. It is marked by the following: a renewed freedom of speculation, as in the case of Anselm of Aosta (archbishop of Canterbury) and the Platonists of Chartres; a heavily critical spirit, as in Abelard's Sic et non; and a renewed flourishing of monastic spirituality, as represented in a special way by Bernard of Clairvaux and his followers, the Cistercians (Pranger 1977). All these tendencies involved a lively commitment to the patristic tradition, and all were considerably influenced by the discovery of new sources beginning in the middle of the previous century. And the commitment to organize the patristic inheritance in a systematic form (e.g., the Summae Sententiarum) received a great thrust from the collections of civil and ecclesiastical canons (Werckmeister 1997; Grabmann 1911, 86-87). A precise judgment of the extent of the Greek patristic influence on the development of scholasticism and mysticism will depend upon the research scholars do in the future. One of the most representative witnesses of such interests is the Clavis physicae of Honorius of Autun "Augustodunensis" (ed. P. Lucentini, Rome 1974), a summary of the pseudonymous Periphyseon; and we know from the catalogs of the medieval libraries and the MSS that have survived to our day that the text of ps.-Dionysius and Eriugena (at times by means of the summary of Honorius) were available in all of Europe. The Periphyseon is mentioned under a pseudonymous name in the Sententiae Anselmi and extracts from the works of John of Eriugena were introduced into the Glossa ordinaria et interlinearis at Laon and in Anselm of Laon's Ennarationes in Johannem; and there are significant indications of such influence in at least two dozen 12th-c. authors (Crouse 1994, 406).

During the middle of the century, ps.-Dionysius was esp. represented at the school of Saint Victor by a translation of John the Saracen and by the commentary of Hugh of Saint Victor. As in the case of the exegetical works of Origen and other Greek Fathers, Dionysius's texts were assimilated into a context that was fundamentally Latin and *Augustinian. For Honorius, e.g., Augustine is always a primary source; nevertheless, his Augustine is the one understood acc. to Eriugena's perspective and articulated acc. to his characteristic vocabulary. In the history of medieval thought, "Augustinianism" could at times mean different things from the moment that the texts were chosen and reinterpreted in relation to new interests. Thus, we cannot speak of just one "Medieval Augustinianism" plain and simple. Anselm of Aosta, e.g., "the Father of Scholasticism" is certainly one of Augustine's followers, and in the prologue of his Monologion, he invites us to compare his work with Augustine's De Trinitate (Monologion, ed. Schmitt, I, p. 8); although Augustine devoted the first four books of his treatise to the auctoritates of *Scripture, Anselm insists on proceeding sola ratione, as Lanfranc of Bec noted. Even the "Victorines" were Augustinians, but they made ready use of Dionysian terminology, which Anselm (who would have had some familiarity with these texts) entirely avoids. As S. Vanni Rovighi observes, "There were different ways of being Augustinian" (Vanni Rovighi 1978, p. 102).

4. The 13th century. In the 2nd half of the 12th c., and for the entire 13th, the intellectual life of Europe was greatly enriched by the acquisition of many previously unknown texts: Aristotelian, *Platonic, *Neoplatonic and patristic texts, many of which had fundamental importance in the formation of High Scholasticism and suggested new perspectives in the interpretation of already well-known sources. Aside from the translations of some major works of Aristotle and of some of his Greek commentators, and of different significant theologically Neoplatonic texts (e.g., the Liber de causis), primarily through Islamic and Byzantine sources, medieval authors acquired important patristic texts such as the new version of John of Damascus and ps.-Dionysius translated by Robert Grosseteste (d. 1258) and Thomas of Vercelli's (d. 1258) Extractio (a "simplified paraphrase"). This second Latin reception of ps.-Dionysius (McEvoy 1999) was of fundamental importance, esp. for the development of mystical theology with its concepts of excessus mentis, principalis affectio and supermentalis unicio, etc., concepts that expressed a radical division between the cognitive and affective spheres, thus forming a division between Scholasticism and Mysticism—a distinction foreign to the Augustinian tradition—where the cognitive and affective spheres remain always in relation to the *Trinity.

All the great Scholastic philosophers and theologians of the 13th c. tried in their own ways to reach a coherent synthesis of patristic scholarship (Greek and Latin) and the scholarship of Aristotelianism and Neoplatonism. Thus, for Bonaventure and his followers, Aristotle provides the fundamental elements of scientia; Plato, sapientia; whereas Augustine embraces both (Bonaventure, Sermo 4 de rebus theol., 181, Opera X, 572). Even Thomas Aquinas, although he does not entirely avoid directing criticism toward Augustine (Gilson 1926), remains "proprement un scholastique authentiquement nourri d'Augustin" (Chenu 1957, 31); but he is also, at the same time, an entirely favorable commentator of ps.-Dionysius and observes that Dionysius fere ubique sequitur Aristotelem (In II Sent., d.14 q.1 ad 2). And although Aquinas establishes his entire concept of the theological-philosophical system upon the Dionysian model of exitus and reditus, such a concept is not at all foreign to Augustine.

The chief authority of the Scriptures and the interpretive authority of the Fathers remained intact, and, as in Aristotle, the Scholastics subordinated all the other sciences to theology ("first philosophy") and Aristotelian and Neoplatonic theology to the theology of the "pagina sacra." Thus, for Dante, the poet of Scholasticism, Aristotle is "the teacher of those who know" (Inferno IV, 131), and his teaching pervades the Divina Commedia from beginning to end; but Aristotle himself remains in Limbo while Bernard of Clairvaux has the privilege of accompanying the pilgrim to the final trinitarian vision, in which the cognitive and affective spheres are perfectly united.

M. Grabmann, Geschichte der scholastischen Methode, 2 vols., Freiburg i.B. 1909, 1911; E. Gilson, Pourquoi saint Thomas a critiqué saint Augustin: Archives d'hist. doct. et litt. du moyen âge I (1926) 46-80; M. Cappuyns, Le prémier représentant de l'augustinisme médiévale. Prosper d'Aquitaine: RTAM 1 (1929) 309-337; E. Gilson, La théologie mystique de saint Bernard, Paris 1947; M.-D. Chenu, Introduction a l'étude de saint Thomas d'Aquin, Paris-Montreal 1950; C. Munier, Les sources patristiques du droit de l'Église du VIII^e au XIII^e siécle, Strasbourg 1957; J. Leclercq, L'amour des lettres et le désir de Dieu, Paris 1957; M.-D. Chenu, La théologie au douzième siècle, Paris 1957; C. Viola, L'influence de la méthode anselmienne, in H. Kohlenberger, ed., Analecta Anselmiana 4/2, Frankfurt 1975, 1-32; H. de Lubac, Exégèse médiévale. Première partie, I and II, Paris 1959; E. Amann, Pères de l'Église: DTC XII/1, 1192-1215; S. Vanni Rovighi, Studi di filosofia medioevale, I, Milan 1978; D. Bell, William of Saint Thierry and Jean Scot Eriugena: Citeaux 22 (1982) 5-28; M. Cristiani, ed., Giovanni Scafo. Omelia sul prologo di Giovanni, Vicenza 1987; É. Jeauneau, Études Érigéniennes, Paris 1987; E. Jeauneau, Le Renouveau érigénien du XII^e siècle, in W. Beierwaltes, ed., Eriugena Redivivus, Heidelberg 1987; J. O'Meara, Eriugena, Oxford 1988; J. Madec, Jean Scot et ses auteurs. Annotations Ériugéniennes, Paris 1988; K. Ruh, Geschichte der abendländischen Mystik, I, Munich 1990; G. D'Onofrio, The Concordia of Augustine and Dionysius. Toward a Hermeneutic of the Disagreement of Patristic Sources in John the Scot's Periphyseon, in B. McGinn - W. Otten, eds., Eriugena. East and West, Notre Dame-London 1994, 115-140; R. Crouse, What Is Augustinian in Twelfth-Century Mysticism? in F. van Fleteren - J. C. Schnaubelt - J. Reino, eds., Collectanea Augustiniana. Augustine, Mystic and Mystagogue, New York 1994, 401-414; A. Di Berardino, ed., Patrologia IV, Genoa 1996; J. Gribomont, The Translations. Jerome and Rufinus, in Patrologia III, ch. IV; I.D. Backus, ed., The Reception of the Church Fathers in the West from the Carolingians to the Maurists, Leiden-New York-Cologne, I, 1997, in particular: W. Otten, The Texture of Tradition. The Role of the Church Fathers in Carolingian Theology, 3-50; J. Werckmeister, The Reception of the Church Fathers in Canon Law, in ibid., 51-81; J.-G. Bougerol, The Church Fathers and the Sentences of Peter Lombard, in ibid., 113-164; B. Pranger, Sic et Non: Patristic Authority Between Refusal and Acceptance. Anselm of Canterbury, Peter Abelard and Bernard of Clairvaux, in ibid., 165-193; J.-G. Bougerol, The Church Fathers as auctoritates in Scholastic Theology to Bonaventure, in ibid., 290-335; L. Elders, Thomas Aquinas and the Fathers of the Church, in ibid., 337-366; J. Contrini, Carolingian Era, Early, in A. Fitzgerald, ed., Augustine Through the Ages, Grand Rapids-Cambridge 1999, 124-129; J. McEvoy, Thomas Gallus, Abbas Vercellensis, and the Commentary on De mystica theologia ascribed to Johannes Scotus Eriugena, in J. Cleary, ed., Traditions of Platonism. Essays in Honour of John Dillon, Aldershot 1999, 389-405; C. Leonardi, ed., Letteratura latina medievale (secolo VI-XV), Florence 2002; E. Mainoldi, ed., Giovanni Scafo Eriugena. De praedestinatione liber, Florence 2003.

R. Crouse

III. The Fathers during the Renaissance

1. Renewed interest in the 14th and 15th c. for patristic texts and their uses - 2. Patristic studies in the 16th c.: Humanism, Reformation and Counter Reformation - 3. The uses of the fathers of the church in the Reformation and Counter Reformation.

The period between the mid-14th and early 17th c. saw an unprecedented development both in the number of patristic works made available and in the diversity of treatments and uses they were put to. This was due to a variety of factors. The growing emphasis on returning to ancient pagan sources in the 14th-15th c. inevitably entailed a return to early Christian sources as a corollary. These were then found of vital importance in resolving problems of doctrine in the climate of religious unrest fostered first by the Great Schism and the Conciliarist movement, and somewhat later by the series of events that followed Luther's break with Rome. In the 14th-15th c. we can, broadly speaking, distinguish two phenomena conducive to the rediscovery of patristic learning: the Renaissance of humanist learning, esp. S of the Alps, and a growing need in theological circles in universities to define what constituted the true church. The two phenomena did not result in the same type of revival of patristic sources. Humanists who worked mainly outside the university context favored the method known as imitative readings of early authors, which enabled them to absorb the given author's doctrine, ethical values, as well as his rhetoric. This approach necessitated the availability of a complete text. The emphasis here was not so much on early church doctrine and its authority irrespective of context as on a particular author's teaching and eloquence as conveyed by the sum total of his writings. In universities, Christian texts continued to be seen as a means of providing true propositions about faith which could be extracted from their context and gathered into collections of sentences. However, the two methods often combined, which meant, among other things, that collections of patristic sayings in the 14th and 15th c. were more accurate and better founded textually, as new MSS of complete works were discovered.

1. Renewed interest in the 14th and 15th c. for patristic texts and their uses. Lorenzo Valla (1407–1457) is generally considered the most radical representative of the humanist method. In rejecting the application of *philosophical categories to theology, he explicitly advocated a return to the Greek and Latin Fathers such as *Basil, *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Ambrose and *Jerome as they alone preserved the true method by not confusing theology and philosophy. Valla also challenged the authenticity of the *Dionysian corpus, a view that did not find extensive support in the 15th or 16th c. While Valla favored a philological approach to theology, other, earlier humanists favored a rhetorical approach. This was based on their optimistic view of the human being as created in God's image which, after being obscured by original *sin, was renewed through redemption. The best example of this approach was Pier Paolo Vergerio (ca. 1370–1444), who contributed to establishing Jerome as the ideal of classical learning and moral virtue dedicated to Christian scholarship and eloquence. He was also the first to identify the *apostles and early *martyrs with public leaders of pagan antiquity who promoted political peace, and to consider early Christianity as a model of civic virtue.

The most lively center of patristic learning in the late 14th and early 15th c. was *Florence where Coluccio Salutati promoted both Greek (it was he who brought over the famous Greek teacher Manuel Chrysoloras) and Latin studies. Salutati's own collection comprised MSS of most of the Latin Fathers, including notably *Lactantius, Jerome, Augustine and Ambrose. Together with such Greek Fathers as he knew (*John Chrysostom in particular) they represented in his view the height of literary, moral, civic and theological achievement. That they did was very largely due to the fact that they had themselves received classical educations. It was Salutati who asked Leonardo Bruni to translate Basil's Ad iuuenes in 1403 as part of his defense of a humanist educational curriculum. The work to this day is extant in over 300 MSS and over 100 editions, ca. 1470–ca. 1560. However, the first humanist to devote himself actively to patristic studies, treating them as his chief concern and not just as a byproduct of the pagan classics, was Ambroggio Traversari (1386–1439), a Camaldolese monk. As well as transcribing and making emendations to MSS of several Latin Fathers such as *Tertullian (fallen into oblivion until then), Lactantius, Ambrose and Jerome, whom he particularly respected, he was the first Western scholar since Burgundio of Pisa (ca. 1110–1193) to translate several Greek patristic texts into Latin. Traversari's earliest translations of Basil, Chrysostom and Climachus's Scala paradisi were all of texts that encouraged monastic life. By the mid 1420s he was also translating Athanasius's Contra gentes and De incarnatione verbi. Among his other translations we might mention the Sermons of *Ephrem, Chrysostom's Homilies on 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus as well as parts of Basil's Contra Eunomium for the Council of Florence (1439). He is best known, however, for his Latin version of ps.-Dionysius, which found a much wider public at the time.

The Council of Florence did much to foster and further the study of the Greek Fathers. In its wake, George of Trebizond (1396–ca. 1474), a Cretan émigré turned papal scribe, translated Basil's Contra Eunomium I-V and De Spiritu sancto (1442). Both versions were to be revised by him in 1467/1468. They were initially carried out at the request of Bessarion, who had attended the Council as a pro-union bishop of Nicaea. The "Western" version of Contra Eunomium, which had interpolated several passages on the double *procession of the Holy Spirit, played a crucial role in the filioque discussions with the Greek delegation. In 1440 Bessarion was made cardinal by Eugenius IV and continued to foster an interest in Greek patristics from Rome. Trebizond, who was to become a prominent member of Bessarion's circle, was also responsible for Latin translations of *Cyril of Alexandria's Thesaurus (excerpts of which had also been used in the conciliar debates), Chrysostom's Homilies on Matthew 26–28 and *Eusebius's Praeparatio euangelica. Of the Italian humanists sponsored by Bessarion, Cristoforo Persona (d. 1485) translated the Pauline commentaries of Theophylact of Ohrid, which he attributed to Athanasius, a large number of Chrysostom's moral sermons and Origen's Contra Celsum. Major patristic achievements dating from the pontificate of Sixtus IV after Bessarion's death include Johannes Argyropulos's translation of Basil's Hexaemeron and Lilio Tifernate's translation of Philo's Old Testament commentaries. All these works, with the exception of Trebizond's translation of Basil's De Spiritu sancto, which fell into oblivion as a result of an incidental omission, were subsequently printed and reprinted until well into the 16th century. A later prominent representative of Italian humanist translators of the Fathers is Raffaele Maffei (1451–1522), who translated some of Chrysostom's works and many treatises of the Cappadocians, including a collection of Basil's sermons and letters later printed with the Trebizond and Argyropulos versions.

In universities, the period immediately prior to the Reformation was characterized by the revival of the doctrines and writings of Augustine. While the doctrinal nature of the Augustinianism of the late Middle Ages is somewhat difficult to define, one of its manifestations was an increase of interest in the corpus of Augustine's writings and a preference for older witnesses to its text. This interest was not limited to Augustine: other Fathers such ps.-Dionysius, Ambrose, as well as more recent authorities such as Anselm were subjected to a similar treatment, albeit less intensively. The period was also characterized by increased production of patristic *florilegia in university circles. While Augustinian florilegia such as the Milleloquium veritatis sancti Augustini of Bartholomaeus of Urbino were of particular importance, milleloquia of other Fathers such as Ambrose were also produced. Whereas nonuniversity humanist circles of the period favored the dissemination of complete texts of the Fathers, universities tended to remain attached to the sentences approach. For the first time, however, theologians became aware that each individual sententia is a quotation from a longer text. The university circles were also slow to recognize the importance of the Greek Fathers, ps.-Dionysius (whose authenticity was not challenged in universities until much later) constituting the most notable exception.

Apart from the usefulness of some Greek Fathers in the double procession debates and the exploitation of Chrysostom's Homilies on Matthew 16 and John 21 in support of Peter's primacy, patristic literature throughout this period provided humanists with a useful counterauthority to Scholasticism. It also provided a valuable source of the doctrine of human preeminence over other creatures. First and foremost, however, all humanists valued the Fathers as expositors of the biblical text, which they regarded as the sole normative expression of Christianity, regardless of their individual views on the primacy of Peter, etc. In university and clerical circles, an increase in interest in Augustine's doctrine of *predestination in the 14th c. coincided with an awareness of a more critical approach to his texts. At the same time the Fathers were increasingly cited in debates over the nature of the true church during the conciliar period with authors like John Wycliffe and Marsiglio of Padua making extensive use of Augustine and Jerome in their attacks on the doctrine of Peter's primacy. Canonists of the period, while still relying on the Decree of Gratian and the Sentences of Peter Lombard, made increasing use of the acts of the early councils (which they knew only indirectly) and of Eusebius's Historia ecclesiastica in Jerome's version. By and large, clerical and university circles of the 14th-15th c. took a less active interest than humanists in the Fathers as expositors of the Bible. This was to change with Erasmus's publication of the New Testament (1516) and Luther's introduction of the Reformation.

2. Patristic studies in the 16th c.: Humanism, Reformation and Counter Reformation. Significantly in the 1st quarter of the 16th c. the most eminent editors of patristic texts such as Erasmus, Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples or Beatus Rhenanus worked outside university circles. Erasmus is the most famous of them. During his lifetime he produced editions of *Jerome (1516), *Cyprian (1520), *Arnobius the Younger, whom he mistook for *Arnobius the Elder (1522), *Hilary (1523), *John Chrysostom (1525), *Irenaeus (1526), *Athanasius (1527), *Ambrose (1527), *Augustine (1529), *Gregory of Nazianzus (1531), *Basil (1532) and *Origen (1536). Of those, his editions of Jerome, Ambrose, Augustine, Cyprian and Hilary contain the complete works as available at the time. His edition of Augustine was intended as an improvement upon the 1505 Basel edition. Erasmus's preface does not refer to any classically Augustinian doctrines such as the issue of *grace and *free will, which so preoccupied most theologians of his era and before him. His only significant Greek edition is that of Basil's De Spiritu sancto (1532). Erasmus's interest in the Fathers was partly doctrinal, partly linguistic and rhetorical, and partly devotional. He also aimed to produce the most accurate text possible. We might note that his preference went to the Western Fathers and that, like the Italian humanists of a previous generation, he combines an interest in patristics with an interest in pagan antiquity.

Among other outstanding examples of this type of humanist learning we might mention Beatus Rhenanus (1485–1547), who edited several pagan authors as well as producing first editions of *Tertullian (1521), the Ecclesiastical History of *Eusebius-*Rufinus and the Historia tripartita (1523). Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples (ca. 1450–1536)—more inclusive than Erasmus in his attitude to the writings of the early church—is best known for first editions of the interpolated version of *Ignatius's Epistles (1498), the Shepherd of *Hermas (1513) and Rufinus's version of the ps.-Clementine Recognitions (1504). As the century progresses, we see that an increasing number of patristic editions emanate from university circles regardless of whether they are Catholic or Protestant. Some examples here are the Protestant Theodore Beza's (d. 1605) Greek-Latin edition of ps.-Athanasius's Dialogi de Trinitate and Basil's Contra Eunomium (Geneva, 1570); François du Jon's edition of Tertullian (1590); the Catholic Wolfgang Lazius's edition of the ps.-Abdias version of the Lives of the Apostles (1551); as well as Gentien Hervet's edition of *Clement of Alexandria (1551).

While there was an increasing tendency in the course of the century to publish Greek Fathers in Greek-Latin editions, the Latin version remained the norm. Many of the translations or editions of both Greek and Latin Fathers that appeared in the 16th c. are a conscious effort to improve upon earlier efforts. The best examples here are the attempts of the Bern reformer Wolfgang Musculus and of the French Carthusian Geoffroi Tilmann to improve upon George of Trebizond's, Argyropulos's and Maffei's versions of Basil (published respectively in Basel 1540 and in Paris 1547). Musculus's edition came out in the same year as the completely new Latin translation by the German physician Janus Cornarius (d. 1558), which proved more popular with both Catholics and Protestants than either Musculus or Tilmann's revisions of the earlier versions. The same Cornarius was responsible for the first Greek edition of Basil's complete works (Basel, 1551) and for the first Latin translation of the Panarion of *Epiphanius of Salamis (Basel, 1543).

Although the increasing concern with textual accuracy that is observed in the course of the century seems to stand at odds with the prevailing tendency to publish only the Latin translations of the Greek Fathers, this is in fact far from being the case. Quite often, the absence of a Greek text, which is more frequently encountered in Roman Catholic editions, is due simply to lack of competent printers. Jacques de Billy (1535–1581), the French Benedictine responsible for the first edition of the works of Gregory of Nazianzus (1569), complained about this quite openly. Indeed, although he was able to obtain copies of several Greek MSS from the Vatican, not just of Gregory but also of *Isidore of Pelusium (1585) and of *John of Damascus's Sacra Parallela (as part of Opera omnia, 1577), Billy only published Latin versions of these Fathers. At the same time, however, the Vatican, which acted as provider of MSS, wanted biblical quotations from Fathers such as Gregory to be translated by the Vulgate. This suggests a preference for the Latin version of Christianity in the post-Tridentine Roman Catholic establishment. There were no such injunctions in the Protestant camp. Protestant printers, esp. those in Basel and Geneva, were often also those who had Greek fonts. Indeed, partly due to this and partly due to the tradition established by Erasmus and Froben, Basel became in the 16th c. the center of Greek and Latin patristic production. Only those editions that had an openly anti-Reformation purpose expressed in prefaces, marginal notes or indexes tended to appear in Rome or Paris. By the mid-16th c., however, all patristic editions, whatever their confessional slant and language, were marked by a concern to achieve the greatest possible degree of textual accuracy. This humanist heritage was common to both Catholics and Protestants and was given added momentum by the reforms subsequent to the Council of Trent.

3. The uses of the Fathers of the Church in the Reformation and Counter Reformation. Martin Luther was marked more by late medieval Augustinianism than by humanism. However, once he became convinced that the biblical message emphasized faith at the expense of good works, he became interested in establishing a sharp distinction between the authority of the Bible, which he considered as absolute, and that of the Fathers, which he thought limited and relative, i.e., subject to correction in the light of scriptural evidence. He states this notably in Von den Konziliis und Kirchen (1539) where he lists the chief Fathers together with their contributions to Christian doctrine. This slightly cautious attitude did not stop other reformers very early on from using the Fathers' writings to defend the Reformation against the attacks of Catholic theologians particularly but also against one another, e.g., in the eucharistic quarrels of 1525–1536 between Zwinglians and Lutherans. Recent editions, esp. those of Erasmus, provided an invaluable store of textual and historical evidence, which was frequently open to conflicting theological interpretations. Both Protestants and Catholics used these editions. Whereas Luther tried to divide sharply the Fathers' authority from that of the Bible, Ulrich Zwingli and Martin Bucer adopted the "implicit normativity" approach. They tended to interpret the Bible through institutional and individual writings of the early church, which they interpreted in turn through the Bible. This approach made for a closer coexistence of biblical and patristic authority in their works. However, they were just as aware of the Fathers' limitations as Luther and did not hesitate to criticize either their doctrine or their exegetical method when they deemed it necessary, i.e., when it diverged too far from their own beliefs. As regards exegesis, while sharing the humanist penchant for the Fathers as prime expositors of *Scripture (more so than Catholic theologians of the period), they were nonetheless extremely critical of their tendency to resort to allegory. Origen particularly was unpopular because of this.

John Calvin, aware of both the supremacy of Scripture and of its silence on certain points, used the Fathers where he thought that Scripture could not provide all the necessary evidence. His recourse to the Cappadocians and to Cyril of Alexandria to support the Nicene doctrine of the Trinity, to Augustine to support his doctrine of predestination, and to a variety of patristic sources to support the Genevan model of church government are examples of this.

Once the boundaries between confessions became better defined, the main purpose for Protestants and Catholics alike was to use the doctrines of the early church to help construct a confessional identity. This wish of both parties to give themselves a past also explains the appearance of new confessionally oriented Histories of the early church: the Centuries of Magdeburg (1554–1574) for all the churches that derived from the Reformation and the Ecclesiastical Annals of Caesar Baronius (1588–1603) for the Catholics. Both were based on recent patristic editions and on unpublished material; each took historical scholarship to unprecedented heights. The main drive of both Protestant and Catholic scholars to produce patristic editions that were free from what they deemed to be heterodox glosses and "corruptions" also dates from the Tridentine and post-Tridentine period. The editions of Irenaeus provide a good example here. The Erasmus edition of Contra haereses is given a Protestant identity in 1570 by Nicolas Des Gallars, who added the Greek fragments of Epiphanius and anti-Roman glosses. A few years later (1575) François Feuardent, OFM, published the complete text for the first time, giving it an openly anti-Protestant orientation.

The later 16th and early 17th c. witnessed the publication of a number of guides to patristic editions and literature. On the Protestant side theologians such as Andreas Hyperius (Methodus, 1567), Abraham Scultetus (Syntagma, 1598–1613) and André Rivet (Criticus sacer, ca. 1612) produced digests intended to ensure that pastors gave a Protestant interpretation of the Fathers. Roman Catholic guides such as Sixtus of Siena's Bibliotheca sancta, Possevino's Apparatus sacer or Bellarmine's De scriptoribus ecclesiasticis (1613), which was intended as the contemporary equivalent of Jerome's De viris illustribus, fulfilled a similar function in the Catholic camp.

In sum, it can be said that there are marked similarities of approach to patristic studies between Catholic and Calvinist post-Tridentine scholars. What distinguishes them is their attitude to the consensus patrum. For Catholics, the idea of the Fathers of the first seven centuries constituting a unified body of doctrine that supports the teaching of the Roman Church is fundamental. Calvinists tend to privilege particular Fathers to support particular doctrines and do not see the body of doctrine of the first seven centuries as homogeneous, although in their view it does on the whole support their own doctrines. Significantly, in the post-Tridentine period the most eminent patristic scholars are either Calvinist or Catholic. What characterizes the Lutheran church of the period is its interest in the history of the church, which includes the unearthing and publication of Christian apocryphal material. Significantly, it is Michael Neander's editions of Luther's Greek Catechism of 1564 and 1567 that include pieces such as the editio princeps of the Protevangelium of James* and *Prochorus's Acts of John. This tradition is carried over into the large collection of Orthodoxographa of Johann Jakob Grynaeus, published in 1569 before the author's conversion from Lutheranism to Calvinism. All these texts were published in Basel. Interest in Christian apocryphal literature, particularly texts such as the ps.-Abdias version of the Lives of the Apostles, published in three different versions in 1531, 1551, 1552 and reprinted several times, was also present among some Roman Catholic scholars. However, their publication was not so much meant to encourage an interest in history as to foster piety in the form of venerating the saints, etc. Other Roman Catholic scholars such as Bellarmine were united with their Calvinist counterparts in firmly refuting the authenticity and value of all Christian apocryphal literature, not only ps.-Abdias but also Prochorus's Acts of John, etc.

The variety of the authors published, as well as increased concern with textual and historical accuracy, mean that the 16th-c. editors, while seeking a confessional identity in the history of the early church, ushered in the study of patristics in the modern sense of the term.

P. Petitmengin, À propos des éditions patristiques de la Contre-Réforme : le 'Saint-Augustin' de la typographie vaticane: RecAug 4 (1966) 199-251; C. Stinger, Humanism and the Church Fathers. Ambrogio Traversari (1386–1439) and Christian Antiquity in the Italian Renaissance, Albany 1977; I. Backus, Lectures humanistes de Basile de Césarée. Traductions latines (1439–1618), Paris 1990; Id., La patristique et les guerres de religion en France. Étude de l'activité littéraire de Jacques de Billy (1535-81) O.S.B., d'après le MS Sens 167 et les sources imprimées, Paris 1993; Id., Historical Method and Confessional Identity in the Era of the Reformation, 1378–1615, Leiden 2003; Reception of the Church Fathers in the West. From the Carolingians to the Maurists, ed. I. Backus, 2 vols., Leiden 1997 (Vol. 2 contains 15 articles from various authors on the fathers of the church during the Renaissance, the Reformation and the Counter Reformation); Auctoritas patrum I-II. Zur Rezeption der Kirchenväter im 15. Und 16. Jahrhundert / Contributions on the Reception of the Church Fathers in the 15th and 16th Century, ed. L. Grane, A. Schindler, M. Wriedt, Mainz 1993, 1998; Tradizioni patristiche nell'Umanesimo. Atti del convegno Istituto Nazionale di studi sul Rinascimento, Biblioteca Medicea Laurenziana, Firenze 6-8 febbraio 1997, ed. M.R. Cortesi, C. Leonardi, Tavarnuzze 2000; Atti del convegno I Padri sotto il torchio. Le edizioni dl'antichità cristiana nei secoli 15-16, ed. M.R. Cortesi, Tavarnuzze 2002.

I. Backus

FATHER, NAME of GOD. The title Father given to *God in Christianity has very specific biblical roots. The OT writers came to the concept of God's fatherhood through an understanding of the fatherhood of their ancestors (the patriarchs), a concept that reached its apex in the spiritual and universal fatherhood of *Abraham (father of a multitude, i.e., of many peoples [Gen 17:5]) and carries with it the blessing of all the nations of the earth (Gen 12:3). The transition from the fatherhood of the ancestors to God's fatherhood, Father of Israel and then of all humankind (Is 64:7; Mal 2:10) was not difficult because he is the universal creator. In the NT, the fatherhood of God becomes explicit both in respect to all people and esp. to *Jesus the Christ. With respect to people, God is presented as the Father of the little ones (Mt 11:25), Jews (Mt 21:31ff.) or *pagans (Mt 25:32ff.), *children who pray to God their Father (Mt 6:9; Mk 14:36; Lk 11:2) and imitate him (Mt 5:44ff.; 18:33). With respect to Jesus of Nazareth, God is the Father of Jesus. Jesus is his Son (Mk 13:32; Rom 15:6; 2 Cor 1:3; Eph 1:3; 1 Pet 1:3), even the only begotten son (the tradition of *John). The Synoptic *tradition of God as the Father, particularly in *Matthew's gospel, developed in Christians' piety, esp. in their liturgical piety (Didache 8,2-3; *Tertullian, *Cyprian and *Augustine's *commentaries on the *Lord's Prayer), bearing witness to the brotherhood of all people and the knowledge of God in the church, which is the mother of believers. The Johannine tradition, however, which was more closely connected to Greek culture and the mystery cults, led to a greater understanding and specification of the *names of God, among which was the name Father—the one most frequently used. The same tradition also opened the difficulty of applying the name "Father" to Jesus the Christ, who was acknowledged as God but also designated in the *Scriptures as the "Son."

In the *Platonism of the Timaeus and in the *Middle Platonism that followed it, the title Father, which the name of God connoted, is understood to be the origin of everything alongside the principle that is not to be identified with the material universe. The adjective agennētos (unbegotten) of itself pertains to the title Father with respect to creation, which is, however, "begotten." The historical context of the mystery religions that were contemporaneous to Christianity even knew of God's name as Father, in the sense that God reveals himself to the one initiated as "the Father of everything" (Corpus Hermeticum 1, 1,12; 21; 30) and is *Providence (ibid. IV, fr. 26,3). The conception of the God-of-everything as applied to creation became explicit in the conception of God as Father-Son, a duality/unity upon which all life depends (ibid. 1,1,6). One should read *Melito of Sardis's attribution of the title Father to Christ in this context (Perì Pascha 9,63), as well as *Synesius's similar attribution in his hymns. Although it was possible in a Christian setting of Greek extraction to understand the concept of Christ-God as Father in the sense of the "Demiurge" creator (the Word) from whom the visible *cosmos depends, that application encountered many difficulties because the notion of the Word carried with it the notion of Filius (Son), i.e., the notion of generation. Christ came to be portrayed as begotten and unbegotten (Justin, 1 *Apol.*14 and 22). The *monarchian controversy, which then raised a debated question about God on the basis of Greek epistemology and led to the modalist *heresy, caused the Christian religion to apply the title Father solely to God the Father. The controversy even put all premonarchian literature in question when such literature simultaneously spoke of Christ as Father-Son.

TWNT 5,952 and 1023; SC 210, 325-331; H.I. Marrou, SC 33 bis, 192; V. Grossi, "Il titolo cristologico di "Padre" nell'antichità cristiana," Augustinianum 16 (1976) 237-269; Id., Tertulliano-Cipriano-Agostino. Il Padre nostro, Rome 1980.

V. Grossi

FAUSTINUS (4th c.). Around 380 he was a priest in Rome of the schismatic sect of the *Luciferians. At the request of *Flaccilla, wife of *Theodosius, he wrote a De trinitate in which he expounded the fundamental points of the anti-*Arian *Catholic doctrine, without particular originality but very clearly. He sent a brief profession of faith to Theodosius to defend himself from the accusation of *Sabellianism launched at him by Catholics. In 384, along with the Luciferian priest *Marcellinus, he addressed to Theodosius the De confessione verae fidei et ostentatione sacrae communionis et persecutione adversantium veritati, better known as Libellus precum, to obtain protection for the schismatics from the violence of the Catholics. The work contains, along with some already legendary elements, important information on the history of the Luciferians.

CPL 119-120; PL 13, 37-108; CCL 69, 287-392; Patrologia III, 83-84; M. Simonetti, Note su Faustino: SE 14 (1963) 50-98; PCBE II/1, 747-749.

M. Simonetti

FAUSTINUS of Potenza Picena (d. after 425/426). Bishop of Potentiae (Potenza Picena, Macerata), he was sent, with the Roman priests Philippus and Asellus, by Pope *Zosimus in 418 to *Carthage to discuss the case of the priest *Apiarius of Sicca Veneria (today Le Kef, in Tunisia) with the African episcopate. Apiarius, having been excommunicated for unknown reasons by his bishop, had appealed to Rome. The delegates also had the task of handling the appeal to the Apostolic See and the petitions to the imperial court at *Ravenna. They arrived bearing an ensemble of canons, considered to be from Nicaea, in reality from *Serdica, which were contested by the African bishops but which they declared themselves ready to accept in a provisional manner. Faustinus remained in Carthage waiting for instructions from the new pope, *Boniface, which arrived 26 April 419. Two other Roman clerics, Dulcitius and Felix, arrived also. In the council of 419 the displayed canons were contested again, with speeches by *Alypius and by *Augustine. Decisions were reached (Canones in causa Apiarii). Faustinus returned to Carthage again, probably in 425, still concerning the case of Apiarius, excommunicated again for serious crimes, but who again had appealed to Rome. He appeared as the advocate of the accused, but the trial finished with the confession of Apiarius. Faustinus was charged with carrying the results of the synod of the bishops to Pope *Celestine.

Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana II, Rome 1976, 1250-1275; PCBE 1, 82-83; 2, 750-752; J. Merdinger, Rome and the African Church in the Time of Augustine, New Haven, CT-London 1997, 111-135, 182-199.

A. Di Berardino

FAUSTUS (5th c.). Priest and *archimandrite of the church of *Constantinople, between 449 and 450 he was exhorted multiple times by Pope *Leo (Ep. 32, 51, 61, 72, 75; PG 54, 795-798, 843-846, 874-876, 897-898, 901-904) not to let himself be influenced by the *monophysite doctrine and to continue to fight for the true faith. On the other hand, Faustus wrote in 451 to the emperor *Marcian, with the collaboration of 18 other orthodox archimandrites of Constantinople, to invite him to judge and oppose adequately the spread of the heresy of *Eutyches.

CPG 8911, 8926, 8955, 8967, 9003; ACO II, 4,5-6, 11-12, 25-26, 28; ACO II, I,2,119-120; C. Silva Tarouca, Die Quellen der Briefsammlungen Papst Leos des Grossen, in Papsttum und Kaisertum. Forschungen zur politischen Geschichte und Geisteskultur des Mittelalters, Munich 1925, 44; Id., Textus et Documenta, Ser. Theol. 15, Rome 1933, 21-22, 37-38, 49-50.

P. Marone

FAUSTUS of Byzantium (4th c.). This is the pseudonym of an author of a *History of Armenia, which goes from the year 330, the death of King Tiridates, to 387, the division of the Armenian kingdom between the *Byzantines and *Persians. The author seems to have been in contact with Nerses the Great, catholicos of Armenia (353–373), who plays a large role in the work. The nickname the Byzantine, already attested in the 5th c. by *Lazarus of Pharb, if it does not refer to the place of birth (nothing is known of the family or social conditions of Faustus), indicates the place of his intellectual and literary education. The work, originally written in Greek (the Armenian alphabet had not yet been created), has reached us in an Armenian translation of the 2nd half of the 5th c. and was composed of six books, but the first two have been lost. *Procopius of Caesarea (De bello pers. 1,5,9-40 and De aedif. 3,1,6) gives extracts of a History of Armenia that correspond to Faustus 4,52ff. and 5,7. The work is the only source for the history of Armenia in the 4th c. The author, who knows the country and its language well, is careful to record the traditions and the memories of the nation, esp. the popular ones. He dedicates particular attention to the relationships between church and nobility, to the moral conduct of the personages, to dissents and intrigues of the feudal families; he has a complete independence of judgment and is generally trustworthy; certain parts, such as those which describe the sending of the embassies to Caesarea in Cappadocia for the consecration of the catholicoi, presuppose written documents.

Armenian text: Venice 1933. Translations: V. Langlois, Collection des historiens anc. et mod. de l'Arménie, I, Paris 1867, 209-310; M. Lauer, Des Faustus von Byzanz Gesch. Arm., Cologne 1879; N. Garsoïan (ed.), The Epic Histories, also known as Patmut'iwn Hayoc' (History of Armenia), New York 1984 (repr. from the ed. of St. Petersburg 1883); G. Uluhogian et al. (eds.), P'awstos Buzand, Storia degli Armeni, trans. M. Bais - L.D. Nocetti, Milan 1997; Patrologia V, 603; Bardenhewer 5, 185-187; DACL 9, II, 1588-1590; EC 5, 1064; Cath 4, 1120; LTK² 4, 43; DHGE 16, 728; CSCO 132, XX, 69; Altaner 363.

A. De Nicola

FAUSTUS of Riez (ca. 400–490/495). Of British origin, born around 400, he was a monk at *Lérins from 424 to 433, abbot of the monastery from 433 to 457, bishop of Riez from 457 until his death (490–495). During his episcopate, Faustus opposed in some way the expansionist policy of the Goth *Euric, who, having seized Riez (476), sent him into exile to an unknown location. He returned to Riez in 485 at the death of Euric. He enjoyed wide prestige both as a monk and as bishop, and was in epistolary communication with various members of the Gallic aristocracy, among others *Sidonius and *Ruricius. Of the various works recorded by *Gennadius (Vir. ill. 86), De spiritu sancto, De gratia and 12 letters have reached us. Engelbrecht (CSEL 21) also attributes to him the authorship of many sermones included in the collection of the so-called Gallican Eusebius. But even if it is certain that material from Faustus has entered this collection, it is also true that this material has been modified in various ways. However, the sermon for Maximus, his predecessor on the episcopal throne of Riez, can be attributed to him with certainty.

The De spiritu sancto, composed after 470, is addressed specifically against the *Macedonians, but the immediate motive for which Faustus wrote against these *heretics, who were always little known in the West, is not clear. On the foundation of the works of *Ambrose, *Rufinus, ps.-*Athanasius, perhaps *Basil and *Didymus, Faustus gives a full treatment of the divinity of the *Holy Spirit, with complete mastery of the subject, but without bringing novelties to a theme already thoroughly investigated. More important is his contribution in the area of the polemic on the relationship between *grace and *free will. He was involved with the priest *Lucidus, who professed a radical *predestination and was condemned for this reason by a council held at *Arles (472 ca). In the context of this question, Faustus wrote the De gratia in two books, in which he takes an intermediate position between the opposed excesses of the *Pelagians and of the predestinationists. Unlike *Augustine, against whom he argues clandestinely multiple times, Faustus is convinced that the *sin of *Adam has, to be sure, wounded human nature, but not entirely deprived it of the aspiration for the *good: in this way, although the aid of divine grace is preeminent for the salvation of human beings, a certain margin is also left for human free initiative. For this reason Faustus was opposed by *Fulgentius and by other radical Augustinians, and modern scholars consider him to be a representative of so-called *semi-Pelagianism.

In reality he sought a balanced solution to the difficult question, putting aside the most radical aspects of the Pelagian and predestinarian theses and attending to all of the terms of the question, without privileging some of them at the expense of others, as the adversaries whom he combated did. Of the letters, we should mention the first, in which Faustus invites Lucidus to turn away from his errors; the second, which is Lucidus's retraction following the condemnation of the council; the third, anti-Arian in subject; the fourth, of christological content; and above all the fifth, in which Faustus maintains the corporeality of the *soul, since only God is incorporeal. This thesis was opposed by *Claudianus Mamertus, while *Avitus (Ep. 4) argued against one of his writings, not extant, as too rigorous concerning the remission of sins.

CPL 961-965; PL 58, 783-870; CSEL 21; G. Weigel, Faustus of Riez, Philadelphia 1938; M. Simonetti, Fausto di Riez e i Macedoniani: Augustinianum 17 (1977) 333-354; Id., Il De gratia di Fausto di Riez: SSR 1 (1977) 125-145; C. Tibiletti, Libero arbitrio e grazia in Fausto di Riez: Augustinianum 19 (1979) 259-285; Id., Fausto di Riez nei giudizi della critica: Augustinianum 21 (1981) 567-587; R.J.H. Collins, Faustus of Riez: TRE 11 (1983) 1336-1338; Faustus von Reji: BBKL II (1990), 1-2; C.M. Kasper, Faustus v. Riez: LTK³ 3, 1199-1200; C.M. Kasper, Faustus von Riez: LACL (1998) 233-234.

Editions and translations: Epistulae ad Ruricium, ed. R. Demeulenaere (CCL 64), 1985, 406-415; Homiliae, ed. F. Glorie (CCL 101, 101A and B), 1970-1971; C.M. Kasper, Faustus von Riez. Predigten an die Mönche: Erbe und Auftrage 67 (1991) 293-

304; 368-386; 453-466; Id.: Erbe und Auftrage 68 (1992) 108-124; 186-194; 279-292; 369-384; 471-480.

Studies: L.A. van Buchem, L'Homélie pseudo-eusébienne de Pentecôte. L'Origine de la Confirmatio en Gaule Méridionale et l'interprétation de ce rite par Fauste de Riez, Nijmegen 1967; C.P. Laurent, L'homélie de Pâques "Magnitudo" (in CCSL, t. 101, p. 192-208) de Saint Fauste de Riez (ou de Lérins) (fin du Vᵉ siècle). Aux sources patristiques lointaines de la transsubstantiation: Divinitas 27 (1983) 123-154; Id., Commentaire du sermon "Magnitudo" de S. Fauste de Riez. L'enseignement eucharistique de "Magnitudo": Divinitas 28 (1984) 203-241; Id., Bref commentaire du sermon eucharistique "Magnitudo" de saint Fauste de Riez: Divinitas 29 (1985) 3-42; C. Tibiletti, Rassegna di studi e testi sui "semipelagiani": Augustinianum 25 (1985) 507-522; Id., Polemiche in Africa contro i teologi Provenzali: Augustinianum 26 (1986) 499-517; C.M. Kasper, Weg und Ziel der asketischen Lebens: RThPh 63 (1988) 230-241; D.J.T. Nodes, "De Subitanea Paenitentia" in Letters of Faustus of Riez and Avitus of Vienne: RTAM 55 (1988) 30-40; C.M. Kasper, Der Beitrag der Mönche zur Entwicklung des Gnadenstreites. Festschrift f. C. Mayer, Würzburg 1989, 153-182; T.A. Smith, De gratia. Faustus of Riez's Treatise on Grace and Its Place in the History of Theology, University of Notre Dame, 1990; C.M. Kasper, Theologie und Askese, Münster 1991; A. de Vogüé, Vie monastique à Lérins: RHE 88 (1993) 5-53; M. Di Marco, La polemica sull'anima tra Fausto di Riez e Claudiano Mamerto, Rome 1995; G. Patio, The Theology of Faustus of Riez Amidst the Controversies in 5th Century Gaul, Rome 2001.

M. Simonetti

FAUSTUS the Manichean. Born ca. 340 at Milevis (modern Mila, Algeria), he came from a *pagan background, and so converted to *Manicheism, where he rose to the rank of bishop. He came from humble circumstances, but managed to acquire a reputation for eloquence; yet *Augustine of Hippo reports (Confessiones V,vi,11) that Faustus, though certainly eloquent (V,iii,3), had little cultural learning. He did not even know the Manichean writings, other than those in Latin translation. His eloquence failed to mask his inability to answer the young rhetor's concerns when they met in *Carthage around the end of 382 or early 383 (V,vii,12). After that, Augustine began sliding away from Manicheism. Faustus was arrested and exiled, probably in 386, but pardoned soon after, though forbidden to teach. He then disappeared from history, leaving behind his Capitula, a writing that survives because Augustine quotes it in his Contra Faustum manichaeum (written before 405). Faustus produced his work probably between 386 and 390 (the proposed year of his death), against a former Manichean turned Catholic (possibly Augustine himself). Its main purpose is to show that Manicheism is Christianity in its purest form, sharply distinguished from *Judaism. Faustus does this by invoking biblical pericopes, either to prove their conformity with Manichean doctrine, or to explain why Manicheans repudiated them. Thus he rejects the whole of the OT, because of its dietary laws, incidents of polygamy, animal sacrifice, sabbath observance and circumcision. The procedure followed in each capitulum (there were possibly twenty-two of them) is to first present Catholic objections regarding some point of Manichean doctrine, then to offer a rebuttal. Faustus therefore avoids any reference to Manichean writings, and only occasionally alludes to its doctrines. However, in repudiating Catholic ideas he invokes texts Catholics would recognize (including the pseudepigraphal Acts of Paul and Thecla: C. Faust. XXX,4). His primary target is the inspired character of the OT. Faustus demonstrates that he knows it as well as he knows the NT, and has given us the most extensive Manichean polemic we possess against what are seen to be the OT's wicked deity, meaningless ritual prescriptions, moral deficiencies and approval of frauds ascribed to Moses and the prophets. Christian tradition has no part to play in this polemic: the individual may interpret *Scripture as he or she sees fit. Faustus also touches on the issues of the true nature of *God, the *incarnation and "Jewish interpolations" in the NT. In addition, Faustus emphasizes Manichean asceticism as further proof of his religion's superiority to Catholic Christianity.

CPL 321; PL 42, 207-518; CSEL 25/1, 251-797; A. Bruckner, Faustus von Mileve. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des abendländischen Manichäismus, Basel 1901; P. Monceaux, Le manichéen Faustus de Milev. Restitution de ses Capitula, Paris 1924; PAC 1, 390-397; F. Decret, Aspects du manichéisme dans l'Afrique romaine. Les controverses de Fortunatus, Faustus et Felix avec saint Augustin, Paris 1970, 51-70 and passim; Id., Les manichéens d'Afrique, in J. Ries - F. Decret - W.H.C. Frend - M.G. Mara, Le epistole paoline nei manichei i donatisti e il primo Agostino, Sussidi Patristici, 5, Rome 1989, 29-85; Id., Le dogme manichéen fondamental des deux principes selon Faustus de Milev, in A. van Tongerloo - S. Giversen (eds.), Manichaica Selecta, Manichaean Studies, 1, Leuven 1991, 59-69, repr. in Id., Essais sur l'Église manichéenne en Afrique du Nord et à Rome au temps de saint Augustin: Recueil d'études, Studia Ephemeridis Augustinianum 47, Rome 1995, 147-158; Id., Faustus de Milev, un évêque manichéen au temps de saint Augustin, in Vescovi e pastori in epoca teodosiana, Studia Ephemeridis Augustinianum 58, II, Rome 1997, 763-775; G. Wurst, Bemerkungen zu Struktur und genus litterarium der Capitula des Faustus von Mileve, in J. van Oort - O. Wermelinger - G. Wurst (eds.), Augustine and Manichaeism in the Latin West, Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies 49, Leiden 2001, 307-324.

J. Kevin Coyle

FELICIAN of Musti (end 4th c.). Donatist bishop of Musti (Aug., Ep. 51,2) in proconsular *Africa. At the death of *Parmenian, *Donatist bishop of *Carthage, *Primian was elected as his successor; he condemned several deacons, and *Maximian among them, who, protected by a woman of Carthage, rallied to his side a group of bishops of proconsular Africa. Primian was called in to resolve the conflict, but did not appear; instead, he prevented his adversaries from meeting. The meeting, however, took place anyway, at Cabarsussi in 393, and the participants condemned Primian and elected in his place, for Carthage, Maximian. Felician was among the twelve bishops consecrating Maximian (Ep. 51,2). Thus was born a sect within the schism itself: the Maximianists. Primian called the Council of Bagai (394) as a response, in which 310 bishops participated. Maximian and his consecrators were condemned, and it was decided to remove them from their sees. Felician opposed this decision, supported in this by the Donatists of Musti. In 397, Felician and Praetextatus reconciled with Primian and declared valid the baptisms administered within the schism. This solution of a political character, in opposition to Donatist principles, allowed Augustine—source for a biography of Felician (Ep. 51,2-5; 53, 3-6; 70,2; 76,3-4; 88,11; 106,1.5.12.14; 108,2.5.15; 141,6; Enarr. 36,2,20; C.ep. Parm. I, 9; II, 20.31.34; III, 18.21.29; Bapt. c. don. I, 2,7; III, 17; C. litt. Pet. I, 11, 16,26; II, 16.19; III, 46; De unit. eccl. 46; C. Cresc. III, 16.22.59.62; IV, 4.5.31.46.61.66; Brev. coil. c. don. I, 12; Ad don. p. coil. 5; De gestis cum Em. 8,9,10; C. Gaud. I, 54)—to declare the incoherence of the schism.

DTC 5, 2126-2128; Monceaux IV, 57-67; W.H.C. Frend, The Donatist Church, Oxford 1952, 219-220; PCBE 1, 400-402; J.-L. Maier, Le dossier donatiste, Berlin 1987.

E. Romero Pose

FELICISSIMUS of Carthage (3rd c.). Felicissimus was among the forerunners of *Donatism; he was a wealthy Christian who opposed his bishop *Cyprian at the time of the *persecution of Decius (250), concerning the reconciliation of the lapsi. He was illegally ordained a deacon and was placed at the head of the dissidents of Carthageda Novato who, in 251, went to Rome to increase the number of schismatics following *Novatian. Felicissimus opposed the rigidity of Cyprian in the treatment of the lapsi and reconciled them on his own authority by means of the libelli pacis. Having established himself "on the mountain" (Byrsa?), he claimed to excommunicate Cyprian, but was excommunicated in his name by the representatives of the bishop. All traces of him disappeared after the persecution.

Monceaux 2, 31-32; LTK[3] 3, 1216; V. Saxer, Vie liturgique et quotidienne à Carthage vers le milieu du III[e] siècle, Vatican City [2]1984, 145-146; J.A. Fischer - A. Lumpe, Die Synoden von den Anfängen bis zum Vorabend des Nicaenums, Paderborn 1997.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

FELICITY, martyr. Roman. The Mart. hier. and the Roman *sacramentaries (except the Leonine) mention Felicity on 23 November. The Itiner. Salisb. indicates her tomb in the cemetery of Maximus on the Via Salaria. The Ep. de locis SS. and the itineraries of later date consider her son the martyr Silanus of the group of 10 July. They refer to the legendary passion that makes her the mother of these seven martyrs, and that can be considered the Roman calque of the biblical episode of the seven Maccabees and their mother.

Cath 5, 1144-1145; Vies des SS. 11, 783-784; DHGE 16, 864-866, BS 5, 605-611; A. Amore, I martiri di Roma, Rome 1975, 43-51; LTK[3] 3, 1216-1217; LCI 6, 221-223; L. Goosen, Dizionario dei santi. Storia, letteratura, arte e musica, It. tr., Milan 2000, 180-181; P.A. Février - J. Guyon, Septimus ex numero fratrum. À propos de sept frères martyrs et de leur mère, quelques réflexions sur Damase et l'hagiographie de son temps, in Memoriam sanctorum venerantes. Miscellanea in onore di Monsignor Victor Saxer (Studi di Antichità Cristiana 48), Vatican City 1992, 375-402.

V. Saxer

FELIX I, pope (d. 274). Apparently born in *Rome to a certain Constantius. He held the pontificate from 269 to 274, under the emperor *Aurelian, at first good-willed toward the Christians and later a promoter of the ninth *persecution. Nevertheless Felix did not die a martyr, despite the contrary testimonies of *Cyril of Alexandria and the Roman Martyrology, which say he died for the faith along the Via Appia, commemorating him 10 May. In reality his name is not included in the Depositio martyrum but in the Depositio episcoporum*, which concerns confessors. Further he seems to have died not 30 May but 30 December (perhaps in the date III Kal. the abbreviation ian. was exchanged with iun.). Felix found himself involved against his will in the theological dispute that had concluded with the Council of *Antioch and the condemnation of *Paul of Samosata. The bishops had sent a synodal letter in 269 to *Dionysius, predecessor of Felix, to inform him of their action and to request confirmation from him (Eus., HE 7,30,2-17). Dionysius having died in the meantime, it was Felix who confirmed the conclusions of the council and the condemnation of the heretic bishop, who nevertheless refused to recant and resign. Therefore it is likely that a phrase cited by Cyril belongs in reality to Felix, even if it has probably been modified (ACO I, I, 7, 45; Patrol. I, 488).

Eus., HE 7,30; LP I, CXXIII-CXXIV, 6-7, 10, 70-71, 158; II, 63-64; III, 75; G. Bardy, Paul de Samosate. Étude historique, Louvain 1929, 358-363; B. de Gaiffier, Les notices des papes Félix dans le Martyrologe Romain: AB 81 (1963) 333-336; ICUR IV (G.B. De Rossi - A. Ferrua), Vatican City 1964, 9516; J.N.D. Kelly, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes, Oxford-New York 1986, 23; LTK[3] 3, 1218 (H. Muller); EPapi I, 296-298 (G.M. Vian).

M. Spinelli

FELIX II, antipope (d. 365). Archdeacon of the church of *Rome and probably also of Roman origin, in 355 he was consecrated bishop in the imperial palace in the presence of a few civil servants, in opposition to *Liberius who was in *Thrace for having opposed the emperor *Constantius in the matter of the *Arian controversy. Later, in 358 when Liberius was able to return from exile for having signed the condemnation of *Athanasius, Felix, who in reality had never enjoyed the favor of the people, was forced by the Romans to leave the city. He tried to gain control of the basilica Iulia (S. Maria in Trastevere), but in the end had to retreat to one of his properties, on the Via Portuense, where he died 22 November 365.

Nevertheless in the 6th c., when the memory of these events was no longer quite so clear, Felix, considered to be a legitimate pope, reached the point of being identified with one of the martyrs of the same name (LP I, 207-215) buried near his residence.

Gesta inter Liberium et Felicem, CSEL 35/1, 1-4; G.N. Verrando, Analisi topografica degli antichi cimiteri sotterranei ubicati nei pressi delle due vie Aurelie: RivAC 63 (1987) 293-357; M. Simonetti, Felice II antipapa: EPapi I, 348-349.

P. Marone

FELIX III (II), pope (d. 492). Bishop of Rome from 483 to 492, this pontiff is usually indicated as Felix III, even if in reality *Felix II (consecrated at Rome in 355) was limited to substituting for the exiled Pope *Liberius, for which reason he is not for all intents and purposes considered as a pope. The LP claims Felix was born in Rome, son of a presbyter, also named Felix. Felix also married and had children before his sacerdotal ordination: among his descendants were *Gregory the Great (cf. Dial. 4, 16). Felix faced difficult situations more or less everywhere, beginning with *Italy, governed de facto in those years by the usurper *Odoacer. In *Africa he intervened with the emperor *Zeno to stop the persecutions of the Catholics by the *Arian *Vandals and the exiling of many bishops, esp. under *Huneric. The situation grew less serious in 487 with the arrival of Gunthamund. There were also serious problems from the East, where the monophysite patriarchs *Acacius and *Peter Mongus were seated on the thrones of *Constantinople and *Alexandria. Felix energetically took position against them, writing to Zeno, sending legates to the spot, inviting *Acacius in vain to come to Rome and finally excommunicating the Constantinopolitan bishop. Thus was reached in 484 the rupture between Rome and the East known as the "Acacian schism," which lasted until 519 (Acacius died in 489). After 490 Felix intervened in the *Pelagian controversy, writing two letters to the bishop *Honorius sympathetic to this heresy, and integrating the second letter with the Contra Andromacum (a work erroneously ascribed to his successor *Gelasius I), in which the pontiff contests the revival of the Lupercalia sought by a Roman patrician (Andromacus). Felix built the basilica of S. Agapetus in Rome and was buried in S. Paul Outside the Walls. Of two inscriptions found near this basilica, one concerns the father of Felix and the other Felix himself and his family (G. B. De Rossi, Insciptiones christianae urbis Romae, I, nn. 831 and 833).

Felicis papae III Epistolae et decreta, PL 58, 893-944, 967-973; De evitanda communione Acacii, PL 58, 944-967; C. Baronio, Martyrologium Romanum restitutum cum adnotationibus, Rome 1586, sub die 25 febbraio; Jaffé I, 591-618, 80-83; 625-626, 84; E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums, II, Tübingen 1933, 25-44, 749 and 810; Storia della Chiesa, ed. H. Jedin, III, Milan 1978, 9-16; P. Nautin, La lettre de Félix III à André de Thessalonique et sa doctrine sur l'Église et l'Empire: RHE 77 (1982) 5-34; Id., La lettre "Diabolicae artis" de Félix III aux moines de Constantinople et de Bithynie: REA 30 (1984) 263-268; BS V, 579-580 (C. Marcora); DHGE 16, 889-895 (P. Nautin); LTK[3] 3, 1219 (H. Muller); EPapi I, 450-457 (R. Bratoz).

M. Spinelli

FELIX IV (III), pope (d. 530). Of Samnite origin, son of one Castorius, in 519 he is supposed to have taken part as a deacon in a delegation sent to the East by Pope *Hormisdas to resolve the "Acacian schism." Felix succeeded *John I at the instigation of King *Theoderic, who died suddenly, however, one month after the consecration of the pope (July 526). The new sovereign, Atalaric, and his mother Amalasunta on the advice of *Cassiodorus continued to support Felix, favoring, among other things, the authority of the ecclesiastical tribunals with respect to secular institutions. This pope converted some pagan sacred buildings of the Roman Forum into the church of SS. Cosmas and Damian, having it decorated with *mosaics, and restored on the Via Salaria the basilica of S. Saturninus, severely damaged by a fire. At the beginning of 529 Felix sent to *Caesarius of Arles, charged with settling the *semi-

Pelagian question, 25 Capitula on grace, which *Prosper of Aquitaine and the Scythian monk Maxentius had taken from the works of *Augustine. In July of the same year the Second Council of *Orange approved the Capitula and condemned semi-Pelagianism. Before dying Felix designated his own successor in the person of *Boniface, his vigorous collaborator. But when the pope died (September 530) the party of the Byzantines succeeded in imposing in his place, even if for just a few days, the Alexandrian deacon *Dioscorus.

CPL 1686-1688; PL 65, 11-16 (Epistula ad Caesarium e Constitutum de ecclesia Ravennatis); G.B. De Rossi, I tre antichi edifici componenti la chiesa dei SS. Cosma e Damiano: BACr I f., 5 (1867) 61-72; L. Duchesne, La succession du pape Félix IV: MEFRA 3 (1883) 239-266; Id., L'Église au VI^e siècle, Paris 1925, 134 and 142-145; E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums, II, Tübingen 1933, 151ff., 193-197, 201-2, 315 and 767; M. Cappuyns, L'origine des "capitula" d'Orange (529): RTAM 6 (1934) 121-142; DACL 14/2 (1948) 2669-2673; DHGE 16, 895-896; Lexicon Topographicum Urbis Romae I, Rome 1993, s.v. Ss. Cosmas et Damianus, Basilica, 324-325; P. Bertolini: DBI 12, 133-136; LTK^3 3, 1219 (G. Schwaiger); Dizionario storico del Papato, ed. Ph. Levillain, I, Milan 1996, 591-592; EPapi I, 487-492 (J.-M. Sansterre).

M. Spinelli

FELIX and ADAUCTUS (d. 303?). An inscription, the oldest testimony of the cult of the two Roman martyrs, documents the intervention of Pope *Damasus on their tombs, venerated by pilgrims who visited the catacombs of Commodilla, near S. Paul Outside the Walls, in which there is also a celebrated representation of the two saints from ca. 528. For what pertains to the 7th c., see the Roman itineraries (CCL 175, 299, 316, 327). The name of the two martyrs was inserted in the Mart. hier. on 30 August; the Sacramentarium Veronense offers a formula for their feast. The Passio of the 6th/7th c. has no historic value. Felix, a presbyter, was condemned to decapitation under *Diocletian. While he was being led to the place of execution, an unknown believer professed his own Christian faith and was therefore killed together with him: Adauctus (from adiectus).

BHL 2878-2884; Verzeichnis 64; LCI 6, 234; A. Ferrua, Epigrammata Damasiana, Vatican City 1942, n. 7; A. Amore, I martiri di Roma, Rome 1975, 207-208; Ph. Pergola, Le catacombe romane, Rome ^{2}1999, 218-221; J.G. Deckers et al., Die Katakombe "Commodilla," Vatican City 1994; E. Schurr, Die Ikonographie der Heiligen, Dettelbach 1997, 316-323.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

FELIX GILLITANUS (6th c.). A monk of the monastery of Cillium (Byzacena) in N Africa (and not of the Vivarium of Cassiodorus), an opponent of Pope *Vigilius (537–555) during the controversy of the *Three Chapters, he was exiled first in Egypt together with the deacon *Rusticus (PL 68,960), and then to Sinope in *Pontus, where he died in 557 (Victor of Tunnuna, ed. Mommsen, Chronica minora 2 [MGH, Auct. ant. 11], Berlin 1894, pp. 204-5). From Felix two very brief texts remain: (a) Praefatio Felicis, in which he explains how the year of the incarnation was calculated by *Dionysius Exiguus; (b) Prologus, a presentation of the paschal tables of Dionysius, built on the Alexandrian system, for the users of his region from ab Incarnatione D. N. J. C. 532 anno Indictione decima usque ad DCXXVI Incarnationis annum.

CPL 2287; PL 129, 1331-1332; B. Krisch, Studien zur christlich-mittelalterlichen Chronologie, I, Leipzig 1988, 207-208; II, Berlin 1938, 67-68 and 86-87; A. Lane Poole, Studies in Chronology and History, Oxford 1934, repr. 1969, 32-33; C.W. Jones, Bedae Opera de temporibus, Cambridge, MA 1943, 73 n. 5; C. Lepelley, Les cités de l'Afrique Romaine au Bas-Empire, II, Paris 1981, 287; G. Declercq, Dionysius Exiguus and the Introduction of the Christian Era: SE 41 (2002) 165-246 (esp. 230ff.).

A. Di Berardino

FELIX of Aptunga (Apthungi, Apthugni) (beginning of 4th c.). Bishop of Aptunga, in 311 he participated in the consecration of *Caecilian, bishop of *Carthage (Opt., I, 18.19.27); for this he was considered an enemy by the *Donatists. He was accused and condemned as a traditor in the Donatist synod of Carthage in 312. This sentence served as a pretext for the Donatists not to accept the decisions of the Council of *Rome (313), which approved the validity of the ordination of Caecilian. The schismatics demanded that the case of Felix be reconsidered. At this point, *Constantine ordered the vicarius of Africa, Elius Paulinus, to make inquiries into the accusations raised against Felix. The consultations were begun in Aptunga and concluded at Carthage in favor of Felix (314). To eliminate every doubt, the Council of *Arles (314) declared valid the ordination performed by a traditor bishop (can. 13). The dossier of the inquiry—Acta or Gesta purgationis Felicis—has been preserved for the most part in Gesta purgationis Caeciliani et Felicis. The authenticity of these acta is confirmed by the mentions of *Optatus, *Augustine and Gesta Collationis, whose lacunae can be filled with the information that reaches us from Optatus and from Augustine. The acta trace the path followed in the various audiences and the functions of the personages and the courts. There is no literary preoccupation, just the simple account of the proceedings between Catholics and Donatists.

Acta purgationis F. episcopi Autamnitani: CSEL 26, 197-204; Monceaux IV, 17-22, 210-229; PCBE 1, 409-410; J.-L. Maier, Le dossier donatiste, Berlin 1987; Y. Duval, Chrétiens d'Afrique à l'aube de la paix constantinienne, Paris 2000, 213-341.

E. Romero Pose

FELIX of Nola (3rd c.). A priest and confessor acc. to *Prudentius (Carm. 12,9) and *Augustine (De VIII Dulc. quaest. 2,2), but considered a martyr at the time of *Gregory of Tours (Glor. mart. 104); Felix died very old after the *persecutions of *Decius and *Valerian and was buried at Cimitile, in the coemeterium of Nola of the 2nd c. The eulogy of Pope *Damasus (A. Ferrua, Epigrammata Damasiana, Vatican City 1942, n. 59) is probably the oldest document of the veneration of Felix. His cult was spread above all by the work of *Paulinus of Nola, who from 395 on dedicated to him every year a carmen natalicium (Carm. 12-16, 18-21, 23-24, 27-28; literature: CSEL 30.2, 630-638) on the occasion of the anniversary of his death, 14 January of a year unknown to us of the 3rd c. The feast attracted many pilgrims (funeral banquets), and there were numerous miracles through which the devil was defeated. Felix had the reputation of being vindex veritatis.

BHL 2870-2876; AB 102 (1984) 185; CPL 1997; BS 5, 549-555; LCI 6, 229-230; F. Lanzoni, Le diocesi d'Italia, Faenza 1927, 228-237; E. Donckel, Ausserrömische Heilige in Rom, Luxemburg 1938, 42-45; V. Saxer, Pilgerwesen in Italien und Rom im späten Altertum und Frühmittelalter, Akten des XII. Internationalen Kongresses für Christliche Archäologie, Vatican City-Münster 1995, 46-51; T. Lehmann, Der Besuch des Papstes Damasus an der Pilgerstätte des hl. Felix in Cimitile/Nola, 969-981; M. Skeb, Christo vivere. Studien zum literarischen Christusbild des Paulinus von Nola, Bonn 1997; H. Brandenburg - L. Ermini Pani (eds.), Cimitile e Paolino di Nola. La tomba di S. Felice e il centro di pellegrinaggio. Trent'anni di ricerche, Vatican City, 2003.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

FELIX of Thibiuca (d. 15 July 303). Bishop of Thibiuca (Zoustina, Tunisia). Condemned to death by the proconsul *Anulinus 15 July 303, at *Carthage, for having refused to hand over the *Scriptures, Felix was buried in via quae dicitur Scillitanorum in Fausti (cemetery). His veneration passed into S Italy at the time of the *Vandal *persecution; from here derive the passions that we retain, which make of Felix an Italian saint, and in which we can recognize elements of the original passion.

Vies des SS. 10, 817-823; BS 4, 585-587; DHGE 16, 884; PCBE 1, 407-8; J.L. Maier, Le dossier du Donatisme, v. I: Des origines à la mort de Costance II (303–361) (Texte und Untersuchungen 134), Berlin 1987, 46-57; V. Saxer, Afrique latine, in Hagiographies. Histoire internationale de la littérature hagiographique latine et vernaculaire en Occident des origines à 1550, sous la direction de G. Philippart (CC. Hagiographies I) Turnhout 1994, 53-54; M.A. Tilley, Donatist Martyr Stories. The Church in Conflict in Roman North Africa (Translated Texts for Historians 24), Liverpool 1996, 7-11; LTK³ 3, 1221.

V. Saxer

FELIX of Trier (d. 400). Elected bishop of *Trier in 386 (Sulp. Sev., Dial. 3,13), during the Priscillianist crisis, succeeding Brittus. The usurper *Maximus had his seat at Trier at that time. In that year in the same city the trial was held against *Priscillian, who was condemned to death. Despite the opposition to such a punishment by *Ambrose, *Martin of Tours and Pope *Siricius, the bishop Felix was favorable and was excommunicated by the pope along with all those who had condemned Priscillian (the Council of *Turin of 398, can. 6, records the sentence of Siricius). Either his election or the attitude taken during the trial provoked a division within the church of *Gaul between Felicians, who remained in communion with him, and the anti-Felicians, who accused him of being in relationship with *Ithacius and *Hydatius, the two ferocious anti-Priscillianists. A council of the Felicians was held at *Nîmes in 394 (or 396) to overcome the division; the crisis finished at the Council of Turin of 398 with the resignation of Felix. He died in 400, and his name appears in the Roman martyrology 26 March, probably the day of his death.

EC 5, 1137; BS 5, 565-566; LTK³ 3, 1221; DHGE 16, 915; Fliche-Martin-Frutaz, Storia d. Chiesa, III, 2, 683-687; N. Gauthier, L'Évangélisation des pays de la Moselle, Paris 1980, 66-81; Storia del cristianesimo 2, Rome 2000, 406-7 and 781.

L. Dattrino - A. Di Berardino

FELIX the Manichean. A teacher (doctor) of the religion, who came to *Hippo toward the end of 404 to spread his religion. In the Retractationes (II,8) *Augustine of Hippo calls him ineruditus liberalibus litteris, but considers him a more able opponent in debate than *Fortunatus. Soon after Felix arrived, five of his books (perhaps the five by *Mani himself known in N Africa) were seized by the authorities. Felix then offered to discuss the contents of the impounded books with Augustine. This would prove, he said, that they contained nothing damnable; if they did, Felix declared himself ready to be burned with them. At this point Augustine agreed to the public debate he sought. The Acta habita cum Felice, Augustine's record of the proceedings, reports two sessions spread over two days (7 and 12 December).

In them, Felix is portrayed as evasive and full of subterfuge. In the first session, he begins by declaring that he will be disadvantaged if he is refused access to his books. At this, Augustine produces Mani's Letter of the Foundation and begins to ridicule its contents. In the course of this session, Felix becomes increasingly evasive under questioning, and Augustine's frustration mounts. One can sympathize with Felix's dilemma: he cannot divulge the whole of Manichean teaching before a mainly hostile audience (largely made up of Augustine's own flock); yet, without being more forthcoming, he will have no chance against Augustine. The first session ends when Felix asks for time to mull over the accusation that the Manichean *anthropology, which presents humans as mixtures of the *good and *evil substances, indicates that the principle of good which permitted the mixture can therefore not be completely good. The second session opens with another plea by Felix to return his books, but when Augustine offers to have them brought, Felix drops the matter. He also refuses to address the issue with which the first session ended. Augustine then steers the discussion toward other matters: the relation of *free will to evil—the second session's main point, acc. to Retr. II,8—the nature of *God, and Christ's *incarnation (C. Felicem, II,8-11). For his part, Felix keeps resorting to the uncooperative tactics of the previous session, and finally an exasperated Augustine threatens him with *anathema, which would bring severe legal consequences. Felix then signs a repudiation of Mani and his teachings. If the addressee of Augustine's Ep. 79 is the same Felix, his renunciation was motivated by genuine conversion.

CPL 322; PL 42, 519-552; CSEL 25/2, 801-852; BA 17, 636-757; PCBE 1, 417-418; F. Decret, Aspects du manichéisme dans l'Afrique romaine. Les controverses de Fortunatus, Faustus et Félix avec saint Augustin, Paris 1970, 71-89; J.M. Lieu - S.N.C. Lieu, 'Felix Conversus ex Manichaeis' – A Case of Mistaken Identity: JTS 23 (1981) 173-176, repr. in S.N.C. Lieu, Manichaeism in Mesopotamia and the Roman East (Religions in the Graeco-Roman World 118), Leiden-New York-Cologne 1994, 153-155.

J. Kevin Coyle

FERRANDUS of Carthage (d. before 546). A student of *Fulgentius of Ruspe, active in the 1st half of the 6th c., he followed his master into exile in *Sardinia. He was a deacon of the church of *Carthage. He had a reputation as a good theologian and was contacted even from Rome for clarifications of a christological nature. He died during the initial phase of the question of the *Three Chapters, before 546. The Vita of Fulgentius, written by him, is based on direct experience and firsthand documentation, so that it is full of information and fully reliable. Ferrandus presents Fulgentius as a model of Christian life on the example of *Augustine, and the tone of the work is one of exaltation and edification, but the entire miraculous element is absent from it, a commonplace of the genre degenerating at that time into legend. Extant from Ferrandus are a letter written to Fulgentius to request clarifications on various doctrinal difficulties, and other letters written to Western and Eastern figures to respond to similar requests addressed to him. Above all, Ep. 3 and 5 are important; they are of anti-*monophysite christological content, in which Ferrandus defends the Chalcedonian formula. The two letters are situated within the context of the *Theopaschite controversy: in Ep. 5. Ferrandus considers it useless to waste time discussing the formula Unus de Trinitate passus, which nevertheless he considers compatible with *orthodoxy, and waits for a decision of the ecclesiastical magisterium on the subject. Ep. 3 on the other hand openly defends the formula against the various objections that were raised against it: he interprets it correctly in the sense that one of the *Trinity, the Son, suffered in the flesh. Since Rome approved the Theopaschite formula in 534, Ep. 5 dates to slightly before this, and Ep. 3 to slightly after. In Ep. 6, Ferrandus takes a position against the condemnation of the Three Chapters because he considers it contradictory to the decisions of Chalcedon, irrevocable since they were issued from an ecumenical council sanctioned by the approval of the bishop of Rome.

CPL 847-848; PL 65, 117-150 and 67, 887-950; G. Lapeyre, ed., Vita Fulgentii, Paris 1929; DTC 5, 2174-2175; R.B. Eno, Doctrinal Authority in the African Ecclesiology of the Sixth Century: REAug 22 (1976) 95-113; PCBE 1, 446-450; R.B. Eno, Ferrandus and Facundus on Doctrinal Authority: SP 15 (1984) 291-296; A. Isola, Sulla paternità della Vita Fulgentii: VetChr 23 (1986) 63-71; BBKL II, 19.

M. Simonetti

FERREOLUS of Uzès (d. 581). *Gregory of *Tours informs us that this bishop died 4 January 581 (Hist. 6,7). Under his name is preserved a monastic rule composed between 553 and 573 (CPL 1849) dedicated to the monastery of Ferréolac (in the ancient diocese of Die), founded by him and named in memory of the Gallic martyr of the 3rd c. Ferreolus. His prescriptions show the influence of the monastic tradition of *Basil, *Pachomius, *Cassian and *Augustine and are close to the Regula Benedicti, even if they do not depend directly. The rule mirrors the typical observance of a monastery of S *Gaul. The influence of the Regula Ferreoli on the Regula Tarnatensis (CPL 1851) is notable; perhaps they come from the same author. The Vitae of Ferreolus (BHL 2901-2) are endowed with scarce historiographic value.

Verzeichnis, 473; BS 5, 650-651; L.R. Desalle, Règles de Césaire, F. et Regula Tarnatensis: Augustinianum 11 (1961) 5-26; G. Holzherr, Regula Ferreoli, Einsiedeln 1961; V. Desprez: Revue Mabillon 60 (1981–1984) 117-148; Id., Règles monastiques d'Occident, Bégrolles-en-Mauges 1980, 287-339.

V. Saxer - S. Samulowitz

FESTAL LETTERS. The epistolographic genre of festal letters, in Greek epistolai heortastikai, i.e, letters regarding *Easter, the Christian feast (heortē) par excellence, was born of the recognition on the part of the bishops of *Alexandria to announce the annual date of Easter to the Christian community of *Egypt and to other parts of the Mediterranean. The first explicit sign of the existence of this genre of document may be found in the Ecclesiastical History of *Eusebius of Caesarea with reference to *Dionysius of Alexandria (247-264): "Dionysius, besides his epistles already mentioned, wrote at that time also his extant festal letters which have come down to us, in which he speaks in solemn terms about the feast of Easter" (HE 7,20). This evidence, as well as several late allusions to the composition of texts on the Easter festival, points to the birth of the genre under the first Alexandrian bishop of whom we have a concrete historical picture, *Demetrius of Alexandria (188-230). The most important data we have about the sending of the festal letters is given by *John Cassian in the Conferences: "In the country of Egypt a custom is by ancient tradition observed that—when *Epiphany is past, which the priests of that province regard as the time both of the Lord's baptism and also of his birth in the flesh, and so celebrate the commemoration of these mysteries not separately as in the W provinces but on the single festival of this day—letters are sent from the bishop of Alexandria to all the churches of Egypt, in which the beginning of Lent and the day of Easter are fixed, not only for all the cities but also for all the monasteries" (X, 2). This is of course a rather late testimony (around 420) and refers to the form that the festal letters assumed in the time of *Cyril of Alexandria. The announcement of the date of the beginning of *Lent is certainly a novelty introduced by *Athanasius, but we do not know when the custom was established of reading the letter on the day of the Epiphany: if this were ancient, we could speculate that the festal letters must have been drawn up toward the end of November of the previous year, to be able to reach the whole Egyptian territory before the Epiphany. The other interesting feature of Cassian's testimony is his insistence that the letters were sent not only to the bishops but also to the monasteries of Egypt. We do not have a date of origin for this practice either. It seems probable that Athanasius was one of the principal promoters of it: in fact, we have evidence of the arrival of his letter XXXIX, written for Easter in 367, not only in the dioceses of Egypt but also in the Pachomian monasteries, as the Lives of *Pachomius (Bohairic life, 189) demonstrate.

From the end of the 4th c. onward we can therefore be certain that the festal letters were conveyed to all the dioceses of Egypt and to the most important monasteries, from the Nile Delta and *Libya as far as Aswan, as well as to other important episcopal sees of the Mediterranean. From the Greek original, tens of copies were made of each letter in the episcopal chancery, and in some receiving dioceses translated into *Coptic; later, the letters of some bishops were gathered together and reissued in collections. In fact, we can identify a number of different ways in which these letters have been transmitted:

a. Letters composed by one bishop in the course of his episcopal tenure, collected together after his death: the most notable case is that of Cyril, but also the Coptic and *Syriac versions of the letters of Athanasius are in this category, in that both derive from two different Greek collections.

b. *Liturgical homilies that contain a festal letter, either in part or in whole, inserted into the section dedicated to the Easter season, such as the case of the Athanasian letter XLI, partially transcribed in a Coptic lectionary (Bohairic), or that of a letter of the *Melkite patriarch *Eulogius, still unpublished.

c. Indirect tradition, such as quotations, short or long, taken by later authors from the letters of past bishops of Alexandria, which in many cases is the only evidence we have of them: the letters of Dionysius are quoted by Eusebius of Caesarea, those of *Peter I are conserved in a dogmatic anthology; fragments of those of Athanasius, *Theophilus, Cyril, *Damian, and *Benjamin are to be found in many subsequent authors because of their dogmatic and liturgical importance; a particular case of indirect tradition is the complete Latin translation by *Jerome of some letters of Theophilus.

d. The papyrus copies that were issued annually by the Alexandrian episcopal chancery. This is a group of scrolls of great interest, as they carry the Greek text of a particular letter recently issued by the bishop of Alexandria and transcribed into tens of copies by his scribes. In two cases these scribes carry a Coptic translation, probably extemporaneous, of a Greek copy newly arrived in the Egyptian dioceses: e.g., Coptic fragments of the first festal letter of Cyril (412-444) and of another which may be ascribed to Damian (578-607). As is well known, the scroll of papyrus could be written on one of its two sides. Placed lengthways, it was usually inscribed along the horizontal fibers, in a succession of columns; placed vertically, using the papyrus breadthways, the texts (usually important administrative documents) were written perpendicular to the vertical fibers (transversa charta), in only one column. The other side was normally left empty, at least for as long as the scroll was used. The festal letters of the bishops of Alexandria follow both typologies: P. Grenfell II 112 (Letter of Peter IV in 577) was written in one column only, vertically; but the type more common is that used also for the transcription of literary texts, i.e., with parallel columns following the direction of the fiber: this is the case with the letters conserved in P. Köln V 215 (*Benjamin or Agatho, from 663 or 674), P. Heid. IV 295 (of uncertain attribution), P. Berolin. 10677 (Alexander II) and P. Vindob. K 10157 (Cyril).

e. The ostraca (fragments of pottery, or pieces of other material) found in the area of Thebes conserve in Coptic the last of several letters written between the 6th and 7th c. This is an unusual and interesting custom: evidently the faithful transcribed the date of Easter, announced for a particular year, on the material that was readily available.

From Dionysius and Athanasius onward we witness the formation of what may truly be described as a literary genre: to the notification of the day of Easter the bishops of Alexandria added moral exhortations, reference to religious affairs of the day, brief doctrinal expositions, as well as lists of bishops, meaning that although the content of the genre is certainly variable, it is distinct from that of the Easter sermon proper, or from that of baptismal writings, addressed principally to *catechumens. The content of the festal letters is not properly the mysteries of Easter or of *baptism, but must be understood as addressed to a wider audience, in need of a moral and doctrinal catechesis grounded in Scripture.

As we have already noted, the first fragments conserved of these letters are from Dionysius. Eusebius is the principal source of them, but others, classified by numerical order, are conserved in late anthologies. The themes are varied and refer often to contemporary events (persecutions, war, epidemics), but also morals, and above all Easter. Of particular interest for us are the fragments of the festal letter of *Peter I for Easter of 309, preserved in a dogmatic anthology. Their subject is that of the quality of the risen body, a question of great importance, and an object of a lively discussion in the 3rd and 4th c., including in the Alexandrian context. The dogmatic anthology also includes the end of the letter, which deserves mention for its liturgical importance: in it Peter announces the end of the Holy Week fast and the date of Easter (expressed both acc. to the Roman and the Egyptian calendars), but mentions neither Lent nor *Pentecost. From *Alexander, predecessor of Athanasius, we have only a fragment, which is in fact a paraphrase of Col 1:15 and Phil 2:5-7, originating, acc. to M. Richard, in a letter sent to Pope *Sylvester, mentioned in turn by *Liberius in a text conserved among the historical fragments of *Hilary of Poitiers.

With the festal letters of Athanasius we have the first trace of the creation of corpora of letters gathered together at the death of the bishop of Alexandria. These have come down to us in two incomplete collections, one Coptic and one Syriac. We may note a difference in the tradition here from that of the letters of other bishops of the metropolis. In fact, while the Coptic collection, and the Greek model of which it is a translation, fall within the more common genre of ancient editions of homiletic cycles or collections of letters, the Syriac collection reflects a rearrangement that the Athanasian festal letters have undergone within the archives of the see of Alexandria itself. Of this Syriac collection we possess only one mutilated MS, which preserves fifteen texts, including letters and notices, each of which is preceded by a heading that carries the date of Easter and other chronological information. The whole is introduced by a text structured in chapters, the Index, that gives for each year of the Athanasian episcopate, in addition to the date of Easter, the names of the consuls and prefects of Egypt, and often details about the life of Athanasius and of his church that have been extracted from official documents and registers deposited at the chancery. Two novelties characterize the letters of Athanasius: from 334 onward the final formula includes the date of the beginning of Lent, lasting six weeks; some letters contain, in a postscript, the list of bishops recently nominated by the patriarch, a practice that would be followed by Theophilus and Cyril.

Of the letters of Theophilus we also have many fragments in Greek, *Armenian and Syriac, found above all in dogmatic works, in Acts of councils and in many anthologies (CPG 2580-2591). New Coptic fragments have been identified in a work that may be attributed to *Shenoute (letter of 401) and one in a work in Syriac of *Peter of Callinicum. The most celebrated letters, known to us in their entirety, are 16, 17 and 19, translated into Latin by Jerome and conserved in his correspondence.

The letters of Cyril are the only ones to have come down in Greek in an (almost) complete collection, edited after his death. The bishop brings to maturity a literary genre that from Athanasius onward tends to deepen and extend its characteristic themes: Easter is always central, as is the reason, closely connected to it, for the incarnation of the Logos; to these elements news of the church is added, as well as, above all, doctrinal polemic, that is anti-*Arian, anti-*Apollinarian and anti-*Nestorian. The Greek collection has undergone editorial retouching, intended to eliminate that which from a certain point of view was seen as superfluous: in particular the postscripts that indicate episcopal successions are omitted, which in fact had certainly been drawn up by Cyril, as is shown by the Coptic version of the first letter.

The festal letters of the bishops of Alexandria from Cyril onward are not extant. However, the indirect tradition, the papyri and the ostraca, have conserved parts of them, including from the period when the hierarchy was duplicated owing to the christological controversies. The papyrus P. Grenfell II 112, containing a festal letter of Peter IV, is important in the history of Greek paleography and significant also for the history of *dogma. A letter of Damian is to be found in two Coptic MSS, the result of an extemporaneous translation from the Greek. A reasonably strong indirect tradition is given us also in his case by quotations of his letters by the polemicist Peter of Callinicum, author of a tract against the trinitarian doctrine of Damian. With *Eulogius of Alexandria, we find ourselves on one side of the barrier that divided the Egyptian church in two: from this correspondent and friend of *Gregory the Great we have an unpublished festal letter in Greek, contained within a set of liturgical homilies. The letters of Benjamin bear witness to a liturgical change of real importance: the extension of the Lenten fast from six to eight weeks, the eighth assimilated to Holy Week. This is attested by quotations in *John of Damascus, but also by the ostraca that contain the conclusions of Benjamin's letters. A long dogmatic fragment of his 16th letter is conserved in Ethiopian. Finally, the festal letter of Alexander II is the last example on papyrus that we know today, in the form of the copy sent to the monastery of Shenoute.

After this long review, we can identify the main elements of the genre. The structure of the festal letter emerges as follows:

1. The beginning, which usually records the approach of the feast, and lists the prophetic references to Easter;

2. The central section, containing various themes: the longest part of the letter, which includes the main catechetical, theological and polemical message, often culminating in a quotation from 1 Cor 5:7;

3. Exhortations on the correct observance of Easter, on living a pure Christian life, on aiding the poor and on brotherly love;

4. The announcement of the dates of the Easter season, mentioning Pentecost, with a doxology;

5. In some cases a postscript that normally contains the episcopal nominations, but also sometimes providing other types of information.

General information about the transmission of the festal letters: P. Évieux, Introduction, in Cyrille d'Alexandrie, Lettres Festales, I-VI. Introduction générale by P. Évieux. Critical introduction and Greek text by W.H. Burns. Trans. and notes by L. Arragon et al. (SC 372), Paris 1991, 11-118; A. Külzer, Die "Festbriefe" (Epistolai heortastikai) – Eine wenig beachtete Untergattung der byzantinistischen Briefliteratur: ByzZ 91 (1998) 378-390; K. Aland - H.-U. Rosenbaum, Osterfestbrief, in Repertorium der griechischen christlichen Papyri. 2: Kirchenväter-Papyri. Teil 1: Beschreibungen (Patristische Texte und Studien 42), Berlin-New York 1995, 523-541.

Dionysius: C.L. Feltoe, The Letters and Other Remains of Dionysius of Alexandria, Cambridge 1904.

Peter: M. Richard, Le florilège du cod. Vatopédi 236 sur le corruptible et l'incorruptible: Muséon 86 (1973) 249-273, esp. 267, nn. 13-14; Id., Le comput pascal par Octaétéris: Muséon 87 (1974) 307-339.

Alexander: see Liberius, in Hilary, Historical Fragments, ed. Feder (CSEL 65), 91-92.

Athanasius: see *Athanasius of Alexandria and A. Camplani, Atanasio di Alessandria. Lettere festali. Anonimo. Indice delle Lettere festali, intro., trans. and notes (Letture cristiane del primo millennio 34), Milan 2003.

Theophilus: CSEL 55, 159-181; 185-211; 213-232; S. Emmel, Theophilus's Festal Letter of 401 as quoted by Shenoute, in Divitiae Aegypti, Festschrift M. Krause, Wiesbaden 1995, 93-98; other fragments in CPG and in Petri Callinicensis Patriarchae Antiocheni Tractatus contra Damianum. IV: lib. III cap. XXXV-L et addendum libro secundo, eds. R.Y. Ebied - A. Van Roey - L.R. Wickham (CCG 54), Turnhout-Leuven 2003, 16 (Festal letter I).

Cyril: PG 77, 401-982; Cyrille d'Alexandrie, Lettres Festales, ed. Burns (SC 372, 392, 434), Paris 1991, 1993, 1998; A. Camplani, La prima lettera festale di Cirillo di Alessandria e la testimonianza di P. Vindob. K 10157: AugR 39 (1999) 129-138.

Peter IV: B.P. Grenfell - A.S. Hunt, Greek Papyri. Series II. New Classical Fragments and Other Greek and Latin Papyri, Oxford 1897, 163-167; A. Camplani, La Quaresima egiziana nel VII secolo: note di cronologia su Mon. Epiph. 77, Manchester Rylands Suppl. 47-48, P. Grenf. II 112, P. Berol. 10677, P. Köln 215 e un'omelia copta: AugR 32 (1992) 423-432.

Damian: Petri Callinicensis Patriarchae Antiocheni Tractatus contra Damianum. II: lib. III cap. I-XIX, eds. R.Y. Ebied - A.

Van Roey - L.R. Wickham (CCG 32), Turnhout-Leuven 1996, 518-519, 524 (Damian); A. Camplani, Coptic Fragments from a Festal Letter of the Late Sixth Century (John Rylands Library, Coptic Suppl. n. 47-48): Damian or Eulogius?, in Coptic Studies on the Threshold of a New Millennium. Proceedings of the Seventh International Congress of Coptic Studies, Leiden 2000 (Orientalia Lovaniensia Analecta 133), Leuven-Paris-Dudley 2004, 317-327.

Eulogius: E. Crisci, I palinsesti di Grottaferrata, Naples 1990, 224-225.

Benjamin: C.D. Müller, Die Homilie über die Hochzeit zu Kana und weitere Schriften des Patriarchen Benjamin I von Alexandrien, Heidelberg 1968; Giovanni Damasceno, De sacris ieiuniis: PG 95, 77.

For Alexander II and the other patriarchs, see above K. Aland - U. Rosenbaum; G. Cavallo, Grammata Alexandrina: JÖByz 24 (1975) 23-54.

A. Camplani

FESTUS (d. after 62). Porcius Festus was sent by *Nero as Roman procurator in *Palestine from 60 to 62, succeeding Felix (Acts 24:27; Josephus, Ant. Iud. XX, 8,9; 9,1; Bell. Iud. II, 14,1). In his administration he revealed himself to be just and proper, despite finding himself in difficult situations of anarchy and revolt. Paul, who had been imprisoned under Felix, was led into his presence to be judged, but appealed to caesar. Festus, before sending him to Rome, had him meet King *Agrippa II and his sister Bernice (Acts 25:23-32) in an audience. Festus died in Judea, a little after his term of office, in 62.

DB 2/2 (1899) 2216-2217; Dictionary of the Bible 2, Edinburg [3]1902, 4-5; U. Holzmeister, Der hl. Paulus vor dem Richterstuhle des Festus (Apg 25,1-12): ZKTh 36 (1912) 489-511 and 742-782; Id., Storia dei tempi del Nuovo Testamento, Casale Monf. 1950, 107-112; Cath 4 (1956) 1215; EC 9 (1962) 1768-1769; NCE 5 (1966) 900; Enciclopedia della Bibbia 3 (Turin 1970) 358-361; BBKL 2 (1990) 24-25 (bibl.).

M. Maritano

FIBULA (buckle). An accurate subdivision of the fibulae into various groups by shape, size and workmanship was completed by Cavada for his study on the elements of masculine dress found in the central and E Alpine valleys (Cavada 1999, 93-108).

A first group consists in the fibulae of great size, with fixed plates of various shapes (triangular, pentagonal, etc.), decorated with carvings (Kerbschnitt) which generally present zoomorphic figures, like the pentagonal plate with lions found at Aquileia, attested along the N limes, from *Britain to *Pannonia, but also in the more internal zones of Raetia and *Noricum and in the more militarized regions of W *Africa. They appear between the third quarter and the end of the 4th c., lasting until the last decades of the 5th c. The distinctive typological element is the ring of oval form, obtained by fusion in open mold, in zoomorphic shape and closed with a plate in folded foil, smooth or decorated with stamps.

The fibulae with mobile plates, decorated with stamps or smooth, constitute, on the other hand, the most documented type in the Late Antique period, beginning from the second third of the 4th c., when the practice of placing belts and girdles in masculine tombs first appears—a practice later to become customary. There are numerous variants: in the methods of fabrication, in the form of the ring, in the plate attached to the leather, smooth or decorated. Two subgroups are distinguished: "A" constituted of fibulae of three pieces (ring, buckle tongue, plate) and "B" of fibulae of four pieces (arch, bar, buckle tongue, plate).

The lyre fibulae with trapezoidal hole, which are also called "omega" fibulae, make up another group.

Finally there are fibulae with drilled fixed plates, which derive from the fibulae with drilled mobile plates and which can be found in Britannia, N Gaul and the regions near the Danube where this type of fibula appears with frequency in contexts of the third and final quarter of the 4th c.

Among the fibulae of Gothic environments those of zoomorphic profile should also be recorded, such as the fibulae in the form of eagles, a pair of which, with cloisonnè decoration (gold settings with inset almandines), has been found in the tomb of a wealthy woman in Domagnano (Republic of San Marino), and which has been dated to the end of the 5th/beginning of the 6th c.

V. Bierbrauer, Die Ostgotischen Grab- und Schatzfunde in Italien, Spoleto s.a. (1975); var. aus., Magistra Barbaritas. I barbari in Italia (Antica Madre, Collana di studi sull'Italia antica), Milan 1990; M. Kazanski, Les Goths, Paris 1991; R. Martorelli, Alcune scene cristologiche su fibule e fibbie dei primi secoli, in Bessarione, Quaderno 8, Rome 1991, 121-137; var. aus., I Goti, Milan 1994; F. Lo Schiavo, Fibula: Enciclopedia dell'Arte Antica, Secondo Supplemento II (1994) 634-640; E. Cavada, Complementi dell'abbigliamento maschile e militari tardoantichi (fine IV-V secolo d.C.) nelle valli alpine centrorientali (bacini del Sarca e dell'Adige), in G.P. Brogiolo, Le fortificazioni del Garda e i sistemi di difesa dell'Italia settentrionale tra tardo antico e alto medioevo, 2° Convegno Archeologico del Garda - Gardone Riviera (BS), 7-9 ottobre 1998, Mantova 1999, 93-108; J. Arce - P. Delogu (eds.), Visigoti e Longobardi. Atti del Seminario (Roma 28-29 aprile 1997), Florence 2001; P. Delogu (ed.), Le invasioni barbariche nel meridione dell'impero. Visigoti, Vandali, Ostrogoti. Atti del convegno svoltosi alla Casa della cultura di Cosenza dal 24 al 26 luglio 1998, Catanzaro 2001.

C. Loasses

FIDES HIERONYMI. A profession of faith that begins Credo in unum Deum Patrem omnipotentem, visibilium et invisibilium factorem, and that was published for the first time by Morin (Anecd. Mareds. III, 3. 199-200). It can be considered as a combination of articles from the *Apostles' and Nicene *Creeds. The expression Descendit ad inferos should be kept in mind, which appears for the first time in the baptismal creed in use in the church of *Aquileia at the time of *Rufinus (Comm. in Symbol. Apostol. 18; PL 21, 356), and not yet included in those of the church of Rome and the East. Also, the other expression Sanctorum communionem makes its first appearance in an instruction of *Niceta of Remesiana (Explan. Symbol. 10; PL 52, 871). Cross does not exclude the possibility of the attribution of the fides hieronmymi to *Jerome himself (ODC 551), while Bulhart (CCL 69,273-4), in the footsteps of Wilmart (RBen 30, 174), refers to *Gregory of Elvira. This fides hieronymi must not be confused with a profession of faith of the same title, which begins Catholicam fidem ita profitemur and which is related in some way with the First Council of *Toledo (CPL 638; PLS II 295-296).

CPL 553; CPPM 2, 626; 628; PLS I, 515-516; CCL 69, 273-275; G. Morin: Anecdota Maredsolana 3 (1903) 199-200; Id., RBen 21 (1904) 1-10; A. Wilmart, RBen 30 (1913) 274ff.; ODC, 610 s.v.

L. Dattrino

FIDES NICAENA. A writing erroneously attributed to *Athanasius, and also known under the title Didascalia CCCXVIII Patrum Nicaenorum. The designation, with which it begins, runs thus: "Faith of the 318 *Fathers, God-bearers, present at *Nicaea, and truly marvelous and saving teaching concerning the Holy *Trinity." In reality it consists of two parts: the first contains, in a profession of faith, the Nicene creed with a dogmatic commentary, in which the theories of *Sabellius, *Photius, the *anthropomorphites and *Arius are condemned, and at the same time precise elements of the dogma are recalled. The second part contains and reassumes a long series of monastic and moral rules, and is entirely similar to the so-called Syntagma ad Monachos, also attributed to Athanasius by certain MSS (PG 28, 835-45). Many elements could suggest an Egyptian origin.

CPG 2, 2298; 2298/Supplementum; PG 28, 1637-1644; Per la Didascalia, Batiffol, Paris 1887 (partial repr. in A. Hahn, Biblioth. Symbol. 308-312): Id., Le syntagma doctrinae de saint Athanase, in Studia Patristica: Études d'ancienne Littér. Chrétienne 2 (1890) 116-160; G. Garitte, Une lettre grecque attribuée à saint Antoine: Muséon 55 (1942) 104-123; G.L. Dossetti, Il simbolo di Nicea e di Costantinopoli, Rome 1967, 51-54, with notes 48 and 49; Altaner 82; R. Riedinger - H. Thurn, Die Didascalia CCCXVIII patrum Nicaenorum und das Syntagma ad monachos im Codex Parisinus Graecus 1115 (a. 1276): JÖByz 35 (1985) 75-92.

L. Dattrino

FIDUCIA. For the ecclesiastical writers the term generally corresponds to the Greek παρρησία (Jer., Comm. in Eph. 3, 12; PL, 26,516 A). It appears 23 times in the NT, often in the sense of fiduciam habere = to trust (Mt 14:27). The meaning of the word undergoes a certain evolution through the effect either of an opposite term (fear, 1 Jn 4:17-18) or of a synonym (hope*, 2 Cor 3:12; Phil 1:20). Thence is derived the word's rather frequent meaning of designating the relationship between *God and the believer (L. Engels, Fiducia dans la Vulgate, 134). Admitting, therefore, that fiducia is a quality of the *soul, there remains the question whether this turns into an objective element (as in the OT, in the sense of a divine guarantee, included in the covenant stipulated by God himself with his people), or a subjective one, in the confidence placed in God by all believers. In this sense the word παρρησία (fiducia) should apparently be understand in most of the *Fathers. Thus, e.g., in *Origen the term is often linked to the complement πρὸς τὸν Θεόν (in Deum) (Comm. in Ier. Hom. 16, PG 13, 444B; In Cant. Cant. Hom. GCS Orig., VIII, 34; 60,123; etc.). Also in Hilary: ... propria conscientia altioris fiducia (In Ps. 54,2; PL 9,348). Furthermore, the *resurrection of Christ constituted the guarantee of the entire Christian fiducia. *Tertullian wrote: Fiducia christianorum resurrectio mortuorum (De res. 1,1; PL, 2,841).

RAC 7, 839-877; DSp 5, 619-630; P. Joüon, Divers sens de παρρησία dans le NT: RSR 30 (1940) 239-242; H. Schlier, παρρησία: TWNT V, 877 (TDNT 5, 884-886); H. Jaeger, παρρησία fiducia: Étude spirituelle des mots, SP = TU 63, 221-239; L. Engels, Fiducia dans la Vulgate. Le problème de traduction παρρησία - Fiducia: Graecitas et Latin. Christ. primaera, Suppl., Fasc. I (1964) 97-144; L. Cignelli, Il titolo "Cristo speranza" nell'esegesi patristica: SBF 23 (1973) 105-150.

L. Dattrino

FIERY FURNACE (iconography). The episode of the three young Jews in Babylon (Dan 3) appears in ancient Christian art in two distinct representations which transmit the two significant moments of the scriptural account: the refusal to adore the idol and the torture in the furnace.

1. First to appear, the scene of the Three youths in the furnace occurs already at the beginning of the 3rd c. in a fresco of the *cemetery of Priscilla at

*Rome (Wp pl. 16). Between the 2nd half of the 3rd and the beginning of the 4th c. it is introduced also into the decoration of *sarcophagi (Ws pls. 176, 2; 192, 1) and afterward it is received into the figurative repertory of the "minor arts." The iconographic iter of the composition could be synthesized in this way: In the examples of the 3rd c. it is usually represented in its essential terms: the furnace and the three youths, in expansis manibus posture, surrounded by flames. In those of the 4th c., other elements are found of a more exclusively narrative character, all traceable to the biblical account, such as the accuser, the angel, the servant who stokes the fire. From the iconological point of view the image of the three youths in the furnace, no differently from other representations taken from the Holy *Scripture, appeared to the faithful of the first centuries as a paradigm of salvation.

2. The first figurative testimonies of the theme of the Refusal (Dan 3:16-18) appear in the environment of funerary *sculpture between the end of the 3rd c. and the beginning of the 4th c. (Ws pls. 287, 1; Rep. n. 625), penetrating a little later also into the repertory of cemetery painting (Wp pls. 123, 1; RivAC 26 [1950] fig. 7). The elements that give life to the composition and reoccur constantly in both sculpture and *painting are Nebuchadnezzar in the act of commanding adoration, the soldier, the half-bust of the idol, the three youths in the posture of refusal. In all the examples known to us of the representation of the refusal, the presence of a detail of the greatest importance can be noted: the identity between the face of Nebuchadnezzar and that of the idol. If one considers that the theme of the refusal is born precisely in the ultimate period of the time of the tetrarchs, it will be appear clearly how such an identification serves as a characterizing element. Finally, an attempt to express the polemical attitude of the community in regard to the imperial cult is evidenced as well. The message included in the biblical text, already explicit by itself, is put in context; the immediate reference creeps in, the incontrovertible affirmation: the generic golden statue set up by Nebuchadnezzar is replaced with the image of the emperor. Still more meaningful are the compositions that present the contrast between the Refusal and the *Adoration of the Magi; here the royalty of Christ is hammered home in an even more explicit way and in clearly polemical terms: only the Savior is worthy of veneration, and therefore adoration is appropriate for him only. The theme of the two contrasting positions appears in the first quarter of the 4th c. on the front of a sarcophagus of the cemetery of Marcus and Marcellianus (Ws pl. 129, 2) and a little later will be frescoed on an arcosolium of the same cemetery (RivAC 26 [1950] fig. 7).

3. Around the second half of the 4th c. the two situations related to the episode of the three youths enter also into the figurative repertory of the so-called minor arts: above all in the ceramic lamps, but also on objects for liturgical use such as capsels and pyxes, along with reliquaries.

J. Daniélou, RAC 3, 575-585; B. Ott, LCI 2, 464-466; C. Carletti, I tre giovani ebrei di Babilonia nell'arte cristiana antica (Quad. Vetera Christianorum 9), Brescia 1975; M. Wegner, Das Nabuchodonosor-Bild. Das Bild im Bild: Pietas. Festschrift B. Kötting, Münster 1980, 528-538; B. Mazzei, s.v. Fanciulli ebrei: TIP, 177-178.

C. Carletti

FILASTER (Philaster, Philastrius) (d. before 397). Active in the 2nd half of the 4th c., he tried without success to oppose the *Arian bishop *Auxentius at *Milan and was punished with beatings (Gaud., Serm. 21). He participated as bishop of Brescia at the anti-Arian Council of *Aquileia in 381. Between 380 and 390 he wrote the Diversarum haereseon liber, using, in addition to *Irenaeus, above all the Panarion of *Epiphanius, but remaining, in Augustine's judgment (Ep. 222), inferior to the source. In reality it is a superficial and generic work, even where it treats heresies, such as Arianism, that the author had known personally, and it is not free of errors and misunderstandings. Filaster, just like Epiphanius, considered any doctrine opposed to Christianity as *heresy, even if chronologically prior; therefore before the 128 heresies that come after the beginning of the church he includes 28 prior Jewish ones. To multiply the number of heresies, Filaster considers the protagonists of certain episodes of the OT to be heretics with precise nomenclature (musuritae, trogloditae, puteoritae, etc.) and includes in the number of heresies many propositions of doctrinal and disciplinary character that he considered erroneous but that do not seem to have given rise to heretical or schismatic movements. Filaster does not even know the distinction between heresy and *schism, already well established before his time.

CPL 121; PL 12, 1111-1302; CSEL 38, 1; CCL 9, 207-324; Patrologia III, 120-122; var. aus., Eresia ed eresiologia nella Chiesa antica: Augustinianum 25/3 (1985) 597-906; E. Guidoboni, Filastrio e l'eresia sull'origine naturale del terremoto, in Id. (ed.), I terremoti prima del Mille in Italia e nell'area mediterranea. Storia, archeologia, sismologia, Bologna-Rome 1989, 178-181; San Filastrio di Brescia, Delle varie eresie. Intr., tr., notes and index by G. Banterle, Milan-Rome 1991; F. Vattioni, La prima lingua in Filastrio da Brescia: Augustinianum 34 (1994) 397-436.

M. Simonetti

FILIOQUE. The introduction of the filioque into the Nicene-Constantinopolitan *Creed, decided by the Synod of *Braga (675), received in *Gaul under Charlemagne, accepted finally by the Roman church (ca. 1013), which has become one of the major causes of dissension between the Western and *Byzantine churches, interests patristic theology for two reasons: the legitimacy of the fact itself and its content. As to the issue of the legitimacy of such a change in the creed, it should be mentioned that the Council of *Constantinople itself (381) altered the Nicene Creed, without worrying about the agreement of the Latins. Furthermore, the *Ephesian Council (431), which forbade professing a faith different from that of *Nicaea (COeD 54), did not cite its Constantinopolitan version. With regard to the doctrinal aspect, the filioque is a central point of the trinitarian theology of *Augustine. Taking up the idea of the Spirit as gift of the *Father and the Son from *Hilary (cf. Hil., Trin. II,29), and the theme of the Spirit as mutual love of Father and Son from *Marius Victorinus (Hymn., I,4; III,242ff; cf. Zeno of Verona Tract. I,17 with Augustine, Trin. VI 10,11) and from *Ambrose (Fid. V 7,90; cf. Origen, Com. Rom. IV,9), Augustine, not only in his speculations, but also in the doctrine destined for the simple faithful, drawing inspiration above all from *John, presents the Father and the Son as the unique principium (i.e., origin or beginning) of the *Holy Spirit; the first, however, as principium non de principio, the second, on the other hand, as principium de principio (Maxim. 2,17,4; cf. Trin. 15,17,29; 15,26-27). The Greek authors did not reach this conclusion because they wished to avoid the danger that the Spirit would be considered a creature, not coming from the same hypostasis of the Father, but made by means of the Son, like the other creatures. The very creed of Constantinople itself, composed in view of the Macedonian positions, should be seen in a similar framework. The formula by means of the Son (instrument, intermediary), as it is found above all in *Gregory of Nyssa, is nevertheless not so far from the filioque of Augustine. This is also true for *Cyril of Alexandria, who, however, was preoccupied by the question in reference to Christ, glorified by his own Spirit (DS 260). Since the controversy of the filioque comes after the patristic era, it is not necessary to discuss in this place the diverse solutions proposed, even if they are justified also by means of patristic positions.

DTC 5, 2309-2343; H. du Manoir, Dogme et spiritualité chez s. Cyrille d'A., Paris 1944; M. Schmaus, Die psychologische Trinitätslehre des hl. Augustinus, Münster ^{2}1966; J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds, London ^{3}1972; A. de Halleux, La profession de l'Esprit-Saint dans le symbole de Constantinople: RTL 10 (1979) 5-39; B. Schultze, Die Pneumatologie des Symbols von Konstantinopel als abschliessende Formulierung der griechischen Theologie (381-1981): OCP 47 (1981) 5-54; B.J. Hilberath - W. Hryniewicz, Filioque: LTK^3 3, 1279ff. (including the controversy); Stellungnahme des Päpstlichen Rates zur Förderung der Einheit der Christen: Una Sancta 50 (1995) 316-324; B. Studer, Zur Pneumatologie des Augustinus von Hippo (Trin. XV 17,27–27,50): SA 127 (Rome 1999) 311-327; Id., La foi en l'Esprit Saint dans l'Église Ancienne: SA 127, 445-463 (bibl.); B. Oberdorfer - K.C. Felmy, Filioque: RGG^4 3, 119-121 (bibl.); B. Oberdorfer, Filioque. Geschichte und Theologie eines ökumenischen Problems, Göttingen 2001.

B. Studer

FINNIAN of Clonard (d. 549). Findian (Finden), latinized as Finnianus or Finianus, was born in *Ireland at Mysdall, around 470; his instructors were the bishops St. Fortchern (d. after 490) and St. David of Menevia (d. around 601 at the age of 147). An evangelist of Ireland, Finnian is the founder of the monastery of Clonard (Cluain Iraird), out of which came several famous ecclesiastical personalities: S. Ciarán of Clonmacnoise (d. 549?), S. Colomba of Iona (d. 597), S. Comgall of Bangor (d. 600). Penitent and thaumaturge, a man of classical and biblical culture, Finnian could be the author of the Paenitentiale Vinniani (Penitential of St. Finnian of Moville [d. 579/580]). He died at Clonard 12 December 549. As an object of liturgical veneration, his name was signaled in a Visigothic martyrology of the beginning of the 9th c. (Escorial I.III. 13).

BHL 2989; EC 5, 1395; P. Grosjean, Notes d'hagiographie celtique, 24. Mention de S. Finnián de Cluain Iraird dans un martyrologe visigotique du début du IX^e siècle: AB 72 (1954) 347-352; Id., La liste des Disciples de S. Finnián: AB 73 (1955) 316-322; J. Hughes, The Historical Value of the Lives of St. Finnian of Clonard: Eng. Hist. Rev. 69 (1954) 353-372; BS 5, 832-833; D. Dumville, The Penitential of Vinnianus, in Gildas. New Approaches, ed. M. Lapidge - D. Dumville, Woodbridge 1984, 207-214; P. Byrne, The Community of Clonard from the Sixth to the Twelfth Centuries: Perita 4 (1985) 157-173; Patrologia IV, 517-518; BBKL XXI, 401.

R. Grégoire

FIRMICUS MATERNUS (d. after 350). The MS tradition attributes to Firmicus Maternus two writings of fairly diverse content which go back to the 4th c.: the Matheseos libri VIII (334–337) and the De errore profanarum religionum (343–347). All information on our author owes to these two writings. He was born in Sicily and lived mostly in *Syracuse. Descendant of a senatorial family, he must have received a solid rhetorical-philosophical education. While still a *pagan, he wrote (between 334–337) his Matheseos, a kind of manual of astrology. Obviously in debt to Greek sources and even more to Latin ones, he has left us a work that, more than any other preserved from antiquity, informs us as to the astrological beliefs and practices of that time.

In his second work, De errore profanarum religionum, composed after his conversion to Christianity (between 346–350), Firmicus Maternus combats contemporaneous paganism in the form of the divinization of the elements and above all that of the mysteries. After demonstrating in a rather aggressive way the inanity and immorality of the myths and pagan cults, he concludes by calling his readers to conversion and by reminding the emperors (*Constantius and *Constans) the serious duty they have of destroying without remorse the pagan religion. This hardly tolerant attitude is explained at least in part by the character of a convert who defended with zeal the Christian cause when Christianity had become the causa victrix, protected now by the emperors themselves. Obviously, however, he intends not only to refute pagan errors, but also to lead nonbelievers to conversion. Even though it is addressed primarily to pagans, the work leans on scriptural proofs, which it owes almost exclusively to the Testimonia of *Cyprian. It should also be remarked that the Consultationes Zacchaei et Apollonii, attributed to him by Morin, do not go back beyond the 5th c.

CPL 101-102; Matheseos libri VIII: W. Kroll - F. Skutsch - K. Ziegler, (Teubneriana) Leipzig 1897–1913 (repr. 1968); De errore prof. relig.: PL 12, 981-1050; C. Halm, CSEL 2 (1967) 75-130; K. Ziegler, Munich 1953; A. Pastorino, Florence 1956 (1969) (commentary); DSp 5, 384-388; RAC 7, 946-959; K. Hoheisel, Das Urteil über die nichtchristlichen Religionen im Traktat "De err. prof. relig." des Iulius F. Maternus (Diss.), Bonn 1971/72; P.F. Beatrice (ed.), L'intolleranza cristiana, Bologna 1990; LTK³ 3, 1297; R. Herzog (ed.), Hdb. lat. Lit. Antike, V (1989) 84-93; LACL (2002) 267-268.

B. Studer

FIRMILIAN of Caesarea in Cappadocia (d. 268). Bishop of the metropolis of *Cappadocia for more than thirty years (from ca. 230 to ca. 268), we know that he received *Origen in 232 or 233 and permitted him to preach in his churches. In 235, under *Maximinus Thrax, the Christians in Cappadocia were persecuted and Firmilian took refuge in *Palestine, where he consorted again with Origen; from there he returned to *Caesarea of Cappadocia. It seems that during the *persecution of *Decius (249–250) he again avoided the opportunity to confess the faith because he was found, later, alongside Bishop *Helenus of *Tarsus in conflict with Bishop *Fabius of Antioch, who leaned toward the severity of *Novatian against all those who had failed in courage during the persecution. With the support of Firmilian, Helenus organized a council to depose Fabius, who in the meantime died. The accusations against Firmilian and Helenus did not stop; rather they were taken to *Rome, where they found a favorable hearing in Pope *Stephen (254–257), who was more inclined toward the Novatians; he made known in a letter that he was excluding the two bishops from his communion. In 256, Stephen also broke communion with *Cyprian of Carthage, because the latter considered invalid the *baptism conferred by the Novatians. Cyprian then appealed to the bishops of the East; Firmilian approved his doctrinal position against that of Stephen in a long letter, which is preserved (Ep. 75, of the correspondence of Cyprian). Some years later, Firmilian was invited twice by Helenus of Tarsus to go to *Antioch for a council that heard the case of the bishop of that city, *Paul of Samosata, accused of heresy. At the time of the first council, Firmilian declared himself satisfied with the responses of Paul, so that the latter was not condemned; the second time, toward 268, he once again set out for Antioch, but died during the voyage to Tarsus.

CPG 1760; Eusebius, HE 6 and 7, passim; DHGE 17, 249-252; P. Nautin, Lettres et écrivains chrétiens, Paris 1961, 152-156, 238-250; M. Girardi, Scrittura e battesimo degli eretici nella lettera di Firmiliano a Cipriano: VetChr 19 (1982) 37-67; S.G. Hall, Stephen of Rome and the One Baptism: SP XVII, 2, 796-798; C. Trevett, Spiritual Authority and the "Heretical" Woman. Firmilian's Word to the Church in Carthage, in Portraits of Spiritual Authority, ed. J.W. Drijvers - J.W. Watt, Leiden 1999, 45-62.

P. Nautin

FIRMUS of Caesarea in Cappadocia (d. 439). One of the leaders of the Cyrillian party at the Council of *Ephesus; 45 letters of his survive, as well as a brief *homily pronounced at the Council of Ephesus (preserved in Ethiopian in the Qērellos).

CPG 6120-6121; DHGE 17, 264; Cath 4, 1320; PG 77, 1481-1514; B.M. Weischer, Qērellos IV 1. Homilien und Briefe zum Konzil von Ephesos, Wiesbaden 1979, 134-137; S. Grébaut, Traduction de la version éthiopienne d'une homélie de Firmus, évêque de Césarée: ROC 15 (1910) 324-325; M.-A. Calvet-Sebasti - P.-L. Gatier, Firmus de Césarée, Lettres. Introduction, texte et traduction, notes et index (SC 350), Paris 1989.

S.J. Voicu

FISH. The fish is a symbol attested in ancient *Egypt, in Mesopotamian culture, and in Greece and Rome. The symbol was associated with the Orphean-Dionysian mystery cults and the goddess Cybele.

Even in the OT many images of fish appear, starting from the creation of the sea creatures and every type of animal that swims and swarms in the water of Gen 1:20-22, to the large sea monster that swallowed *Jonah and spewed him onto the land (Jon 2:1-11). In the NT, then, the fish became an image of believers (Lk 5:10; Mt 13:47ff.), while the *apostles were described as "fishers of men" (Mt 4:19; Mk 1:16). Fish, moreover, along with bread, was the food *Jesus multiplied (Mt 14:19 and 15:34-36). The symbolism was enriched in the writings of ancient Christian authors, and fish became a very strong *symbol, also because the Greek word that expresses it, ΙΧΘΥΣ (ichthys), already at the end of the 2nd c. was interpreted as an acrostic "Jesus Christ, God's Son, Savior," so that as a result *Clement of Alexandria invited Christians to decorate their seal with a fish (Paed. III, 59,2: GCS I, 270,7ff.). *Archaeological finds have confirmed the antiquity of the symbol that appears, alone or duplicated, esp. in funerary contexts, and is at times associated with the acrostic ΙΧΘΥΣ, as occurs, e.g., in a graffito in the catacombs of Priscilla, or in the funerary stone of Licinia Amia, where one finds the formula ΙΧΘΥΣ ΖΩΝΤΩΝ (fish of the living) and the portrayal of two fish set face-to-face and divided by an anchor (see L. Gambassi, s.v. Pesce, 254). Scholars have asked themselves about the relationship between the figurative symbol of the fish in the acrostic, indicating the chronological priority at one point of one and at another point of the other (a summary of the major positions on this question can be found in L. Gambassi, s.v. Pesce, 252).

The symbol of the fish is understood only when one starts from the meaning that was attributed to the ocean in which it lived. In fact, if one keeps in mind the key identification of the ocean with the world and *sin, one can better explain why the fish was a symbol of the believer captured and, therefore, saved by Christ and the apostles, though the fish that remains in the abyss is a symbol of those who will be damned (ps.-Barn. 10,5; Clem. Al., Paed. 3,52,2 and 59,2: GCS I, 296,21 and I, 270,7ff.; Strom. II, 15,67: SC 38, 86-87; Orig., Mt. Com. 13,10: GCS Origen, X, 207,29). The act of fishing, which implies the extraction of the fish from the place of sin, was consequently adapted to the *resurrection, by which one understands well the christological interpretation of the fish: *Augustine associated the abyss of mortality in which Christ lived with the depth of the waters in which the fish live (Civ. Dei 18,23: CCL 48, 613-614) and defined Christ as the "Great Fish," who was the first to emerge from the water and to rise to heaven as our intercessor (In Ioh. ev. tr. 17,11: CCL 36, 176,15ff.). *Zeno of Verona considered Christ the fish who was the first to rise from the dead and from whose mouth issued forth two covenants (Tract. 1,375). In *Tertullian's writings, the two symbols of the faithful fish and the Christ-fish are found: human beings are indeed the "small fish," that are born in the water acc. to the image of the true fish (the Greek term ichthys is used), and they are saved only by staying in the water (Bapt. 1,3: CCL 1,1, 277,11); the ocean is here understood, therefore, in a positive sense, a source of life; it is the regenerating water of *baptism. This living water would be interpreted subsequently as the water of the Jordan, in which Christ the fish is born through water and where, after the resurrection, he will provide living food for his disciples (*Peter Chrysologus, Sermo 55,5). In the figurative arts there are many representations of Christ in the Jordan surrounded by fish, and the symbol of the fish appears very frequently in the baptismal fonts (Gambassi, Pesce, 255-256).

The symbolism of the fish is not limited, however, to the sacrament of baptism, but is also found in a eucharistic context because it is food: one merely has to reflect on the gospel accounts of the multiplication of the loaves of bread and the fish (Mt 14:15-21; Mk 6:35-44; Lk 9:12-17; Jn 6:11-14 and, again, Mt 15:32-38 and Mk 8:1-9) or to the time when the disciples offered roasted fish to the risen Christ (Lk 24:41-43). Augustine (Conf. XIII, 21: CSEL 33, 367,16-18) compared Christ to the fish raised from the ocean depths to become food on the table, a food destined for the land united to God (Conf. XIII, 23: CSEL 33, 372,22-23), a theme that would become traditional.

The christological interpretation of the fish hanging on the fishing rod caused some Fathers to detect in it an allusion to the passion of the Lord. Augustine, e.g., commenting upon Jn 21:9, identified the fish placed over the fire with Christ on the cross (In Ioh. Ev. tr. 123,3: CCL 36, 676,20), establishing a tradition that would continue long after him.

Among the various fish, the whale deserves special mention, or rather the large sea creature responsible for swallowing *Jonah and spitting him out after only three days. In fact, this large fish was often confused with the ocean monsters, protagonists of myths, or with the biblical dragon that lived in the abyss: in the catacombs of Priscilla, one finds a depiction of Jonah in the jaws of the monster, which looks like a cross between a dragon and a whale. The story of Jonah, already interpreted as a prefiguration of Christ's death and resurrection in Mt 12:39-41, was often invoked by ancient Christian authors. Zeno of Verona, e.g. (Tractatus I, 34,8: CChL 22,87), identified in Jonah's sleeping on the ship a symbol of the mystery of the Lord, declaring that Jonah was an image of Christ; the ship, an image of the cross, inasmuch as it was also made of wood; the sleep, a figure of the passion; the sea, an image of this world, which in vain has fought against God, while the large sea creature is a representation of hell. The whale thus emerged as a symbol of an infernal monster, the devil, and was thus identified with Leviathan (Job 40:25ff.), which is destined to be captured by the Lord (Job 3:8). This is a type of the devil, whom Christ deceived and defeated by his resurrection (Orig., Hom. Lev. 8,3: GCS 7, 398).

In a manner analogous to Jonah's whale, the other large sea creatures and monsters found in *Scripture should be identified with the devil (*Ambrose, Exp. Ev. Lc IV, 40: CSEL 32/4, 159; Explan. Ps. 36,63,3: CSEL 64/6, 121 and *Gregory the Great, Mor. In Iob VIII, 23,39: CCL 143, 410); these monsters are defeated when the righteous resist temptation (Augustine, Adn. in Iob 26: CSEL 28/3, 563), or when a sinner repents and receives baptism (Gregory the Great, Mor. in Iob IV, 9,14: CChL 143,172). Lastly, in *Origen's writings the sea monsters are at times a symbol of wicked thoughts that emerge from the human heart in order to be judged by God (Hom in Gen 1,8: GCS Orig. 6,11).

F.J. Dölger, ΙΧΘΥΣ. Das Fischsymbol in frühchristlicher Zeit, 1. Religionsgeschichtliche und epigraphische Untersuchungen, Rom 1910; Id., ΙΧΘΥΣ. Der heilige Fisch in den antiken Religionen und im Christentum, 2, Münster 1922; Id., ΙΧΘΥΣ. Die Fischdenkmäler in der frühchristlichen Plastik, Malerei und Kleinkunst, 5., Münster 1943; J. Engemann, s.v. Fisch, Fischer, Fischfang: RAC 7, 959-1095; E. Sauser, s.v. Fisch: LCI 2, 35-39; L. Gambassi, s.v. Pesce: TIP, 252-258; M.P. Ciccarese (ed.), Animali simbolici. Alle origini del bestiario cristiano I (Agnello - Gufo), Bologna 2002, s.v. Balena/cetaceo, 191-201.

C. Noce

FISHERMAN. Closely connected to the symbolism of the *fish is that of the fisherman, which occupies an important place in the NT: many of the apostles were in fact fishermen, called by Jesus to become "fishers of men" (Mt 4:19; Mk 1:16; Lk 5:10). This passage lies at the foundation of the soteriological interpretation of the catch, understood as the winning of souls for eternal life: *Clement of Alexandria identified the fisherman in this sense, namely, the fisherman who draws in *souls to safety, in one passage *Peter (Paed. III, 52,2: GCS I, 266,21-24), in another *Jesus Christ (Paed. III, 101,3: GCS I, 291,23-292,28), designated as the "fisher of men." The image of Peter, fisher of men, borrowed above all from Mt 17:27, "go to the sea and cast a hook," was a favorite of the Latin West as a symbol of the primacy of Peter. *Augustine (In Ioh. Ev. tract. 42,1: CCL 36, 615-616) detected an allegorical meaning in the hook, namely, the Word of God, which was able to draw in the faithful; *Hilary (Com. Mt 17,13: SC 258, 72, 1-4) and *Zeno of Verona (Tract. I, 37,6: CCL 22, 102, 51) did so as well. Hilary perceived the teaching in which Peter is able to draw martyrs and faithful to God; Zeno, a symbol of evangelical preaching; *Peter Chrysologus distinguished between the hook of sanctity and the net of the teaching that leads the flock of men to *faith (Serm. 107,3: CCL 24, 666, 23-24). During the Middle Ages, the popes began to seal their letters with the small hook of the fishermen (anulus piscatoris), probably starting from the time of Clement IV, in 1265 (see Rahner, 829-830). *Ambrose developed the image of Peter, fisherman of souls, primarily in his Commentary on the Gospel of Luke: the amazing act of Peter's miraculous catch (Lk 5:3ff.) consists in the fact that the fish have been captured to live, to emerge from the abyss of the sea to the heights of heaven (Exp. Ev. sec. Luc. 4,72: CSEL 32, 4, 176,6-8). The nets, though overloaded, do not allow the boats of the church and Israel to sink: in the end, even the *heretics will be gathered in (Exp. Ev. sec. Luc. 4,77-78: CSEL 32, 4, 177,24-178,7).

The incongruity between the death of the fish and the destiny of human life was already noticed by *Origen. Commenting on Mt 13:47-50, i.e., the parable in which the kingdom of heaven is compared to a net cast into the sea that gathers every type of fish, Origen noted how for the fish it is bad to find oneself in the net, but in the parable it is bad not to find oneself in the net, because the net is a symbol of the church, the only place for salvation (Com. Mt X, 13: GCS X, 15,30-16,4). The sifting of the bad fish from the net, however, refers to the eschatological *judgment (Com. Mt X, 12-13: GCS X, 14,22-15,21). The net, moreover, is a symbol of *Scripture, which is capable of capturing various types of faithful (Com. Mt X, 12: GCS X, 13,26–14,20). Elsewhere, Origen interpreted the net as a catch like faith (Hom. Lev VII, 7: GCS VII, 392,6-9), although others put it in relation to the teachings of the gospel (Jerome, In Mt II, 47-49: SC 242, 290,362-292,374) or with the doctrine of Christ (Hilary, In Mt XIII, 9: SC 254, 302,1-9).

On the basis of a christological interpretation of the fish, which we have already seen was common, the fishing rod that achieves the catch in Mt 17:27 became a symbol of the cross (as Ambrose seems to have affirmed; Hex. V, 6,15). Moreover, as in the case of the net, it is a symbol of the Word of God (Augustine, In Ioh. Ev. tract. 42,1, cit.).

Lastly, more rare is the baptismal interpretation of the fisherman which praised the *apostles inasmuch as they were fishers of men and baptizers, as one finds in *Ephrem's writings (De epiph. 7,24-27: CSCO 187, 154); similar occurrences of this association of ideas are also found in the figurative arts (see L. Gambassi, 250).

J. Engemann, s.v. Fisch. Fischer, Fischfang: RAC 7, 1969, 959-1095; B. Ott, s.v. Fischer Fischfang: LCI 2, 35-39; H. Rahner, L'ecclesiologia dei Padri, Rome 1971, 827ff.; L. Gambassi: TIP, 248-252.

C. Noce

FLACCILLA (d. 386). Of Spanish origin, she married the emperor *Theodosius I in 376. With him she had three children: *Arcadius, *Pulcheria and *Honorius. The sources (Theodoret, Hist. Eccl., V, 18; Sozomenus, Hist. Eccl., VII, 6; Gennadius, De Vir. Ill. 16) agree in presenting her as dedicated to good works, an adversary of *paganism and of *Arianism. At her death *Gregory of Nyssa delivered the funeral oration (PG 46, 877-892).

DCB 2, 524-525; PLRE I, Aelia Flavia Flaccilla, 341-342.

G. Pilara

FLACCILLUS of Antioch (d. before 343). Succeeded *Euphronius on the throne of *Antioch around 330, proponent of the Eusebian *Arians, he participated in 335 in the Council of *Tyre, that condemned *Athanasius; in the same year he was in *Jerusalem on the occasion of the dedication of the church of the Anastasis. In 339 he supported the election of *Gregory the Cappadocian to the Alexandrian see. In 340–341 he was one of the Eastern bishops who, alongside *Eusebius of Nicomedia, were in unfriendly correspondence with *Julius of Rome concerning the Roman council of 341. Also in 341, he presided at the Council of Antioch, at which the Eusebians responded to the Roman synod in an anti-Nicene sense. At this time he contributed to reintegrating the bishop *Eusebius at *Emesa, who had abandoned his seat because of the hostility of the people. He died before 343.

DHGE 17, 310-311; F. Cavallera, Le schisme d'Antioche (IVe-Ve siècle), Paris 1905; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IVe siècle (328–373), Rome 1996, passim; Fedalto 2, 687.

M. Simonetti

FLAVIAN, martyr. Diverse martyrs carry this name: (1) The first is a Flavian mentioned by Usuardus in his martyrology on 30 January, perhaps a vice-prefect of Rome, a merely legendary personage, of whom no passio exists; his tomb was venerated at Civitavecchia (BHL 5857d). (2) The historic reality of Flavian of Ancona, martyred under *Diocletian, is not certain because the ancient martyrologies do not mention him (BHL 6622). (3) A martyr of Bôbîdouna (Noviodunum in Moesia [today Isaccea, in Romania] or a city in Africa?) with this name is in the Mart. syr. 25 May, a day that suggests a link with the Flavian of BHL 6009. (4) Another, from the time of *Julian the Apostate, would have been prefect of Rome, then exiled to Aquas Taurinas (Montefiascone), where a Romanesque church, dedicated to him, was raised. No value can be given to his legend (BHL 1322-1323; LCI 6, 245-246). (5) The last was a companion in martyrdom of *Montanus and Lucius of Carthage (BHL 6009), who died 25 May 259.

BS 5, 879-885, 909.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

FLAVIAN I of Antioch (bishop 381–404). He was born in the early years of the 4th c. to a prosperous family. Around 350, although still a simple lay ascetic, he was, together with *Diodore the future bishop of *Tarsus, one of the leaders of the Nicene party at *Antioch, a circumstance in which he showed himself to be very active, organizing liturgical assemblies, introducing the choral singing of the antiphons and proposing the present anti-*Arian formulation of the Gloria Patri. He was ordained a priest in 362–363 by *Meletius, whom he succeeded, despite the explicit opposition of *Gregory of Nazianzus. Because of the enduring *schism at Antioch (and also several irregularities in his election), recognition of his ordination was delayed by the West, which was in communion with his rival *Paulinus. As bishop he carried out ceaseless organizing and charitable activities, widely attested in the works of *John Chrysostom, his disciple. His zeal for the church was manifested in a special way during the revolt "of the statues" (February 387), when Flavian, despite his advanced age, did not hesitate to undertake the long voyage to *Constantinople to intercede with *Theodosius I for the pardon of the city, threatened with imperial reprisals. From his works, only a homily De anathemate (transmitted under the name of Chrysostom) remains, which concerns the Antiochene schism, as well as a few fragments transmitted by later *florilegia, esp. the Eranistes of *Theodoret.

CPG 3430-3436; DHGE 17, 380-386; PG 48, 945-952; F. Cavallera, Le schisme d'Antioche (IVe-Ve siècle), Paris 1905; L. Perrone, Flaviano di Antiochia, Nessun anatema, né per i vivi né per i morti! = De non anathematizandis vivis vel defunctis (Testi dei Padri della Chiesa 1), Magnano 1993.

S.J. Voicu

FLAVIAN II of Antioch (d. after 518). *Chalcedonian archbishop and patriarch of *Antioch from 498 to 512, successor to the archbishop Palladius. During his episcopate there was a resurgence of the christological controversies, esp. due to the influence of *monophysite followers of Philoxenus of Mabbug, who sought to transform into a tool of the anti-Chalcedonian battle the formula of faith of the Henotikon (482), developed by *Acacius of Constantinople and sanctioned by the emperor *Zeno in order to bring all the subjects of the empire back to the unity of faith. Having disappointed with his reconciliatory and substantially pro-Chalcedonian attitude the expectations of the Philoxenian monophysites—who expected from him *anathemas against *Nestorius, *Diodore of Tarsus, *Theodore of Mopsuestia and *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, as well as the condemnation of Chalcedonian *dyophysitism and the approval of the Henotikon, understood as a refutation of the Chalcedonian "additions" to what had been defined in the preceding councils of *Nicaea, *Constantinople and *Ephesus—Flavian fell victim to the defamatory campaign and the ferocious hostility of his adversaries, and after various vicissitudes and some temporary success (such as that of the Synod of Sidon in 511) he was deposed in 512 and replaced with the monophysite bishop *Severus, and finally exiled by imperial order to *Petra (Arabia Petrea, in the area of the present Ma'an). When the emperor *Justin I, after having ended the Acacian schism, restored to their thrones the deposed Chalcedonian bishops, he put on the chair of Antioch, in place of Severus, not Flavian, but a certain Paul: probably at that time Flavian had already died. From him no writings are extant.

R. Devreesse, Le patriarcat d'Antioche depuis la paix de l'Église jusqu'à la conquête arabe, Paris 1945; A. de Halleux, Philoxène de Mabbog. Sa vie, ses écrits, sa théologie, Louvain 1963; DHGE 17, 386-388; A. Fliche - V. Martin, Storia della Chiesa, It. ed., IV, Turin [3]1977; Patrologia V (cf. index).

S. Leanza

FLAVIAN of Chalon-sur-Saône (d. 591). Referendary of Gontran, the king of Burgundy, he succeeded Agricola on the episcopal throne at his death (580). He took part in the councils of Mâcon (581 and 585), *Lyons (583), Valence (585) and in the *baptism of Chlotar, son of Fredegund, at Nemours. The hymn Versus ad mandatum in cena Domini is attributed to him. He founded or restored the abbey of S. Peter at Chalon.

CPL 2014; PLRE III, A. Flavius, 487; A.S. Walpole, Early Latin Hymns, Cambridge 1922, 201-204.

G. Pilara

FLAVIAN of Constantinople (d. 449). A member of the clergy of *Constantinople, he was elected patriarch there in 446, at the death of *Proclus, and a little later, in 448, found himself confronted by the beginning of the *monophysite crisis, provoked by the preaching of the monk *Eutyches in the capital itself. The latter was accused before Flavian by Eusebius of Dorylaeum, and the patriarch convoked a local council which condemned Eutyches on 18 November. On this occasion, Flavian affirmed that Christ is of two natures in a single hypostasis and a single prosopon*. But the immediate reaction to the condemnation, headed by *Dioscorus of Alexandria and favored by the emperor *Theodosius, led to the convocation of an ecumenical council at *Ephesus in 449, which was carefully prepared in favor of Eutyches. In this context, Leo the Great sent a dogmatic letter to Flavian, the Tomus ad Flavianum, which would become the foundational document of Chalcedonian Christology. At the time, however, it did not provide any help to Flavian, who, accused by Dioscorus on 8 August, was deposed from his charge. In the tumult that followed, while trying to escape, he was seized and badly beaten by his adversaries. Imprisoned, he died three days later while he was en route for exile. His orthodoxy was recognized two years later at the Council of *Chalcedon, which rehabilitated his memory.

CPG III, 5930-5938; DHGE 17, 390-396; W.H.C. Frend, The Rise of Christianity, Philadelphia 1984, 763-770; Patrologia V, 36-37; BBKL II, 52; S. Acerbi, Conflitti politico-ecclesiastici in Oriente nella tarda antichità. Il II Concilio di Efeso (449), Madrid 2001.

M. Simonetti

FLAVIAN of Philippi. Bishop of *Philippi in the 5th c., Pope *Celestine I sent him a letter on the occasion of the Council of *Ephesus (431) to inform him that he had entrusted to *Cyril of Alexandria the task of preparing the case against *Nestorius (PL 50, 465). At the council, Flavian replaced *Rufus of Thessalonica, hindered from participating (Mansi IV, 1280 and 1305), and to this fact is probably due the title of archbishop, erroneously attributed to him by *Liberatus (Breviar. 5: PL 68, 977). He had an important role in the condemnation of Nestorius. He was among the signers of both the edict of deposition of the heretic (Mansi IV, 1212), and of the conciliar letter to the clergy and people of *Constantinople (Mansi IV, 1304); his name appears also in the list of the orthodox bishops for the emperors *Theodosius II and *Valentinian III (Mansi IV, 1425). The Nestorians tried in vain to win him to their side.

DHGE 17, 397-398; A. Fliche - V. Martin, Storia della Chiesa, It. ed., IV, Turin [3]1977; L.I. Scipioni, Nestorio e il Concilio di Efeso, Milan 1974; A. Crabbe, The Invitation List to the Council of Ephesus and Metropolitan Hierarchy in the Fifth Century: JTS 32 (1981) 369-400; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Rome 1976 (cf. index).

S. Leanza

FLAVIANUS, Virius Nicomachus (d. after 394). Related to the *pagan Symmachus, he shared with him the attempt to restore declining paganism in the 2nd half of the 4th c. He fulfilled high public charges. In 376, as vicar of *Africa, acc. to the testimony of *Augustine (Ep. 87,8), he favored the *Donatists and for this was recalled by the emperor *Gratian. He was appointed praefectus praetorio Italiae Illyrici et Africae by Theodosius in the years 390–392 and 393–394, because of his fame as a scholar (he translated the *Life of Apollonius of Tyana by Philostratus into Latin) and historian (he composed Annales, which have not survived). He was consul around 393–394. He supported the rebellion of *Eugenius (Soz., HE 7,22,5), from whom he obtained the restoration of the *Altar of Victory (Paul Med., Vita Ambr. 26) and the restitution of the goods confiscated from the pagan temples. In 393–394 he renewed pagan worship at Rome. He died in 394 in the Alps in a military action against Theodosius, after having threatened to turn the church of *Milan into a cattle shed, once having reached there, and to force the clergy to enter the army (Paul Med., Vita Ambr. 31). It has been hypothesized that the Carmen contra paganos refers to him (for the bibl. cf. Patrologia III, 316-317).

PWK 6, 2506-2511; PLRE I, 347-349; PCBE 1, 827.

A. Pollastri

FLAVIUS CLEMENS, consul (1st c). Son of Titus Flavius Sabinus, he belonged to the gens Flavia and was the cousin of the emperors *Titus and *Domitian. His two sons were designated by Domitian as eventual successors to the empire (Suet., Domitian 15). He was consul in the year 95. Dio Cassio accused him of atheism and of following Jewish customs (Hist. Rom. LXVII, 14,1-2), and *Suetonius accused him of indifference and political inertia (Domitian 15). Such accusations, frequently formulated against Christians, would suggest that Flavius Clemens was a Christian. His consular mandate having ceased, he was condemned to death for religious reasons, which do not exclude those of political jealousy. His wife Flavia Domitilla, whose name is given to a Christian cemetery situated on his property, was sent into exile on the island of Ventotene. In the same period other citizens were exiled, deprived of their property or condemned to death. Suetonius hastens to note that the crime committed against Flavius Clemens and his family accelerated the end of the emperor, who was assassinated a short time later (Domitian 15.17). A later tradition identified the consul with Pope *Clement of Rome, but there are no documents to justify such an identification, despite their being contemporaries. One could suppose that the latter belonged to a family of freedmen of Flavius Clemens.

A. Fliche - V. Martin, Storia della Chiesa, I, Turin [3]1958, 376-377, 524-535; G. Bardy, Clément (Titus Flavius): DHGE XII, 1083; BBKL 7, 503-519.

E. Peretto

FLESH. In the language of the Septuagint, the Greek term σάρξ was often adopted as an equivalent to the Hebrew basar, meaning the human being in its corporeity and earthly existence, frail and ephemeral, and thus implicitly contrasted with the divine being and its properties of holiness and eternity, or contrasted with the angelic being in its immaterial characteristics. From the time of Epicurus, poets and pagan *philosophers used σάρξ to designate the body, but already in the moral language of late *Stoicism, esp. in Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius, σάρξ took on a strongly negative connotation, indicating almost a disdain for the person's corporeal dimension, in opposition to the logos (ratio). In Latin also, caro, which translates σάρξ, is pregnant with negativity (cf. Seneca, Ep. 74,16; Ad Marc. 24,5). Among Christian authors, the anthropological meaning of the biblical basar prevailed in reference to the human person, accentuating his corporeity, often in contexts that claim the divine origin of the human body against *gnostic interpretations in general and *Marcionite in particular (cf. Ignatius, Rom. 2,1; Tatian, Orat. 13,1; Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. V, 6,1; Clem. Al., Strom. III, 9,65,2; Tertullian, Adv. Marc. I, 29,1; An. 27,5; Res. 49,2; Novatian, Trin. X, 55; Lactantius, Div.

Inst. IV, 25,16; Ira Dei 1,5). Nevertheless, the negative dimension of the two terms σάρξ and caro tends to be reinforced in reference to the tendencies of the human body toward *evil, under the suggestion esp. of Pauline and Johannine texts (cf. ps.-Barnabas, Ep. 10,9; Ep. Diogn. 10,9; Clem. Al., Paedag. 1, 6,36,3; Strom. II, 41,4; Origen, Princ. III, 4,4; Tertullian, Mart. 1,1; An. 40,2; Novatian, Trin. XXIX, 170; Lactantius, Div. Inst. VI, 13,5-10).

The term σάρξ/caro was particularly developed in *Christology, under the inspiration of NT statements (cf. Jn 1:14; 1 Jn 4:2; Rom 9:5) in which it designates the human nature of Jesus Christ; it is particularly frequent in contexts aimed at asserting the reality of Jesus' human body against *Docetic interpretations: it is enough to think of *Tertullian's De carne Christi and of the formulae it uses to designate the *incarnation, such as carnem accipere (6,5), carnem suscipere (17,3), carnem gestare (5, 1; 18,7), near or equivalent to Greek formulae (cf. Clem. Al., Paedag. III, 1,2,2; Strom. VI, 16,137,4; VII, 2,7,5). Among these, particularly significant is the christological formula κατὰ πνεῦμα κατὰ σάρκα (= secundum spiritum / secundum carnem), inspired by Rom 1:3 and 9:5, in which σάρξ/caro designates weak and fragile human nature as compared with Christ's divine nature (cf. Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. III, 22,1; IV, 4,1; Epid. 3; Hippolytus, Ben. Iac. 16,27; C. Noet. 16; Tertullian, Carn. Chr. 22,3; Adv. Iud. 13,11; Cyprian, Test. II, 8; 11,11; Novatian, Trin. XVII, 95). In christological formulae until the *Arian crisis, σάρξ/caro indicates human nature as a whole. Only beginning with Arian exegesis could the σάρξ/caro of the christological formulae be used to emphasize the purely corporeal aspect of the humanity assumed by Christ. This limiting interpretation would be reinforced by *Apollinaris of Laodicea; but against the Arian and Apollinarian interpretations, the *orthodox tradition confirmed the anthropological meaning of the biblical tradition to claim the full humanity of Jesus Christ (cf. Athanasius, Tom. 7; Basil, Ep. 236, 1; 261,3; Didymus, Heb. 1, 6; Theodore Mops., In Jo. 1, 14).

C.H. Lindijer, Het Begrip Sarx bij Paulus, Assen 1952; J.N. Seventer, Paul und Seneca, Leiden 1961, 80-81; R. Braun, "Deus Christianorum." Recherches sur le vocabulaire doctrinal de Tertullien, Paris 1962, 300-304; V. Loi, Lattanzio nella storia del linguaggio e del pensiero teologico pre-niceno, Zürich 1970, 208-210; 221-224; ThLL III, 484,56ff., 488,3; DSp 2,439-443; GLNT XI, 1266-1338 (TDNT 7, 98-151); Lampe 1224-1226.

V. Loi - B. Amata

FLIGHT

I. Flight from persecution - II. Flight from the world.

I. Flight from persecution. According to the witness of the gospels, just as Jesus foretold his own passion (cf. Mt 16:21ff.; 17:13; 17:22-23, etc.), he also predicted *persecutions for his followers (cf. Mt 10:16ff.; Lk 12:8ff.; Jn 15:18ff., etc.) in terms such that this does not appear as an exceptional event for Christian communities. From the first centuries, how to act when faced with persecution had been discussed, and, as is natural, the figure and events of Christ and his first disciples were considered. At the beginning of his earthly life Jesus was removed from the danger of death and led by Joseph and Mary to Egypt (cf. Mt 2:14ff.); during his public ministry he distanced himself from those who wished to kill him (cf. Mt 14:13; Lk 9:10). Also in his speeches, he advised his disciples, when they were persecuted in one city, to flee to another (cf. Mt 10:23; 24:16, etc.). When he reached the moment of his passion, however, and was confronted with those who came to arrest him, he did not flee nor did he agree to be defended with violence (cf. Mt 26:47). The conduct and teaching of the Christians who belonged to the Great Church followed along these same lines. The apostles, including *Peter and *Paul, were forced to flee to escape the traps set by enemies (cf. Acts 9:29-30; 14:5-6; 17:10-15).

Similar cases were not lacking in later times. A little after the middle of the 2nd c., as the persecution grew more intense, *Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, accepted the counsel of those among his followers who insisted that he escape from the city until—face to face with those who had come to take him—he felt he had to stay in order that "the will of God be done" (cf. Mart. Pol. 7). In 177, in the face of the test that was about to engulf the community of *Lyons and *Vienne, in *Gaul, "the grace of God . . . allowed the weak to escape" (Eus., HE 5,1,5,6). The examples could be multiplied easily. It is sufficient to recall again the case of *Cyprian, bishop of *Carthage, who, after the promulgation of the general edict of Decius against the Christians (250), took refuge not far from the city, not without provoking criticism within his church, to which he responded himself: "If the crown is a gift of the goodness of God, it cannot be received except at the appointed hour. Whoever retreats for a time, while remaining faithful to Christ, does not deny his *faith, but awaits his hour" (De lapsis 10; consider also the defense of his conduct that his biographer *Pontius makes in the Vita Cypriani 7-8). It is not by chance, furthermore, that the edict of Decius foresaw the confiscation of goods for whoever fled. It is known that, a few years later, during the following persecution of *Valerian, the bishop of Carthage was first of all exiled and later martyred (258). Flight from persecution therefore was permitted, but certainly not imposed: its appropriateness depended on the circumstances, on the position that each person held in the community and above all on the discernment of the will of God.

Likewise important, e.g., are the words that Augustine addresses to his clergy in a letter of 428–429—years in which *Genseric, at the head of the *Arian *Vandals, had passed into Africa and had begun to vex the Christians: flight is permitted when the priestly ministry is not indispensable to the salus (the salvation) of the faithful, also for the purpose of preserving oneself to benefit the church in quieter times. If later it should be necessary to decide who must stay and who flee, "may the lot put an end to disputation" (Pr 18:18), because God judges better than humans (cf. Ep. 228,9ff.). Spontaneously offering oneself to the authorities is something the church discourages; in fact, acc. to the expressions of *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. IV, 10), the Lord does not want a person to be the cause of his own death nor of the crime committed by the one who persecutes and kills him. Such a disciplinary indication takes on its full meaning when one keeps in mind that in the first centuries persons were not lacking who, exalting martyrdom, reached the point of proposing it to the faithful as an obligation. An echo of such a position is found in the treatise of *Tertullian under the title De fuga in persecutione; there, contradicting the opinion expressed in the De patientia (13) and in the Ad uxorem (1,3), Tertullian maintains that flight from persecution is not licit because it conflicts with the will of God and becomes therefore a renunciation of God who sends persecution to confirm the faith of his followers (even if the devil has a hand in it).

In the light of this principle Tertullian rejects every objection, interpreting in a restrictive way the passages of the sacred *Scripture that oppose it. This idea is very much affected by the influence of *Montanism and also later will have success; the Great Church will continue to oppose it, considering flight from persecution illicit and cause of *sin only when it involves denying the faith or violating a duty.

H. Leclercq, s.v. Fuite de la persécution: DACL 5, 2660-2684. On the persecutions of the early centuries, in general, cf. J. Vogt, s.v. Christenverfolgung: RAC 2, 1159-1207; W.H.C. Frend, Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church, Oxford 1965; R. Freudenberger: TRE 8 (1981) 23-29 (within the borders of the Roman Empire) (bibl. on pp. 28-29.); K. Schäferdiek - R. Freudenberger: TRE 8 (1981) 29-35 (outside the Roman Empire, among the Goths, the Sassanids, the Arabs, the Islamics) (bibl. on pp. 34-35), s.v. Christenverfolgungen. On De fuga in persecutione of Tertullian: cf. I. Marra, critical ed., Turin 1932; J. Thierry, with intr., tr. into Flemish and comm., Tertullianus de fuga in persecutione, Hilversum 1941.

P. Siniscalco

II. Flight from the world. With the expressions fuga mundi, or fuga saeculi, the early Latin Christians understood the renunciation and separation from worldly goods for the purpose of encountering God in a more intense and exclusive manner. From a certain perspective, this conduct answers the essential challenges of the gospel message: "If anyone would come after me," Jesus says to his disciples, "let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me. For whoever would save his life will lose it, and whoever loses his life for my sake will find it. For what will it profit a man, if he gains the whole world and forfeits his life?" (Mt 16:24-26). One aspect therefore of the fuga mundi applies to all Christians, while other dimensions have to do with the environment of individual vocations, ever since ancient times. For an exhaustive treatment of the theme it would be necessary to begin from pre-Christian times, examining the relevamt evidence from the Greco-Roman world, the Jewish world and above all the sacred *Scripture; furthermore, it would be appropriate to consider the phenomena and conceptions concerning "flight from the world" in the patristic era both along a chronological line and in geographic areas, distinguishing East from West. For a profile of the theme, articulated in this way, see Alszeghy (Fuite du monde, DSp 5, 1575-1599; bibl. at coll. 1592, 1596, 1599). Here we will limit ourselves to identifying some traits of the ideal and practice of "flight from the world," as they are proposed in the first centuries of our era among the Christians. To understand their attitude in facing the mundus (κόσμος) it is perhaps useful to keep in mind a twofold distinction: the first (a) concerning the meaning attributed to the term "world"; the second (b) the meaning given to the term "flight," or better yet, "separation."

a. World indicates, among other things, the visible world, created by God, the great mass of the universe having an order and a harmony perceived by the eyes and the intelligence of human beings. But from the NT (cf., e.g., Jn 1:9-10; 14:30; Col 2:8, etc.), the word takes on a completely negative connotation: "this world" is opposed to "the world to come" and to "eternal life," and therefore becomes the name and symbol of that part of humanity that has forgotten the Creator and lives without any transcendent perspective; it is identified with idolatry, with *sin, with all that is different and distant from God. In this second sense, every Christian is called to flee the "world," acc. to the unanimous and incessant warning of the patristic writings. "Do not have Jesus Christ on the lips and the world in the heart," warns *Ignatius of Antioch in his letter to the Romans (7,1). A separation is therefore necessary from what is worldly; various figures, whether from the OT or imaginary, quickly became familiar in ancient Christian literature and assisted in making this necessity clear. Think of the people of Israel in pilgrimage in search of their homeland; think of the patriarchs, who were their leaders, "types" of a pilgrimage proposed to every person who wished to reach perfection. "Hear my prayer, Lord, . . . for I am an outsider, a stranger like all my fathers," says the psalmist (Ps 38:13), and Ambrose (De Abr. II, 62), one among the numerous voices who could just as well be cited, comments, "Anyone indeed who is a pilgrim, is a citizen of Heaven; anyone, on the other hand, who thinks to fix all the substance of the soul in this world and rejoices in the acquisition of earthly inheritance is excluded from the kingdom of God."

b. No less important for the reflection and for the discipline elaborated by the ecclesiastical pastors and writers of the first centuries is the meaning attributed to such a separation. In broad strokes, the common direction found upon investigating the texts is sufficiently homogeneous: although not denying the positive value of the world, as a creature of God, the Christian must be inwardly separated from it. One must not leave the world materially, but with the spirit, *Origen observes (In Exod. 3,3).

Some vocations demand also the material renunciation of goods; thus, particularly from the end of the 3rd c. on, the spiritual flight of the soul is realized also by seeking refuge in the desert. This explains the flowering of hermitism and of *cenobitism and the importance assumed by the monk in the religious world of the time. He was the example par excellence of one who has left the world with the body as well as with the heart, without forgetting the world, but being present to it in other ways.

The case of *Anthony, monk of the Egyptian desert, as presented by *Athanasius in the Vita Antonii, is emblematic in this regard. In this sense fleeing from the world acc. to the Christian vision is not purely natural, nor does it find its realization only in the effort of the individual; it is a supernatural event that is accomplished with the help of God and that begins with the mystical union of the person with Christ: this is a useful element to better evaluate similarities and differences between the Christian conception and the analogous *Platonic conception, and esp. the *Neoplatonic one (*Plotinus frequently affirms that the height of perfection consists in the fleeing of the individual toward the One: see, e.g., Enn. VI, 9,11; I, 6,6; V, 1,6 etc.).

At the end of 4th c., the golden age of patristics, *Augustine, particularly in the Confessions, distinguishes the terms mundus and saeculum in a meaningful way, assigning them to two different notional fields: the first to the field of space, the second to the field of time. If all Christians must renounce the "world of sin," none of them, not even the monk, must abandon the world inasmuch as it is created by God. The monk, rather, renounces a particular aspect of worldly life that is in itself legitimate. Under the urgent pressure of the *eschatological spirit, he does not apply himself to assure the development and the earthly fortune of the societies in which he may take part. "In this he follows Christ, not only in the intentions of the life of the Lord—things to which all are held—but also in his state of life: without taking a wife or fathering children, without hoping for a 'position' or a 'career,' without having possessions."

The monks, therefore, renounce only certain aspects of the life that passes through time (the Greek equivalent of saeculum is aiōn) (L.M.J. Venheijen, "Mundus" et "saeculum," 682); such renunciation, on the other hand, every Christian without distinction is called to realize—not an effective separation, but certainly an affective one.

RAC 1, 193-204 (Aiōn); DSp 5, 1575-1599. For the De fuga saeculi of Ambrose, see, among others, H. Savon, Saint Ambroise devant l'exégèse de Philon le Juif, I, Paris 1977, 329ff. and relevant notes, II, 145ff.; F. Martinez, L'ascétisme chrétien pendant les trois premiers siècles de l'Église, Paris 1913; H. Koch, Quellen zur Geschichte der Askese und des Mönchtums in der alten Kirche, Tübingen 1933; L.M.J. Verheijen, "Mundus" et "saeculum" dans les Confessions de Saint Augustin: SMSR 38 (1967) (= Studi in onore di A. Pincherle), 665-682; A.P. Orbán, Les dénominations du monde chez les premiers auteurs chrétiens, Nijmegen 1970; M. Ruiz Jurado, El concepto de "mundo" en los tres primeros siglos de la Iglesia: EstEcl 51 (1976) 79-94.

P. Siniscalco

FLOOD, Universal (iconography). While the episode of the flood (Gen 6–8) in ancient Christian art was most often depicted with the simple iconographical scheme of a human figure (*Noah) leaning half out of an ark—expressed most schematically as a square box—there were also more narrative formulations of the event, which sought to depict the unfolding of the action, and sometimes the setting of the cataclysm in a realistic and dramatic way. If we rule out a disputed mid-4th c. *painting in the catacomb of via D. Compagni at Rome (Nestori, 72, n. 2) in which some would see this episode (A. Ferrua, Le pitture della nuova catacomba di via Latina, Vatican City 1960, 47, pl. 93), the only figurative evidence of the flood in narrative schemes is found in biblical miniatures. This can be found in the Cotton Genesis (5th-6th c.), as we can gather from the narthex *mosaic of St. Mark's basilica, Venice, which punctiliously follows the lost miniature original (Bianchi Bandinelli, La composizione del diluvio, pl. 32,2); similarly, in the Ashburnham Pentateuch (7th c.; K. Weitzmann, Manuscrits gréco-romains et paléochrétiens, New York 1977, fig. 45); and finally, also and esp. in the Vienna Genesis (6th c.), where the spatiality of the composition—in which ark, people and animals are depicted in full perspective, swirling and dramatically immersed in the waters—has led to the suggestion of an archetype from the Hellenistic tradition in mural painting or in mosaic, datable to the 3rd c. AD (Bianchi Bandinelli, La composizione del diluvio, 66-77, pl. 30).

R. Bianchi Bandinelli, La composizione del diluvio nella Genesi di Vienna: MDAI(R) 62 (1955), 66-67 (see also Bandinelli, Archeologia e cultura, Rome ²1979, 328-343); L. Kötzsche Breitenbruch, Die neue Katakombe an der via Latina in Rom. Untersuchungen zur Ikonographie der alttestamentlichen Wandmalereien: JbAC Erg. 4 (1976) 51-54.

V. Fiocchi Nicolai

FLORENTIUS (1st half of 5th c.). Minister under *Theodosius II and then under *Marcian. He held the highest posts of the empire: in 422 he was named praefectus urbis Constantinopolitanae, then prefect of the praetorium of the East in the period 428–430 and again in 438–439. As imperial representative he participated in 448 and 449 in the permanent synod of *Constantinople and in 451 in the Council of *Chalcedon (ACO II, 1,1,55; 138-139; 145; 171; 175-176; 2,69; 85; 138).

PLRE II, Fl. Florentius 7, 478-480; DNP 4, Flavius Florentius 4, 565; A. Grillmeier - H. Bacht, Das Konzil von Chalkedon, II, Würzburg 1954, 214-216.

G. Pilara

FLORENTIUS of Strasbourg (6th c.). Probably of Gallic-Roman origin, Florentius was the successor of St. Arbogast in the see of Strasbourg in the last 3rd of the 6th c. and died 3 April. As a great missionary, it is said that he founded the monastery of St. Thomas in Strasbourg and the monastery of Niederhaslach next to Roman ruins. At first buried in the cloister of the future chapter of St. Thomas, he was later transferred to Niederhaslach 7 November 810, the day that became his liturgical feast day. The most ancient Vita was written after 1160 by a canon of Haslach (BHL 3045). Florentius had supposedly been a Scot who came with some disciples to Alsace to lead a hermitic life there.

BHL 3043-3046f; BS 5, 858-859; BBK 16, 496-497; M. Barth, Der heilige Florentius, Bischof von Strassburg, Strasbourg 1952.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

FLORIAN. There are two *martyrs with this name: one from Bologna, without any historical attachments, who is celebrated 17 December (BHL 3053b, 3053d); the other, of Lorch (Austria), is mentioned by the Mart. hier. 4 May. The report was enlarged probably during the Carolingian period on the basis of a passio of the same time which, almost certainly based on that of St. *Irenaeus of Sirmium, has Florian die during the *persecution of *Diocletian. The martyr Florian was then thrown in the river Enns with a stone around his neck (BHL 3054-3061). Recent excavations below St. Lawrence at Lorch have brought to light a tomb, probably belonging to the forty martyrs mentioned in the Passio of Florian; obviously these were already venerated in the 4th c.

BS 5, 934-940; BBKL 2, 64; LCI 6, 250-254; E. Tomek, Kirchengeschichte Österreichs 1, Innsbruck 1935, 30-32; R. Sörries, Frühchristliche Reliquienfunde und Wallfahrtsstätten im Alpen-Donau-Raum: Akten des XII. Internationalen Kongresses für Christliche Archäologie, Vatican City-Münster 1995, 1187-1188; R. Harreither, Der hl. Florian. Der einzige namentlich bekannte Martyrer in Noricum Ripense, in R. Bratoz (ed.), Westillyricum und Nordostitalien in der spätrömischen Zeit, Ljubljana 1996, 235-262; R. Zinnhobler, Der heilige Florian und seine Gefährten, in 1000 Jahre Ostarrîchi. Seine christliche Vorgeschichte, Innsbruck-Vienna 1997, 23-30.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

FLORIAN, abbot (5th-6th c.). The little information we have of him comes from two letters preserved in the collection Epistolae Austrasicae. Baptized by *Ennodius, disciple of *Caesarius of Arles (Ep. Austras. 5,4-5: CCL 117, p. 412), he entered into the monastery of Romenum, in Milanese territory, whose abbot Theodotus was his teacher in the comprehension of the *Scriptures. *Arator wrote him in 544 to praise his culture and his library (Ep. ad Florianum: CSEL 72, pp. 1-2); also Ennodius (d. 521) sent him letters (MGH AA 7, pp. 23-24). The two letters of Florian were directed to *Nicetius of Trier. The first requested prayers for his bishop Dacius of *Milan (d. 552); the second solicited an intervention with King Theobald, of Austrasia, to respect the oath made in his name with respect to the fideles of the island of Comacina. Perhaps a third letter to Nicetius (CCL 117, pp. 448-449) and an *epigram (cf. CPL 518) are also his.

CPL 518; 1059; 1504; Verzeichnis, 476; CPPM 2, 187; PL 72, 917; PL 45, 1857-1858; PL 51, 149-152; CCL 117, 413-416; MGH AA 7, LIX-LX (ep. 1), p. 116 ep. 3; DBI 48, 336-338; J. Jenal, Italia ascetica atque monastica, Stuttgart 1995, I, 144-156; P. Radiciotti, Note su Floriano: RFIC 126 (1998) 183-188; PCBE 2, 845-6.

A. Di Berardino

FLORILEGIA. The problems associated with the patristic florilegia are very complex. Not only are critical editions of many of them lacking, but also it is often difficult to establish their provenance and their influences. An ample introduction, very instructive in the field of the pre-Byzantine literature, is found in the now classic work of A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus im glauben der Kirche. Basing his work on the research of H. Chadwick and above all of M. Richard, the great expert of patristic *Christology presents the christological florilegia without completely ignoring other forms of the anthology. The following exposition will follow in his footsteps. Although bringing a minor simplification to the question, it is perhaps useful to begin from the distinction between dogmatic florilegia, spiritual florilegia and biblical *catena. Post-Chalcedonian authors adhere to the patristic tradition, including their treatment of other literary genres. Starting from this presupposition, Grillmeier refers to the catalogs of *heresies and the collections of definitions and aporias. Almost all the other literary forms could be added, including sermons (cf. B. Studer, Storia della Teologia, 583-598). In these writings, however, the citations are more or less exact, and are mostly presented without the name of the author. *John of Damascus, e.g., integrated into his Exposition of the Orthodox Faith long passages from his predecessors without specifying from where he took them. His work, despite being obviously of a compilatory character, is not therefore to be considered technically a patristic florilegia (against Grillmeier, 87). This article will discuss only florilegia proper; therefore catenae also will be omitted.

In dogmatic florilegia the compiler reunites a more or less considerable series of passages (testimonia), indicating their provenance explicitly (name of the author, title of the work, perhaps the chapter) to refute doctrinal errors and demonstrate the truths of the orthodox faith in virtue of the authority of the recognized authors. This literary genre had very deep roots (see *argumentation, patristic). From the beginning Christian life has been oriented by the *Tradition, a normative principle inherited from *Judaism and reinterpreted later in the light of the Greco-Roman cultural and religious traditions. This tradition, recognized quickly as apostolic, was brought little by little into relation with individuals endowed with a certain authority, or with the "ecclesiastic fathers" (*Eusebius), i.e., therefore, with the synodal fathers of *Nicaea. But only in the 4th c. was a theological method developed that leaned explicitly on the authority of the fathers, the so-called patristic argument. This evolution is explained not only by the exigencies of the *Arian controversy, but also by the influence of Judeo-Christian *exegesis and from common conventions in literary, philosophical and legal fields. The great promoters of this new theological method were, as is well known, Eusebius (HE 1,1,4), *Basil, *Augustine and *Cyril of Alexandria (cf. Graumann). The latter in particular is to be considered in this place, precisely because the later christological controversies, in which the patristic florilegia reached their perfection, in large measure turned his theology around. Cyril, in fact, was the principal pioneer of Eastern patristic argumentation. Inspired perhaps by a collection in which *Eusebius of Dorylaeum had reunited some texts of *Nestorius (CPG 5940), he composed five florilegia, four of which have been preserved. In one of these, the so-called Florilegium ephesinum presented to the participants at the Synod of *Ephesus, Cyril opposed the testimonies of the Fathers to the opinions of Nestorius in order to make Nestorius's heresies obvious (CPG 8675, 9). His florilegia constitute the basis for the *monophysite florilegia. The longest among these have been added to the writings that *Timothy Aelurus launched between 458 and 477 against the decisions of *Chalcedon (CPG 5475).

The Antiochene adversaries of Cyril immediately took up the weapon of the florilegia. *Theodoret added to his Pentalogos against Cyril a florilegium preserved only in Latin (CPG 6215). From a similar florilegium of *Andrew of Samosata only the list of names of the cited authors is known. Theodoret himself published in 447 in his Eranistes a larger florilegium, which became the basis for the *dyophysite florilegium (CPG 6217). In the Acts of the Council of Chalcedon this florilegium of Theodoret is found together with the first florilegium translated into Greek of *Leo I (CPG 9021; cf. also Leo, Ep. 165,10). The florilegia enlarged by Theodoret (CPG 6215) in defense of the council were published later, as well as a collection of citations of Cyril (ed. Hes-pel) which *Severus of Antioch examined critically and refuted in his Philalethes (CPG 7023) during his stay in Constantinople (508–511) (cf. A. Grillmeier 2/2, 21ff.; 28-31).

After the edict of *Zeno (482) the dogmatic florilegium was employed as the principal weapon of theological controversy both by monophysites and by dyophysites. But only one Alexandrian florilegium related to this period has been preserved. After 520 *Leontius of Byzantium and *Justinian gave life to florilegia independent of the preceding ones. Leontius added a florilegium to each of the three books Contra Nestorianos et Eutychianos (CPG 6813). These and other florilegia of Leontius had a great influence on later dyophysite florilegia, e.g., on that of De sectis (CPG 6823). The monophysite florilegia, on the other hand, have been preserved only in *Syriac. The most famous is that of Severus of Antioch (CPG 7023). In this new phase of the christological controversy, however, a methodological novelty is also encountered. The criticism of the received texts becomes more acute (cf. B. Studer, in Storia Teol. 586-587). On the one hand, ever more numerous florilegia appear compiled only secondhand; against this tendency Severus protested strongly, denouncing this often superficial use of patristic passages (cf. CPG 7022 and 7024). On the other hand, the most expert scholars of the time discussed the authenticity of the reported citations. The necessity of this criticism was imposed when certain *falsifications of the *Apollinarians were brought to light, which had already entered into the tradition of the florilegia before 500, a time in which they were generally composed on the basis of a personal reading of patristic texts. The most relevant criticism of these falsifications was attributed to Leontius of Byzantium, but does not belong to him (CPG 6817). The new conflicts in the 7th c. led to the composition of florilegia against the *monothelites. The largest is that composed around 646 by *Maximus the Confessor (CPG 7697, 15). Such antimonothelite florilegia were also used in the discussions held at the synods of the Lateran in 649 (cf. CPG 9402) and of Constantinople (cf. CPG 9429). Finally, the iconoclast controversy gave the occasion for a redaction of florilegia in favor of the veneration of images. Thus *John of Damascus completed all three discourses on *images with patristic florilegia (cf. CPG 8045).

In the 7th c. the attempt to present systematically all the doctrine of the faith with patristic citations finally appears. An author, who has remained anonymous up to today, but who without doubt was part of the environment of Maximus, published around the years 660–685 the Doctrina Patrum, which was later used by, among others, John of Damascus (cf. Kotter 1.2.4). In the West, however, collections of patristic testimonia are encountered that did not intend so much to demonstrate the validity of synodal decisions, as much as affirm that the Catholic exegetes had constantly preserved the true faith.

Augustine attests this form of recourse to the authority of the tractatores catholici in the two letters in which he discusses the vision of God (Ep. 147-8). More important is his fairly free method of referring to the patristic testimonia which he opposes to *Pelagius and his followers (cf. Nat. gr. 61,71; 65,78; C. ep. Pelag. IV, 10,27-11,31; C. Iul. II, 10,33-37: only names of authors, without texts). To defend his interpretation of biblical texts, esp. of passages from the letters to Romans and Galatians, Augustine bases himself above all on African and Roman traditions, represented by *Cyprian and *Ambrose. The spiritual florilegia of the Eastern tradition, on the other hand, which include explicit citations of the Bible, the Fathers and also of profane authors, were compiled with a view toward Christian life, *asceticism and spiritual progress; such florilegia, however, were composed only starting from the 8th c. (cf. M. Richard, DSp 475-6). Nevertheless, a first class, defined by Richard as "Damascene," constitute a later development of the Sacra Parallela, attributed precisely to John of Damascus. This three-part work on God, on man, and on *virtues and vices can be reconstructed from later florilegia and excerpta. In fact, collections of patristic sayings prior to the ascetic works elaborated after 800 should be mentioned (cf. B. Studer, in Storia Teol. 593-594). Thus, Antiochus, a monk of Mar Saba, wrote pandects in 150 kephalaia around 620, which, however, constitute rather a continuous exposition of spiritual themes of the Fathers (CPG 7843; cf. M. Richard, DSp 499). Someone after Maximus the Confessor composed the Capita de caritate, which presents numerous sayings of the Fathers, slightly modified (CPG 7693). John of Damascus, for his part, added a florilegium to his tract De sacris ieiuniis (CPG 8051). *John of Scythopolis, of the 1st half of the 6th c., left the first text of Scolii to the writings of ps.-*Dionysius (CPG 6852). Following his footsteps, Maximus the Confessor, in the Ambigua (CPG 7705) and in other writings, interpreted passages of the same ps.-Dionysius and of *Gregory of Nazianzus. This method of study adopted from the Fathers led quite naturally to the patristic florilegia of the 8th-9th centuries.

F. Diekamp (ed.), Doctrina Patrum de incarnatione Verbi. Ein griechisches Florilegium aus der Wende des 7. und 8. Jahrhunderts, Münster 1907, 2nd ed. 1981; M. Richard, Les florilèges diphysites du Ve et du VIe siècle, in Chalkedon I, Freiburg 1951, 721-748 (cf. the numerous other studies of the same author); M. Richard, Florilèges spirituels grecs: DSp 5 (1964) 475-512; H. Chadwick, Florilegium: RAC 7 (1969) 1131-1160; G.H. Ettlinger, Theodoret of Cyrus. Eranistes, Critical Text and Prolegomena, Oxford 1975; B. Kotter, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskus 3, PTS 17, Berlin 1975, 24-33; E. Mühlenberg, Griechische Florilegien: TRE 11 (1983) 215-219 (bibl.); A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche 2/1 and 2/2, Freiburg 1986 and 1989, 58-100; B. Studer, Una teologia patristica, in Storia della teologia, I (1993), 583-598; W. Speyer, Florilegium: LTK^3 3, 1330-1331 (bibl.); T. Graumann, Kirche de Väter. Vätertheologie und Väterbeweis in den Kirchen des Ostens bis zum Konzil von Ephesus (431), Tübingen 2002 (with bibl.); B. Studer, Die christliche Theologie des Eusebius von Cäsarea: Adamantius 10 (2004) 138-166.

B. Studer

FLORILEGIUM EDESSENUM ANONYMUM. Anti-*Nestorian Greek florilegium preserved only in a *Syriac redaction prior to 562. Probably composed a little after the Council of *Ephesus (431), it depends in large part on the Cyrillian florilegium De fide ad reginas and, in its present state, offers some parallels with the *florilegia cited by *Severus of Antioch.

I. Rucker, Florilegium Edessenum Anonymum (syriace ante 562) (= Sitzungsberichte Bayer. Akad. [1933] 5), Munich 1933.

S.J. Voicu

FLORINUS (2nd c.). Contemporary of *Irenaeus and his fellow student at the school of *Polycarp of Smyrna, he was later presbyter at Rome, where he adhered to the *Valentinian *heresy. According to the testimony of *Eusebius (HE 5,20,1-8), Irenaeus wrote a letter On the Monarchia, or that God is not the author of evil against him; and later, when Florinus became a follower of Valentinianism, another letter *On the Ogdoad. There exists furthermore a Syriac fragment of a letter of Irenaeus addressed to Pope *Victor (fr. XXVIII, in Sancti Irenaei episcopi lugdunensis libros quinque adversus haereses, ed. W. Wigan Harvey, Cambridge 1857, vol. II, 457), where Irenaeus asks the pope to take precautions against Florinus, whose writings were widespread in *Gaul and put at risk the faith of the Christians. From the title of the letters that Irenaeus wrote about him and from the brief mention of Agapius (Universal History, part II, in PO VII, 516-517) some elements of his theology can be reconstructed: Florinus probably shared the *gnostic doctrines on the origins of *evil and the Valentinian doctrine of the aeons and the primordial ogdoad, denying the unity of the three divine persons and the *resurrection of the dead. These few doctrinal elements do not allow Florinus to be linked with certainty to any known gnostic system, except generically to the Italian school of Valentinus.

A. Hilgenfeld, Die Ketzergeschichte des Urchristentums, Leipzig 1884 (facs. repr. Hildesheim 1963), 446-448; K. Kastner, Irenäus von Lyon und der römische Presbyter Florinus: Der Katholik 42 (1910), 40-54, 88-105; H. Koch, Tertullian und der römische Presbyter Florinus: ZNTW 13 (1912) 59-83; K. Kastner, Zur Kontroverse über den angeblichen Ketzer Florìnus: ibid., 133-156; E. Fliedner, Die ketzergeschichtlichen Angaben des Agapius und das System des Florìnus, diss., Münster 1942. Bibliographic index: D.M. Scholer, Nag Hammadi Bibliography. 1948–1969; vol. 2: 1970–1994; vol. 3: 1995–2006, Leiden 1971, 1997, 2009; M.J. Edwards, Gnostics and Valentinians in the Church Fathers: JTS 40 (1989) 26-47.

C. Gianotto

FLORUS of Hadrumetum (d. after 418). A monk of the monastery of *Hadrumetum (5th c.). Together with his friend Felix he visited Uzalis, his birthplace near Utica, where he was able to read Augustine's letter 194, written in 418 to a Roman priest, the future Pope *Sixtus III. From Uzalis he went to *Carthage, while his friend Felix returned to Hadrumetum, carrying with him the letter of *Augustine (Ep. 216,2). The letter of Augustine, read without the knowledge of the abbot Valentinus, provoked differing opinions and disagreements in the monastery on the problem of *grace (Ep. 216,3; 214,6). To resolve the questions and restore peace, Augustine wrote De gratia et libero arbitrio (Retr. II, 6), a work that he sent to Hadrumetum together with letters 214 and 215. Sometime later Florinus proceeded to *Hippo (Ag., Ep. 215,8; 215 A), carrying a letter from Valentinus, which narrated the origin of the agitation in Hadrumetum; Augustine then responded with letter 216.

PCBE 1, 478-9; BA 24, Paris 1962; NBA 20; V. Grossi, La crisi antropologica nel monastero di Adrumeto: Augustinianum 19 (1979) 103-133; M. Vessey, Opus imperfectum; Augustine and His Readers, 426–435 A.D.: VChr 52 (1998) 264-285.

E. Romero Pose

FOOT WASHING. A baptismal rite practiced in the *Quartodeciman communities who followed the Johannine observance, in polemic against the *baptism by total immersion whose origin they trace to *John the Baptist, a view strongly held in the communities of Petrine and Synoptic origin (Jn 13:10: whoever receives baptism by foot washing does not need to wash the head and hands also). Through this rite it is affirmed that the active principle of baptismal purification does not consist in the physical element of the water, but in service to the self-humiliation of the crucified Messiah who founds the community on reciprocal love. In the Syriac East the memory of the original baptismal meaning of the foot washing survived for a long time (Aphraates, Dem. XII: De Paschate; Cyrillona, Hymn on the Washing of the Feet, etc.), despite the normal practice of baptism by immersion. In contrast, the baptismal ritual of the foot washing was transplanted into the West by the Johannine Quartodeciman mission originating out of Asia. For *Irenaeus of Lyons (Adv. haer. IV, 22,1), the Savior purified the just who departed during the descensus ad inferos by conferring on them the sacrament of baptism through foot washing, an affirmation that presupposes on his part the knowledge and practice of this rite within the Quartodeciman tradition of Johannine origin defended by him in the letter to *Victor of Rome (Eus., HE 5,24,11-18).

After the long silence of the sources for the entire 3rd c., it is possible to follow directly the evolution of the rite in the West from the 4th c. onward. At Aquileia, it was placed immediately before baptism (Chrom., Sermo XV), while from all other testimonies it appears as one of the various postbaptismal rites. In the 4th c. the understanding of the baptismal value of the foot washing entered definitively into crisis, to the point that the Council of *Elvira decreed its abolition (can. 48). At *Milan, around 390, *Ambrose had to justify the existence of this rite in the eyes of those who, based on the Roman baptismal practice, which has no provision for it, intended to abolish it or to practice it as a simple gesture of *hospitality (De Sacr. III, 1,4-7); for Ambrose the foot washing fulfilled the specific function of purifying the *neophyte from original *sin, in contrast to the purification from personal sins which one expected from baptismal washing (De Myst. 6,32; In psalm. 48,8-9). According to *Augustine, in contrast, the foot washing had nothing to do with the sacrament of baptismal regeneration, but was simply the example of supreme *humility left by the Lord to his disciples (Ep. 55,18,33; Virg. 32,32; In psalm. 92,3). In particular, in foot washing we must see the mystery of the sacrifice of the *cross which allows the penitential remission of the inevitable postbaptismal daily sins (In evang. Ioh. 55-58).

The influence of both Augustine and the monastic tradition, which saw foot washing as exclusively an act of hospitality and humility (John Cass., Inst. IV, 19,2; Reg. Bened. 53,13-15, etc.) conditioned the interpretation of the postbaptismal foot washing in the Celtic and Gallican area in the early medieval centuries (Caes. of Arles, Serm. 64,2; 204,3, etc.; ps.-Max. of Turin, Sermo de baptismo III; Missale Gothicum, Missale Gallicanum vetus, Missale Bobbiense, Stowe Missal). In some churches the postbaptismal foot washing slid to the week of the octave, Tuesday or Sunday (ps.-Fulg., Sermones IV de pedibus lavandis), but in the end it irreversibly disappeared due to the upper hand taken by the new rite of foot washing observed on Maundy Thursday.

The non-Quartodeciman Greek tradition, stretching from *Clement of Alexandria (Paed. II, 38,1 and II, 63,2) to the exegetes of the Antiochene school, considered foot washing as the supreme example of the Master's humility and love and as preparation of the *apostles for the evangelical mission. *Origen, through the allegorical-moral reading, had reached the point of interpreting it as the mystery of the purification of the feet of the soul and the interior man (cf. Comm. in Joh. XXXII). In the Eastern churches such as *Alexandria, *Jerusalem, *Antioch and *Constantinople, the baptismal rite of foot washing had never been practiced; this, coupled with Greek *exegesis, brought about the new foot washing rite on Maundy Thursday as a substitute for and competitor with baptismal foot washing. Born in the cathedral liturgy of the holy city not before the end of the 5th c. (Georgian Lectionary in CSCO 189, 92 and 205, 100-101), this rite on Maundy Thursday spread rapidly from Jerusalem to Byzantium (Cod. Barber. Vat. graec. 336 of the 8th c.) and the West, where it appears attested very early in Spain (Counc. Toledo XVII of 694, can. 3) and at Rome, in the papal liturgy of the Lateran, around 700, as is clear from the Ordo edited by A. Chavasse in RHE 50 (1955) 21-35. From Rome the rite spread in turn throughout the entire Latin West starting from the end of the 8th c. on in the wave of liturgical Romanization inaugurated by Pippin the Short and Charlemagne.

Th. Schäfer, Die Fusswaschung im monastischen Brauchtum und in der lateinischen Liturgie, Beuron 1956; H. Giess, Die Darstellung der Fusswaschung Christi in den Kunstwerken des 4.-12. Jahrhunderts, Rome 1962; G. Richter, Die Fusswaschung im Johannesevangelium. Geschichte ihrer Deutung, Regensburg 1967; M.A. Argal Echarri, El lavatorio des los pies y el pecado original en san Ambrosio, in El pecado original. XXIX Semana Española de teología, 15-19 Sept. 1969, Madrid 1970, 141-159; B. Kötting, Fusswaschung: RAC 8, 743-777; P.F. Beatrice, Tradux peccat. Alle fonti della dottrina agostiniana del peccato originale, Milan 1978, 181-185; Id., Due nuovi testimoni della lavanda dei piedi in età patristica. Cromazio di Aquileia e Severiano di Gabala, in Ecclesia orans. Mélanges A. Hamman (Augustinianum 20/1-2), Rome 1980, 23-54; Id., La lavanda dei piedi. Contributo alla storia delle antiche liturgie cristiane, Rome 1983; B. Kleinheyer, Sakramentliche Feiern I. Die Feiern der Eingliederung in die Kirche, Regensburg 1989, 74-76; J.C. Thomas, Footwashing in John 13 and the Johannine Community (JSNTSup 61), Sheffield 1991; P.F. Bradshaw, The Search for the Origins of Christian Worship, London [2]2002; P.F. Beatrice, John 13,1-10 and Romans 13,1-7 in Irenaeus of Lyons. Two Test Cases for New Testament

Textual Criticism, in J.K. Elliott - C.B. Amphoux (eds.), The New Testament Text in Early Christianity. Proceedings of the Lille Colloquium, July 2000 (Histoire du Texte Biblique 6), Lausanne 2003, 369-386; M. Simonetti, Origene esegeta e la sua tradizione, Brescia 2004, 191-201.

P.F. Beatrice

FOREKNOWLEDGE. The ability to know in advance (προγινώσκειν) future events was, for Greek authors, an ability of human intellect. The noun "foreknowledge" (in Greek πρόγνωσις) had its most proper context in the medical vocabulary, in the sense of prognosis, i.e., foresight about the course an illness would take by observing the patient, even if it was then extended to the astrological meaning, as the prognosis of a person's destiny or an event's outcome (cf., *Tatian, Speech to the Greeks 1,1). The Greek OT began the theological meaning of the substantive and the verb, using them to refer to the foreknowledge that *God has of historic events (Jdth 8:6 LXX; the same in Wis 8:8, where the subject is divine wisdom), but also the knowledge of the future that a person can have through divine revelation (Jdth 11:6 LXX; likewise in Wis 18:6). In Wis 6:13 one reads that divine wisdom precedes in knowledge all those who desire it and, therefore, here the objects of foreknowledge are certain individuals. In the NT, the noun appears twice. In Acts 2:23, it was used to emphasize that God already knew that the Jews would receive Jesus with hostility, to the point of seizing him and effecting his death, which is nonetheless included in God's salvific and providential plan. In 1 Pet 1:2, God's foreknowledge is the reason for the election of believers who were thus chosen because they were known beforehand. With respect to the New Testament's use of the verb, in 1 Pet 1:20 it refers to Christ's salvific mission, known by God already before the foundation of the world; elsewhere, it expresses the eternal knowledge that God has of those who would follow Christ (Rom 8:29). Israel has also benefited from this prior knowledge (Rom 11:2), which in a certain way has the characteristics of an election. Other uses can be found in Acts 26:5 and 2 Pet 3:17. These are less technical uses and can therefore be overlooked in this entry.

In 2 Clem. 9:9 mention is made of God's foreknowledge, which knows the heart of the human being; *Hermas maintained that since the Lord knew beforehand his creatures' weakness, he established a time of repentance (Mand. 4,3,4), and the difficulty of this weakness was revealed to Hermas because, by recognizing it beforehand, he could prepare himself to endure it (Sim. 7,5). For *Justin Martyr, God knows in advance what will occur and it is precisely this understanding that creates the possibility of prophecies (1 Apol. 44,11; Dial. 95,2; 135,4); even Christ benefited from this prior knowledge (Dial. 35,7; 82,1); the spirit of foreknowledge has been poured out moreover on certain Christians (Dial. 39,2). God's foreknowledge should not be understood, however, in a necessitating sense: God knows that some people, who were known beforehand, will believe (1 Apol. 45,1), although others become reprobate on account of their free choice without God being held responsible in any way (Dial. 140,4). God's foreknowledge does not contradict human *freedom (1 *Apol.*43,1-8), but in a certain sense comes to its aid: God in fact waits to carry out the last judgment precisely to give many the opportunity to benefit from his delay in punishing (1 Apol. 28,2). For *Clement of Alexandria, foreknowledge is an appropriate definition for prophecy understood as anticipated knowledge (Strom. II, 12,54,1). *Revelation has an aspect of anticipated knowledge of the future that is able to awaken hope in awaited blessings (Strom. 8,1,5,2).

For *Origen, the idea that God knows events before these occur is a principle inherent in the very notion of God, substantiated by the prophecies contained in sacred *Scripture (Phil. 23,4). The fact that God knows in advance the choices and the outcomes of human deeds does not in any way compromise the freedom of these people: Origen explained it by taking the example of Judas's betrayal and the case of Laius, the father of Oedipus: the former was able to not betray his friend and the latter was able to not beget a child; far from determining their choices, the prophecies concerning them only declared in advance what their choices would be (C. Celsum 2,20; Phil. 23,8; see also In Rom. 8,23). God's foreknowledge, therefore, does not intervene to cause people to perish, but can act in view of their improvement by allowing sinners, after having tolerated the evil, to be healed more radically and permanently (Princ. 3,1,13; 3,1,17): this happened to the pharaoh about whom one reads in Exodus and concerning whom Paul spoke in Rom 9:17-18 (Princ. 3,1,13-14).

Using the light of foreknowledge, Origen proceeded to interpret certain scriptural passages that could lend themselves to a *predestinarian-determinist reading; among these were Rom 1:1 (Paul's calling) and Rom 8:28-30 (the election of Christians). God chooses those whose inclinations toward the *good he knew in advance. This foreknowledge of God can have as its object those who must still come into the world (Phil. 25; In Rom. 1,3) or rather the one who is already living and dedicates himself with such passion to fulfill the good so that he merits election from God (In Rom. 7,7). With this interpretation, Origen, in a way not unlike Justin Martyr, resolved the crucial problem of the relationship between God's foreknowledge and human free action. Origen's solution was destined to have great success in the ancient church and to provide a guideline for the interpretation of biblical passages that would lead one to suspect a sort of predeterminism of the saved. Among these biblical passages is Rom 9:10-13, in which Paul spoke of Jacob's election and Esau's rejection, which Origen interpreted along the aforementioned lines (In Rom. 13,15 to be read in connection with In Rom. 7,7-8; it is established, however, that elsewhere Origen explained God's actions by making reference to the merits acquired by the two brothers before their souls acquired a body, Princ. 3,1,22). Against every form of *gnostic determinism, *Jerome adopted a position not unlike the one expressed in Origen's commentary (In Gal. 1,1,13-14), and *Ambrosiaster (In Rom. 8,29; 9,11) and *Pelagius did the same (In Rom. 8,28; 9,10-12). The Liber de induratione cordis Pharaonis (CPL 729), an anonymous Pelagian text, fully developed terms already seen in Origen's work to demonstrate that one should in no way think that divine foreknowledge abolishes human freedom.

*Augustine's conviction that foreknowledge was the cause of election led to an important development. In a text written in 394, he adopted a position along the lines of those explained by Origen above (Exp. quar. Prop. ex ep. ad Rom. 47; 53; acc. to the enumeration of PL 55; 61). Nevertheless, Augustine, in a work written shortly thereafter, expressed a slightly different idea: all people are equally sinners, and no one could merit anything unless God's mercy had not come to their rescue by first of all calling them. The call of some over others, then, is something that remains inexplicable to people, even if it corresponds to God's hidden and just design (De div. Quaest. 83, q. 68, 5-6). Lastly, in a document written in 397, Augustine completely rejected the idea that God chose Jacob in view of his virtue and rejected Esau because of his future wickedness: foreknown merits do not cause someone's election, but it is the fact of being chosen and the act of responding willingly to this election that causes one to attain merit (De div. Quaest. ad Simpl. 1,2).

GLNT 2, 532-535 (TWNT 1, 715-716); M. Simonetti, Origene. I principi, Turin 1968; A. Colonna, Origene. Contro Celso, Turin 1971; E. Junod, Origène. Philocalie 21-27, SC 226, Paris 1976; A. Monaci Castagno, L'idea di preesistenza delle anime e l'esegesi di Rm 9, 9-21, in H. Crouzel - A. Quacquarelli, eds., Origeniana Secunda. Second colloque des études origéniennes, Bari 1980; F. Cocchini, Origene. Commento alla lettera ai Romani, Casale Monf. 1985; J.R. Díaz Sánchez-Cid, Justicia, pecado y filiación. Sobre el comentario de Orígenes a los Romanos, Toledo 1991; N. Cipriani, L'autonomia della volontà nell'atto di fede, in Il mistero del male e la libertà possibile. Linee di antropologia agostiniana. Atti del VI seminario del Centro Studi Agostiniani di Perugia, SEA 48, Rome 1995.

G. Caruso

FORGIVENESS. Forgiveness is a distinctive feature in Christianity, although it was not appreciated as much in the *pagan world, in which pity and mercy were considered more important. Both in the New Testament and in patristic authors it is a theme that receives much attention. In the New Testament, in Lk 17:3-4, Jesus says, "If your brother sins, rebuke him, but if he repents [μετανοήσῃ], forgive [ἄφες] him. And if he sins seven times a day against you and for seven times he returns to you, saying, 'I repent [μετανοῶ],' you will forgive [ἀφήσεις] him." Forgiveness depends on the offender's repentance and its manifestation to the offended person. Matthew 18:23-35 also shows both human and divine forgiveness as conditional: here, the servant who had his debt forgiven/canceled by his master upon his supplications (18:27) is condemned because he did not forgive a debtor when the latter supplicated him. God's forgiveness depends on human forgiveness: "So will my heavenly Father do, too, if you do not forgive your brother" (18:35).

The *parable of the prodigal son in Lk 15, one of those most clearly intended to show divine forgiveness, emphasizes the son's repentance, expressed to his father: "Father, I have sinned against heaven and you: I am unworthy of being called your son" (15:18-19 and 21). Repentance is also a requirement of forgiveness in the parable of the lost sheep, equated with a "repenting sinner," as opposed to the "ninety-nine righteous who need no repentance" (Lk 15:7). In the third parable in Lk 15 the lost drachma is a symbol of a "sinner who repents" (Lk 15:10). In the final mission of the apostles in Lk 24:47, "repentance and forgiveness of sins [ἄφεσις ἁμαρτιῶν] will be preached to all people." Forgiveness must be preceded by repentance. Similarly, in Lk 7:36-50, Jesus declares that a woman's sins are forgiven after she has manifested repentance by crying. Likewise, in 1 Jn 1:9 forgiveness of sins depends upon one's acknowledgment of them: "if we recognize our sins . . . he will forgive [ἄφῇ] our sins." The repentance–forgiveness scheme also appears in Mk 1:4 and Lk 3:3 in reference to John the Baptist, who announces "a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness [ἄφεσιν] of sins." The same sequence is in Mk 4:12: "that they may repent/convert and be forgiven." And in Acts 5:31, in a speech before the Sanhedrin, Peter explains that God sent Jesus and exalted him in order to "give Israel repentance and forgiveness [ἄφεσιν] of sins." Forgiveness always presupposes repentance. In Lk 6:37 and Mt 7:1-5 Jesus again places a condition on our being forgiven: we shall be forgiven if we forgive, we shall not be judged and condemned if we do not judge and condemn. This too indicates that forgiveness is not regarded as unconditional. Likewise, in Lk 11:4 the *Lord's Prayer includes the following passage addressed to the Father: "forgive [ἄφες] our sins [ἁμαρτίας], because we too forgive all our debtors." The parallel in Mt 6:12 has ὀφειλήματα instead of ἁμαρτίας. Here, too, forgiveness has a precise condition: that we forgive in turn. This is stressed in Jesus' words explaining the prayer in Mt 6:14-15: "If you forgive people their sins, your heavenly Father will forgive you too, but if you don't forgive them, neither will your Father forgive your sins." Similarly, in Mk 11:25 forgiving people is the condition of being forgiven by God.

In Lk 23:34, Jesus on the cross exclaims: "Father, forgive them [ἄφες αὐτοῖς], because they do not know what they are doing." All modern versions translate "Father, forgive them," and ancient versions such as Syriac, Coptic and Latin use a verb that, like ἀφίημι, can mean "forgive," but also much else. The difficulty is that Jesus asks God to "forgive" his killers by adducing that they are unaware of what they are doing. But this rules out any culpability, which would also exclude forgiveness. Jesus here is not speaking of forgiveness proper, since ignorance excludes awareness, recognition of guilt, and repentance. Rather, he means "do not even impute this to them; do not impute any responsibility to them." This is confirmed by the words of *Stephen, whose martyrdom imitates Jesus' death: In Acts 7:60—remarkably another Lukan narrative—just before dying his words echo Jesus' words, but with a significant change in the verb: "Lord, do not impute to them [μὴ στήσῃς αὐτοῖς] this *sin." The Vulgate does not use dimittere, its standard verb for "to forgive," but renders Domine, ne statuas illis hoc peccatum, "Lord, do not impute to them this sin." Likewise, the Peshitta renders: "do not impute to them (this sin)." The negative form μὴ στήσῃς exactly corresponds to the positive imperative ἄφες in Lk 23:34, where it means, not "forgive" (as the offenders are unaware of their sin), but "do not impute." Both Jesus' and Stephen's words mean, "Lord, do not count this act as a sin of theirs." Moreover, Jesus' words in Lk 23:34a are present only in a part of the MS tradition, so that, e.g., Nestle and Aland rejected them as a subsequent addition. I think that v. 34a was present in the original edition of Luke and was subsequently dropped, from the 3rd c. onward, in a part of the tradition, as is confirmed by at least two intentional echoes of it in Luke-Acts. One is in the aforementioned invocation in Acts 7:8, where Stephen, imitating Jesus, asks God not to impute his death to his killers. The other is in Peter's Jerusalem speech in Acts 3:17, yet another Lukan text, where, like Jesus, Peter affirms that those who caused Jesus' death did not know what they were doing: "Now, brothers, I know that you have acted out of ignorance, just as your leaders did." Peter insists on the fact that the Jerusalem people and chiefs caused Jesus' death also in other passages (Acts 2:23, 36; 3:13-15; 4:10; 5:30). Likewise, in Acts 13:27-28, another Lukan text, Paul declares that the Jerusalem people and leaders caused Jesus' death, and that they did so out of ignorance, in that they did not realize who Jesus was: "because they ignored [ἀγνοήσαντες] his identity, they condemned him." This confirms that the author of Acts drew on Jesus' words from the gospel, "they are unaware of what they are doing."

Peter repeats that they acted out of ignorance; therefore, they were not responsible. But now that they have learned the truth and are aware of what they did (see, e.g., Acts 2:37), because of this awareness, he exhorts them to repent, and at the same time guarantees that their repentance will produce God's forgiveness (Acts 2:38; 3:19-21, 25; 5:31). Thus, here too forgiveness depends on repentance. In Acts 3:20-26 Peter even presents repentance as the premise of the universal restoration (ἀποκατάστασις πάντων) that will be a consequence of the forgiveness of sins and that is also described as "the comfort and consolation coming from the Face of the Lord" (3:21) and the fulfillment of God's promise to Abraham, to bless "all the families of the world" in his progeny (3:25). This eschatological perspective corresponds to Paul's prophecy in Rom 11:26 that in the eschatological times "the totality of the gentiles will enter and the whole of Israel will be saved." Again, this is connected to the remission of sins: in v. 27 God says, "I shall remove their sins." The repentance–forgiveness scheme is repeated in another speech of Peter's: "Repent and pray the Lord that he may forgive you this thought" (Acts 8:22).

The Fathers generally understood forgiveness as closely related to divine *grace, but not as unconditional, whether it comes from God or from humans. A core role in their reflection on forgiveness was played by their soteriological and eschatological issues.

Among the so-called Apostolic Fathers, 1 Clement 8 is wholly devoted to repentance and quotes scriptural passages in which the Lord grants forgiveness to those who have repented (Ezek 33:11; other sections from Ezek 33; Is 1:16-20); in 1 Clement 9 the author goes on to say that in this way it is also possible to ask for God's mercy. Repentance is a prerequisite of forgiveness. In Phil. 3, *Ignatius urges the leaders of the community to forgive the repenting sinners: "I therefore exhort you in the Lord to receive with tenderness those who repent and return to the unity of the church." For "to all those who repent the Lord grants forgiveness [ἀφίει], if they repent returning to the unity of God and communion with the bishop" (8). Likewise, in Smyrn. 5, regarding some heretics, he says: "Be it far from me to make any mention of them, until they repent." Forgiveness rests upon repentance. Still in the 2nd c., *Justin in 1 Apol. 61,6-7 explains that the Lord forgives those who repent, quoting Is 1:16-20 (already employed by Clement of Rome): "How those who have sinned and repent will escape their sins, is declared by Isaiah the prophet . . . : 'Wash, make yourself clean; put away the evil of your doings from your *souls; learn to do well; judge the fatherless, and plead for the widow: and then come and let us reason together, says the Lord. And even if your sins be as scarlet, I shall make them white like wool. . . . But if you refuse and rebel, the sword will devour you.'"

Those who do not repent are not forgiven. Also in Dial. Tryph. 95, Justin declares that forgiveness depends on repentance: "If, indeed, you repent of your sins, and recognize this person to be Christ, and observe his commandments, then . . . forgiveness [ἄφεσις] of sins will be yours." The same concept is repeated in Dial. Tryph. 108. In 141, 2-3 Justin is adamant that those who do not repent cannot obtain forgiveness: "if they repent, all those who wish can obtain mercy [ἐλέους] from God . . . whoever repents of his sins will receive forgiveness [ἄφεσιν] of sins from God. But if even to such a man [i.e., King David] no forgiveness [ἄφεσις] was granted before repentance . . . how can the impure and utterly abandoned hope that the Lord will not take their sin into account, if they do not weep, mourn, and repent?"

*Clement of Alexandria attaches great importance to forgiveness, including interpersonal forgiveness, so to make of it an essential feature of the "gnostic," i.e., the perfect Christian, in Strom. 7,13,81: "He never remembers those who have sinned against him, but forgives them. Wherefore also he righteously prays, saying, 'Forgive us; for we too forgive.' For this also is one of the things which God wishes, to covet nothing, to hate no one. For all humans are the work of one will." The perfect Christian will forgive because he or she will hate no one, in that God wanted all human beings to exist. The idea of the unity of all humanity in Clement is essential, as it will be in *Origen and, with particular emphasis, in *Gregory of Nyssa. Clement emphasizes God's forgiveness, too. He states that there is no place where divine mercy is not active: its providential activity is always present, in heaven, on earth and even in hell, where repentance and conversion can still occur: "The Savior, in sum, is always active, because his own work is to save. And this he did precisely by drawing to salvation those who wanted to believe in him, thanks to preaching, wherever they were found. . . . They repented, converted and believed, even though they were imprisoned in hell. . . . God is good and able to save, with impartial justice, those who repent and convert, in this world or elsewhere; for it is not only on this earth that God's active power extends, but it is everywhere," even in hell (Strom. 6,6,45-47).

Divine *providence and forgiveness are clearly not considered by Clement to be unconditional, but they respond to, and at the same time elicit, a moral improvement on the part of humans. For punishment itself serves God's purpose of purifying and improving humans (Strom. 7,13,81); punishment and suffering are inflicted by God "for an education that is salvific" (cf. Strom. 7,10,56,4-5). Clement has a strongly therapeutic and pedagogical conception of God's salvific oikonomia. Conversion and repentance must be voluntary to elicit God's forgiveness, but are strongly favored by the pedagogical and therapeutic action of Christ-Logos, who is teacher and physician, and "almost compels people to salvation out of an excess of goodness" (Strom. 7, 14,86,6).

According to Origen, De or. 8,1, "it is impossible to obtain the forgiveness of one's sins by praying if one has not heartily forgiven the sibling who has offended him or her and now asks to be forgiven." In 9,1 Origen insists that, when one prays, one should raise "pure hands" in that one should "forgive each of his or her offenders." In 28,7, he extensively quotes Mt 18:23-35: "Therefore, we must forgive [ἀφετέον] those who have sinned against us, at least if they declare that they repent. And this, even if our debtor should do so many times. For Jesus says, 'If he sins against you seven times a day, and for seven times he returns to you, saying, I repent, you will forgive him'" (Lk 17:3-4). Origen, immediately after, tackles the question of what to do with those who have offended us but do not repent. He does not recommend forgiving them, but correcting them; if they persist in refusing to be corrected, the fault would be with them. All hints offered by Clement were developed by Origen, whose *eschatology is pivotal in his thought and is all based on forgiveness and grace, two closely related concepts in his view. Basing himself on Rom 6:23, Origen emphasizes that eternal life, i.e., salvation, is a free gift from God, which will be bestowed upon all in the end, when all, after *purification, healing and instruction, will voluntarily adhere to the *Good, i.e., God.

Justice will be realized in punishments in the next world, grace in blessedness and eternal life. Punishments will be commensurate with one's sins in this life (Comm. in Rom. 22,11), and therefore will be limited, but eternal blessedness, which is participation in divine life and ultimately a theōsis, cannot be commensurate with one's merits, but is a work of God's grace, and has no limit and no end (Comm. in Rom. 3,1,155-175). Origen expounds Paul's claim—that as all became culpable in *Adam, so will all be justified in Christ (Rom 5:18-19), that God made all culpable to bestow mercy upon all (Rom 11:32), and that Christ assumed all of humanity and died for all when all were still sinners (Rom 5:8-9)—to emphasize that salvation and blessedness are due to divine grace, not to anyone's merits. But Origen ascribes a crucial importance to human free will and is far from thinking that the final restoration will entail God's forgiveness of anyone without conversion. To reach eternal blessedness, all will have to be purified, healed and illuminated. Once their intellectual sight is made clean, all will voluntarily reject *evil, which will thus disappear, and adhere to the Good-God, entering eternal blessedness. Origen indeed stresses that conversion is necessary for anyone to obtain forgiveness from God, and that obedience toward the Good will not mean a forced submission, but the knowledge of the Good and the spontaneous obedience to it through love. In fact, Origen explicitly identifies the universal submission to Christ foretold in 1 Cor 15:24-28 with universal salvation (e.g., in Princ. 1,6,1; Commentary on John 6,295-296). This is the only way of interpreting this submission "in a way worthy of the goodness of the God of the universe" and of "God's lamb, who takes up the sin of the world." Violence and compulsion would be unworthy of God.

He comments on the Lord's Prayer (De or. 18-21), quoting, in his philological sensitivity, the verse on forgiveness in both Matthew's and Luke's versions. We are always indebted in many ways to many, he argues, so we should remit the debts of our debtors, remembering that we are much more indebted to others and to God. If we can remit the sins of our debtors, it is because we imitate God who, properly, is the only one who has the power of remitting sins. Origen ascribes importance to repentance and to its expression by words and/or tears. Tears of repentance are good in that repentance leads to forgiveness and hence salvation. Examples abound. Through repentance, sinners are forgiven and come to life. Those who will be confined to the "outer darkness," hell, will desire the light and repent, praying God to rescue them from there (Comm. in Matth. 17,24). Thus, God will cast them into hell that they may repent and ask for divine help. According to Fr. in I Cor. 24, God will separate the sinners from the good in the next world, so that they may not spread their contagion among all, but will also cure them, having them repent. Theirs will be a therapeutic and pedagogical suffering: what will be consumed will be their "fleshly way of thinking," whereas their soul will be healed.

A central feature of Origen's thought on repentance and forgiveness is his dynamic conception of moral progress in each rational creature and in history. He rejected the Stoic idea of *aeons that cyclically repeated themselves, with identical behaviors in the same people (C. Cels. 4,12; 4,67-68; 5,20; De princ. 2,3). For him, history is in progress and points to one telos: the apokatastasis*, when the sequence of aeons will cease and "all beings will be no more in an aeon, but God will be all in all" (De princ. 2,3,5). Origen sees this progression realized in the attainment of God's likeness as a result of moral progress. This conception of moral progress, again, points to a close link between Origen's conception of forgiveness and his *soteriology and eschatology.

In early Christianity, the connection between repentance and forgiveness is clear, esp. thanks to the sacrament of penance or reconciliation, which was public. The offender had to publicly manifest his or her repentance. The connection between repentance, penitence and forgiveness was crucial to the controversies about the lapsi and libellatici who, after *Decius's *persecution in AD 250, asked to be readmitted into the church, and often were recommended by confessores. *Cyprian's epistles are the main source of our information. He advised that, after the end of the persecution, each case would have to be evaluated separately, acc. to the seriousness of each one's sins. In his De lapsis (AD 251) he stresses the different degrees of culpability, and states that the lapsi should be readmitted into the church after proportionate public penances, recommending *prayer, grieving, *fasting, *almsgiving, tears of contrition and all manifestations of repentance aiming at the attainment of forgiveness. This position is confirmed by many passages of Cyprian's letters as well. He also knew the works of *Tertullian, who devoted a whole treatise to repentance in AD 203 in which he allowed for repentance, public penance and forgiveness also after *baptism, emphasizing the link between repentance and forgiveness. In chapter 8 Tertullian underlines that the Lord is willing to forgive those who repent.

The idea that repentant lapsi should be forgiven after a public penance was rejected by the *Novatians who, after Decius's persecution, left the church. They did not allow for forgiveness even after the sinners' repentance. During this *schism, acc. to *Socrates (HE 5,19), some churches appointed specific presbyters to the "penitential office": sinners would confess their sins before them and receive an appropriate penance in order to obtain forgiveness by God. Forgiveness and readmission into the church after public penance were experienced even by emperors. *Ambrose of Milan imposed a public penitence upon *Theodosius before forgiving him for the massacre of Thessalonica (AD 390 or 389). The earliest source is Ambrose's Letter 51 to Theodosius, in which Ambrose claims that "the Lord himself does not forgive but those who repent" (11). *Eusebius (HE 6,34) reports that a bishop already forbade the Roman emperor *Philip the Arab to take part in the church's prayers on Easter eve before repenting for his crimes, probably for the elimination of Gordian III in AD 244. Of course, this tradition presupposes that Philip was a Christian and reflects the penitential praxis of the church.

*Basil (Reg. mor. 52, 777AB) comments on Lk 17:3-4 by stressing the importance of repentance for forgiveness, the same that is also highlighted in Ep. 22,3 (Courtonne): "One must not harbor resentment against the person who sinned and repents, but must heartily forgive this person. The man who says that he repents for a sin must not only feel pierced through by the sin that he has perpetrated, but must also produce fruits worthy of his repentance."

The third Cappadocian Father, Gregory of Nyssa, treated forgiveness esp. in De oratione dominica, Or. 5. Here, Gregory points out that the remission of debts is proper to God, and that only God can remit sins; as a consequence, our forgiveness is an imitation of God. According to a conception dear to Origen and to him, he stresses that we ought to acquire a similarity to God in forgiving sins and "becoming God ourselves," acc. to the ideal of theōsis. If we forgive, we shall be forgiven by God, and, as God's nature is infinite, there will be an infinity of forgiveness on the part of God, an "abundant gift." This makes it clear that grace is an essential factor of God's forgiveness. The latter always requires human repentance, but it is grace that fills up the gap between human merit and the infinitude of the blessings offered by God. Gregory accepted even the most criticized aspect of Origen's apokatastasis doctrine; even the devil will be forgiven in the end, which will occur after the devil's conversion to the Good (i.e., God), but all, including him, will indeed repent and convert, through a process of instruction, purification and sanctification, thanks to which all will reject evil and voluntarily choose the Good. This very process will take place thanks to God's grace, which extends to all of humanity and at the end of which evil will utterly disappear; Gregory and Origen share this conviction, which is grounded not only in the ontological nonsubsistence of evil, but also in 1 Cor 15:26, acc. to which death will eventually be destroyed: for both understand this death not only as physical, but also as spiritual. And spiritual death was caused by sin.

The doctrine of apokatastasis, as theorized by Gregory and Origen, surely bears a crucial relation to forgiveness, the remission of all sins being a condition for universal salvation. The condition of forgiveness, in turn, will be repentance, conversion and purification. Gregory, in De an. 101-104, interpreting the parable in Mt 18:23-25 and Lk 7:41, observes that in the other world all will pay the "debt" contracted with their sins and will be unable to enter blessedness before paying it up to the last coin. Everyone's "debt" will be entirely repaid, and therefore canceled, sooner or later, and will return free, like God: "God's nature is the source of all virtue; so, in it there will be those who have attained freedom from evil, that, as the Apostle says, God may be 'all in all'" (1 Cor 15:28). Purification in the next world will be commensurate with one's sins, and therefore limited, whereas blessedness, which is the gift of God, who is infinite, has no limit and no end. It is out of love that the divinity pulls all souls to itself, as Gregory explains esp. in De anima; Gregory calls God's love agapē and even erōs when he wants to highlight its intensity.

Whereas in Origen on can count about a hundred occurrences of aphesis and aphiēmi in reference to forgiveness of sins, Gregory uses the term much less, even though his work has survived in much better condition. This is also because almost all of Origen's surviving works are exegetical. Origen and Gregory, indeed, mostly use the vocabulary of forgiveness in an exegetical context, in reference to *Scripture or *liturgy. That forgiveness is conceived as conditional by Gregory and Origen is further indicated by the widespread attestation of metanoia, "repentance/conversion," in their writings: more than 300 occurrences in Origen, almost 50 in Gregory. The apokatastasis, acc. to both of them, will not take place without repentance, but what makes them sure that it will be universal is their certainty that all, thanks to purification and illumination, mainly performed by Christ-Logos, Teacher and Physician, will convert, will have their sins forgiven and will cling to God, who is the Good.

*Gregory of Nazianzus also had much sympathy for the doctrine of apokatastasis and knew Origen's thought well. He used the image of the "baptism of tears" to signify purifying repentance for the attainment of forgiveness. The latter was granted by the Lord who loves humanity, even to Peter who denied him thrice. So, even to those who have denied their faith it is necessary to grant forgiveness, if they repent (Or. 39). The OT quotation of God on which Origen insisted: "I want mercy rather than sacrificial offerings," Gregory refers to Jesus, "who came for the conversion of sinners." Nazianzus is convinced that after one's death conversion is still possible if it has not yet occurred. He takes up Origen's notion of Christ as Physician, and emphasizes one of the main pillars of the doctrine of apokatastasis: punishment absolutely must not exceed the measure of sin, because in this way it would produce despair, not repentance and improvement. Forgiveness must be granted only to those who repent, but mildness must be observed with a view to the rectification of sinners. Punishment, commensurate with sins, will be limited, and in this God's justice will be expressed, after which there will be the expression of God's grace. Eternal life and bliss will not be commensurate to what anyone deserves, but will be a limitless gift from God. Nazianzus too, like Origen and Nyssa, sees punishment as remedial and therapeutic, as a way to improve all and to render all worthy of forgiveness.

In the "Ephraem Graecus," emphasis on contrition and forgiveness is found in De oratione, where the author declares that our sins will be forgiven if we repent with suffering and an afflicted soul. Prayer also helps forgiveness, because it is against resentment and corrects sins (διόρθωσις). "Ephraem" insists on the notion that God's forgiveness depends on our own willingness to forgive in turn (Mk 11:25): "If you have forgiven [ἀφῆκας], I too shall forgive [ἀφίω] you." The author recommends contrition for one's sins, not to be sad, but to be forgiven and be in grace. He also cites the parable of the Pharisee and the publican, where the publican is forgiven thanks to his humility, confession and repentance.

*John Chrysostom—a disciple of *Diodore of Tarsus, who embraced the doctrine of apokatastasis—drew from Origen the notion of Christ as Physician, already present in Clement. Even if one has reached the extreme limit of evil, the Physician will open up many ways of forgiveness and salvation. Chrysostom gives even more emphasis than do Origen and the Cappadocians on the aspect of a sinner's metanoia for obtaining God's forgiveness. Especially in his Homilies on 1 Corinthians (PG 61, 194-196), he insists that repentance and good deeds are indispensable to gain forgiveness. All humans are sinners, but all can "rise up again," ἀναστῆναι. Notably, ἀνίστημι denotes the resurrection; ἀνάστασις as the remission of sins is the spiritual component of the *resurrection. According to a holistic view of the resurrection typical of Origen and shared by his followers, the physical component will be liberation from physical death, but the spiritual component will be the liberation from evil and the restoration of the soul to the Good. Chrysostom uses the metaphor of being wounded in order to introduce the motif of Christ as Physician: those who are sick with evil "need the Physician who applies medications" and can heal those whom human physicians cannot: "do not despair: for even though your wounds are difficult to heal, they are not incurable. Our Physician can: so skilled is he," echoing Origen's statement that "no being is incurable for the One who has created it." What is necessary is only to be aware of one's sins/wounds, which is the premise of repentance and forgiveness. If one repents and begins to do good deeds, every sin can be remitted, however serious. The first of the good deeds that Chrysostom recommends is interpersonal forgiveness, and contrition in repentance itself. All other good deeds follow: almsgiving, justice, help to widows and orphans, pity, endurance and so on. Chrysostom insists, here and in many other passages, that these produce salvation and the liberation from the eternal death of hell.

Unlike Origen and his followers, who believed that God will apply both justice and grace to all in the end, *Augustine, although he adhered to the doctrine of apokatastasis at first, later thought that God will apply justice to some and grace to others. For some, divine forgiveness will be ruled out forever, because after death there will be no more chance to repent and thereby obtain forgiveness. Yet Augustine offered splendid reflections on forgiveness. For instance, commenting on Jn 13:10-15, he inserts a meditation on the Lord's Prayer, on the words that were already commented on by Origen and Nyssa: "forgive [dimitte] us our debts [debita], as we also forgive our debtors." He allegorically interprets the exhortation to wash one another's feet as a recommendation to forgive one another and pray for one another. Christ is presented by Augustine as intercessor and forgiver (Homily 58 on John and elsewhere); however, his intercession is seen as effective only for some. The whole theodicy was at stake: after the rejection of Origen's theodicy, two alternatives remained: that of *Pelagius, who did not admit of grace or original sin, and that of Augustine, who considered grace to be necessary for salvation, as did Origen, but reserved it for some, acc. to God's inscrutable election. Augustine too, like Origen, relied on Romans, but with a different understanding of the breadth of divine grace, which was also influenced by Augustine's war against Pelagianism. It is just after its outbreak that he began to overtly criticize the doctrine of apokatatstasis.

The Syriac 8th-c. mystic *John of Dalyatha, a supporter of the apokatastasis, also emphasized forgiveness and the importance of repentance to this effect. Other people's prayer for a sinner may help his repentance, which comes from Christ's grace (Ep. 43,25). John devotes his Letter 43 to repentance (tyābūtā), which always produces forgiveness and salvation: it brings one back from spiritual death to life and leads one to heaven, being like a fire that burns all sins.

B. Marotta, Eleemosyna a morte liberat (Tob 12:9). Sul valore salvifico dell'elemosina, in Pagani e Cristiani alla ricerca della salvezza. Atti del XXXIV Incontro di Studiosi dell'Antichità Cristiana, Rome, Augustinianum 2006, 817-827; I. Ramelli, Gregorio di Nissa. Sull'Anima e la Resurrezione, Milan 2007; P. Tzamalikos, Origen. Philosophy of History and Eschatology, Leiden 2007; I. Ramelli, Note per un'indagine della mistica siro-orientale dell'VIII secolo: Giovanni di Dalyatha e la tradizione origeniana: 'Ilu 12 (2007) 147-179; Id., Origen's Exegesis of Jeremiah. Resurrection Announced Throughout the Bible and Its Twofold Conception: Augustinianum 48 (2008) 59-78; Id., Forgiveness in Patristic Philosophy, in var. aus., Ancient Forgiveness, Cambridge 2010; Id., Luke 23:34a. A Case Against Its Athetesis: Sileno 36 (2010); Id., Unconditional Forgivness in Christianity? Some Reflections on Ancient Christian Sources and Practices, chap. 2 in C. Fricke (ed.), Ethics of Forgiveness, New York 2011.

I. Ramelli

FORNICATION. The history of the Latin word fornicatio shows the fundamental influence of *Judaism and Christianity. Originally fornicatio (derived from fornix, "arcade, portico," where the prostitutes enticed their clients, see Isid., Diff. verb. 263,37,22) and its Gr. equivalent πορνεία (probably from πέρνημι, "purchase," which indicates the payment for the sexual service, see Liddell - Scott 1451) described the sexual act with a prostitute, which was permitted at Rome. Thus it must be carefully distinguished from the so-called stuprum which occurred when a man had sexual relations with an unmarried girl or an adolescent of free birth, which, in contrast, entailed severe punishment. Under the influence of the OT and of rabbinism, the meaning of the concept grew in the NT to include every act of concupiscence and illicit sexuality: thus prostitution, incest, idolatry, lascivious behavior and sex outside of marriage. In the Septuagint, in fact, porneia could be used in a very broad sense, since it had occupied the semantic field of the Hebrew zenut, which indicates either a single woman who has relations with a man, or anyone who gives his own daughter for sexual purposes without the intention of marrying her, or who does not marry off his daughter after puberty, or who has a dowry too small to get married.

In the patristic period, the interpretation by the fathers of Mt 5:32 and 19:9—which originally could allude to an actual cohabitation which for some reason was extramarital, thus allowing Christians to exit from such "irregular unions"—interpreted πορνεία based on Dt 24:1-4, as if it were a synonym of μοιχεία (properly "adultery"). The term ended up including not only the concept of adultery (Aug., Quaest. Hept. 2,71) but also every type of *sin against the 6th commandment. Another reason for this identification was the fact that all of these irregular relations, inasmuch as they did not guarantee exclusivity, could be considered comparable to the sexual act with a prostitute. It is in this sense that the word also became identified with stuprum and with adulterium, given that in the first case there is no matrimony that would assure exclusivity, and in the second it is precisely the exclusivity guaranteed by matrimony that has been corrupted (Luc. Cal., Non conv. cum haer. 11; Isid., Sent. 2,642,31). These technical terms later qualify fornication; it is named stuprum if someone sleeps with a virgin or a widow (Gr. φθορά; and this can happen by force [vis] or consensually); it is adultery if it occurs with a married woman (Papin., Dig. 48,5,6,1). It is in this larger sense that we see the word used in reference to concubinage (cohabitation without intention of matrimony), to the third or fourth marriage (Basil, Ep. 188,4), to marriage without the consent of the father or pedagogue of the girl (Ep. 199,38), to the marriage of nuns (Ep. 188,6) and to other cases. Concerning the Latin terminology, while a man can be called fornicator or fornicarius for having been together with a prostitute or for having committed a stuprum or an adulterium, women can be called fornicariae if they are prostitutes, adulterae if they agree to the stuprum; if they do not agree, they will be constupratae but not fornicariae. Alongside the more general meaning, in the 4th c. a broader meaning began to be conferred on the notion of fornication in which it soon reached the point of indicating any illicit sexual act except adulterium (Jer., Comm. Proph. min., Os. 1,2; Ep. 123,3,3). It also began to be codified in a more coherent way.

The ecclesiastical sanction for fornication properly so-called is a solid period of exclusion from the community (from 3 to 7 years), depending on the gravity of the deed, but certainly not as long as that for adultery. Furthermore, if interpreted as identifying fornication with adultery, the passages Mt 5:32 and 19:9 theoretically make divorce possible because of fornication on the part of the spouse (Bas., Ep. 188,9).

A. Vaccari, La clausola sul divorzio in Mt 5,32 e 19,9: RivBibl 5 (1955) 97-111; H. Crouzel, L'Église primitive face au divorce, Paris 1971; J. Jensen, Does porneia Mean Fornication? A Critique of Bruce Malina: NTS 20 (1976) 161-184.

H. Crouzel - L. Odrobina

FORTUNATIAN of Aquileia (4th c.). According to the testimony of *Jerome (De vir. ill. 97), Fortunatian was bishop of *Aquileia under *Constantius (337–361). At the Synod of *Serdica he was in the party of the Western defenders of *Athanasius. He apparently persuaded *Liberius (352–366) later to be more flexible. He seems to have died a little before 368. Of his writings we know only three fragments of his *commentary on the gospels and a few allusions made by Jerome, who used it (cf. Com. Mat. praef.: PL 26, 200; Ep. 10,3: ed. Labourt I, 29). A connection with ps.-Jerome, Exp. Quattuor Evangeliorum cannot be demonstrated.

CPL 104; A. Wilmart - B. Bischoff, CCL9 (1957) 365-370; P. Meywaert, New Fragments: FS B. Bischoff, Monaco 1988, 277-283; L. Duchesne, Libère et Fortunatien: MEFR 28 (1908) 31-78; DHGE 11, 1182-1185; J. Lemarié, Italie. Aquilée: DSp7 (1971) 2161-2162; J. Doignon, in HLL 5, § 577; RGG 3 (2000) 204; LACL (2002) 271.

B. Studer

FORTUNATIAN of Sicca Veneria (1st half of 5th c.). Bishop of *Sicca, he appeared in the list of those present at the conference of *Carthage in 411, in the sixth place among the bishops designated to dispute against the *Donatists. His name, furthermore, is present in the list of bishops who took part in the councils of Carthage and Milevi, called in October 416 to discuss the *Pelagian question (Aug., Ep., 175-176). From a doctrinal point of view Fortunatian seems to have been favorable to the position of the anthropomorphites, as it appears from a letter of *Augustine addressed to Fortunatian on the theme of the knowledge of God and on *anthropomorphism (Ep. 148; cf. Retract. 2,41): the bishop of *Hippo asked him to be the mediator between himself and an unidentified bishop, with whom he had argued on this theme, and clarified in the letter his thought on the subject.

PCBE 1, Afrique, Fortunatianus 4, 482-485.

G. Pilara

FORTUNATUS of Carthage (middle of 3rd c.). According to St. *Cyprian (Ep. 14, 16, 43, 44) and *Pontius (Vita Cypr. 5), at the death of *Donatus, bishop of *Carthage, Cyprian was designated as his successor (249). Some priests—among them Fortunatus—led by *Felicissimus, a layman ordained a deacon by *Novatus, opposed Cyprian and refused obedience to him. They were all excommunicated by a synod in 251. This condemnation was confirmed by the Council of Carthage. In response, Felicissimus joined with *Privatus, deposed bishop of *Lambaesis, and the two ordained Fortunatus bishop of Carthage. Thus, in 251–52, there were three bishops at Carthage: Cyprian for the Catholics; Fortunatus for the followers of Felicissimus (a party of around 25 bishops) and *Maximus for the Novatians. Felicissimus sought to be recognized by Pope *Cornelius, but Cyprian convinced the pope to break with Felicissimus and Fortunatus in 252.

DHGE 17, 1173; Monceaux II, 31-32, 208-209; G.W. Clarke, The Letters of Cyprian of Carthage, New York 1984, I, 266-268.

E. Romero Pose

FORTUNATUS the Manichean (d. after 392). In the late 4th c., he had been living for a long time in Hippo Regius, winning converts to *Manicheism, of which he was a presbyter. Nothing further is known about his life, beyond *Possidius's statement that *Augustine had known him in Carthage (Life of Augustine, 6). Local Catholics organized a debate between the latter, by then a Catholic presbyter, and Fortunatus, who agreed to it reluctantly. Augustine's record of the exchange, held 28 and 29 August 392, is preserved in his Acta disputationis habitae cum Fortunato manichaeo and summarized in Retractationes I,16.

Augustine opens the first day with a résumé of Manichean beliefs with which Fortunatus agrees. The Manichean then tries to make Augustine admit that Manichean moral behavior is irreproachable. Wary, Augustine accuses his interlocutor of not honoring an agreement to stick to doctrinal issues. This tactic wins the sympathy of the audience, who also take Fortunatus to task for invoking *Scripture instead of remaining with arguments from reason. On the second day, Fortunatus presents his version of Manichean doctrine, esp. regarding *evil. Here he comes to the heart of the issue: God has nothing to do with evil's existence. Augustine agrees with this, but then compares the Catholic and Manichean views on the cause of moral evil. Fortunatus rejects the attribution of moral responsibility to human *free will because that would imply that God is powerless, or at best an accomplice in evil. Neither debater, it is clear, can satisfactorily explain evil, esp. using reason alone. Augustine's exit from the impasse is to offer the audience a choice between the Catholic God who takes a loving risk in creating beings with free will, and the Manichean God who not only deliberately condemns the human soul to enslavement in matter, but does so out of self-preservation. At this juncture, rather than admit defeat, Fortunatus declares himself ready to consult his superiors on points of the system he has been unsuccessful in defending. He then leaves Hippo for good, unconverted.

The primary interest of this text for us is that it is the authentic record of a meeting between a Catholic and a Manichean where, for once, we have a sense of the public positions of the two groups vis-à-vis each other, and we can measure the effect of the arguments on an audience of the late Western Roman Empire, even if that audience is from a single locale and favorable to the Catholic protagonist. The Manichean position, as Fortunatus represents it, may also be regionalized; e.g., his portrayal of Christ has traits peculiar to the Manicheism of N Africa.

CPL 318; PL 42, 11-130; CSEL 25/1, 83-112; BA 17, 117-193; NBA 13/1, 263-319; PCBE 1, 490-493; F. Decret, Aspects du manichéisme dans l'Afrique romaine. Les controverses de Fortunatus, Faustus et Félix avec saint Augustin, Paris 1970, 39-50.

J. Kevin Coyle

FORTY MARTYRS of SEBASTE. In the Mart. hier. (9 March), we read: "In Armenia Minor*, at *Sebaste, forty soldiers belonging to the Legio XII Fulminata, residing at Melitene, whose Acts we possess." These Acts (BHG 1201-1202; BHL 7537-7539; BHO 712-713), even if they were not written by an author who lived during that time, do not lack historical value acc. to Delehaye. We possess *panegyrics based on these documents written by *Ephrem the Syrian, *Basil the Great, *Gregory of Nyssa and *Gaudentius of Brescia (BHG 1204-1208; BHL 7542), and the testament edited by one of the *martyrs in prison. They died after being placed in a pool of ice. Their legend was depicted on a fresco in the Roman oratory dedicated to them at the entrance of S. Maria Antiqua.

DACL 14, 2003-2006; Vies des SS. 3, 21-22; LTK[2] 9, 556; BS 11, 768-771; P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, I santi quaranta martiri di Sebastia: ST 49, 155-184; A. Orbán, Testamentum XL martyrum, It. tr. by S. Ronchey in Atti e passioni dei martiri, ed. A.A.R. Bastiaensen, Milan 1987, 339-351, 582-583; M. Girardi, Basilio di Cesarea e il culto dei martiri nel IV secolo, Bari 1990, 121-144; P. Karlin-Hayter, Passio of the Forty Martyrs of Sebasteia. The Greek Tradition, The Earliest Account (BHG 1201): AB 109 (1991) 249-304.

V. Saxer

FOSSOR. From the Acts of the requisition of the church of *Cirta, following the *Diocletian edict of 303 (Gesta apud Zenophilum = CSEL 26, 186-187), one learns that the fossor—also known by the names laborantes, κοπιῶντες, κοπιάται and copiatae—not only carried out the activity of diggers of underground cemeteries, but also those of quadratarii, pictores, musivarii and albarii. While Saturninus, when asked cuius condicionis es? responded fossor, the other fossor, Victor, responded artifex to the same question. The fossores were evidently organized into corporations, to be identified, for the most ancient period, with the collegia tenuiorum, and were subsidized by the community (Waltzing, Études historiques, passim). They had to subdivide into squads, which became fixed, esp. for the grand complexes of the via Appia, Salaria and Ardeatina, as the peculiarities, different in the various cemeteries, of the negative architecture, the typology of the tombs, the *epigraphic formulas and the decorative techniques indicate. With the end of the *persecutions the fossores made up a very compact social group, even if the quality of their work progressively declined, and they acquired many privileges. At the end of the 4th c. they became the effective owners of the cemeteries, so that they directly managed the purchase and sale of the tombs, as a dense group of inscriptions testifies (Guyon, La vente des tombes, 349ff.); the most ancient (337–352) currently known comes from the cemetery of *Callistus and records, among other things, that the tomb was purchased ab Alexandro fosso[re] (ICUR IV, 11751). In the 5th c., perhaps because of the excessive avidity and the continual abuses of the fossores, the members of the clergy (esp. the mansionarii, the cubicularii and the presbyteri) assumed the responsibility for the cemeterial administration. Finally *Gregory the Great, in 597, abolished every kind of tax on burials (Ep. VIII, 3).

The custom of representing the fossor in pictures and inscriptions on slabs should be placed within the realistic expressive tendency proper to popular Italic art (Bianchi Bandinelli, Arte plebea, 39ff.), which from the 3rd c. had a notable development in the entire orbis antiquus, expressing itself in spontaneous and immediate little scenes taken from daily life and therefore also from professional activity (Reddé, Les scènes de métier, 4ff.). It is for this reason that in the paleo-Christian cemeteries, next to rare scenes of breadmaking, of commerce in wine, vegetables and casks, or other even more concise scenes that reproduce only the tools of work (Bisconti, Mestieri nelle catacombe, passim), the fossores appear represented in the precise moment of digging (Conde Guerri, Los "fossores," 23-102). In line with this *iconography, dressed in short work tunics without sleeves and having a belt at the waist, these figures appear in paintings from the 1st decade of the 3rd c. and throughout the entire 4th c. Thus they occupy in a symmetrical position the two internal walls of the entrance to some cubicles at S. Callistus (Wp 48,1; Josi, Cimitero, A2 = beginning of 3rd c.) and at SS. Peter and Marcellinus (Wp 107,2; 103,5; 59,1; 48,3; 65,3; 59,2 = middle of 3rd c. and Wp 48,3; 112,5 = beginning of 4th c.). Sometimes the fossores appear standing, but identifiable by the pick, the lantern or basket for gathering dirt associated with their figure: thus again at S. Callistus (Josi, Cimitero, A3 = beginning of 3rd c.), in the hypogeum of Via D. Compagni (Ferrua 1990, fig. 74 = middle of 4th c.), in the cemetery ad duas lauros (Kirsch, Cubicoli, 34-35; Wp 113,3 = middle of 4th c.: Wp 48,2 = end of 3rd c.; Testini Archeologia, 766 = middle of 4th c.) and at the cemetery of Bassilla (Wp 152 = middle of 4th c.). Other *paintings were discovered by ancient visitors to the catacombs and then disappeared again; recently Fr. U.M. Fasola has rediscovered, in the anonymous cemetery of Via Anapo, the fosro Tofimus (sic), as the painted didascalia explains (Conde Guerri, Los "fossores," fig. 30).

This sober iconographic scheme, even more abbreviated, is followed also by several inscriptions on slabs found at Calepodius (Nestori, La catacomba, 210), at Commodilla (ICUR II, 6446), at Marcus and Marcellianus (ICUR IV, 12228), at S. Agnes (Conde Guerri, Los "fossores," fig. 37).

From these representations—and esp. the one painted on the rear lunette of a cubicle at Domitilla (Wp 180 = middle of 4th c.) concerning the fossor Diogenes, around whose figure (unfortunately lost at present) various work tools and an abstract representation of the dense network of cemeterial galleries are arranged—the various paraphernalia used for excavation can be identified. Among these the dolabra fossoria, the mallet, the chisel, the compass, the shovel, the hook for the lamp, the groma (De Angelis d'Ossat, Di un utensile, 179) are recognizable.

The notable recurrence of the fossor in the figurative arts suggests a particular meaning for these representations that surpasses the original realistic motive to reach some symbolic significance that would suggest that the figures are a Christianized genius loci, or else an allegory of the biblical Tobit père or, finally, the personification of the life-death antinomy (Conde Guerri, Los "fossores," 103ff.).

G.P. Kirsch, Cubicoli dipinti del cimitero dei SS. Pietro e Marcellino sulla via Labicana: RivAC 4 (1927) 259-287; E. Josi, Il cimitero di Callisto, Rome 1933; G. De Angelis d'Ossat, Di un utensile dei fossori, Rend. della Pont. Accad. Rom. di Arch., 1937, 179ff.; A. Ferrua, Catacombe sconosciute. Una pinacoteca di IV secolo sotto la via Latina, Florence 1990; J.P. Waltzing, Études historiques sur les corporations professionelles chez les Romains, Louvain [2]1968; A. Nestori, La catacomba di Calepodio: RivAC 48 (1972) 193-200; J. Guyon, La vente des tombes à travers l'épigraphie de la Rome chrétienne (III^e-VII^e siècles). Le rôle des fossores, mansionarii, praepositi et prêtres: MEFRA 86 (1974) 349-506; Ch. Pietri, Appendice prosopographique à Roma Christiana (311–440): MEFRA 89 (1977) 398-406; R. Bianchi Bandinelli, Arte plebea. Dall'ellenismo al medioevo, Rome 1978, 35-48; M. Reddé, Les scènes de métier dans la sculpture funéraire gallo-romaine: Gallia 36 (1978) 1,4-63; E. Conde Guerri, Los "fossores" de Roma paleocristiana, Vatican City 1979; P. Testini, Archeologia Cristiana, Bari [2]1980, 150-155; C. Carletti, Iscrizioni cristiane a Roma. Testimonianze di vita cristiana (secoli III-VII), Florence 1986; M. Minasi, TIP, 182-184; F. Bisconti, Mestieri nelle catacombe romane, Vatican City 2000.

F. Bisconti

FOUR CROWNED MARTYRS. A titular basilica at *Rome was dedicated to the four crowned martyrs from the end of the 6th c. situated on the slope of the Caelian Hill, but there are still many open questions concerning both the identity of these four individuals who were the object of veneration and the very origins of the place of worship and the succession of its building phases.

On the first issue, scholars generally tend to recognize in the four crowned martyrs who were venerated on the Caelian Hill the protagonists of the hagiographical account who underwent martyrdom at *Sirmium, *Pannonia, in 306 during the time of the emperor *Diocletian, but various difficulties impede this identification, the most obvious consisting in the specific detail about the group of martyrs from Pannonia consisting of five persons, not four. For an examination of the complex hagiographical question, see the detailed analysis done by A. Amore (BS 10, 1276-1286), who maintained that there were two distinct series of sources, which were established at the same time. To the first group belong, among others, the statements in the Leonine and Gregorian Sacramentaries that attest to the veneration of the four crowned martyrs in the city of Rome, whose specific names, however, were never mentioned, evidently because they were already unknown in ancient times; in this line, the biography of Pope Leo IV is inserted (847–855) as contained in the Liber pontificalis (LP II, 115-116), in which the statement is made that the pontiff who promoted the restoration of the basilica of the Caelian Hill went to great lengths to find the remains of the titular martyrs, which were not found in the church, and once found, he placed them there. In light of this information, therefore, the relics of the holy four crowned martyrs were recovered only from the mid-9th c., but the editor of the source does not clarify from where they were recovered.

A second group of sources, however, makes up part of the passio of the five martyrs from Pannonia: Claudius, Nicostratus, Simpronianus, Castorius and Simplicius. This redaction can be attributed to the 6th c. The first four, acc. to legend, were brave sculptors who were secretly Christians; after Simplicius had been converted by their example, he joined them. Because they were known for their great skill in their art, the same Emperor Diocletian commissioned some works from them, among which was a statue of the god Aesclepius, which the five refused to do. Upon declaring their faith, acc. to the usual model of such texts, the accusations began, then the conversion of many who were present, the condemnation and the execution of the punishment and the recovery of their bodies by a godly person. The account then has a sort of appendix, in which a story is told that several months later the same emperor, when he returned to Rome, commissioned the construction of a temple to Aesclepius near the baths of *Trajan and commanded that all the soldiers offer sacrifice there. The refusal to follow such a command led to the deaths of other Christians, this time the four cornicularii (the assistants of a centurion), whose abandoned bodies were buried by St. Sebastian and Pope *Miltiades on the third mile of the Via Labicana. Because the names of these new martyrs were unknown, but the date of their death coincided with that of the five martyrs from Pannonia (8 November), the same pontiff, likewise on the authority of the passio, promoted the cult and arbitrarily attributed to them the names of the first four protagonists of the events (Claudius, Nicostratus, Simpronianus and Castorius). This account therefore seems to clearly exclude the simple identification of the four crowned martyrs with the five artists of Sirmium.

Other sources that can be attributed to the 7th c. seem to derive from the hagiographical account: The itinerary De locis sanctis, which situates the veneration of the four crowned martyrs on the Via Labicana, reports the names of the five martyrs from Pannonia (iuxta viam vero Lavicanam . . . sancti isti dormiunt . . . IIII Coronati id est Claudius, Nicostratus, Simpronianus, Castorius, Simplicius). In some versions of the Martyrology of *Jerome, 8 November is remembered as the feast of the four crowned martyrs (whose names also coincide with those of the martyrs of Sirmium, with the exception of the last, Simplicius), but the celebration of that feast was then inserted in the church already existing at that time on the Caelian Hill.

The element that allowed the superimposition of the two traditions can be identified in the actual veneration at Rome, attested in the 4th c. by the Depositio martyrum*, of individuals (Clement, Sempronianus, Claudius and Nicostratus) who were celebrated 9 November in comitatu. It is easy to note the proximity of the dates of the feast for these latter individuals and for the martyrs mentioned in the aforementioned sources, although the interpretation of the qualification in comitatu is more complex, a qualification that is generally understood as a reference to a toponym, but translatable rather as the specification that the veneration of the four occurred "together," acc. to M. Cecchelli's recent proposal.

Turning now to events pertaining to the worship edifice, equally thorny questions complicate its most ancient history: the first definite mention of a titulus sanctorum Quattor Coronatorum dates back to the year 595, when the place of worship was artistically represented by a presbyter at the Roman synod held in that year. Still lacking certain confirmation is the possibility that over the course of the 6th c. the dedication to the four crowned martyrs replaced a more ancient dedication, that of the titulus Aemilianae, already present with its own clergy at the Roman synod of 499. The reconstruction of the building phases pertaining to the basilica (which also does not lack opposing interpretations) should begin with the identification of a large aula with an apse that can be dated to the 4th c. It probably belonged to a patrician domus attested to on the Caelian Hill, within which the most ancient place for Christian worship was erected. The Liber pontificalis mentions the restoration efforts in it promoted by Popes *Honorius I (625–638: LP I, 324, 326) and Hadrian I (772–795: LP I, 572), whose traces on the monument have not yet been identified with certainty, and which was followed by the entire reconstruction of the edifice commissioned by Pope Leo IV toward the mid-9th c. (847–855: LP II, 115-116): the primitive aula with an apse on this occasion was not entirely eliminated, but was modified to construct the central aisle, with the apse, of a much broader three-aisled basilica; the new church was then adorned, acc. to the custom of the Carolingian era, with a semicircular crypt in which were placed the relics of the four martyrs, which had been recovered, acc. to the Liber pontificalis, by the pontiff himself. The structure was brought to completion with three small chapels dedicated to St. Barbara, St. Sixtus and St. Nicholas, and probably even an enormous portico. Very important elements pertaining to the early Christian building and its Carolingian transformation have emerged over the course of recent excavations in the cloister of the structure on the Caelian Hill (Barelli - Pugliese 1994; Barelli 2002; Barelli 2006), which also led to the identification of a baptismal facility.

The imposing structure that is still preserved in its general features is nonetheless the fruit of the subsequent complete reconstruction that followed the devastating fire that struck the basilica and its adjoining buildings in 1084, and which is due to the intervention of Robert Guiscard. A first attempt at restoration, attested to by the discovery of a plug to close the archways of the columns, left space for a total reconstruction, but led to a new consecration of the church by Pope Paschal II in 1116. The place of worship was rebuilt in rather reduced dimensions, reduced into a new three-aisled church in the sole W portion of the nave of the old basilica; it was, however, inserted within a large monastic structure, whose construction was promoted by the same Paschal II and was enlarged over the course of the 13th c. with the construction of the monastery and the chapel of St. Sylvester, astutely decorated with scenes taken from the Acta Silvestri.

BS 10, 1276-1286 (A. Amore); LTK[3] 10, 780-781 (bibl.); LTUR 4, 177-179; A. Muñoz, Il restauro della Chiesa e del Chiostro dei SS. Quattro Coronati, Rome 1914; A.M. Colini, Storia e topografia del Celio: Memorie della Pontificia Accademia Romana di Archeologia, s. III, 7 (1944); B.M. Apollonj Ghetti, I SS. Quattro Coronati (Le chiese di Roma illustrate, 81), Rome 1964; L. Barelli - R. Pugliese, Note sulla basilica titolare dei SS. Quattro Coronati in Roma: Palladio 13 (1994) 19-24; L. Barelli, Il complesso dei SS. Quattro Coronati nel IX secolo, in Ecclesiae Urbis, Atti del Congr. Int. di Studi sulle chiese di Roma (IV-X sec.), ed. F. Guidobaldi - A. Guiglia Guidobaldi, Vatican City 2002, II, 979-992; L. Barelli (ed.), La fontana del chiostro dei SS. Quattro Coronati a Roma. Storia e restauri, Rome 2006.

A. Milella

FRAGMENTA ARIANA. In 1828, Angelo Mai published 21 fragments contained in a *palimpsest in provenance from Bobbio. The first 19 certainly contain *Arian material, and because of the unity of style and tone should be assigned to a single author, although apparently derived from different works. Fragment 17 contains an ample profession of faith, others cite passages from Arians of an earlier period—*Athanasius of Anazarbus and *Theognis of Nicaea—and refute ideas of *Hilary, *Phoebadius and *Ambrose. The author, a radical Arian of the school of *Wulfila, is polemical not only with Catholics but also with the Macedonians. It has been proposed that he should be identified with various exponents of Western Arianism known to us at the end of the 4th to the beginning of the 5th c.: Wulfila, *Auxentius, *Palladius, *Maximinus, but without solid reasons. The fragments, however, should be dated to that time.

CPL 705; PL 13, 593-628; Patrologia III, 98; M. Meslin, Les Ariens d'Occident, Paris 1967, 113-134; T. Böhm, Fragmenta Ariana: LACL (1998), 239; J. Ulrich, Die Anfänge der abendländischen Rezeption des Nizänums, Berlin 1994, 136-194.

M. Simonetti

FRANKS. A Germanic people of uncertain origin—acc. to *Gregory of Tours they came from *Pannonia—including different tribes established near the North Sea and along the right bank of the Rhine. From here, starting from the 2nd half of the 3rd c., the Franks made multiple land and sea raids in all of *Gaul; they were always repulsed by Roman generals and emperors who nevertheless used groups of defeated Franks as colonists to repopulate and recultivate some of the extensive territory of devastated Gaul. In the course of the 4th c., many Frankish soldiers were used as auxiliaries in the Roman legions, and Frankish officials fulfilled high charges in the service of the emperor (e.g., Merobaudes, Arbogastes, Bauto). The most important tribe for future history was that of the Salians, originally installed on the coast of the North Sea, who later moved S to occupy the Toxandria, the region between the Meuse and the Scheldt. Defeated by *Julian (358) they were nevertheless left in the same territory as foederati; afterward, under the guidance of King Chlodio, they took over Tournai and Cambrai, extending their dominion up to the Somme. In the course of the 5th c. the eastern group of the Franks, situated along the Rhine, accomplished a series of devastating incursions into the regions of *Trier and *Cologne, and were successful, after the middle of the 5th c., in permanently occupying the territory on the left bank of the Rhine, with their capital at Trier. After 450, the Salesian kingdom, with its capital at Tournai, was governed by Childeric, whom *Gregory of Tours claimed was son of Meroveus, eponym of the Merovingian dynasty. Childeric fought as a loyal ally at the flank of the Roman generals of Gaul against the *Visigoths, the Saxons and the Alamanni. At his death the throne was occupied by his son *Clovis (481/482), who began a policy of great expansion: he defeated Syagrius at Soissons (486/487) and progressively extended his dominion up to the Loire; he conducted victorious campaigns against the Thuringi (491) and the Alamanni; he defeated the Visigoths of Alaric II at Vouillé (507), expanding the limits of his kingdom up to the Pyrenees. Clovis received from the emperor of the East, Anastasius, the privilege of the honorary consulate which legitimized, in the eyes of the subjected Romans, the sovereignty of the Frankish king. He established his capital at *Paris and reinforced his power with murder and deception, freeing himself from the other Salian kings and engulfing the kingdom of the Rhineland Franks.

A few years after he married the Burgundian princess *Clotilde, a Catholic, Clovis, who had always shown deference toward the Gallic-Roman episcopate, converted, having himself baptized by *Remigius, bishop of *Reims. The adoption of Catholicism on the part of the king brought with it the conversion of the Frankish people as well and facilitated the fusion between conquerors and subjects; it also had notable political consequences. *Avitus, bishop of *Vienne, understood the historic importance of the event, as his letter of congratulations shows, which salutes in Clovis the only Catholic king in the West. Since the other barbarian peoples were either pagans or *Arians, Clovis appeared to the Catholics as the protector of the orthodox faith, foreshadowing that guiding position in the Christian West assumed later by the Carolingians. He treated the Gallic-Roman population with clemency, respecting their language and property, and he established a Roman-Germanic state in which both the ancient provincial cives and the Franks, as Catholics, were equally placed under the authority of the bishops. In reality the Frankish church in the Merovingian period held political power; it was a state church and a national church in close connection with the king. At the death of Clovis (511), the four sons divided the kingdom as a personal inheritance, with different capitals: Chlodomer at Orleans, Childebert at Paris, *Chlothar at Soissons and Theuderic at Reims. They continued the work of expansion of Frankish power: they occupied Thuringia (531), taking prisoner the princess *Radegund, whom Chlothar later married; they seized Burgundy (534), and from Vitiges they obtained Provence (537) which furnished the Franks, through *Marseille, with an opening to the Mediterranean. Theudebert, having succeeded to his father Theuderic, in the course of repeated incursions into *Italy set up numerous garrisons in the Po valley and coined money in his own name; but at his death (548) the precarious Frankish dominion in Italy disappeared. The influence of the Franks extended to Alamannia, Raetia, Bavaria and Pannonia, reaching its greatest extent around 560, when the entire state was reunited under Chlothar; but at his death (561), a period of ferocious fratricidal battles followed which reinforced the aristocracy and favored the division of the vast territory into three regions: Austrasia, Neustria and Burgundy, with separate administrations. When *Chlothar II again reunited the entire kingdom under his power (613), he was forced to grant a certain independence to Austrasia and to Burgundy, each with its own mayor of the palace.

In 614, Chlothar II called a council at Paris with all the Merovingian episcopate to publish the capitularia regum Francorum, with large concessions to the bishops and the aristocracy. His son Dagobert was more rigid in defense of the monarchical authority and rights, supported missionary activity among the Basques to the S and Frisians to the N, and concluded a "perpetual peace" with the emperor of the East *Heraclius (631), in view of their common fight against the Slavs. With the death of Dagobert (639) began the decadence of the Merovingian dynasty and the decline of imperial authority in favor of the mayors of the palace who gradually acquired full power. In Austrasia, Arnolph, bishop of Metz, and Pippin of Landen, who had been mayor of the palace of the young King Dagobert, gave rise to a powerful dynasty, later known as Carolingian from its most illustrious representative, destined to gradually supplant the Merovingians. In fact, after a bloody period of civil wars culminating in the battle of Tertry (687), Pippin of Heristal, mayor of Austrasia, succeeded in imposing his governance on the whole Merovingian kingdom, newly unified. The kings of this period did not have any importance: the power belonged in fact to Pippin II, who defended energetically the military and religious unity of the entire kingdom. At his death (714), new disorders followed until Charles, later called Martel, illegitimate son of Pippin, succeeded in reestablishing order and seizing power with arms and diplomacy. His great merit was in repulsing the Arabs, ending the Islamic advance at the battle of Poitiers (732): his victory was decisive for the saving of Christianity. He imposed the Frankish primacy on the barbarian tribes of Germany, accomplishing expeditions against the Alamanni, the Frisians and the Saxons. In internal politics he was hostile to the grand episcopal aristocracy, he deposed bishops, deprived the churches of privileges and confiscated ecclesiastical goods to pay his milites, provoking a further decadence of the Frankish church. On the other hand, he favored the evangelizing work of the Catholic missionaries in European areas still predominantly pagan, with the consequent political and social organization and diffusion of civilization. In particular he protected *Boniface, a great preacher in Thuringia and Bavaria, and later, elected archbishop (732), the architect of the reform of the Frankish church and mediator between the Franks and the papacy.

J.M. Wallace-Hadrill, The Long-Haired Kings and Other Studies in Frankish History, London 1962; R. Latouche, Gaulois et Francs. De Vercingétorix à Charlemagne, Grenoble 1965; R. Grand, Recherches sur l'origine des Francs, Paris 1965; G. Tessier, La conversion de Clovis et la christianisation des Francs, in La conversione al cristianesimo nell'Europa dell'alto medioevo, Settimane di Studio XIV, Spoleto 1967, 149-189; H. Zöllner, Geschichte der Franken bis zur Mitte des sechsten Jahrhunderts, Munich 1970; H. Grahn-Hoeck, Die fränkische Oberschicht im 6. Jh. Studien zu ihrer rechtlichen und politischen Stellung, Sigmaringen 1976; J.M. Wallace-Hadrill, The Frankish church, Oxford 1983; E. James, The Franks, Oxford 1988; I.N. Wood, The Merovingian Kingdoms 450–751, London 1994; W.M. Daly, Clovis. How Barbaric, How Pagan?: Speculum 69 (1994) 619-664.

C. Braidotti

FRAVITTA (d. 490). Patriarch of *Constantinople for four months between 489 and 490, after the death of *Acacius. He wrote a letter of communion to *Peter Mongus of *Alexandria, preserved for us in Syriac translation by *Zacharias Rhetor, with an appeal to overcome the differences that had arisen after the Council of Chalcedon (451) and the promulgation of the Henoticon decree (481) on the part of the emperor *Zeno. He also tried to reestablish communion with Pope *Felix III, who in 484 had excommunicated and deposed Acacius because he recognized Peter Mongus as archbishop of Alexandria. The conciliatory attitude of Fravitta did not produce any effect on either of his interlocutors: Peter Mongus repeated the condemnation of the Council of Chalcedon and the Tome of *Leo the Great, while Felix III did not grant communion to Fravitta because the bearers of the letter were not able to assure him of the suppression of the names of Acacius and Peter Mongus from the *diptychs.

CPG 5996; CSCO 84, 9-11 (text); CSCO 88, 6-7 (tr.); DHGE 18, 1128-1129; Patrologia V, 42.

F. Scorza Barcellona

FREDEGAR (pseudo) (7th c.?). The attribution of the composition of the Chronica to a Fredegar appears to be the fruit of an erroneous reading of the MSS by the humanists (sed carius, read as Fredcarius, later changed into Fredegarius), and now the almost unanimously accepted opinion holds that the writing is a compilation, perhaps the result of the work of numerous authors. In fact the Chronica appear as a heterogeneous whole, comprising at least five parts, in the most ancient MS—more or less contemporaneous with the compilation—that transmits them (the Claromontanus, Paris, BN, Lat. 10910). The fourth part is original, introduced by a praefatio that explains the structure and plan of the work. This starts off with the Latin translation of the so-called Chronaca of *Hippolytus of Rome; it proceeds with extracts from the Chronicon of *Jerome and with a synthesis of the Historiae of *Gregory of Tours and concludes with some extracts from the Chronica of *Isidore of Seville, reaching up to 642.

Multiple hypotheses have been advanced by scholars on the phases and modalities of the compilation and on the number and political-geographic affiliation of its editors: they go from the three editors proposed by Krusch, all of the 7th c., two of Burgundian origin and one of Austrasian (a hypothesis that is still today among the best supported), and from the two of Hellmann, to the sole editor of Goffart, who accepted reflections already advanced by preceding scholars. Finally, acc. to Erikson, who confronted the question from the linguistic point of view, there was no author Fredegar (or someone in his place), but only a compiler who drew on various sources, transforming them acc. to his personal style.

In their original part the Chronica narrate the history of the Merovingian kingdom from 584 to 642 (with interpolations that reach up to 658); therefore they represent a primary source for knowledge of the vicissitudes of the Franks; in particular they are the only source for the period after 591–592, which ends with *Gregory of Tours. On the whole the chronicler creates a "universal Francocentric history." The literary evaluation of the work is severe: the use of the sources has usually been judged uncritical, the sense of narration scarce, the coloring of fable excessive, the Latin barbaric. In such a panorama, contrary voices such as that of Goffart, who defined it as "the most important literary work of the Frankish kingdom in the 7th c.," are rare.

More recently, critical historiography has revealed the ideological implications underpinning the "origin myth" of the Merovingian dynasty that is narrated in the Chronica and has granted a specific importance to the perspective of the editor in relationship to the sources, revealing his intentional autonomy. According to this vision, the portrait of Clovis that emerges from the work appears to contrast strongly with that elaborated by Gregory of Tours, for whom the king was the true founder of the Frankish people thanks to his baptism. In the picture painted by Gregory, in fact, Clovis is put into a mythic-Christian tradition; in that of the author of the Chronica into a mythic-pagan one, in which the Christian elements are reduced to a minimum, and Clovis loses his charisma of "founder" to become the fifth king of the Franks, starting from the historical-legendary information endorsed by ps.-Fredegar.

CPL 1314. Editions: MGH, Script. rer. Merov., 2, 1-193; J.M. Wallace-Hadrill, The Fourth Book of the Chronicle of Fredegar with Its Continuations, London 1960; Frédégaire, Chronique des temps mérovingiens (livre IV et continuations), Fr. tr. and comm. by O. Devillers - J. Meyers, Turnhout 2001.

Studies: G. Schnürer, Die Verfasser der sogenannten Fredegar-Chronik, Fribourg 1900; M. Baudot, La question du pseudo-Frédégaire: Le Moyen Âge, S. II, 29 (1928) 129-170; S. Hellmann, Das Fredegarproblem: Historische Vierteljahrschrift 29 (1934) 36-92, now in Id., Ausgewählte Abhandlungen, Darmstadt 1961, 101-157; J.M. Wallace-Hadrill, Fredegar and the History of France: Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 40 (1957–1958) 529-550, now in The Long-Haired Kings and Other Studies, London 1962, 71-94; W. Goffart, The Fredegar Problem Reconsidered: Speculum 38 (1963) 206-241; A. Erikson, The Problem of Authorship in the "Chronicle" of Fredegar: Eranos 63 (1965) 47-76; B. Luiselli, Il mito dell'origine romana dei Galli, dei Franchi, degli Scandinavi: Romanobarbarica 3 (1978) 89-121; K.H.J. Gardiner, Notes on the Chronology of Fredegar Book IV: Parergon 20 (1978) 40-44; W. Goffart, The Narrators of Barbarian History, Princeton, NJ 1988; W. Goffart, Rome's Fall and After, London 1989; F. Brunhölz, Histoire de la littérature latine du moyen âge, I/1, Fr. tr., Louvain-la-Neuve 1990, 137-138 and 269; I.N. Wood, Fredegar's Fable, in Historiographie im frühen Mittelalter, Vienna-Munich 1994, 359-366; R. Waswo, Our Ancestor, the Trojans. Inventing Cultural Identity in the Middle Ages: Exemplaria 7 (1995) 269-290; K.F. Werner, La "conquête franque" de la Gaule. Itinéraires historiographiques d'une erreur, in Clovis chez les historiens. Études réunies par O. Guyotjeannin (= Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartres 154 [1996]), 7-45; Patrologia IV, 354-358; A. Callender Murray, Post vocantur Merohingii. Fredegar, Merovech and 'Sacral Kingship,' in After Rome's Fall. Narrators and Sources of Early Medieval History. Essays presented to Walter Goffart, Toronto 1998, 121-152; C. Carozzi, Clovis, de Grégoire de Tours aux Grandes Chroniques de France. Naissance d'une mémoire ambigüe, in Faire mémoire. Souvenir et commémoration au Moyen Âge, Aix-en-Provence 1999, 41-61; G. Scheibelreiter, Fredegar Chronist einer Epoche, in The Medieval Chronicle. Proceedings of the 1st International Conference on the Medieval Chronicle, Drieberg-Utrecht, 13-16 July 1996, Amsterdam 1999, 251-259; G. Scheibelreiter, Die barbarische Gesellschaft. Mentalitäts-geschichte der europäischen Achsenzeit 5.-8. Jahrhundert, Darmstadt 1999.

B. Clausi

FREEDOM – FREE WILL. The notion of freedom was central to ancient *philosophical reflection, esp. in *Platonism and *Stoicism. The former, following Plato, privileged persuasion, instruction and free adherence to rules and discipline as a basis for education; the latter, from the ancient Stoa (esp. Chrysippus) onward, strongly felt the need of a reconciliation between universal fate/necessity (εἱμαρμένη, ἀνάγκη) and human freedom.

*Justin's main criticism of Stoic thought, which he otherwise appreciated in many other respects (2 Apol. 8,1) but which he left for the Platonic doctrine and Christianity, lies precisely in its determinism, which in fact denies human freedom, as he denounces in his second Apology 7,3-8, Indeed, in his first Apology (28,3 and 43,1-8), Justin attacks determinism, using the Stoic ethical terminology, but insisting on human freedom and on each human's responsibility before God. According to Justin, the Stoic ethic is good, but is not adequately grounded in metaphysics and is undermined by determinism. Other patristic authors as well supported the doctrine of human freedom and responsibility—grounded in the *Bible and in the idea of a *judgment and of God's punishment or reward for human deeds—against determinism: for instance *Theophilus, Ad Autol. II 27; *Irenaeus, AH IV 4,3; 37,1-6; 39,1; and *Athenagoras, who also was well acquainted with Greek philosophy. But those who, after Justin, most vigorously defended freedom against *gnostic and astrological predestinationism were surely *Clement, *Origen and *Bardesanes. The first two strongly fought against the *Valentinian idea that humanity is divided into three classes, each predestined to salvation or damnation by nature, independent of individual choices. Clement argued for human freedom in many passages, esp. in Strom. I, 1,4,1, where he applies Plato's principle that virtue is something ἀδέσποτον and God is ἀναίτιος to claim that each one is responsible for his or her own choices—just as he does in VII, 2, 12 and in I, 17, 83-84, where he also adduces examples drawn by *Chrysippus on human freedom (SVF II, 353 and 236)—or in IV, 24, 153, 1-2 and in II, 14-15, 60ff.

Clement devotes a long treatment to human responsibility, drawing support both from the Bible and from the classical world. Every rational creature is endowed with freedom, including the devil, who was not evil by nature, but became such due to a bad choice (I, 17, 83-84). Clement espouses the Socratic-Platonic principle that one chooses evil mistaking it for good (ethical intellectualism), and takes up the Stoic one that errors are the consequence of an assent given to a wrong proposition. It is clear that, from this perspective, in order to make good choices, one must have good knowledge and intellectual discernment. In I, 20, 115-116, Clement attacks Valentinus's claim that a soul may be saved by nature rather than by knowledge. Clement openly criticizes gnostic predestinationism, as theorized by Valentinus, *Basilides and their followers, in that it undermines human freedom, the ἑκούσιον and ἀκούσιον, and divine punishment and reward in God's "salvific justice" (Strom. II, 3). If human beings had no freedom, they would be like puppets. The very same argument is to be found in a contemporary of Clement, Bardesanes of Edessa, who wrote a Κατὰ Εἱμαρμένης that is at least partially preserved in Greek by *Eusebius and in Syriac in the so-called Liber Legum Regionum, col. 10 Nau: if human beings had been created by God without freedom, they would be simply an instrument of him who moved them toward good or evil. Bardesanes, like Clement and Origen, polemicized against gnosticism and *Marcionism, and against astrological predestinationism. The whole Liber and the Eusebian excerpts are all devoted to the refutation of determinism and fate and to the defense of human free will. The same arguments Contra Fatum, partially already present in Philo and in the Platonic philosophical tradition, occur again in Origen, *Didymus the Blind, *Diodore of Tarsus (who wrote a Κατὰ Εἱμαρμένης preserved by *Photius) and *Gregory of Nyssa, who also wrote a treatise titled Contra Fatum.

For Origen in particular the endorsement of human freedom was crucial. I have endeavored to demonstrate that he even based his theodicy and eschatology precisely on this polemic against gnostic determinism, as is evident from Princ. III, where he begins with supporting human freedom and constructing a theodicy that destroys Valentinian and Marcionite doctrines, and ends with the theory of apokatastasis*. Indeed, both for him and, later, for *Gregory of Nyssa, who was deeply influenced by Origen, human freedom does not at all undermine the eventual apokatastasis: for in the αἰῶνες each one will experience the consequences of his or her previous free choices, but sooner or later all will achieve purification and illumination, thanks also to the help of the angels and of Christ-Logos, who is the Great Physician, and all will voluntarily adhere to the *Good, i.e., God. The apokatastasis is not in the least at odds with the freedom of all rational creatures. All will not be forced to submission, but will voluntarily and consciously choose the Good after knowing it, thanks to a pure, undarkened mind.

Origen's ethical intellectualism certainly played a core role, but it is important to observe that the final, blessed telos is achieved and preserved by all not only by means of knowledge and illumination, purification and sanctification, but also and above all by means of love (ἀγάπη), which guarantees the unity of all in the apokatastasis. Indeed, acc. to Origen, human freedom does not entail a new fall in the end, and thus the series of αἰῶνες will come to an end in the ἀϊδιότης of apokatastasis (see *eternity), because "love never fails." Origen (Comm. in Rom. V, 10,15-16) cites St. Paul, 1 Cor 13:8a: ἡ ἀγάπη οὐδέποτε ἐκπίπτει. There will be no more κόρος (satiety), because the goodness of God, as an object of love, will never be exhausted. "What it is that will be able to restrain freedom in the future world in order to prevent it from falling again into *sin is indicated by the Apostle in a short statement: Love never falls. This is why love is said to be greater than faith and than hope. For it is only thanks to love that it will no longer be possible to sin . . . once we have reached the culmination of perfection, it will be all the more impossible that our freedom may fall from the object of its love. . . . The power of love is so great as to attract everything to itself [tanta caritatis vis est ut ad se omnia trahat]. Love will bring all to itself and will overthrow all powers, because it is God who first gave us the basis for love. Thus, quite rightly, love, which, alone, is greater than all the rest, will keep every creature far from falling. Then God will be all in all [ideo merito caritas, quae sola omnium maior est, omnem creaturam continebit a lapsu. Tunc erit Deus omnia in omnibus]." This is what Gregory of Nyssa, too, will maintain (In illud. Tunc et Ipse Filius, pp. 13-14 Downing): "No one will fall out [μηδενὸς ἀποπίπτοντος] of God's Kingdom." The apokatastasis is characterized by perfect and indefectible love acc. to both Origen and Gregory.

At the same time, the apokatastasis will be the reign of freedom: one of the New Testament passages that Origen most loves and repeatedly applies to the *resurrection and apokatastasis is Rom 8:21: each creature will be liberated from the slavery of corruption into the liberty of the glory of God's children. "The whole creation hopes for its liberation, hopes to be set free from the chains of corruption, when the children of God, who had fallen and dispersed, will be collected again into unity" (Princ. III, 5,4); "I understand the Apostle's words, 'all creation will be liberated from the slavery of corruption into the liberty of the glory of God's children' [Rom 8:21] in the sense that the first creation of rational and incorporeal beings was such as not to be subject to corruption, in that it was without (heavy) bodies. For, wherever there are bodies, immediately corruption follows. The creation will be set free from the slavery of corruption when it has received the glory of God's Son, and God will be all in all" (Princ. III, 6,1). Indeed, in Princ. I, 7,5 Origen presents the apokatastasis as "the liberation of the creation and the end of slavery," i.e., the enslavement to evil that brought about death and corruption. The apokatastasis will be the glorious achievement of perfect freedom for all human beings and all rational creatures. This idea is shared entirely by Nyssa as well. In De Anima, 101,25-43, he describes the apokatastasis as the achievement of true freedom after the liberation from evil: "The gospel . . . asserts that the justice of God applies to all, granting the time necessary for the cancelation of the debt, acc. to its weight, without neglecting even the smallest of debts. And the Evangelist has said that the cancelation of debts does not come by means of a payment of money, but rather that the debtor is consigned to torturers, until he has paid his entire debt: and this means nothing other than that, by means of the required suffering and the penalty of participation in pain, he cancels the debt that he acquired during his earthly life. . . . And so, after having shed all that was alien to him, i.e., sin, and after having stripped off the shame that resulted from his debts, he can finally arrive at a condition of freedom and of trust."

There is another sense in which freedom can be understood: as opposed to *slavery, which in the ancient world was a regular institution. Among philosophers, and esp. in Roman Stoicism, it was stressed that both slavery and freedom are to be found in the moral sphere—as enslavement to passions and freedom from passions guaranteed by wisdom—and it was often recommended to treat slaves humanely, in light of our common human nature, e.g., by Seneca. Perhaps the one who went farthest was a disciple of Musonius Rufus, Dio Chrysostom: he recognized that slavery in itself "is unjust and does not belong to truth" (Or. 15,25-28), just as all manners of possession of a person on the part of another person are unjust, because by nature and in truth all human beings are free—although not even Dio fought for the elimination of slavery. St. Paul, too, notoriously exhorted masters to love their fellow believers even if slaves, and to remember that they too have a Master in heaven, before whom all human beings, slaves and free, will have to appear at the judgment. And in Gal 3:28 Paul claims that "in Christ there is neither slave nor free." But neither Seneca nor Paul condemned slavery as an institution; in 1 Cor 7:20 Paul recommends his fellow believers maintain the social condition they had before their conversion to Christianity (since it evidently is an "indifferent," in Stoic terminology), and, after converting the fugitive slave Onesimus, he sent him back to his master Philemon, albeit certainly calling him "my heart," in that he was his spiritual son.

Generally speaking, the position of the Fathers did not result in a condemnation of slavery as an institution either. Mostly, they saw it as an evil, to be sure, but a necessary evil, a consequence of the Fall that, as such, cannot be eliminated. *Augustine (Civ. Dei 19,15) presents slavery as the fruit of sin. It is not part of God's plan, but a result of decay; it will be eliminated only in the other world. Some Fathers, such as *Theodoret in De Providentia Divina 7, even maintained the usefulness, not only of poverty and richness, but also of slavery and mastery, on the pretext of a differentiation of tasks. *Basil, in De spiritu sancto 20, recognizes that no human being is a slave by nature—an assertion that goes against Aristotle's conviction—since by nature all human beings are free; but soon he explains that some are slaves because of a war, others due to poverty and others thanks to an ineffable providential dispensation, for the worse were commanded to serve the better, which is "not even a condemnation, but a blessing." For it is useful that those who have scarce intelligence serve those who are better. At least Basil insists that in respect to God we are all slaves, since we all belong to God our Creator. But *John Chrysostom claimed (e.g., in Hom. in 1 Cor. 40,5) that there is no need for slaves, as God made us capable of serving ourselves and even our neighbors; he adduces the example of St. Paul, who worked for himself and had no slaves. Especially having many slaves is "shameful," for it is not necessity that introduced slavery, but sin: but now Christ has eliminated this, because in Christ there is neither slave nor free. Therefore, John's advice is to let one's slaves free, because keeping slaves is not a work of philanthrōpia.

Above all, at least one Father thought that human freedom is so precious a good and divine gift to all humans that the very institution of slavery is intolerable and should be abolished altogether; namely, *Gregory of Nyssa. Differently from other patristic authors, he believed that slavery, far from being an indifferent or an inescapable consequence of the Fall, is a positive offense to God and to humankind, and that it ought to be radically eliminated. His main argument is found in his fourth *Homily on Ecclesiastes (GNO 5, 334-352), in commenting on Eccl 2:7. These homilies were preached in AD 379; in 321 Constantine had granted churches the power of manumissio in Ecclesia, and Easter had become a traditional occasion for the emancipation of slaves. Gregory exhorts his flock to set free their slaves (In Sanctam Ecclesiam, GNO 9, 250-251). But his discourse is not occasional: it rather consists in a full argument for the intrinsic illegitimacy and impiety of all slavery.

From the beginning of the homily (334) he criticizes those human beings who presume to be masters of other human beings, which is nothing but a huge presumption; one cannot pretend to possess another human being in front of God, since we all belong only to God. Those who pretend to own other persons make of God's possession their own possession (335). Those who presume to possess slaves go against God's decree, which made all human beings free. God's law gives us no privilege over one another, for God made each human being the master of all creation, and anyone who dares enslave any human being fights against God's decision. God granted humans the command over irrational creatures, not over other humans. Those who presume to own slaves divide human nature into slavery and mastery (336). But the image of God can be bought at no price: God made each human being the owner of the whole cosmos, and no amount of money, however huge, could buy it. Not even God would enslave humanity: for, as humans enslaved themselves to sin, God called them again to freedom; not even the whole world could ever buy one human creature. Only a fool could presume to be the master of the image of God (337). All are equal, all liable to the same passions and sufferings and joys, all breathe the same air, all will have the same judgment, the same Kingdom or Gehenna, and the same salvation, and it is not permitted to divide human nature into slavery and mastery. But the root of all sins is the love of money and possessions (339). Similar positions are held by Gregory in De Oratione Dominica, GNO 7/2, 70-71, and De Beatitudinibus 3. Gregory observes that τὸ αὐτοκρατὲς καὶ τὸ ἀδέσποτον are fundamental characteristics of the entire human nature, created in the image of God.

N.D. O'Donaghue, Freedom in the City of God, Prudentia 11 (1979) 27-32; R. Klein, Die Sklaverei in der Sicht der Bischöfe Ambrosius und Augustinus, Stuttgart 1988; C.E. Manning, Stoicism and Slavery in the Roman Empire, in ANRW, II.36.3 (1989) 1518-1543; S. Bobzien, Determinism and Freedom in Stoic Philosophy, Oxford 1998; T. Brennan, The Stoic Life. Emotions, Duties, and Fate, Oxford 2005; I. Ramelli, La coerenza della soteriologia origeniana. Dalla polemica contro il determinismo gnostico all'universale restaurazione escatologica, in Pagani e cristiani alla ricerca della salvezza. Atti del XXXIV Incontro di Studiosi dell'Antichità Cristiana, Roma, Augustinianum, 5-7.V.2005 [SEA 96], Rome 2006, 661-688; Id., Il βασιλεύς come νόμος ἔμψυχος tra diritto naturale e diritto divino. Spunti platonici del concetto e sviluppi di età imperiale, Naples 2006; Id., Gregorio di Nissa: Sull'Anima e la Resurrezione, Milan 2007; Id., Bardesane Κατὰ Εἱμαρμένης, Bologna 2009; Id., Slavery as a Necessary Evil or as an Evil That Should Be Abolished? The Patristic Debate, Annual Meeting of the SBL, Boston, November 2008.

I. Ramelli

FRIENDSHIP. The awareness that Christian charity must extend to all did not prevent the Fathers of the first centuries from discussing the theme of friendship, as a relationship of preferential love that may mutually unite some men and women. They were encouraged in this by examples in *Scripture: the friendship between David and Jonathan (1 Kgs 18:20; 2 Kgs 1) and the exhortation of Prov 17:17: "A friend loves at all time, and a brother is born for adversity." Mentioned more than once in the NT is the friendship between Christ himself and Lazarus (cf. M. Garzonio, Lazzaro. L'amicizia nella Bibbia, Milan 1994) or the other disciples. Friendship was principally considered a good that human beings possess by nature (Aug., De bon. coniug. 1,1); it must therefore be desired for itself and not for ulterior ends (ibid., 9,9; Ep. 130, 6, 13), and is essential for life (Soliloq. 1,7). In this conception the Fathers faithfully followed the idea of friendship already held by the *pagans. According to Aristotle: "Among the various kinds of friendship, the truest is that which is born of the common aspiration for virtue" (Et. Nicom. 8,6.1202). *Lucian of Samosata considered friendship to be that thing "admired above all others" (Tossari o l'amicizia, 7). *Clement refers to Pythagoras (Protr. XII, 122,3), and *Augustine cites Cicero (C. Acad. 3, 6, 13), who had defined friendship as "communication of human and divine things through benevolence and love" (Cic., Lael. 6,2).

From this definition, however, Augustine emphasized the aspect most proper to Christian friendship: it is above all "communication of divine things," a communication such as to render the friendship perfect and eternal, since it unites friends to the Lord himself (Aug., Ep. 258, 1). The specific quality of friendship must be its duration (Jerome, Ep. 3,6) (for Jerome's friendships, cf. I. Grego, San Girolamo e i suoi amici romani: Asprenas [1985] 429-444): not transitory, but eternal (Cic., Lael. 9, 32). For this to occur, God must have a part in the friendship. For Clement of Alexandria it is the mediation of the Logos that establishes the close relationship of friendship between God and the creature (Strom. 2,9.41,2); for Origen, the Logos makes us friends of God (C. Cels. 4,3). The eternity of God, moreover, guarantees the eternity of friendship (Paul. Nol., Ep. 3, 1; 40,2; Aug., Conf. IV 7; John Chrys., Hom. in Col. 1, 3). Friends must also flee *sin, helping one another (Athan., Om. Copta, codex M 577 = Athanasius, in Omelie Copte, ed. T. Orlandi, Turin 1981, 55; Ambr., De off. 3; John Chrys., Hom. in Eph. 18,4; Hom. in Heb. 30,2; Aug., Ep. 151, 7), and avoiding the friendship of *heretics (Athan., Vita Ant. 68). The characteristics of Christian friendship are amply pointed out by *Ambrose based on scriptural texts (De off. 3, 124-134). In addition, the person's relationship with God can also be understood as friendship, thanks to the mediation of the Word (Clem. Al., Prot. XII, 122, 3): it is Christ who has taught us a way of life that leads to friendship with God (Orig., C. Cel. 1, 3, 28), such that all things are common to these friends, God and the human being (Clem. Al., Prot. l.c.), with the covenant itself being understood as a communion of friendship (Id., Paed. 1, 7, 56). Friendship with celestial creatures is also discussed (Aug., Civ. Dei 19,9; Leo the Great, Serm. 35, 4) in a tension that must lead friendship to extend to all, including enemies (Aug., Serm. 56, 10, 14).

Among the most famous friendships in patristics is that between *Basil of Caesarea and *Gregory of Nazianzus. Gregory wrote to Basil: "I breathe you even more than the air, and live only when I am with you, whether in your presence, or in your absence through images" (Ep. 6,5). The friendship between *John Chrysostom and *Olympias should also be noted (we have 17 letters from the former to the latter), and that between *John Cassian and *Germanus. In Confer. I, Cassian writes: "From the beginning of my Christian life, I had a perfect union of intentions with him. I was with him in the *cenobium, I was with him in the hermitage, to the point that those who knew us, in order to indicate the unity of our purposes, said that we were one soul in two bodies."

P. Fabre, Saint Paulin de Nole et l'amitié chrétienne, Paris 1949; M. Aquinas McNamara, L'amicizia in s. Agostino, Milan 1970; L.F. Pizzolato, L'amicizia cristiana, Turin 1973; C. Mazzucco - C. Militello - A. Valerio, E Dio li creò . . . Coppie straordinarie nei primi tredici secoli di cristianesimo, Milan 1990; C. Militello, Amicizia tra asceti e ascete, in La donna nel pensiero cristiano antico, ed. U. Mattioli, Genoa 1992, 279-304; R. Piccolomini, L'amicizia. Sant'Agostino, Rome 1994; C. Romano, Un'anima in due corpi. L'amicizia nella patristica, Salerno 1995.

M.G. Mara

FRONTO of Cirta. A native of *Cirta in Africa (95/100–166/175 AD), he lived at *Rome, becoming a celebrated orator and carrying out an intense judicial activity with political and forensic speeches. Around 138 he obtained the post of tutor of the future emperor *Marcus Aurelius (Jerome, De vir. ill. 24). He also made a career in politics: praetor (ILS 1129 and 2928), consul suffectus in 143 and governor of Asia (however, he renounced this office). He wrote various works (letters, speeches, etc.) discovered by A. Mai in a *palimpsest of Bobbio in 1815. Only *Minucius Felix (Oct. 9,6 and 31,2) alludes to a speech of his against the Christians—not extant—which Fronto probably delivered around 160, where various infamous charges are set out (orgies, sexual liberties, cannibalism, ritual homicide of children, onolatry, etc.): Fronto seems to have made himself spokesman for the *pagan reaction or instrument of the official political line, hostile to Christians. The hypothesis of Schanz (96) that Fronto had given this speech before the senate, perhaps at the request of the emperor, does not appear likely and still less is it verifiable. For Hubík the 2 Apology of Justin is a response to it.

Fronto appears as one of the principal representatives of the archaizing tendency of the 2nd c.: he delighted in linguistic studies and the pursuit of a refined vocabulary and stylistic elegance; he dedicated himself to the assiduous reading of texts, preferably archaic, considered examples of the true and genuine Latin literary culture.

Editions: C.R. Haines, The Correspondence of Marcus Cornelius Fronto (Loeb Classical Library), Cambridge, MA-London 1919–1920; F. Portalupi, Opere di Marco Cornelio Frontone (Classici latini), Turin 1974; M.P.J. van den Hout, M. Cornelius Fronto, Epistulae (Bibliotheca Teubneriana) Leipzig [2]1988; Marcus Cornelius Fronto, Epistulae (Scriptorum Romanorum quae extant omnia), 2 vols., Pisa 1989. Studies: K. Hubík, Die Apologie des hl. Justinus, Vienna 1912, 164-172 and passim; M. Schanz Geschichte der römischen Literatur 3, Munich [3]1922, 88-100; P. de Labriolle, La réaction païenne, Paris 1934, 87-94; P. Frassinetti, L'orazione di Frontone contro i cristiani: GIF 2 (1949) 238-254; F. Portalupi, Marco Cornelio Frontone, Turin 1961; KLP 2 (1967) 616-618; RAC 8, 520-524; M.C. Cristofori, L'oratio di Frontone contro i cristiani e la persecuzione di Marco Aurelio: RSCI 32 (1978) 130-139; E. Champlin, Fronto and Antonine Rome, Cambridge, MA-London 1980; B. Baldwin, Fronto on the Christians: Illinois Classical Studies 15 (1990) 177-181; C. Bammel, Die erste lateinische Rede gegen die Christen: ZKG 104 (1993) 295-311; P.V. Cova, Marco Cornelio Frontone: ANRW II.34.2 (1993) 874-918 (bibl.); P. Soverini, Aspetti e problemi delle teorie retoriche frontoniane: ibid., 919-1004; A. Michel, Rhétorique et philosophie au second siècle après J.-C.: ANRW II.34.1 (1993) 3-78.

M. Maritano

FRUCTUOSUS of Braga (d. 665). Monk and bishop, coming from the royal Visigothic family (related to King Sisenand and to the bishops Peter of Béziers and Selva [Sclua] of *Narbonne), he had his education in Palencia under the guidance of *Conantius. He dedicated himself to anchoritic *asceticism, but the presence and pressure of disciples led him to found new monasteries: Compludum and Rufiana in Bierzo, others in the province of León, on the Atlantic (perhaps in the province of Pontevedra) and in Andalucia. He was elected abbot-bishop of *Dumium before 650; in 656, he was metropolitan of *Braga, where in 665 he died. His tomb (a strange building still preserved) became a center of worship. This and his monastic asceticism led to the composition of his Vita toward 674, unduly attributed to *Valerius of Bierzo. He wrote a Rule of the Monks for the exclusive use of the first monastery he founded in Compludum, a supplication to King Recceswinth in favor of some political prisoners, and a letter to *Braulio of Saragossa, in which certain works, not to be found in Galicia, were requested. A Common Rule has been attributed to him; but this, in reality, must be the work of his disciples. Perhaps he merely contributed to it. There is no reason to attribute to him the paternity of a monastic movement, called Fructuosian or federal, because the structure of the monastery is based on a mutual rapport between abbot and monks.

CPL 1869-1871; Diaz 216-219, 314-315; PL 80, 690-692; 87, 1099-1130; A.C. do Amaral, Vida e reglas religiosas de S. Fructuoso Brucarense, Lisbon 1805; I. Herwegen, Das Pactum des hl. Fruktuosus von Braga, Stuttgart 1907; C.F. Nock, The Vita Sancti Fructuosi, Washington DC 1946; M. Martins, Correntes da filosofia religiosa em Braga, Porto 1950, 287-320; M.C. Díaz y Díaz, La Vida de San Fructuoso de Braga, Braga 1974; BS 5, 1295-96; DIP 4, 983-986; R. Grégoire, Valeurs ascétiques et spirituelles de la "Regula monachorum" et de la "Regula communis" de S. Fructueux de Braga: RAM 43 (1976) 159-176; A. de Almeida Matos, La "regula monastica communis." Su origen y autoría: AST 51-52 (1978-79) 191-202; M.C. Díaz y Díaz, Fructuosiana, in De Tertullien aux mozarabes, Mélanges Fontaine, II, Paris 1992, 31-40; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, IV, Madrid 1998, 289-343.

M. Díaz y Díaz

FRUCTUOSUS of Tarragona (d. 259). Bishop of *Tarragona, Fructuosus and his deacons Augurius and Eulogius suffered martyrdom 21 January 259. In 1926–1930 the place in which they had been buried and a fragment of an inscription that indicates their names were discovered. Above the tomb a basilica was raised; its layout has been identified. Their passion (BHL 3196), which largely reports the minutes of the trial during which they were condemned, has been preserved in a rewritten version that seems to be from the end of the 4th c. *Prudentius dedicated the Perist. VI to them, and *Augustine, Serm. 273. In antiquity their veneration spread in *Baetica, in Catalonia, in S *Gaul and in *Africa. The Visigothic Orational (conserved at Verona) contains several prayers in their honor; the martyrologies mention their feast.

P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, Gli atti di S. Fruttuoso di Tarragona: ST 63, 129-181; Delehaye 144-199; C. García Rodríguez, El culto de los Santos en la España romana y visigoda, Madrid 1966, 316-321; BS 5, 1296-1298; DHEE 2, 962-3; LTK[3] IV, 178-179; Histoire des saints, II, 158-160; P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, Note agiografiche, ST 65, Rome 1935; A. Wlosok, Actes des martyrs et Passions, in Nouvelle histoire de la littérature latine, V: Restauration et renouveau. La littérature latine de 284 à 347 après J.C., ed. R. Herzog, avant propos de J. Fontaine, Turnhout 1993, 486-487; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-christiana, I. Siglos III-IV, Madrid 1998, 34-45; F. Scorza Barcellona, Agli inizi dell'agiografia occidentale, in Hagiographies. Histoire internationale de la littérature hagiographique latine et vernaculaire en Occident des origines à 1550, sous la direction de G. Philippart (CC. Hagiographies III), Turnhout 2001, 49-52.

V. Saxer

FRUMENTIUS. The apostle of "India ulterior," he was consecrated bishop by *Athanasius (Ruf., HE X, 9: GCS Eus., 2,2, 971-973; cf. PL 21, 478-480). The traditional identification of Frumentius with Abba Salama, first apostle of *Ethiopia, has been contested by Altheim and Stiehl.

BS 5, 1292-1294; F. Altheim - R. Stiehl, Christentum am Roten Meer, I, Berlin-New York 1971, 402-409.

S.J. Voicu

FULGENTIUM DONATISTAM, ADVERSUS. Known for some time and published with other Augustinian works, the Adversus Fulgentium Donatistam is a brief work composed of two distinct parts: the refutation of a *Donatist pamphlet on *baptism and a fictional dialogue between Augustine, spokesman for the Catholics, and Fulgentius, spokesman for the Donatists. P. Monceaux, in his work dedicated to African writers, attributes this work not to Augustine, as the codices claim, but to an African writer contemporaneous with Augustine, to whom he gives the name Fulgentius Donatist, and dates the work on the basis of internal evidence (reference to the Conference of *Carthage of 411 and to the *schism of the *Maximianists) between 412 and 420. His judgment on the quality of the work is not among the most favorable, above all because of the lack of internal harmony in the dialogue: the anonymous interlocutors suddenly acquire precise names, Augustine and Fulgentius, and the discourse, at first rather sluggish, at the end acquires vivacity; nevertheless, he acknowledges the historic value of a work that conveys noteworthy parts of the Donatist treatise to us.

C. Lambot in 1948 announced a new MS that revealed a considerable lacuna in the text, a lacuna that at last allows us to explain the different rhythms of the dialogue and the introduction of the names of the interlocutors; Lambot has described the MS in question and has prepared an edition of the complete work, prefacing it with a study concerning the author, the divisions of the text, the closeness with other writings of a similar content. Furthermore, acc. to Lambot, Augustine cannot be recognized as the author of the work. The unanimous attribution to the bishop of Hippo by all the MSS would have been conditioned by the original absence of a title: to designate the work, one of the protagonists of the dialogue would simply have been identified as the author; apart from the names of the participants, no internal evidence reveals any clue as to the identity of the author; the date is a little later than the Conference of Carthage (411), given that the work shows strong affinities with other African writings of that period.

After a brief introduction, where "to seek the truth in all things, recognize it where it is found, keep it after it has been recognized" (I, 4-5) is pointed out as a precise duty of the Christian, a dialogue takes place between a donatista and a catholicus, supporters of opposed theories on baptism: acc. to the Donatist, the baptism dispensed by the Catholic clergy is invalid and those who enter into his church must be rebaptized; naturally, the repetition of baptism is completely excluded by the Catholic. Each of the interlocutors relies heavily on the Holy *Scriptures to support his own thesis. The observations of P. Monceaux, for the section of the text known to him, on the sacred text used by the two contestants are interesting; on this question, we add simply that the catholicus tends esp. to challenge the passages cited by the Donatist, reusing them against the adversary after having revised the exegesis in an orthodox interpretation. The dialogue even reaches contemptuous notes: the Donatist is accused of considering himself so perfect, in the rites and the interpretations which he has chosen, as to relegate others, including God himself, outside the circle of the true followers of God (XV, 20). The first part concludes with the apostrophe to brother Fulgentius who has brought the pamphlet into the hands of the author: he corrects and leads to the truth one who desires always to be a disciple of the truth (XXX, 32-38). The dialogue of the second part is vivacious; the hypothetical encounter between Fulgentius and Augustine is proposed to clarify all the tortuous quibbles of the controversy; playing on the meaning of the words and putting forth stringent logical arguments, he returns to attacking the Donatist conception of baptism. The task of ridiculing the presumption of an African church being left as the only remaining depository of the correct faith against the entirety of the Christian world falls to Augustine (cf. XXIV, 2-5).

PL 43, 763-774; CSEL 53, 287-310; CPL 380; Monceaux VI, 220-232; C. Lambot: RBen 58 (1948) 177-222.

D. NUZZO

FULGENTIUS, Fabius Planciades (late 5th c.?). Little or nothing is known of this author, including when he lived (estimates fluctuate between the 4th and 6th c.), given the scarcity and ambiguity of the information obtainable from his work and the absence of any external data. He was of African origin but later than Martianus Capella. That he was Christian appears with certainty, based on the polemical suggestions contained within his famous studies of allegorical interpretation—the Mythologiarum libri tres (mythological stories allegorically interpreted) and the Expositio Vergilianae continentiae (allegorical interpretation of the Aeneid of Virgil)—on an isolated citation of *Tertullian in the bizarre Expositio sermonum antiquorum (explanation of 62 obsolete words with examples taken from the ancient authors up to Martianus Capella), and above all on the biblical inspiration of his universal chronicle, the De aetatibus mundi et hominis (14 passages that describe biblical and profane events), an incomplete work in 14 books that the MSS attribute to a Fabius Claudius Gordianus Fulgentius, but which unequivocal stylistic-textual agreements prove to be the work (like the very brief Super Thebaidem having reached us with the name of S. Fulgentius Episcopus) of the same author as the above-mentioned works.

A possible identification with Fulgentius of Ruspe has been considered, with whom he shares African origin; this thesis has also been proposed again recently by Langlois. The fundamental cultural orientations, however, of the two authors are extremely different: exclusively theological and doctrinal in the first, plain and skillfully literary and erudite (consider the "lipographic" technique of the De aetatibus) in the second.

CPL 849-853; R. Helm, repr. Leipzig 1970 (with bibl.); Expositio sermonum antiquorum, intr., text, trans. and notes by U. Pizzani, Rome 1969; Expositio Vergilianae continentiae, intr., text, trans. and commentary by T. Agozzino - F. Zanlucchi, Padova 1972; O. Friebel, Fulgentius der Mythograph und Bischof, Paderborn 1911; Fulgentius the mythographer, trans. L.F. Whitbread Columbus, Ohio 1971; R. Edwards, Fulgentius and the Collapse of Meaning: Helios 4 (1976) 17-35; G. Rauner-Hafner, Die Vergilinterpretation des Fulgentius: MLatJb 13 (1978) 7-49; P. Magno, Su alcune citazioni di Fulgenzio riguardanti Ennio e Pacuvio: RSC 26 (1978) 451-458; C. Stoecker, Alexander der Grosse bei Fulgentius und die Historia Alexandri Macedonis des Antidamas: VChr 33 (1979) 55-75; P. Langlois: RAC 8, 632-661 (identifies the two Fulgentii); B. Baldwin, Fulgentius and His Sources: Traditio 54 (1988) 37-57; J.C. Relihan, Fulgentius, Mitologiae 1.20-21: AJPh 109 (1988) 229-230; A. Bisanti, Le citazioni omeriche di Fulgenzio, in Studi di filologia classica in onore di G. Monaco, Palermo 1991, IV, 1483-1490; M. Manca, Un prologo di troppo nel De aetatibus mundi et hominis di Fulgenzio: Quaderni del Dipartimento di filologia, linguistica e tradizione classica 1998, Bologna 1998; B.G. Hays, A Second Look at Fulgentius's Alexander: VChr 54 (2000) 204-207.

U. Pizzani

FULGENTIUS of Astigi (Écija) (d. before 625). Brother of *Leander, Florentina and *Isidore (6th c.). Biographical details are gathered from the Regula of Leander (PL 72, 892), and information on his episcopate is furnished to us by the Acts of the councils of *Toledo (610) and *Seville (619). Fulgentius was born in Cartagena in 540–550, to the Catholic Severianus, a Roman citizen of Spanish origin and representative of the kingdom of Toledo at Cartagena; his mother, acc. to some, was an Arian, perhaps of the name Turtura. After the Byzantine occupation, the family of Fulgentius departed for Seville in 552. He returned to Cartagena to recover his father's possessions, but we know nothing of his residence there from 575 to 589. It is probable that he was a bishop in 600. In 610 he certainly was bishop of Astigi and signed the decree of *Gundemar (610–612) for the establishment of Toledo as a metropolitan see. In the Second Council of Seville (619), the bishop of Malaga demanded from Fulgentius some parishes included in the jurisdictional territory of Astigi after the Byzantine occupation; Fulgentius, on his side, demanded from the bishop of Cordoba a basilica situated on the border of the two dioceses. In 620 Isidore dedicated to him the De eccl. off. Fulgentius died before 625. The veneration paid to him is posterior to 1330. Falsifiers of the 16th–17th c., confusing Fulgentius with *Fulgentius of Ruspe, among other inaccuracies, attributed to the first a treatise De fide and another treatise on mythology.

DHGE 19, 371-374; BS 5, 1302-1303; J.F. Rivera Recio, Encumbramiento de la Sede Toledana durante la dominación visigótica: Hispania Sacra 8 (1955) 13-19; Leandro de Sevilla, De la instrucción de las vírgenes y desprecio del mundo, trans., study and notes by Jaime Velásquez, Madrid 1979, 13-18.

E. Romero Pose

FULGENTIUS of Ruspe (467–532). From an excellent family, he was born in 467 in *Africa at Thelepte (Byzacena). His widowed mother Mariana made sure that he received a complete education, which even included knowledge of Greek. But after some years dedicated to administering the family inheritance, Fulgentius entered a monastery despite the hostility of his mother. The anti-Catholic persecution of the *Vandals forced him to change residence more than once, and one time he was badly beaten by an *Arian priest. He decided to take himself to the monks of *Egypt, but in Sicily he abandoned the idea and proceeded to *Rome (500). After returning to monastic life in Africa, despite his reluctance he was not able to avoid a more direct ecclesiastical charge. Made a priest and later bishop of Ruspe (Byzacena) in 507, he was exiled with the other members of the Catholic clergy to *Sardinia. Meanwhile, his prestige as a man of doctrine had increased greatly, and in 515 King Thrasamund wanted him at *Carthage for discussions, but sometime later sent him back to Sardinia because of the anti-Arian activity that Fulgentius was carrying out. He returned to Africa at the death of Thrasamund (523) and spent his last years dedicated to writing and pastoral activity. He died 1 January 532.

The Vita of Fulgentius, written by *Ferrandus, the primary source for information of a biographical nature, mentions some works that have not reached us. But those which have been preserved are sufficient to offer a precise portrait of the author. They are of a doctrinal character and are organized around two centers of interest, one trinitarian and christological of an anti-Arian slant, and the other soteriological (*grace and *free will) against the so-called *semi-Pelagians.

In the first group, Contra arianos liber unus, perhaps the oldest work of Fulgentius, was written in 515 at Carthage to respond to a series of Arian objections proposed by Thrasamund. The Arian, having done poorly in the first encounter with Fulgentius, sent him another series of questions, but in order to make it more difficult did not permit him to make a copy of the text and took it away from him after he had read it. Obliged to respond, Fulgentius laments, at the beginning of the Ad Trasamundum libri III, the unfavorable conditions in which he is constrained to write, but this does not prevent him from developing the matter organically, centered above all on specifically christological themes, because the most serious errors centered on this point. In reality Fulgentius, without omitting the specific anti-Arian thematic, primarily treats the relationship between the person and nature in Christ in polemic with the *Nestorians and the *monophysites in this work.

Also worthy of mention are the 10 books Ad Fabianum, of which only fragments have reached us; the Contra sermonem Fastidiosi ariani, written to refute an Arian sermon that is also extant; De fide ad Petrum and De trinitate ad Felicem; books II and III Ad Monimum; Ep. 8 and 14. Adversus Pintam has been lost. The anti-Arian themes treated by Fulgentius retraces that of the end of the 4th c., by now traditional, without originality but with a full mastery of the complex matters and a capacity to present them in a personal way. The novelty here consists in the interference in the Arian controversy of the great christological discussions of the 5th c. That is why Fulgentius treats this matter thoroughly as well, in adherence to the Chalcedonian theology, but with a particular insistence on underlining the unity of the subject in the distinction of the two natures of Christ.

A series of requests, including that of the Scythian monks (Ep. 16 of the correspondence), pushed Fulgentius to treat the old Pelagian question as well, which came up again repeatedly. The De gratia of *Faustus of Riez had had great success, and the supporters of radical Augustinianism found difficulty in opposing it. Therefore Fulgentius, during the second exile in Sardinia, wrote a group of works on this problem: the first of Ad Monimum libri III, Contra Faustum Reiensem libri VII (nonextant), De veritate praedestinationis et gratiae, and Ep. 15 and 17.

The doctrine that Fulgentius expounds in these texts is Augustinian in the most radical sense: human nature, corrupted funditus (entirely) by the *sin of *Adam which was transmitted to his descendants, makes each person incapable of wanting the *good and of saving oneself by his or her own devices by means of free will; only the grace of God saves a person, granted freely, which precedes merits and determines them; therefore the salvation of anyone is exclusively due to God. God grants this grace not to all but only to some who are predestined, chosen by the inscrutable divine judgment. All the others are left to their destiny, predestined not by sin but rather to the punishment that follows it. Like Augustine, Fulgentius does not deny completely the action of free will in the person, but does not succeed in plausibly harmonizing this presence with the rigid doctrine of predestination. Also, when the cooperation of the person with the preponderant action of grace is present, he clarifies that even this good will is predisposed by God, so that yet again free will falls completely under the initiative of grace, and one returns to the aporia left unresolved by Augustine.

We have pointed out several letters of Fulgentius: only 19 have reached us, and some are those of his correspondents. They are all engaged doctrinally and pastorally; none are correspondence for correspondence's sake.

Of the various sermons that have reached us under his name, the edition of CCL 91A only attests 8 of them as authentic, dedicated to various themes (liturgical festivals, celebration of martyrs, explanations of scriptural passages).

His Abecedarium has recently been discovered, better known as Psalmus contra Wandalos arianos, composed in imitation of the anti-Donatist Psalmus of Augustine: 23 alphabetic stanzas of 12 verses, not composed in meter, in imitation of the biblical psalms. The content is strongly committed to doctrine and is presented in a much simpler form than that usually adopted by the author, in order to be more accessible to the people.

CPL 814-846; PL 65; CCL 91 and 91A; M.G. Bianco, Abecedarium Fulgentii episcopi: Orpheus NS 1 (1980) 152-171; G. Lapeyre, Fulgence de Ruspe, Paris 1929; B. Nisters, Die Christologie des Fulgentius von Ruspe, Rome 1930; Repertorium 4, 604; PCBE 1, 507-513; M. Djuth, Fulgentius of Ruspe. The initium bonae voluntatis: Augustinian Studies 20 (1989) 39-60; BBKL II, 152-153; F.P. Rizzo, Fulgenzio a Siracusa, in Studi di filologia classica in onore di G. Monaco, Palermo 1991, IV, 1473-1482; V. Grossi, La questione della predestinazione nell'agostinismo di Fulgenzio di Ruspe (Cagliari 502–523), in La Sardegna paleocristiana tra Eusebio e Gregorio Magno. Atti del Convegno, Cagliari, 10-12 ottobre 1996, Cagliari 1999, 201-225; D. Bachelet, Fulgence de Ruspe. Lettres ascétiques et morales, SC 487, Paris 2004.

M. Simonetti

FULGENTIUS the Donatist (d. after 411). A *Donatist writer, he was probably a priest (410–420). He is known as the author of the Libellus de Baptismo, written sometime after the Conference of *Carthage of 411 and preserved thanks to the citations contained within the reply of a *Catholic, perhaps a student of *Augustine. Fulgentius asserted that "there was only one baptism, which the Samaritan woman (i.e., the Catholic) did not possess. There was an 'enclosed garden' which was the church, where a sealed fountain was prohibited to every unworthy person. There was an oil, which was the most holy unction, which dead flies had corrupted (cf. Eccl. 10:1) and which should in no case be given to sinners." Fulgentius concentrated on the unworthiness of the Catholics, as traditores, to dispense valid *sacraments, but his treatise is also noteworthy inasmuch as it contains the only literal citation of the opinion of one of the bishops present at the council gathered at Carthage in 312, where *Caecilian was excommunicated. It is a good example of the level of popular religious debate in the period following the official condemnation of Donatism in 412.

Anon., Contra Fulgentium Donatistam: PL 43, 763-774; Monceaux VI, cap. 6, Fulgentius le Donatiste; PCBE I, 506-507.

W.H.C. Frend

FULMINATA (legio XII). The column of *Marcus Aurelius (Rome, piazza Colonna), among the other bas-reliefs that describe the victories of the emperor (161–180), represents the scene of the torrential rain and the lightning that saved the XII legion in Dacia from thirst and defeat. The episode of 172 (the sources offer various dates between 171 and 174), probably identified already by the emperor in a letter to the senate as a divine intervention, immediately became an object of interpretation in a Christian sense acc. to which the salvation depended on the prayers of the Christians, as *Apollinaris of Hierapolis, between 175 and 180 ca. (Eus., HE 5,5,4), and *Tertullian (Apol. 5,6; Scap. 4,7) testify. The column attributes the miracle to the demon of rain; Cassius Dio (Hist. rom. 71,8,1-10,5) on the other hand attributes it to the Egyptian magician Arnuphis, to Hermes and to other demons. An apocryphal letter of Marcus Aurelius favorable to the Christians was also put in circulation (CPG 1075). The nickname of Fulminata is not due to the miracle of the storm, because the legion already bore the name at the time of Augustus: it had probably been a sign of homage and devotion to Zeus Keraunos.

M. Schanz, Geschichte der römischen Literatur 3, Munich [3]1922, 252-253; M. Sordi, Le monete di Marco Aurelio con Mercurio e la pioggia miracolosa: Annali dell'Istituto Italiano di Numismatica 5-6 (1958–1959) 41-55.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

FUNERARY RITES. By the phrase "funerary rites" we are referring to that developed number of gestures, practices and *symbols with which the ancients faced the theme of death by seeking a relationship between the world of the living and the world of the dead. The process of elaboration of various rituals during the centuries of Late Antiquity should be analyzed in close relationship to the phenomena of continuity and discontinuity with the previous era. On the one hand, some aspects, esp. those pertaining to how the material of the rites developed, should be analyzed in close connection to the widespread and well-established behaviors during the centuries constituting, in some respects, a uniform cultural and anthropological inheritance. On the other hand, there also emerged themes and issues tied to attempts to "reconcile" the ancient practices with the new religion, which at times emphasize the contrasts and contradictions, or rather, the behavioral norms and precepts against which the writings of the fathers of the church and the bishops and, to a lesser extent, the conciliar canons raised their voices.

In recent decades, the historiographical debate has faced in particular the interpretation of the church's role in the ways of approaching and evaluating the reality of the funerary rites. The object of debate is the problem of the diversification and the interaction between the "popular" position of a lay multitude that was still tied to pagan or "neutral" beliefs—i.e., those that were not definable within precise religious categories—and the position of the church, which sought a malleable communicative channel and mediation with the persisting material vision of the faithful. The processes of transformation by which "the rites done by Christians" could be called "Christian rites" are numerous and complex and should be analyzed in the milieu of a broader context that also includes phenomena connected to the cult of the *martyrs and the *relics, in which the gradual "Christianization" of the worship practices can be perceived more in the ultimate finalities than in the means used. On the other hand, the funerary rites should be understood within the reality in which the borders between "sacred" and "profane"—the latter understood as the product of religious and cultural pluralism—were not only very transient, but also greatly changeable. The flexibility of these borders resulted in a copresence and coexistence of various sensibilities that were more or less close to reasons of a religious character, making it difficult to connect the context of the rites to a sole and uniform identity.

The entirety of the funerary rites can be articulated in two primary conceptual categories. One should not consider these rigidly separate, but tightly connected and complementary; the different aspects and the various nuances can reenter the complex system that constitutes the Christian approach to the world of death. The first category includes the series of beliefs, convictions, fears and symbols that become concrete in functional rituals for the deceased person's preparation for interment, and the participation of the family and the mourning community (the funerary toilette, the viewing of the dead person, the funerary procession and the interment). The second category relates to the underlying ideology understood in the commemoration of the deceased, which presupposed subsequent care and visits to the tomb on the days of their anniversaries, expressed primarily through liturgical celebrations and the repetition of the funerary banquet (see *dead, ceremonies for the; *refrigerium).

The study of the funerary rites is based on comparative analyses of various types of sources (written, *iconographic and *archaeological) that offer different points of view through which Christians expressed not only their idea of care for the deceased and their tombs, but also the need for socialization and communication. The practices that met the latter need emerged in a significant way esp. in the development of ritual practices tied to funerary meals.

One can analyze the funerary rites in a chronological framework of historical and broadly "homogeneous" time periods from the 3rd c., the period of the birth and spread of the first *cemeteries of the Christian community, to the 6th-7th c., a period that marks in certain respects a historical and cultural division. This chronological marker prefigured significant changes in the means of organization and the handling of the funerary areas, namely, in the way of conceiving the relationship between the space of the dead and the space of the living, and in relation to the various funerary cultures pertaining to the "barbarian" populations, which in the Early Middle Ages entered into contact with the "Roman" population.

After a phase marked by the coexistence of burials by interment and by cremation from the age of Hadrian until the 3rd c., interment became the only type of burial in the 4th c.—despite certain instances attested when it was delayed. With this gradual spread of the practice of burial by interment, the body of the deceased person became the new object of attention. The practices by which one prepared the body before its placement in the tomb were documented in the written sources, esp. of the 4th-5th c., and were connected to the deep conviction that the body preserved a level of materiality such as to be able to perceive the care offered by the living to the inanimate body.

Some specific treatments—some lasting longer than others—were developed for the preservation of the body; or they might be considered as ways of facing the fears connected to the phenomenon of the decomposition of the flesh. The Apocryphal Acts of Peter (4th c.), offers a description of a different procedure in which the body of the martyr was washed with milk and wine, lathered with a mixture of aromatic substances and spices prepared for the embalming, and finally placed in a *sarcophagus filled with honey (Passione di Pietro dello Ps. Lino: ed. Erbetta II, 177). *John Chrysostom condemned the excesses in the development of the funerary rites; in particular he noted that the use of clothing for the deceased and sprinkling them with aromas did not offer indefinite protection from decomposition of the body (Hom. in Joannem 85,5: PG 59, 465-468). *Augustine took a more tentative approach, emphasizing the uselessness of certain funerary customs, including the use of aromata (En. Ps. 33, D. 2,25).

The following church fathers mentioned the wrapping of the body in cloth garments or a shroud: *Prudentius (Cathemerinon X, 49-52: CCL 126, 55) and *Jerome, who specified the involvement of the clerici who specialized in the preparation of the cadaver (Ep. I, 12: CSEL 54, 7). In a hagiographical text from the 2nd half of the 5th c., the Vita Germani, Constantius of Laon mentions that the bishop of Auxerre, when proceeding to the interment of the unburied body, ordered that the deceased person's members be wrapped in vinculis linteis (Constantius Lugdunensis, Vita sancti Germani 10: SC 112, 138-142). An iconographic representation of this funerary custom comes from the cemeterial hypogeum of Commodilla, at *Rome on the Via Ostia, where an inscription on a marble slab portrays, in an elaborate way, a body wrapped in flax with a gravedigger nearby (ICUR II, 6446).

Some sources, such as the texts of *Lactantius, which refer to the defunctorum . . . vestibus pretiosis (Divinae institutiones II, 4: CSEL 19, 109), of Jerome (Vita s. Pauli primi eremitae 17: PL 23, 28-29) and of *Augustine (En. Ps. 48, D. 2,7), reaffirm condemnations of the extravagant display of riches at the time of death in the use of clothes and precious fabrics. Despite these invectives, interments with precious garments continue to be attested in the primary sources even during a later period, as in a text of *John Moschus (late 6th-early 7th c.) in which he recounts an attempt to violate the corpse precisely because of the deceased person's pretiosis vestibus (Pratum spirituale 78: PG 87/3, 2931-2936).

Archaeological remains of fabrics within the tombs were documented, e.g., in some catacombs in the city of Rome; in particular, in a funerary area identified with the cemetery of Novella—in the range of the cemeterial structure of Priscilla on the Via Salaria nova—a burial cell housed a deceased person who was completely wrapped in bandages shaped in the form of a cross. In some pavement tombs excavated in the early decades of the 20th c. at the ground level of the basilica dedicated to the *apostles (the structure of St. *Sebastian) on the Appian Way various entombed bodies were discovered wrapped in fabrics, in some cases in even more layers and enriched by golden threads (Styger, 21-22; Spera 2005, 16). Concerning the burial of women, which can be dated to the 6th-7th c., within a tomb that was part of the ecclesiastical structure of St. Peter, located at Canosa in Apulia, a pin was found that was used to hold to the woman's hair a veil made of brocade with soft golden filaments (Nuzzo 2003, 135). Other cemeterial areas document the custom of dressing the deceased person with everyday garments, archaeological traces of which remain esp. by what is left of their shoes; in the catacomb of Castelvecchio Subequo, near Aquila (4th-early 7th c.), in several tombs were found iron nails tied to the elements in leather and wood (Giuntella et al., 282-284). Several small iron studs, presumably for shoes with nailed soles, were discovered in a significant number of tombs of the cemetery basilica discovered in the vicinity of San Giusto, near Lucera in Apulia, and dated around the 6th c. (De Santis - Giuliani, 229).

Further work relating to the preparation of the body concerned the laying out of the corpse on the lectus funebris in the presence of the family. A valuable iconographic testimony of this remains in the funerary area underlying the cemeterial structure of St. Sebastian at Rome, in a wall fresco from the mausoleum of Claudius the Hermit, originally of a pagan order, visited from the mid-2nd to the early decades of the 3rd c.; the *paintings that adorn the funerary monument can be dated to AD 150–160 (Ferrua [2]1990, 72-73).

A series of rituals accompanied the deceased person on the journey toward the place of interment; Tertullian described a prayer scene near the deceased person morante adhuc sepultura, "while the burial itself was delayed," completed by a presbyter in the presence of onlookers (De anima 51,6: CCL 2, 857). In the final decades of the 4th c., *Gregory of Nyssa recounted the funeral of his sister *Macrina, in Cappadocia, at which the community gathered together during the funerary *vigil and spent the night singing *hymns and *psalms; the following morning, in the presence of the local bishop, the funerary court went toward the place of interment where, at last, a prayer was recited (De vita s. Macrinae 25-36: SC 178, 227-259). The funerary ceremonies for Augustine's mother, *Monica, which were held at Ostia, adds a detail not attested by other sources: the performance of a *eucharistic celebration before the interment. One must emphasize that from Augustine's description one can infer that in the area of the necropolis there existed areas set aside for the performance of such rituals (Augustine, Conf. 9,12,32). A rare archaeological witness to these spaces has been identified near the Jewish catacomb of the Villa Torlonia at Rome (Fasola 1976, 41).

The performance of the eucharistic celebration during the funeral was subjected to a series of restrictions and regulations in the canon of the African council of 393 in which the bishops prohibited such a celebration in the presence of a corpse as well as administration of the Eucharist to a dead body (Concilium Hipponense 4: CCL 149, 21), a significant prohibition confirmed in the diocesan Synod of Auxerre (Concilia Galliae 12: CCL 148A, 267). The analysis of a special sarcophagus, discovered near Brescia and datable between the 5th and 7th c., has recently led scholars to posit the existence of a funerary practice in open violation of the conciliar norms; the upper surface of the cover contains an opening, which is closed by a sort of limestone plug and furnished with the inscription crux Christi alere peccator(em). It seems that the text could refer to the practice of placing the eucharistic species within the tomb, in addition to, of course, other substances (Sannazaro). A diplomatic approach to this disputed question seems to have been offered in a statement made by *Gregory the Great, in which he recounted an anecdote attributed to St. Benedict who, to help a young monk whose soul was in eternal rest, granted his relatives permission to place a consecrated host on the chest of the deceased monk (Gregory the Great, Dialogues II, 24,1-2).

Even with respect to funerals, the fathers of the church were sure to emphasize the futility of certain external manifestations of sorrow and to condemn the extravagance in the performance of these rituals; only prayer and alms could help the deceased person in his or her journey toward salvation (John Chrysostom, In Iohannem hom. 62,5: PG 59, 348; Augustine, Serm. 172,2,2). At times the epitaph made explicit the friends and relatives' organization of the funeral with such expressions as facere funus (e.g., ICUR V, 15322, a. 387; VI, 17117, mid-4th c.).

The deceased's placement within the tomb involved two distinct documented practices esp. evident from the archaeological finds: systems of arrangement within the tomb; the placement of a funerary wardrobe. The use of materials and devices generally placed at the bottom of the tomb is to be attributed not only to the fears concerning the processes of the body's decomposition but also to the more functional aspects of burial tied to hygiene. Forms of arrangement of the surfaces on which buried bodies were laid out were documented in the cemeterial basilica of San Sebastiano at Rome, where numerous tombs showed the bottom covered by a layer of lime. In the cemeterial structure of Cornus, in *Sardinia, some of the burials dated to the mid-5th c. were placed on a bed of coals acc. to a well-known rite in the necropolis in Germanic culture; moreover, substances such as ash and coal allowed for the absorption of liquid organics. In various contexts, cemeteries attest the use of tombs that have the bottom covered with slabs with holes in them for drainage of cadaverous liquid; the function of this system was to accelerate the processes of decomposition. Examples of these artifacts, at times no longer discovered in situ, are attested, e.g., in the cemeterial basilica of San Sebastiano at Rome (Styger, 22; Spera 2005, 15-16) or, later (7th c.), in the tomb discovered near the sanctuary of S. Michele a Monte Sant'Angelo in Apulia (De Santis-Nuzzo, 145-146).

The arrangement of the interior of the tomb sometimes made provisions for funerary cushions on which the deceased could rest his or her head, which were often produced with materials that would last, but in some cases, as at San Sebastiano, with leaves, perhaps of a laurel tree (Styger, 22, 25; Spera 2005, 16); this latter practice is also attested during the mid-6th c. in a text of *Gregory of Tours (De gloria confessorum 84: PL 71, 892). The body was inserted into the tomb facing upward, a practice that became the most widespread in Late Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages, even though other ways to position the body are evident; the preference for this position seems to have responded to the demand for maintaining the deceased person's "gaze" toward heaven.

The act of interment included the actual placement of possessions within the tombs. By now, scholars have completely rejected the idea that one could distinguish pagan burials from Christian ones on the basis of the relative presence or absence of possessions in the tombs; the placement of possessions inside or outside the tomb was a generally widespread practice documented in Christian funerary contexts. Within the tomb, one can distinguish distinctly personal possessions, closely related to the life and adornment of the deceased, and also a set of ritual objects that express the deceased's underlying beliefs; this distinction of course does not exclude the presence, attested in various ways, of each type of possession in the same burial site. In the account of the trip to the Holy Land by the monk Antonino Piacentino, which can be dated to the years 560–570, the author described the baptismal rite at the end of which the faithful immersed themselves in the Jordan River for the blessing "dressed with a shroud and many other objects that they preserved for burial" (C. Milani, Itinerarium Antonini Piacentini. Un viaggio in terra santa del 560–570 d.C., Milan 1977, 242). The citation, which is rather problematic, can be interpreted both as a reference to containers used during the celebration of baptism and then chosen to be deposited with the deceased person, and, in a more general way, to their objects for personal use.

Personal possessions primarily consisted of handmade objects connected to clothing (e.g., belt buckles [see *fibula], hat pins and luxury hairpins), the person's adornment (e.g., rings, bracelets, earrings, necklaces and pendants) and daily furnishings (toiletries, toys, objects tied to activity carried out in the life of the deceased). The placement of personal possessions should perhaps be put in relation to the ancient legal understanding that considered some objects as tied to the owner even after his or her death, removing them from hereditary transmission. On the other hand, one should also consider the social function bound up with the personal possession, which, upon burial, would clearly identify the deceased's connection to a specific group.

The possessions used during funerary rites could refer to multiple symbolic and cultic meanings. The presence of plates, primarily ceramic and glass, within—often in proximity to the head of the deceased—and/or outside the tomb can be connected, in the first place, to the practice of funerary meals and their symbolism by which the ancients expressed their conviction—already proper to some pagan rites—of the survival after death of the material needs of the deceased, such as thirst and hunger, thus creating an indissoluble bond between the worlds of the living and of the dead. In some cases, the placement of containers occurred in association with the remains of a meal, to be interpreted as true and proper meal offerings even following the completion of the funerary banquet held directly on the tomb or in the immediate vicinity. At Muralto, in Lombardy, in a tomb from the 2nd half of the 4th c., probably belonging to a building of Christian worship, archaeologists recovered an urn placed below the buried body containing the bones of a swine (Sannazaro 1990, 53). The case of the Sardinian necropolis of Cornus is now well known, where, within a tomb that dates between the end of the 6th and the beginning of the 7th c., a pitcher was found in which chicken bones were kept (Giuntella 1999, 83).

In addition to possessions, the use of containers in miniature—that is of modest dimensions that imitated models on the larger scale of common use—seems to suggest the existence of a specialized and exclusive production specifically associated with the funerary rituals. This is the case, e.g., of some nail spikes found in the cemeterial structure of San Felice at Cimitile (Nola) that go back to the 6th-7th c. (Stasolla, 276-277). Widely attested, moreover, is the introduction of containers that were no longer functional and often in fragments. At times, the container was intentionally broken; there may have been a ritual breaking that could be interpreted, on the one hand, as a sort of purificatory ceremony through which one was "liberated" from objects considered impure inasmuch as they were connected to death, although on the other hand, it could represent a means for establishing a lasting bond with the dead, who in this way "participated" in the rite (De Francesco).

The presence of containers inside the tomb could also have other meanings; omitting the problematic mentioned above of a possible symbolic meaning connected to the rite of baptism celebrated during life, there may be—in the case of shapes such as the balsamari, attested increasingly in Late Antiquity—a relationship to the ritual of spreading fragrant substances near and inside the tomb. Spindle-shaped vials and glass cruets were found, e.g., in some tombs belonging to the cemeterial basilica furnished with an ambulatory found at Rome on the Via Ardeatina (Fiocchi Nicolai et al. 1995–1996, 192-194). Another possession with heavy ritual meanings was the coin, which, when the intention of its placement can be verified, indicates different meanings, acc. to its position with respect to the tomb and the buried body, and acc. to its value. The practice of placing a coin in the tomb—at times inserted into the mouth or the hand of the deceased person, or simply placed inside—is attested from the Classical Age and was based on the pagan belief that one had to pay an offering to Charon (i.e., the mythical ferryman of Hades) to cross the mythical River Styx. This rite continued to be documented in Christian funerary contexts from Late Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages and signified an offering of alms toward the afterlife and was still full of apotropaic meanings The recently emphasized magical-religious meanings (Perassi) have been suggested by the material the coins were made of and their shape; it was a protection for the tomb against evil spirits or possible brigands. The placement of a single coin between the hands of the deceased was found in some tombs from the early decades of the 4th c., belonging to the Late Antique cemetery identified in the courtyards of the Università Cattolica di Milano; an explicit presence of a Christian community has not been documented, however (Perassi, 109). A coin within a deceased's mouth was found in a tomb from the Necropolis of Cornus, which contained possessions datable to the 2nd half of the 6th c. (Giuntella 1999, 142).

The placement of coins in the tomb in boxes of a certain consistency, at times preserved in suitable containers—a use that began to be attested starting from the Late Antique period—may have multiple ritual meanings. On the one hand, the "viatic" value of this type of offering may have persisted. On the other hand, it could represent an ostentatious display of riches or make some connection to the life of the deceased person with a meaning, in certain instances, similar to that of the personal possessions discussed above. Some significant examples have been attested in Sicily: in three infant burial cells from the catacomb of the so-called Vigna Cassia at Syracuse, monetary collections consisting in one case of more than 100 coins (Garraffo); in the catacomb of San Senatore at Albano, 6th-c. tombs restored six distinct monetary collections, the most famous of which consisted of more than 200 coins (Fiocchi Nicolai et al. 1992, 91-97). The perforated coins, however, should be considered elements of personal possession, to which one could also assign a talismanic meaning reused as pendants and ornaments. The practice of placing money within the tomb must have been sufficiently widespread to lead *Theodoric, in a regulation written from the 1st decade of the 6th c., to order a limitation of the custom because these objects "were more useful for the living than for the dead" (Cassiodorus, Variae IV, 34: MGH AA XII, 129).

The interpretation of the presence of coins outside the tomb—a rite scarcely attested archaeologically—becomes problematic, given the difficulties of distinguishing the actual intention of the original ritual gesture. A typical case was recently represented again by the Necropolis of Cornus, where a significant number of burials have restored numismatic finds in the areas immediately outside the tombs (Giuntella 1999, 68-69). Scholars have discussed an "obol-offering" in relation to the unfolding of the rites of refrigerium, in which all the elements—the coin could be considered on the same level as dietary substances—function to create a connection to the otherworldly "reality."

A particular class of materials consisting of clay and glass lanterns merits specific discussion for the value of its multiple meanings in funerary contexts. In the first place, one should consider the functional aspect of these handmade objects used widely for illumination; one should note the discovery in the necropolis of Cimitile of a number of glass fragments outside the tombs that were interpreted as traces of glass lamps used as a signaculum (Pani Ermini et al. 1993, 305-306). On the other hand, the frequent placement of clay lamps within the tombs, esp. in the hypogeum cemeteries, but not exclusively, can be attributed to the desire for emphasizing the symbolic aspect of light that one hoped would accompany the deceased in his journey toward the otherworldly "reality." The universality of this ritual message is evidenced by the documented presence of lanterns as a funerary possession even in the tombs—even for cremations—belonging to a use that was not explicitly Christian as in the case of the aforementioned Late Antique necropolis of *Milan (Airoldi 117). The symbolic theme of light, therefore—although present in pagan, or rather "neutral," culture—is significantly added to the process of the Christianization of funerary rituals as an implicit reference to the eternal light and the spirit's survival, also suggested by the gospel parable of the ten virgins in which the soul presents itself before the Lord with a lit lamp (Mt 25:1-13). Clear demonstrations of this symbolism can be found when the handmade object placed near the tomb does not present traces of smoking or when only the figurative representation of a lantern appears, of which we have various examples in cemeterial hypogeal structures such as that of San Cristina at Bolsena, which, at the burial cell's point of closure, has a depiction of a lantern lit within a fake niche (Fiocchi Nicolai 1988, 160); in the Roman catacomb of Pamphilus, on the Via Salaria vetus, a lit lamp and an anchor are sketched on the mortar of a burial cell's closure (Josi 1926, 89). Further documentation is also offered by inscriptions on slabs (ICUR IV, 9913). The well-known prohibition contained in can. 34 of the Council of Elvira, Spain, 303–306, seems to take on an opposite meaning (Vives, Concilios, 7-8); it enjoins that one not light candles in the cemeteries during the day in order not to disturb the sanctorum spiritus—where the term sanctus is to be understood as a synonym for the fidelis—leaving one to understand the survival of beliefs based on a "negative" value of light. The double functional and symbolic aspect appears closely connected and complementary in the use of placing lanterns outside the tomb in even further examples; the case of the tomb belonging to a hypogeal of the cemeterial structure of Sts. Rufina and Secunda at the 9th mile of the Via Cornelia is exemplary. Upon the discovery of this tomb, it became evident that it was equipped with five lanterns placed on the cover and on a small facing table (Fiocchi Nicolai 1988, 63).

Lastly, one must ascribe a magical and apotropaic function to a series of objects, a function which was attested frequently even in the funerary possessions from Late Antiquity, and which were closely connected to the demand for protecting the tomb and the deceased person. The presence of handmade objects considered magical, both inside and outside the tomb, contributed to neutralizing the negative influences such as sicknesses or epidemics, and the larvae (ghosts) or insepulti (unburied), i.e., the spirits of the deceased who did not receive proper funerary honors, could have an influence on the living; Christian authors also faced these issues (Tertullian, De Anima 56: CCL 2, 863-865; Augustine, De cura pro mortuis gerenda 9-10). The numerous condemnations expressed by the ecclesiastical hierarchy on the making and use of amulets and on the participation in magical rites, were unable to undermine the widespread continuance of such beliefs.

Numerous objects were attributed a magical-apotropaic value in antiquity and are substantially exemplified in three distinct but complementary categories. To the first group belong the special objects that owe a magical force to characters intrinsically connected to specific symbols or alphabetic engravings as for example gems, plates and glass characters of Egyptian divinities, masks and heads of Gorgon. Second, an apotropaic force was attributed to handmade objects of daily use such as nails and bells, the latter were chosen because the sound they emitted performed the function of scattering the evil spirits, as indirectly attested by John Chrysostom (In epistula 1 ad Corinthios hom. 12,7: PG 61, 105-108). The third aspect pertains to the material with which the objects were produced; specific magical and healing effects were tied to certain types of rocks and metals (Nuzzo 2000).

Regarding the articles of the tomb, a particular phenomenon widely documented in cemeterial hypogeal contexts involving "grave articles" deserves consideration: the practice of affixing to the outside of tombs on the wet mortar with which the burial cells were sealed objects of various sorts (e.g., lanterns, glass or clay receptacles, objects of personal decoration, coins and toys) and organic and inorganic materials, even fragmentary (e.g., shells, pieces of marble and terra cotta, cakes shaped from glass and pieces of a *mosaic). The phenomenon, which has not yet been systematically or exhaustively analyzed, seems to be confined to certain sectors of some Roman catacombs characterized by an almost indiscriminate use of simple loculus tombs, and generally, but not exclusively, datable around the 2nd half of the 4th c. The interpretation of these types of articles, understood to be in some way "profitable" outside the tomb, goes beyond the simple "identification" of the grave, highlighting, in the interweaving of concepts of "furnishings and articles," a set of elements that interact with each other and overlap in the definition of the tomb's "identity." This interpretive approach has led to a diversified evaluation of how various elements functioned, highlighting all the various ritual meanings, which, however, rescue from anonymity overlapping tombs laid on undifferentiated pilae. The multiple layered meanings of the articles/furniture could refer to different interconnected aspects: a decorative meaning may apply primarily to the furniture of the tomb, a personal article of the deceased might have a symbolic-evocative value tied to specific rituals and, lastly, articles may have an apotropaic function for the tomb's protection (De Santis 1994; Felle - Del Moro - Nuzzo; De Santis 1998; De Santis 2000).

The commemoration of the deceased involved shared social aspects of the funerary rite that connote and accompany the life of the family gathered together at specific times: the 3rd, 7th or 9th, 30th or 40th day from death, the anniversary of the dies natalis (*birthday) corresponding to the day of death in substitution for the pagan natalitium, the day of one's birth. The repeated ritual practices for one's own relative appear in two primary expressive forms: rites belonging to a more properly liturgical sphere such as the recitation of prayer and celebration of the Mass and practices involving concrete gestures such as the offering of food to the deceased, the completion of funerary banquets or their virtual and symbolic evocation.

From an analysis of the written sources a canonized and institutionalized liturgical practice does not seem to emerge specifically for the commemoration of the deceased but rather suggestions of practices such as those proposed in the Constitutiones apostolicae (in 4th c.), which refers to the songs and prayers to be recited on the days of the anniversaries. They also indicate the behavior for the clergy who were invited to participate in the rites of the commemoration (Constitutiones apostolicae VIII, 42,1-3 and 44: SC 330, 260-261). The expression oblationes facere leads one to understand a relationship between the eucharistic celebration and the anniversary of the dead, found in the writings of Tertullian, who mentions annual celebrations (De Corona 3,3: CCL 2, 1042-1043). One of *Cyprian's letters seems to attest the association of the Mass and prayers for the "repose" of the deceased, which are to be performed, however, in church and not at the tomb (Ep. 1,2,1: CCL 3B, 3-4). Augustine explicitly spoke of supplicationes pro spiritibus mortuorum, which took the form of a single prayer (generali commemoratione) in the instances when there were no individual prayers by the relatives; he therefore seems to affirm the existence of two parallel manners of prayer: one communal promoted by the church, the other heavily tied to the ritual customs of the family (De cura pro mortuis gerenda 4,6). A particular reference to how the faithful expressed their desire for individual intercession can be found in the writings of John Chrysostom, who identifies alms for the needy as the best means to remember one's own relative in the prayers of all those who have benefited from them (In acta apostolorum hom. 21,4: PG 60, 170). Gregory the Great continued to reaffirm the exclusive usefulness of prayers and eucharistic celebrations for the dead, which, when repeated, even acquired an expiatory function for sinners (Dialogues 4,52-57).

In this regard, it is significant to note the text of three funerary inscriptions found in proconsular Africa, at Sufetula (Sbeitla), that can be dated between 540 and the beginning of the 7th c., that seem to contain a formulary taken from the liturgy of the deceased, which could relate to the celebrations of funerals or even those commemorative celebrations following the interment: D[omi]n[us] d[e] h[oc] s[ae]c[u]lo tran/sitorio ad sua reg/na convocare dig/natus est, {convo/care} ubi est sede/s sempiterna et requ/ies aeterna. Amen, "the Lord has deigned to call from this transitory world to his kingdoms, where there is an everlasting throne and eternal rest" (Duval 1988, 302-303).

The pagan ritual that provided for the consumption of meals near the tombs of relatives and the offering of foods and drinks was based on the concept of the soul's survival within the tomb or in its immediate vicinity, with the specific needs of the earthly dimension. The church found itself having to face the reality of these rooted customs and to oppose the abuses by promoting processes of Christianization.

The first testimonies of Christian authors' approaches to the consumption of funerary meals are from the African context. The implicit expression of a perplexity regarding the banquets is contained in a passage from Tertullian, who emphasized, in the rejection of any form of idolatry, what Christians must not do (De Spectaculis 12,3-4: CCL 1, 238). Cyprian spoke explicitly of turpia et lutulenta convivia, with respect to a complex event, on which he found himself having to render a judgment regarding the behavior of two Spanish bishops (Ep. 67,6: CCL 3C, 456-457).

Starting from the 2nd half of the 4th c., the literary sources progressively broadened and became enriched; the bishops of Verona and Brescia, when speaking to the *neophytes, likened the funerary meals and the parentalia to the idolatrous and superstitious practices of the pagans from which Christians must refrain (*Zeno, Tractatus 1,3: PL 11, 296; *Gaudentius, Sermo 4: PL 20, 870). Between the 4th and the 5th c., when the celebration of banquets became a widespread practice even during the anniversaries of the martyrs, the debate that moved the ecclesiastical hierarchy seems to have been conditioned by the demand to avoid cultic practices and to anchor the devotional forms for liturgies and communal gestures. From Augustine's Confessions, one can conclude that at Milan Bishop Ambrose, before 385, had prohibited the funerary banquets ad memorias sanctorum (Conf. 6,2; for Ambrose's direct testimony on the subject, see De Elia et ieiunio admonitio 17,62: PL 14, 719). Shortly after, two African councils, from 307 and 401, reaffirmed this prohibition, first applied only to ecclesiastical officials, then extended to all (Registri Ecclesiae Carthaginensis Excerpta 3,53 and 6,60: CCL 149, 190.196-197). Even at Rome, the primary sources denounce episodes of quotidiana vinolentia at the basilica of St. Peter in the Vatican (Augustine, Ep. 29,10). From another point of view, *Paulinus of Nola describes the banquet offered in 397 by his friend *Pammachius, whose charitable intention he praised, in memory of his wife in the basilica of St. Peter, at which a large number of pauperes participated (Ep. 13,11: CSEL 29, 92-93).

Returning many times to the topic, Augustine expressed a twofold position between a clear condemnation of all forms of degeneration and abuse in the rituals, on the one hand, and on the other, a highlighting of the ways that Christians could enhance the lives of the living in their worship while respecting their own religious principles (Ep. 22,1,6 and 29,9; Serm. 172,2; 361,6,). In fraternal and charitable sharing, Augustine found the religious dimension for "converting" the ancient practices of the banquets into agape feasts (Contra Faustum 20,20). This perspective has certainly significantly contributed to catalyzing those processes of Christianization that led to, e.g., transforming the Caristia (22 February), by which the parentalia were brought to a conclusion, on the feast of the cathedra Petri already attested in the Depositio martyrum* (R. Valentini - G. Zucchetti, Codice topografico della città di Roma, II, Rome 1942, 18). In the 6th c., the festival of the cathedra Petri was still deeply popular among the faithful, who celebrated it by bringing dietary offerings to the deceased, as attested, in a critical way, by some conciliar and literary sources (Council of Tours, can. 22 a. 567: Mansi, 9, 803; a work of doubtful attribution, Sermo in Cathedra s. Petri: PL 39, 2101).

The coexistence of a perception and a "material" and "spiritual" use of these rituals appears clearly in the rich funerary epigraphic documentation in which the terms refrigerium and refrigerare, which were already used in pagan inscriptions, allude both to the practical development of the rites and the eschatological dimension that connected the physical restoration to the desire for spiritual refreshment. A further sign of the attention to the rites of commemoration appears in the proliferation of the mention of the dies mortis on the epitaphs, which was typical in Late Antiquity. The presence of a date expressed the need to formalize the periodic celebration on the tomb (Carletti 2004, 37-41). The sharing of food near the tombs, therefore, concretely assured the "survival" of the deceased person by preserving and perpetuating their memory as it took on a heavy meaning of familial and social cohesion. The double meaning, concrete and metaphorical, seems to be well represented in the famous mosaic epigraph discovered in the African necropolis of Tipasa, where the text (In Chr[isto] Deo / pax et concordia sit / convivio nostro) and the support, a table with the depiction of seafood and fish, agree in expressing the christological and communal dimension of the rite. The same multiple meaning is found in the representations of banquet scenes that give a figurative interpretation, full of symbolic values. From the Roman catacombs come the most numerous testimonies; the case of the so-called region of the Agape is representative: in the cemetery of Sts. Marcellinus and Peter on the Via Labicana (4th c.), the figurative message, united to the didactic message of the inscriptions (ICUR VI, 15942-15949), expresses strong fidelity to the traditions of conviviality as instruments for affirming victory over death, which was by then inserted into a scheme of social relations and daily life (Mazzei). Likewise at Rome other significant testimonies emerged in which the written and figurative message united into a single epigraphic product, as occurred, for instance, in the engraved slab of Criste: a male figure, presumably the father of the deceased person and the dedicator of the inscription, is represented in the act of drinking (ICUR III, 6618). In other inscriptions, the deceased person is the sole protagonist of the ritual, which makes him a participant of the "heavenly joy," as in the epitaph of Auguriana, who was portrayed as praying with cups in hand (ICUR VI, 15867), and in that of the Eutropos, a sculptor of sarcophagi, who is represented in the act of raising the cup in order "to refresh himself" (ICUR VI, 17225).

The rich and variegated archaeological documentation that attests to the practice of refrigerium can be divided, on the basis of the intrinsic characteristics and purposes, into two primary categories, which more often than not coexist in the milieu of the necropolis itself. One includes the devices and handmade objects closely connected to the tomb of the single individual, or limited groups, that functioned for the material development of the banquet or for offerings of food—a banquet seen, however, in a substantially "private" form (liquid channels, tables, chairs and structures for the offerings). The second involves the monumental evidence of spaces adapted and set aside for the communal and collective consumption of ritual meals.

Some devices, which were very widespread even in funerary contexts of the classical age, functioned to connect the burial with the external and allowed the reception of food offerings or perfumes from the living; the ritual made the moment of sharing and participation between the living and the dead concrete. We see this type of ritual in Paulinus of Nola's description of the insertion of perfumes contained in vascula within the tomb of the Martyr *Felix, by means of foramina (Poemata 21, vv. 590-615: CSEL 30, 177-178) and perhaps even the well-known verse by Prudentius et frigida saxa / liquido spargemur odore (and cool stones / we are sprinkled with a serene fragrance), with which he concludes the hymn for the funeral ceremony of the deceased person (Cathemerinon X, 169-172: CCL 126, 59). One of the cases attested to in the Basilica Apostolorum on the Via Appia in Rome is significant; a polysomatic monumental sarcophagus from the mid-4th c., found inside a mausoleum joined to the circular basilica, was furnished with a long bronze tube attached on the cover in a way that from the floor of the funerary milieu one could directly place the offerings of those who had been buried (Ferrua 1951, 23-24). Slab coverings for the tombs designed for libations, in some cases connected to clay or metallic tubes, or rather protected by gullies, are attested not only at Rome but also in numerous cemeterial contexts from Late Antiquity—open galleries and hypogea, distributed in all of the area of the Mediterranean, esp. the W part: in Sicily (catacomb of S. Giovanni at Syracuse), in Sardinia (necropolis of Cornus), in the Iberian Peninsula (necropolis of S. *Fructuosus at *Tarragona), in N Africa (cemeterial basilica of *Tebessa and *Timgad), in the area of *Dalmatia (the cemetery of Manastirine near *Salona). At times, the slabs had a written message; a Sardinian inscription provides but one example: the slab is inscribed with a text on the outside of the tomb in which the author wishes refrigerium for the deceased person (Giuntella - Borghetti - Stiaffini, 44-45).

We see a greater and even wider proliferation of the structures placed outside the tombs on which libation offerings were placed or on which funerary meals were consumed. In some cases, devices are included or overhang the structure of the tomb; in other cases, they are placed in spaces adjacent to the tombs, and display various forms and typologies: circular, semicircular and rectangular tables, a sigma, at times decorated with mosaics, epigraphs; tables decorated with reliefs alluding to the meal, furnished with cavities for the offerings. Often, in the immediate vicinities of these structures are specific systems for the storing and drainage of water, an element, for practical and symbolic reasons, necessary for the performance of the rite of refrigerium. Other discoveries, organic and inorganic, are connected to the consumption of foods. Various examples have been documented from African (esp. at Tipasa), Spanish, Sardinian, Sicilian, Dalmatian and NE Italian necropolises (Giuntella - Borghetti - Stiaffini; Duval 1985). In the ground-level necropolis of Agrigento (Sicily, 3rd-5th c.) a table with a niche for offerings was found arranged in such a way as to form a unitary level belonging to three distinct floor tombs, perhaps attributable to a single familial group (Bonacasa Carra, 398). The tables equipped with a figurative apparatus are primarily from African areas, such as the aforementioned mosaic from Tipasa or that of Timgad, upon which were carved relief images of various types of dishes such as bread and fish. The well-known inscription of Aelia Secundula from 299 from Satafis in Mauretania (ILCV 1570), also African, lacks specifically Christian elements and describes the preparation of the rite of the gathered relatives: "we have thought to prepare a table of stone, around which to recall his numerous virtuous works, while foods and chalices and coverings for setting the table are prepared and offered" (lines 4-6; trans. in Carletti 2004, 40).

Within the hypogea necropolises, one must suppose that the actual performance of banquets was conditioned by the restricted space and the lack of lighting and, in certain cases, by the difficult accessibility of a given tomb, often made almost impossible by the continual deepening of the galleries; forms and structures were therefore ritual forms and structures for the celebration of an "abbreviated" rite or even only to begin a virtual and symbolic tie to the deceased. The Roman catacombs, from the 4th c. onward, esp. among the areas of those who were privileged, rather frequently have tables made with cylindrical and quadrangular supports made from bricks or composed of columns and slabs, in marble or ceramic, upon which were placed the offerings of the meal by some of the family members, although one cannot exclude the possibility that they could have been used as a support for lanterns. In one region from the 2nd half of the 4th c., from the catacomb of the Giordani on the Via Salaria nova, this type of table was placed primarily within burial cells, which were therefore functional for the cultic and memorial visitation of more tombs (Chalkia). Similar, but designed for a more humble use, are the smaller shelves made from fragments of marble or brick, affixed on the mortar of the closing point of the burial cells, but their primary function was to support lamps, which in some cases were found in situ. Nevertheless, one can also suppose them to be used as shelves for objects and containers connected to the rites suggestive of the funerary meals.

Another series of handmade objects relate to a symbolic meaning of the rite of refrigerium: the seats, the so-called cathedra, a particular concentration of which one observes in a region from the 2nd half of the 4th c. of the hypogeal cemetery on the Via Nomentana in Rome. These structures, characterized by their small dimensions, have been extracted from tuff and placed within the burial cells; these have been interpreted as the symbol of the sharing of the funerary meal with the deceased person for whom they reserved a suitable place (Fasola 1961).

As mentioned above, other archaeological and monumental evidence documents a flourishing of the ritual structures of the ever-increasing groups and, in certain cases, the existence of spaces designed for collective ceremonies. These include rooms, underground and ground level, enclosed spaces, and buildings that provide for benches, seats, tables and devices suited for storing water. Underground areas fitted in this way are attested already starting from the 3rd c., in the Roman catacomb structures, where one observes a substantial separation between places delegated for banquets and for tombs and a special attention given to decorative aspects (pictorial coverings, in marble and mosaic). In the cemetery of Priscilla, at the beginning of the 3rd c., a room belonging to the so-called hypogeum of the Acilii, which originally performed the function of a cistern, was transformed by placing stone benches close to the walls (Tolotti, 154-161). A sepulchral chamber from the cemetery of *Praetextatus probably already in the construction phase (2nd half of the 3rd c.) took measures to leave space for the presence of a bench on three sides of the room; in the 4th c., a limited group of tombs were housed in the sepulchral chamber, which continued, however, to preserve its original ritual purpose with the presence of a counter, reorganized and enlarged, and with the positioning of a table immediately outside, lined up with the entry (Spera 2004, 70, 183-186). In Africa, the familial hypogeum of the so-called Adam and Eve at Gargaresc (Tripolitania) contains a room designed for funerary banquets inasmuch as it lacks tombs and is furnished with a stibadion and a table extracted from a piece of a column; paintings decorate the room, which are datable to the 2nd half of the 4th c., with a representation of torchbearers and an amphora to be interpreted as the material protagonists of the rite (Di Vita).

A conceptual and monumental turn in the organization and in the ways of participating in the rites of the commemoration is certainly represented by the construction of cemeterial basilicas in funerary areas; starting from the Constantinian age, in close connection to the progressive development of the cult of the martyrs, places previously designated for a familial type of visiting were transformed into spaces predisposed to the collective burial and communal celebrations where the funerary rites offered for the single individual were "strengthened" by those celebrated for the martyrs, combining the social and religious aspects.

In this regard, the example of Rome is extremely significant, where the monumental funerary basilicas commissioned by Constantine characterize the suburban landscape of the city by creating rival centers of attraction to the traditional urban ones. In these "covered cemeteries" the commemorative rituals could be carried out both inside and outside as well as in the adjacent structures. The aforementioned testimony of Paulinus of Nola is typical with reference to the basilica of St. Peter, from which one concludes that the church members used the atrium and the stairway access for the celebration of the banquets (see above).

Even in the N African necropolises, one witnesses the transformation of the spaces and the shape of their borders laid out in relation to the ritual demands; e.g., there is frequent documentation of the placement of tables not only near the individual tombs but also within the enclosed spaces or sheltered by a portico for receiving the participants of the banquet for a communal ceremony. A portion of the funerary area of Tipasa, which became more important by the presence of the basilica dedicated to Bishop Alexander, was enclosed and intended to receive a series of benches along the wall and tables protected by a portico-type structure; a well is located near the stairs leading to the yard. In the necropolis of Matarès, likewise at Tipasa, are attestations to communal tables of large dimensions and set apart, suited for the consumption of various meals at the same time; moreover, sophisticated systems of water drainage permitted the flow of water directly on the supports for the banquets (Février 1970).

In conclusion, it is possible to apply to the funerary rites an interpretive category used for the epigraphic documentation commissioned by Christians, namely, the concepts of symbiosis and metabolism, which are well adapted for examining the phenomenon of a complex reality in which a specifically Christian identity emerged in the context of Late Antique culture following a gradual process based on negotiation and compromise (see *epigraphy, Christian).

A. Ferrua, Il refrigerio dentro la tomba. I-II: La Civiltà Cattolica 92/2 (1941) 373-378, 457-463 (= Scritti vari di epigrafia e antichità cristiane, Bari 1991, 69-81); R. Krautheimer, Mensa-coemeterium-martyrium: Cahiers Archéologiques 11 (1960) 15-40; P.A. Février, À propos du repas funéraire: culte et sociabilité: Cahiers Archéologiques 26 (1977) 29-45; Id., Le culte des morts dans les communautés chrétiennes durant le III^e siècle, in Atti IX Congr. Int. di Archeologia Cristiana (Rome 1975), Vatican City 1978, 211-274; E. Jastrzebowska, Les scènes des banquets dans les peintures et les sculptures chrétiennes des 3^e et 4^e siècles: RecAug 14 (1979) 3-90; V. Saxer, Morts, martyrs, reliques en Afrique chrétienne aux premiers siècles, Paris 1980; E. Jastrzebowska, Untersuchungen zum christlichen Totenmahl aufgrund der Monumente des 3. und 4. Jahrhunderts unter der Basilika des Hl. Sebastien in Rom, in Europäische Hochschulschriften Archäologie XXXVIII, Frankfurt 1981; C. D'Angela, L'obolo a Caronte. Usi funerari medievali tra paganesimo e cristianesimo: Quaderni Medievali 15 (1983) 82-91; P.A. Février, La tombe chrétienne et l'au-delà, in Le temps chrétiens de la fin de l'antiquité au moyen-âge. III^e-XIII^e siècles, Colloques internationaux du CNRS (Paris 1981), Paris 1984, 163-183; A.M. Giuntella - G. Borghetti - D. Stiaffini, Mensae e riti funerari in Sardegna. La testimonianza di Cornus, Mediterraneo tardoantico e medievale. Scavi e ricerche. 1, Martina Franca 1985; N. Duval, Piscinae et mensae funéraires. De Salone à Aquilée, in Aquileia, la Dalmazia e l'Illirico, Antichità Altoadriatiche 26, Udine 1985, 437-462; P.A. Février, La mort chrétienne, in Segni e riti nella chiesa altomedievale occidentale, XXXIII settimana CISAM (Spoleto 1985), Spoleto 1987, 881-942; U.M. Fasola - V. Fiocchi Nicolai, Le necropoli durante la formazione della città cristiana, in Atti XI Congr. Int. di Archeologia Cristiana (Lyons, Vienne, Grenoble, Genève et Aoste 1986), Vatican City 1989, 1153-1205; R. Teja, Prácticas de la oferta votiva del paganesimo al cristianesimo. La prohibición del refrigerium en Milán y Roma: Scienze dell'Antichità. Storia, archeologia, antropologia 3-4 (1989–1990) 234-239; A.M. Giuntella, Sepoltura e rito. Consuetudini e innovazioni, in Le sepolture in Sardegna dal IV al VII secolo, L'Archeologia romana e altomedievale nell'Oristanese, Atti IV Convegno (Cuglieri 1987), Oristano 1990, 215-229; C. Amante Simoni, Sepoltura e monete. Obolo viatico – obolo offerta, in ibid., 231-242; D. Stiaffini, La suppellettile vitrea nelle aree cimiteriali in Sardegna. IV-VII secolo, in ibid., 243-256; J.Ch. Picard, Cristianizzazione e pratiche funerarie. Tarda antichità e alto medioevo (IV-VIII sec.), Turin 1992; A.M. Giuntella, L'uso degli spazi. Sepolture e riti funerari, in G. Cantino Wataghin (ed.), La "civitas christiana." Urbanistica delle città italiane fra antichità e altomedioevo. Aspetti di archeologia urbana, I Seminario di studio, Turin 1992, 127-137; C. Amante Simoni, Moneta e riti funerari nei secoli VI e VII, in ibid., 138-140; P. De Santis, Elementi di corredo nei sepolcri delle catacombe romane. L'esempio delle regioni di Leone e della galleria Bb nella catacomba di Commodilla: VetChr 31 (1994) 23-51; A.E. Felle - M.P. Del Moro - D. Nuzzo, Elementi di "corredo-arredo" delle tombe del cimitero di S. Ippolito sulla via Tiburtina: RivAC 70 (1994) 89-158; C. D'Angela, Contesti tombali tardoantichi e altomedievali, in R. Cantilena (ed.), Caronte. Un obolo per l'aldilà: La Parola del passato 50 (1995) 319-326; P. De Santis, La teoria dei "segni mnemonici" negli scritti di Giovanni Battista de Rossi, in Atti XIII Congr. Int. di Archeologia Cristiana (Split-Porec 1994), Vatican City-Split 1998, 339-350; L. Chioffi, Mummificazione e imbalsamazione a Roma ed in altri luoghi del mondo romano: Opuscula Epigraphica 8 (1998); A.M. Giuntella, Note su alcuni aspetti della ritualità funeraria nell'altomedioevo. Consuetudini e innovazioni, in G.P. Brogiolo - G. Cantino Wataghin (eds.), Sepolture tra IV e VIII secolo (VII Seminario sul Tardo Antico e l'Alto Medioevo in Italia centro-settentrionale Gardone Riviera 1996), Mantova 1998, 61-75; P. De Santis, Glass Vessels as Grave Goods and Grave Ornaments in the Catacombs of Rome. Some Examples, in J. Pearce - M. Millett - M. Struck (eds.), Burial, Society and Context in the Roman World, Papers from . . . symposium Univ. Durham, 18-20 April 1997, Oxford 2000, 238-243; R. Martorelli, Clothing in Burial Practice in Italy in the Early Christian Period, in ibid., 244-248; D. Nuzzo, Amulet and Grave in Late Antiquity. Some Examples from Roman Cemeteries, in ibid., 249-255; B. Mazzei, Banchetto, in F. Bisconti (ed.), Temi di iconografia paleocristiana, Vatican City 2000, 134-136; M. Marinone, I riti funerari, in L. Pani Ermini (ed.), Christiana Loca. Lo spazio cristiano nella Roma del primo millennio, Catalogo della mostra, Rome 2000, 71-80; U. Volp, Tod und Ritual in den christlichen Gemeinden der Antike, Leiden-Boston 2002; D. De Francesco, Materiali vitrei nei corredi delle tombe del cimitero di s. Ilario "ad bivium" presso Valmontone. A proposito della cosiddetta "frammentazione rituale," in E. Russo (ed.), 1983–1993. Dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia, Atti VII Congr. Naz. di Archeologia Cristiana (Cassino 1993), Cassino 2003, 555-565; E. Rebillard, Religion et sépulture. L'église, les vivants et les morts dans l'Antiquité tardive, Paris 2003; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, Elementi di trasformazione dello spazio funerario tra tarda antichità ed altomedioevo, in Uomo e spazio nell'alto medioevo, L settimana CISAM (Spoleto 2002), Spoleto 2003, 921-969; C. Carletti, Dies mortis-depositio. Un modulo "profano" nell'epigrafia tardoantica: VetChr 41 (2004) 21-48; L. Spera, Riti funerari e "culto dei morti" nella tarda antichità. Un quadro archeologico dai cimiteri paleocristiani di Roma: Augustinianum 45 (2005) 5-34.

Archaeological-monumental contexts for reference: P. Styger, Il monumento apostolico della via Appia: Dissertazioni Pontificia Accademia Romana di Archeologia 13 (1918) 3-115; E. Josi, Il cimitero di Panfilo II: RivAC 3 (1926) 51-211; A. Ferrua, Tre sarcofaghi importanti da S. Sebastiano: RivAC 27 (1951) 7-33; U.M. Fasola, La regione delle cattedre nel cimitero Maggiore: RivAC 37 (1961) 237-267; P.A. Février, Le culte des martyres en Afrique et ses plus anciens monuments: Corsi di cultura ravennate e bizantina 17, Ravenna 1970, 191-215; F. Tolotti, Il cimitero di Priscilla, Rome 1970; U.M. Fasola, Le due catacombe ebraiche di Villa Torlonia: RivAC 52 (1976) 7-62; A. Di Vita, L'ipogeo di Adamo ed Eva a Gargaresc, in Atti del IX Congr. Int. di Archeologia Cristiana (Rome 1975), Vatican City 1978, 199-256; S. Garraffo, Su alcuni rinvenimenti monetari nell'area cimiteriale dell'ex Vigna Cassia a Siracusa: RivAC 57 (1981) 283-324; E. Chalkia, Le mense del "coemeterium Iordanorum": RivAC 62 (1986) 169-197; N. Duval, L'épigraphie funéraire chrétienne d'Afrique. Traditions et ruptures, constantes et diversités, in A. Donati (ed.), La terza età dell'epigrafia, Faenza 1988, 302-303; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, I cimiteri paleocristiani del Lazio. I. Etruria meridionale, Rome 1988; R.M. Bonacasa Carra, La necropoli paleocristiana di Agrigento. Aspetti e problemi, in Le sepolture in Sardegna dal IV al VII secolo, L'Archeologia romana e altomedievale nell'Oristanese, Atti IV Convegno (Cuglieri 1987), Oristano 1990, 391-412; M. Sannazaro, La cristianizzazione delle aree rurali della Lombardia (IV-VI secolo). Testimonianze scritte e materiali, Milan 1990; A. Ferrua, La basilica e la catacomba di s. Sebastiano, Vatican City [2]1990; E. Chalkia, Le mense paleocristiane. Tipologia e funzioni delle mense seconda- rie nel culto paleocristiano, Vatican City 1991; A.M. Giuntella et al., Recenti indagini nella catacomba di Castelvecchio Subequo (AQ): RivAC 67 (1991) 249-321; V. Fiocchi Nicolai et al., Scavi nella catacomba di s. Senatore ad Albano Laziale: RivAC 68 (1992) 7-140; L. Pani Ermini et al., Recenti indagini nel complesso martiriale di S. Felice a Cimitile: RivAC 69 (1993) 223-313; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, La nuova basilica circiforme della via Ardeatina, con appendice di M.P. Del Moro - D. Nuzzo - L. Spera: Rendiconti della Pontificia Accademia Romana di Archeologia 68 (1995–1996) 69-233; P. De Santis - R. Giuliani, I corredi funerari, in G. Volpe (ed.), San Giusto I. La "villa," le "ecclesiae." Primi risultati dagli scavi nel sito rurale di San Giusto (Lucera): 1995–97, Bari 1998, 221-232; A.M. Giuntella, Le sepolture, in Cornus I,1. L'area cimiteriale orientale, Oristano 1999, 81-89; P. De Santis - D. Nuzzo, Sepolture ad limina nel santuario di San Michele a Monte Sant'Angelo. Ultime indagini (1999): VetChr 38 (2001) 131-156; C. Perassi, Le monete della necropoli. Osservazioni sul rituale funerario, in M. Sannazaro (ed.), Ricerche archeologiche nei cortili dell'Università cattolica. La necropoli tardoantica, Atti delle giornate di studio (Milan 1999), Milan 2001, 101-111; F. Airoldi, Le incinerazioni in età tardoromana. Caratteristiche e diffusione del fenomeno, in ibid., 115-124; A. Samellas, Death in the Eastern Mediterranean (50–600). The Christianization of the East: An Interpretation, Tübingen 2002; D. Nuzzo, Realizzazione del vano di passaggio e suo uso funerario, in G. Volpe et al., Il complesso episcopale paleocristiano di san Pietro a Canosa. Seconda relazione preliminare (campagna di scavi 2002): Archeologia Medievale 30 (2003) 132-135; F.R. Stasolla, Riti e corredi funerari a Cimitile, in H. Brandenburg - L. Pani Ermini (eds.), Cimitile e Paolino di Nola, la tomba di s. Felice e il centro di pellegrinaggio. Trent'anni di ricerche, Atti della giornata tematica dei Seminari di Archeologia Cristiana (Rome 2000), Vatican City 2003, 275-279; L. Spera, Il complesso di Pretestato sulla Via Appia. Storia topografica e monumentale di un insediamento funerario paleocristiano nel suburbio di Roma, Vatican City 2004; N. Maes, Caring for Body and Soul in the Early Christian Mediterranean. Eastern and Western Perspeptives: Byzantion 76 (2006) 571-579; M. Sannazaro, La cristianizzazione delle pratiche funerarie: il caso di Padenghe sul Garda (BS), in La cristianizzazione in Italia tra tardoantico ed altomedioevo. Aspetti e problemi, Atti IX Congr. Naz. di Archeologia Cristiana (Agrigento 2004), Palermo 2007, 671-690.

P. De Santis

G

GABRIEL (iconography). In *Scripture Gabriel appears as the messenger par excellence, who announces to Zechariah the birth of *John the Baptist (Lk 1:19) and to *Mary that of Jesus (Lk 1:26-28). The attributes and *gestures attributed to the archangel Gabriel in *iconography refer directly to his principal function as an envoy: he is always shown in the gesture of speech and, at least starting from the 5th c., beyond being winged, he carries the baculus of the messenger, more rarely a lit lantern, a mirror on which are written the orders of *God, or a phylactery with the words Ave Maria gratia plena. The most ancient figurative testimony of the archangel Gabriel appears in the course of the 4th c. in a fresco of the cemetery of SS. Peter and Marcellinus in Rome (Wilpert, Ein Cyclus, pls. I-IV = J.G. Deckers - G. Mietke - A. Weiland, Die Katakombe "Commodilla." Repertorium der Malerein, no. 17; cf. B. Mazzei, Il cubicolo dell'Annunciazione nelle catacombe di Priscilla. Nuove osservazioni alla luce dei recenti restauri: RivAC 75 [1999] 258-262). Here Gabriel, as yet without his specific individual attributes (wings, baculus), is represented in the act of the adlocutio while he announces to Mary the birth of the Christ. The image of Gabriel becomes completely defined in its essential iconographic terms starting from the end of the 4th through the 5th c. This can be confirmed in the Pignatta *sarcophagus of *Ravenna, in which Gabriel is in the act of addressing Mary, shown seated and with a spindle in her right hand, and in the *mosaics of the triumphal arch of S. Maria Maggiore in Rome. The valuable depiction of the Annunciation found on the ivory chair of Maximian in the Museo Arcivescovile of Ravenna (Volbach n. 140, pls. 72-74) belongs to the 6th c. Here, underlining his function as divine messenger, Gabriel is represented with a cross-shaped baculus.

Together with *Michael, Gabriel shares the role of guardian of the church and in this function is represented in the presbyterial mosaic of St. Vitale in Ravenna (5th c.) and in the apsidal one of the Panaghia Angeloktistos in *Cyprus (7th c.).

DACL 6, 10-29; LCI 2, 74-77; EC 5, 1833-1834; BS 5, 1326-1336; G. Wilpert, Ein Cyclus christologischer Gemälde aus der Katakombe der hl. Petrus und Marcellinus, Freiburg i.B. 1891; C. Lamy-Lassalle, Les archanges en costume impérial dans la peinture murale italienne: Synthronon, Paris 1968, 189-198; P. Testini, Su una discussa figurazione del sarcofago detto del profeta Eliseo o Pignatta: FR 113/114 (1977) esp. 334ff.; R. Giuliani, s.v. Angelo: TIP 109.

C. Carletti

GABRIEL QATRAYA (7th c.). The literary sources mention five Syro-Eastern authors by the name Gabriel Qatraya, who could also be a single person who lived in the 1st half of the 7th c. The absence of precise information is reflected in the sources themselves, some of which attempt to identify him. Thus there existed a Gabriel, celebrated exegete of the school of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon and teacher of the catholicos Henanisho (d. 699/700). According to the historian Abdisho bar Berika (d. 1318), a Gabriel Qatraya wrote a christological sermon, Mēmrā on the Union, and a Solution to Questions Concerning the Faith, while *Babai the Great (d. ca. 627/628), again acc. to Abdisho, wrote a treatise, Book of the Causes, about or against some authors among whom one was Gabriel Qatraya. There are, furthermore, two other authors named Gabriel Qatraya of whom we know a little more: one was the author of a commentary on *liturgy in five books, datable to the 1st half of the 7th c., while the other was an exegete cited by two anonymous comments on the OT (8th-10th c.), by Isho'dad of Merv in his commentaries on the OT and NT (ca. 850) and by the lexicographer Bar-Barhūl (10th c.). In an anonymous Vita of Isaac of Nineveh, this last Gabriel Qatraya is considered a relative of Isaac, while the Gannat bussāmē (13th c.) identifies him with Gabriel Aryā ("the lion"), also a relative of Isaac.

DHGE 19, 563-4; BO III/1, 172-173; Baumstark, 200-201; T. Jansma, Investigations into the Early Syrian Fathers on Genesis, in Studies on the Book of Genesis, B. Gemser - J. Hoftijzer - A.R.

Hulst et al. (eds.), Leiden 1958, 69-181; S.H. Jammo, Gabriel Qaṭraya et son commentaire sur la liturgie chaldéenne: OCP 32 (1966) 39-52; Id., L'office du soir chaldéen au temps de Gabriel Qaṭraya: OS 12 (1967) 187-210; L. Van Rompay, A Hitherto Unknown Nestorian Commentary on Genesis and Exodus I–IX,32 in the Syriac Manuscript (olim) Dijarbekr 22: OLP 5 (1974) 73-78; Id., Le Commentaire sur Genèse–Exode 9,32 du manuscrit (olim) Diyarbaker 22. I-II (CSCO 483-484; Syr 205-206), Louvain 1986, in part. II, xxvii-xxxii.

K. den Biesen

GAIANUS (6th c.). A follower of the *monophysitism of *Julian of Halicarnassus (see *aphthartodocetism) opposed by *Severus of Antioch. At the death of the monophysite *Timothy IV of Alexandria in 535, one part of the people elected *Theodosius, follower of Severus, and another Gaianus, follower of Julian. Gaianus occupied the Alexandrian see for a brief period; the intervention of *Narses reestablished Theodosius. Gaianus was exiled first to *Carthage and then to *Sardinia, where he died. Nevertheless the aphthartodocetist monophysite sect continued, and his followers were also called Gaianites (from Gaianus) and Julianists (from Julian of Halicarnassus).

Liberato, Breviarium, 19-20: PL 68, 1032-1038; DTC 6, 998-1023; F. Diekamp, Zum Aphthartodoketenstreit: ThRev 25 (1927) 89-93; A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition, II/4, London 1996, 45-54; E. Wipszycka, L'épitaphe du Duhela SB III 6249. Moins gaïnites dans de monastères alexandrins: JJP 28 (1998) 55-66.

A. Di Berardino

GAIUS (and the Alogi) (2nd c.). A Christian writer of the end of the 2nd c. The only direct sources on Gaius are *Eusebius and Dionysius bar Salibi. Comparing the information reported by them, the following certain facts can be gathered: Gaius was a Roman writer, author of a work against the *Montanist *Proclus, of which Eusebius preserves some fragments. He did not believe the Fourth Gospel and the *Apocalypse to be Johannine, attributing them to *Cerinthus. According to Eusebius, who does not mention the opposition of Gaius to the Fourth Gospel, he was orthodox and highly esteemed; acc. to Dionysius he was a heretic. Dionysius preserves some passages of a writing of *Hippolytus against Gaius: the Capitula adv. Caium. The objections of Gaius to the Apocalypse contained therein concern presumed contradictions between this work and the Pauline writings. The figure of Gaius is usually associated with the Alogi, a name created by *Epiphanius (Haer. 51) on the basis of a wordplay (a-logos: without reason, but also implying an adversary of the Logos) for a group of opponents of the Johannine works, which they attributed to Cerinthus. They accused the Fourth Gospel and the Apocalypse of falsities and incoherencies with the other writings of the NT, in particular with the Synoptics. The validity of Epiphanius's report is questionable. It has been held that Epiphanius drew upon Hippolytus (perhaps in the lost Syntagma), but the absence of any mention of Gaius in his report creates difficulties: it is an inexplicable omission given the polemic of Hippolytus with Gaius. Over time the conviction of the heterodoxy of Gaius has imposed itself in criticism, on the evidence of Epiphanius and Dionysius bar Salibi. However, it seems more precise to locate Gaius and his possible followers in the context of the hesitations that had developed at Rome, toward the end of the 2nd c., among part of the hierarchy toward the Johannine writings, because of the problems created by *gnostics, Montanists and *quartodecimans who all, under various aspects, appealed to John.

CPG 1330-1331; the fragments of Adv. Proclum in Eusebius, HE II, 25,6-7; III, 28,1-2; III, 31,4; VI, 20,3. The fragments of Capitula adv. Caium in I. Sedlacek, Dionysius bar Salibi. In Apocalypsim, Actus et Epistulas catholicas (CSCO 53.60; Syr. 18.20), Paris 1909–1910; TRE I, 290-295; E. Prinzivalli, Gaio e gli Alogi: SSR 5 (1981) 53-68; A. Camplani - E. Prinzivalli, Sul significato dei nuovi frammenti siriaci dei "Capitula aduersus Caium" attribuiti a Ippolito: Augustinianum 38 (1998) 49-82.

E. Prinzivalli

GALATIA. A region in the central part of Asia Minor, formed primarily of high plateaus, Galatia took this name in the 3rd c. BC following the immigration of *Celtic tribes. It was reduced by Augustus to a Roman province after the death of the last Galatian king, Amyntas, in AD 25. The legate of the province also had authority over Pisidia, Lycaonia, Pamphylia, Isauria, Paphlagonia, the Galatian *Pontus and, between 80 and 114, over *Cappadocia. The Galatian region was *evangelized by *Paul in the course of his second missionary journey (Acts 16:6). In all probability, it is to the Christian communities of this region that he addressed the letter to the Galatians. The principal cities of Galatia were Pessinus, *Ancyra and Tavium. In the course of the 4th c. three councils took place at Ancyra: one orthodox in 314, one *homoiousian in 358 and one pro-*Arian in ca. 375. Between 385 and 395 Galatia was divided in two eparchies: Galatia Prima with metropolis Ancyra and Galatia Seconda with metropolis Pessinus; later, through the effect of can. 28 of the Council of *Chal-cedon (451), the ecclesiastical province of Galatia was put under the patriarchate of *Constantinople. From the monastic point of view mention should be made of the *anchorite Peter the Galatian, *Nilus of Ancyra and the monk Leontius who later became metropolitan of Ancyra.

Ancyra: DHGE 2,1538-1543; Galatia: DHGE 19,714-731.

S. Zincone

GALBIUS and CANDIDUS, a Greek legend (6th c.?). An etiological account of the discovery of the clothes of Mary. It was a "pious theft" done by two employees of Constantinople, Galbius and Candidus, who, after having stolen the clothes of Mary, took them to the capital to deposit them in the church of Blacherne.

A. Wenger, L'Assomption de la T.S. Vierge dans la tradition byzantine du VI[e] au X[e] siècle, Paris 1955, 293-311 (2 recensions, Fr. tr.); Pol. tr.: Starowieyski 1/2, 827-832; S. Mimouni, Dormition et l'Assomption de la Vierge, Paris 1995, 604-617.

M. Starowieyski

GALEN (ca. 129–199). Doctor, grammarian and philosopher, born in Pergamon (Asia Minor), died in Rome in 199. A student of *Platonic teachers, he traveled before settling in Rome, where he was the doctor of *Marcus Aurelius and cared for his son *Commodus. He wrote numerous works on medicine and philosophy which exercised a great influence during the Byzantine Middle Ages. He was a rationalist and an eclectic, excluding Epicureanism and the skeptic movements. Galen mentions the Christians only four times together with Jews in the expression "followers of Moses and of Christ"; he is critical of their fideist attitude, inasmuch as they accept "laws not demonstrated," and he has reservations about their critical spirit, because of their elementary philosophy. He admires the rigor of their customs and the chastity practiced by men and women (De puls. diff. II, 4, ed. Kühn, Leipzig 1824, 579 and 657), "and they behave in a way analogous to that of true philosophers" (Carrara, 132).

RAC 8, 777-786; R. Walzer, Galen on Jews and Christians, Oxford 1949; P. de Labriolle, La réaction païenne, Paris 1934, 94-97; P. Carrara, I pagani di fronte al cristianesimo. Testimonianze dei secoli I e II, Florence 1984, 127-132; R.M. Grant, Paul, Galen, and Origen: JTS 34 (1983) 533-536; S. Gero, Galen on the Christians. A Reappraisal of the Arabic Evidence: OCP 56 (1990) 371-411.

A. Hamman

GALERIUS (ca. 250–311). C. Galerius Val. Maximianus, born of humble origins in the area around *Serdica (today Sofia), in Dacia Ripensis (Illyricum), about 250. He received the title of Caesar on 1 March 293, together with *Constantius Chlorus, in the tetrarchic system created by *Diocletian. He led military campaigns in *Egypt in 294; in the Orient he was defeated near Ctesiphon in 295 by the Persians; in 298 he obtained a favorable treaty for the Romans. A convinced pagan, he was among the most active supporters of the anti-Christian persecutory politics of Diocletian. At the abdication of the two Augusti in 305, he became emperor for the Orient; he invaded Italy in 307 to avenge the death of *Severus against *Maxentius. During his withdrawal, he sacked Italy. When in 308 the Augustus *Maximian tried to reconquer the throne, he sought to win the elderly Diocletian to his side; in the meeting of Carnuntum in October of 308, *Licinius was named Augustus, while *Maximinus Daia and *Constantine were names filii Augustorum. But the compromise solution lasted only as long as Galerius lived; a severe illness that struck him in 311 (described in De mort. persec. 35,3 of Lactantius)—which provoked his death and which he himself seems to have attributed to his own acts of *persecution against the Christians—may have led him to pronounce in April of 311 an Edict of Tolerance, with the intention of placating the Christian God.

PWK 14,2, 2516-2598; S. Mazzarino, L'impero romano, Bari [2]1973, 587ff.; D. Kienast, Römische Kaisertabelle. Grundzüge einer römischen Kaiserchronologie, Darmstadt 1990, 283-287; S. Corcoran, The Empire of the Tetrarchs. Imperial Pronouncements and Government AD 284–324, Oxford 1996; W. Kuhoff, Diokletian und die Epoche der Tetrarche. Das römische Reich zwischen Krisenbewältigung und Neuaufbau (284–313 n. Chr.), Frankfurt a.M. 2001.

M. Forlin Patrucco

GALILEANS (Christian). The expansion of Christianity in the Jewish world outside of Jerusalem is briefly mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles. Justin completes the biblical data recalling various components of the Jewish community of Jerusalem: Genists, Merists, Galilei, Hellenes, Baptists (Dial. 80,4). The Galileans, mentioned by Justin, who acknowledged as guide Judas the Galilean (Acts 5:37, Josephus Flavius, Ant. 18,1), should not be confused with the Christian Galileans. The foundation of the Christian church in Acts 9:31 is taken for granted through a stereotyped literary formula. The apostles' family links in Galilee suggest that the region had been evangelized very early. The absence of documents does not allow us to decide on possible sympathies of the Christians of Galilee for independence movements active there. Nor can the presence of Simon, nicknamed the Zealot, among Jesus' disciples be brought as an argument in favor of this hypothesis. The Zealots become a political party with the Jewish war of AD 66–70. After 70, there is no further mention of Christianity in Galilee. This leads one to believe that it was confessed in majority by fishers and farmers, who have left no traces of themselves. For Epictetus (Discourses IV, 7,6) the term "Galileans" designated the Christians, just as for the emperor *Julian the Apostate, who used it habitually in his works in a disdainful sense (Greg. Naz., Oration 4,75). Julian also wrote a work with the title Adversus Galilaeos.

L.F. Elliott Binns, Galilean Christianity, Chicago 1956; M. Simon, Les sectes juives au temps de Jésus, Paris 1960; G. Jossa, Gesù e i movimenti di liberazione della Palestina, Brescia 1980, 61-77; Emperor Julian, Contra Galilaeos, intr., critical text and tr. by E. Masaracchia, Rome 1990; L.I. Levine (ed.), The Galilee in Late Antiquity, New York 1992; D. Argiolas, I "Galilei" nell'epistolario dell'imperatore Giuliano l'Apostata: Theologica. Annali della Pontificia Fac. Teologica della Sardegna 4 (1995) 161-196; E. Masaracchia, Aspetti della cultura di Giuliano nel "Contra Galilaeos": Rudiae 10 (1998) 91-111; E. Nodet - J. Taylor, Essai sur les origines du christianisme, Paris 1999 (It. tr., Casale Monf. 2000).

E. Peretto

GALL (d. ca. 645). A saint of Irish origin, disciple of *Columbanus. Following his teacher in the territory of the Alamanni, he stopped near the Lake of Constance, where he established a hermitage at the sources of the Steinach, where later a church rose and where Othmar, in the 1st half of the 8th c., founded the celebrated monastery called "of Saint Gall." Gall evangelized Alamanni, Suebi and neighboring peoples, at the E edges of Austrasia. He refused the bishopric of Constance and the charge of abbot of Luxeuil. A *homily delivered at Constance for the episcopal consecration of his disciple John was attributed to Gall, but the Latin text that survives (PL 87, 13-26) seems to be the work of Notker Balbulus (d. 912). Gall died at Arbon during a visit with his friend Willimar. His feast is celebrated 16 October. His legend includes the hagiographic topos of the encounter with the bear, in whose company Gall is often represented. According to a carmen composed between 835 and 850, perhaps by Walafrid Strabo (Carmen Sangallense n. 5, ms. 187 of Saint Gall), the other name of Gall would have been Seth: in this case he would have been the designatory of the Carmen ad Sethum, attributed by some to Columbanus of Bobbio, by others to Columbanus of Saint-Trond (late 8th c.).

Sharpe 306; J.F. Kenney, The Sources of the Early History of Ireland, New York 1929, I, n. 50, 206-208; BHL 3245-3258; BS 6,15-19; DCB 2,601-602; B. and H. Helbling, Der heilige Gallus in der Geschichte: SZG 12 (1962) 1-62; G. Gindele, Columban verzichtet auf seinen Messpriester Gallus: SMGBZ 90 (1979) 438-445; M.W. Herren, A Ninth-Century Poem for St. Gall's Feast Day and the "Ad Sethum" of Columbanus: SM 24 (1983) 487-520; G. Hilty, Die Konstanzer Predigt des heiligen Gallus und das Fortleben des Romanischen am Südufer des Bodensees bis ins 7. Jahrhundert.Geistesleben um den Bodensee im frühen Mittelalter: Vorträge eines Mediävistischen Symposions vom 30. September bis zum 3. Oktober 1987 . . . , ed. A. Masser - A. Wolf, Freiburg 1989, 57-63; K.H. Burmeister, "Ohne Bregenz kein St. Gallen." Der Weg des hl. Gallus von Bregenz nach St. Gallen: SVGB 114 (1996) 5-16; M. Jochimsen, Der Heilige Gallus. Der Mönch, der Bär und das goldene Halsband, in Herrscher, Helden, Heilige, ed. U. Müller - W. Wunderlich, St. Gallen 1996, 639-651.

E. Malaspina

GALLA PLACIDIA (ca. 388–450). Aelia Galla Placidia, daughter of the emperor *Theodosius I and half-sister of *Arcadius and Honorius, emperors respectively of the East and the West. Born at Constantinople a little before 390, she lived mostly in *Ravenna, where she took an active part in the intrigues of the court, contributing to the ruin of the general *Stilicho who met his death there in 408. In 410, during the sack of *Rome, she was imprisoned by *Alaric, but four years later married his brother-in-law, Ataulf, at *Narbonne, even without the agreement of the emperor Honorius, with all possible pomp and acc. to traditional Roman custom, contributing to the improvement of the difficult relations between the *Visigoths and the Empire. After the death of Ataulf and of a son she bore him, Galla Placidia entered a new matrimony (416) with the general and patrician *Constantius, with whom she had two children, Justa Grata Honoria and Placidus Valentinian. In 419 she was involved in the troubles concerning the election of the new bishop of Rome, as several of her letters attest. She obtained a little later the title of Augusta, when Constantius was co-opted Augustus of the Occident. But the following year, Constantius having died, Galla Placidia found refuge from the wrath of Honorius with *Theodosius II in the East. At the death of her brother, after the defeat of the usurper John, the kingdom passed to *Valentinian III (423 or 425), on whose behalf she was regent until 437. In such a position, scheming and calculating, she inserted herself into the conflict between *Aetius and *Boniface, making use of Aetius until Boniface's death in battle. Aetius was then exiled by the empress (435), but regained the greatest honors from her later. From 437 Galla Placidia, although continuing to be a figure of the greatest importance, dedicated herself with zeal to worship, building or restoring many churches. Up until her death she represented a perfect example of the aristocracy with a will of iron, so characteristic of the late empire. Buried at first in Rome, her body was placed in the celebrated mausoleum of Ravenna which bears her name, but which in reality had been intended as a church of St. Lawrence.

CSEL 35, 1, 71-74; W. Ensslin, Placidia (1), PWK XX, 1910-1931; Galla (2), PLRE, I, 382; A. Lippold, KLP 4, 876-877; K. Groß-Albenhausen, NP 4, 762-763; H. Benrath, Die Kaiserin G.P., Stuttgart 1937 (= 1951); E. Stein - J.-R. Palanque, Histoire du Bas-Empire 1.1, Paris 1958 (= Amsterdam 1968); V.A. Sirago, G.P. e la trasformazione politica dell'Occidente, Louvain 1961; F. Gerke, L'iconografia delle monete imperiali dell'Augusta G.P. Corsi di cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina 13 (1966) 163-204; M.A. Nagl, G.P.: Studien zur Geschichte und Kultur des Altertums, New York 1967; S.I. Oost, G.P. Augusta. A Biographical Essay, Chicago-London 1968; S.I. Oost, G.P. and the Law: CPh 63 (1968) 114-121; L. Storoni Mazzolani, G.P., Milan 1975 (= 2002); Ph. Caffin, G.P., la dernière impératrice de Rome, Paris 1977; A. Lippold, Kaiser Theodosius und seine Zeit, Stuttgart ²1980; E. Demougeot, L'évolution politique de G.P.: Gerion 3 (1985) 183-210; S. Rebenich, Gratian. A Son of Theodosius, and the Birth of G.P.: Historia 34 (1985) 372-385; Id., Gratianus Redivivus: Historia 38 (1989) 376-379; M. Donnini, G.P. nelle fonti latine medievali, umanistiche e rinascimentali: StudMed 35 (1994) 695-732; A. Collaci, G.P. La vita e i giorni, Florence 1995; M. Clauss, Die Frauen der theodosianischen Familie, in H. Temporini - G. Vitzthum (eds.), Die Kaiserinnen Roms. Von Livia bis Theodora, Munich 2002, 370-436.

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

GALLAECIA (Galicia). Province of Hispania created following the administrative reforms of *Diocletian (ca. 297) with the W most territories of the Tarraconensis. The first Christian testimonies of Gallaecia mention the double See of Legio-Asturica (León-Astorga) as already well established (254; Cyprian, Ep. 67) and the firm adhesion of many Galician bishops to the *Priscillanist heresy—a theme treated at the Council of *Toledo I (400; Exemplar professionum)—and, to a lesser degree, to *Manicheism (Hydatius, Cont. Chron. Hieron., a. 445, 122) and to *Arianism, introduced among the Suebi by Ajax (466; Hydatius, Cont. Chron. Hieron., a. 465-466, 228; Isidore, Hist. Sueu. 90). In the year 409, Suebi, Alans and *Vandals penetrated into the *Iberian peninsula (Hydatius, Cont. Chron. Hieron., a. 409, 34) and, in 414, installed themselves in Gallaecia (Isidore, Hist. Sueu. 73), esp. in the conventus Lucense, Bracarense, Asturum and Cluniacense. Their settlement brought conflicts with the Hispanic-Roman population, as shown by the flight of *Orosius to *Hippo (prior to 415; Orosius, Hist. adu. pag. libri 3,20,7; 5,2,1; 5,1,15; 5,2,8) and the three-month imprisonment of *Hydatius, probably bishop of Chaves (Hyd., Cont. Chron. Hieron., a. 460, 196 and 202), despite the Catholic faith of some of their kings, such as Requiarius (Hyd., Cont. Chron. Hieron., a. 448, 129). In the 4th-5th c., Gallaecia had numerous direct contacts with *Africa and with the Orient: *Turibius, Orosius, Hydatius, the three Avitus Bacchiarius and others, such as the pilgrims *Egeria (for some, an Aquitanian) and Pimenia. In the middle of 6th c., the Suebian king—either Charraricus (*Gregory of Tours, De mirac. s. Martini 1,11) or Theodimir (Isidore, Hist. Sueu. 91)—converted to Catholicism. In 585 the Suebian kingdom was annexed to the Visigothic kingdom of *Leovigild (Isidore, Hist. Sueu. 49).

Beyond Hydatius and Orosius, the documentation on the history of the Galician church in the Suebian-Visigothic period is constituted, principally, by the letter of the Roman bishop *Vigilius to a certain colleague, the bishop of Braga *Profuturus (29 June 538; Vigilius, Ep. 1); by the acts of the three councils of *Braga (561, 572 and 675); by the works of *Martin of Braga (2nd half of 6th c.); by the Divisio Theodomiri (or Parochiale Sueuorum), a text dated between 572 and 582, in which the 13 Suebian episcopal sees are grouped around two Suebian religious provinces (Lugo and Braga); and by the works of *Isidore of Seville (mid 6th-mid 7th c.), *Fructuosus of Braga (2nd half of 7th c.) and *Valerius of Bierzo, a Leónese hermit (7th c.).

The Christianization of Gallaecia, very sparse at the beginning of the 4th c., intensified starting from the end of the 4th c., as the chrismon on a slab of white marble demonstrates, perhaps a table for the offerings (S. Maria de Hermida, Quiroga, Lugo; 1st quarter of the 5th c.); the paleo-Christian *sarcophagi (1st third of the 4th c.) of S. Justo de la Vega (Astorga), of S. Maria de Temes (Carballedo, Lugo), of the Orans of Monterrei (Orense) and of Vilar de Servoi (Castrelo do Val, Orense); the cover of a sarcophagus in stone with sepulchral mosaic, a local work, found at Frende (Baião, Portugal; late 4th-mid 5th c.). More difficult to date are the sarcophagus of Villanueva de Lorenzana (Lugo) and those of the zone between Orense and Chaves (5th-7th c.). The earliest documented churches are those of S. Eulalia de Tines (Vimianzo, La Coruña), built above a late imperial villa, in which an inscription bearing the formula in pace was found; S. Eulalia de Bóveda (Lugo), a direct Christianization of a pagan edifice (4th-5th c.) and the martyrium of Marialba (Marialba de la Ribera, León), with a cylindrical baptistery and three phases of construction: a large rectangular room with a horseshoe apse (phase I; 4th c.), an edifice on a central plan and central vault (phase II; late 4th-early 5th c.) and a transformation of the apse which raised the floor, resting on 13 tombs (phase III; late 6th-early 7th c.).

At the beginning of the 5th c., in the Suebian epoch, new episcopal sees are present: Celenis (Caldas de Reyes; a temporary see) and Bracara (Braga) and, a little later, Lucus (Lugo) and Aquae Flaviae (Chaves). The sources mention the existence of basilicae sanctorum at Braga (Hyd., Cont. Chron. Hieron., a. 456-457, 167) and of sanctae ecclesiae at Astorga (Hyd., Cont. Chron. Hieron., a. 457, 179), in both cases with altars, ornaments and liturgical furnishings. By the 6th c. the sees of Auria (Orense), Brittania (S. Maria de Bretoña), Dumio (Dume), Iria Flavia (Padrón), Laniobrensis (site unknown), Magneto (Meinedo; transferred to Oporto), Portus Cale (Oporto), and Tude (Tuy) were added. The archaeological finds consist of a sepulchral sarcophagus in provenance from the cathedral of Braga (early 5th c.) of African influence with a lateral chrismon; the cover of the sarcophagus of Ithacius in provenance from S. Maria (Oviedo; late 5th-early 6th c.), this also with a chrismon, of Ravennate influence, and the church of S. Miguel Arcángel de Navatejera (Villaquilambre, León; 5th c.), a cruciform building situated above a Roman villa.

From the 2nd half of the 6th c. are the churches of S. Maria (Tuy); S. Martín (Orense); S. Martín de Mondoñedo (Mondoñedo); S. Esteban (Ribas de Sil, Orense) and S. Pedro (Triacastela, Lugo); in addition to the reliefs of Saamasas (Lugo), with an animal decoration of Ravennate influence, and the sepulchral laus of Modesta (Tuy; end 6th c.), S. Maria de Padrón and S. Fiz de Solovio (Santiago de Compostela) also go back, perhaps, to the 6th c.

The following churches all date back to the 7th c.: S. Fructuoso de Montelios (Braga) was a Greek-cross basilica built by S. Fructuosus as a mausoleum (656–665) of Byzantine type with an external decoration that recalls the mausoleum of *Galla Placidia (Ravenna) and horseshoe chapels between three of the arms of the cross, with a cupola at the center and vaults in the lateral arms. S. Juan de Baños, in the conventus Asturum (Cerrato, Palencia; consecrated in 661, a work of Recceswinth), was an edifice of basilica plan with three aisles, rectangular apse, portico but without a baptistery, despite being intituled to S. John the Baptist. S. Pedro de Balsemão (Lamego, Portugal), a building situated on the border between Gallaecia and Lusitania, mostly reconstructed, on a quadrangular plant with three aisles, featured a rectangular apse without baptistery. More difficult to date is the church, still to be excavated, of S. Comba de Bande (Baños de Bande, Orense), reconstructed for the most part at the time of Alfonso III (end of 10th c.); S. Pedro de la Nave (Campillo, Zamora), very complicated in plan and of a much-disputed chronology, with polygonal capitals decorated with scenes of the OT, without baptistery; S. Colomba (Villaquejida, León), a typical example of a medieval church above a Roman villa, the oratory of Ouvigo (Orense), or even the Crypt of the Cathedral of Palencia, acc. to Schlunk, the martyrium of Antolín dated to the 2nd half of the 7th c. Furthermore, abundant liturgical material is available from the principal episcopal sees.

Other basilicas and esp. monasteries are documented by the sources, such as the primitive monastery of Samos (Vives, 559; 2nd half of the 7th c.), the monastery Maximus (Parochiale Sueu. 13,1) or the Christian edifices of the zone of the Bierzo described by Valerius, among which are mentioned the church of Ricimiro; the oratory in memory of Fructuosus and the monasteries Rufianense, Compludum and that founded by John. Furthermore, Valerius specifies that many lay domini of the Bierzo had the custom of changing their properties into monasteries (Valerius Bergid., De genere monach. 1,9-14), certainly to benefit from fiscal exemptions, an aspect dealt with by the 2nd Council of *Braga (Conc. Brac. II [572], ch. 5).

C. Torres, Límites geográficos de Galicia en los siglos IV y V: Cuadernos de Estudios Gallegos 4 (1949) 367-382; P. de Palol, Arqueología cristiana de la España romana. Siglos IV-VI, Madrid-Valladolid 1967; Id., Arqueología cristiana hispánica de tiempos romanos y visigodos: RivAC 43 (1967) 177-232; J. Vives, Inscripciones cristianas de la España romana y visigoda, Barcelona [2]1969; M. Sotomayor, Datos históricos sobre sarcófagos romano-cristianos de España, Granada 1973; R. Puertas, Iglesias hispánicas (s. IV al VIII). Testimonios literarios, Madrid 1975; H. Schlunk - Th. Hauschild, Hispania Antiqua. Die Denkmäler der frühchristlichen und westgotischen Zeit, Mainz am Rhein 1979; E.A. Thompson, The Conversion of the Spanish Suevi to Catholicism. Visigothic Spain, Oxford 1980, 77-92; P. Díaz Martínez, Los distintos "grupos sociales" del noroeste hispano y la invasión de los suevos: SHHA 1 (1983) 75-88; A. Ferreiro, The Missionary Labors of St. Martin of Braga in 6th Century Galicia: StudMon 23 (1983) 11-26; J. Mattoso, A história das parroquias em Portugal: Portugal Medieval. Novas interpretações, Lisbon 1984, 37-76; P. Díaz Martínez, Comunidades monásticas y comunidades campesinas en la España visigoda, in Los Visigodos. Historia y civilización, Murcia 1986, 189-195; R. Teja, La carta 67 de S. Cipriano a las comunidades cristianas de León-Astorga y Mérida. Algunos problemas y soluciones, in Cristianismo y aculturación en tiempos del imperio romano, Murcia 1990, 115-124; P. Díaz Martínez, El monacato y la cristianización del NO hispano. Un proceso de aculturación, in ibid., 531-539; L. Caballero - J.C. Sánchez, Reutilizaciones de material romano en edificios de culto cristiano, in ibid., 431-485; M.C. Díaz y Díaz, La cristianización en Galicia, in La romanización de Galicia, A Coruña 1992, 105-120; J. Vilella, Roma, Cartago i la cristiandat hispana segons l'epístola 67 de Cebrià. Homenatge a Miquel Tarradell, Barcelona 1993, 883-887; C. Godoy, Arqueología y liturgia. Iglesias hispánicas (siglos IV al VIII), Barcelona 1995; J.M. Novo, Lugo en los tiempos oscuros. Las menciones literarias de la ciudad entre los siglos V y X (2): Boletín do Museo Provincial de Lugo 7 (1995–1996) 67-80; L. Caballero - F. Arce, La iglesia de San Pedro de la Nave (Zamora). Arqueología y arquitectura: AEA 70 (1997) 221-274; J.E. López Pereira, La cristianización de la Gallaecia, in Galicia castrexa e romana, Santiago 1997, 282-288; F. Singul, La pintura de Santa Eulalia de Bóveda (Lugo). Ortodoxia y clasicismo en la pintura paleocristiana del Noroeste hispánico: Boletín Auriense 27 (1997) 175-193; J. Vilella, Priscilianismo galaico y política antipriscilianista durante el siglo V: AntTard 5 (1997) 177-185; M.J.V. Branco, St. Martín of Braga, the Sueves and Gallaecia, in The Visigoths. Studies in Culture and Society, Leiden 1999, 63-97; J.L. Quiroga - M.R. Lovelle, Topografía funeraria rural entre el Miño y el Duero durante la Antigüedad Tardía (s. V-VII). Aproximación a un marco cronológico y tipológico: Madrider Mitteilungen 40 (1999) 228-253; J. Vilella, Idacio, un cronista de su tiempo: Compostellanum 44 (1999) 39-54; Id., Biografía crítica de Orosio: JbAC 43 (2000) 94-121; O. Núñez, El mundo funerario bajoimperial y sus aportaciones al estudio de la cristianización de Gallaecia: Minius 8 (2000) 61-74.

C. Buenacasa

GALLICAN LITURGY

I. Origin and development - II. Principal characteristics.

I. Origin and development. We should first of all specify that when we speak of liturgia or ritus gallicanus we refer exclusively to the local *liturgy that was formed in the S of *Gaul, probably at the beginning of the 6th c., and which became extinct with the adoption of the Roman rite on the part of Charlemagne for the entire Franco-Roman Empire. Even highly qualified studies often use an ambiguous terminology: the name of "gallicana" is given also to a Roman liturgy reelaborated in the Carolingian cultural environment. It is true that the Carolingian cultural movement, which is characterized by its eclecticism and which prided itself on being extensively documented, made use sometimes of ancient Gallican texts in its liturgical adaptations, as it also made use of Ambrosian texts and Hispanic texts. But this does not mean that the Franco-Roman liturgy, which is sometimes given the qualifier of "Gallicanized Roman liturgy," represents a natural evolution or a survival relative to the ancient Gallican rite. That which distinguishes the true Gallican rite clearly from the Franco-Roman *liturgy is its purely Latin cultural matrix. We will nevertheless see that, in the period of decadence, which the Gallican rite reached too quickly, there was some penetration of the literary style and mentality of the Merovingians in the composition of texts. The Gallican rite was born at the same time as the Hispanic rite, based on the same foundations and through the effect of an identical historic phenomenon. Whether in the churches of Spain or in those of Gaul, a heritage of liturgical traditions already existed, coming from the E and Italy, but above all from Latin Africa.

The historic phenomenon that produced the birth of the Gallican rite and the Hispanic rite consisted initially in an attempt to realize in their own environments and with their own means something similar to that which had already happened in the liturgy of Rome in the 5th c. The production on a grand scale—as it was happening in Rome—of variable texts for the *eucharistic celebration, the production of which was accompanied by the composition or reelaboration of euchological texts for the administration of the *sacraments—*catechumenate, *baptism, chrism, *matrimony, ministerial *ordination—and of a certain repertory of orations intended for the morning and evening offices, was understood as an explosion of euchological creativity, which excited in all the West a certain sense of emulation. The first euchological schools of Gaul and Spain were therefore formed, which in an earliest moment must have been tightly linked together.

It was almost an imitation of the Roman development. As we have already indicated, the initial intention was to realize euchological creativity, but in their own environment and with their own means. Thus, both the Gallican rite and the Hispanic remained far from the structure of the Roman *Mass of the 5th-6th c. because they remained faithful to another structure, their own ancient one, coming from Latin Africa, and which now constituted an important part of their liturgical heritage. Nor did the Gallican and Hispanic euchological schools let themselves be fascinated by the literary style of the Roman texts, and always for the same reason: they intended to remain faithful to their style, looser and less dense than the Roman, and thus—although under the pressure of the euchological creativity of Rome—faithfulness to their own literary forms did not disappear, through which they were often able to integrate into the new texts certain locutions of the archaic texts.

From the philological and literary study of the liturgical formulas, it can be deduced that the most ancient Gallican texts which have reached us were composed around the last decade of the 6th c. This date corresponds in fact to certain historical information, which attributes the composition of texts for the Mass to the priest *Museus of *Marseille (ca. 459), to Eustathius of Marseille and to *Sidonius Apollinaris (432–490). The composition of a *sacramentary is attributed to *Gregory of Tours (538–594); but his was probably more a work of redaction than a true creation of texts; a work similar to that of *Gregory the Great at Rome and of *Julian of Toledo in Spain. Among the Gallican authors who attended to the distribution of the readings, we have the names of *Claudianus (ca. 460), the already cited Museus of Marseille and *Caesarius of Arles (470–542). The same Caesarius presided at the Council of *Agde in the year 506, whose can. 30 was intended to regulate some particulars of the office.

Studying the liturgical books, comparing them among themselves and trying to discover in them the points of contact with other neighboring rites, one discovers that the Gallican rite turns out to be more than anything else a complex of distinct local activities, each one tending to form its own liturgy, without there being a true and proper coordination between them, despite having easy reciprocal exchanges. In other words, the Gallican rite never reached a phase of more or less uniform codification of its liturgical books. Every sacramentary is the result of a different attempt to compose the principal book of the eucharistic celebration; all draw on a common stock of libelli, but the choice and the ordering happen acc. to distinct and sometimes divergent criteria. There is not, e.g., even the slightest agreement between the lectionary of Luxeuil and the other distributions of readings that we find in texts like the Missal of Bobbio and in many fragments of other lectionaries.

One of the biggest difficulties that we encounter in the historical study of the ancient Gallican rite is precisely this dispersion of its liturgical books, aggravated also by the fact that we have remained completely without any documentation concerning certain sectors of the liturgy. We know the euchological texts for the Eucharist celebration and for the administration of the sacraments. We have also the systems of readings, even if represented, as we have said, in a very fragmentary way. But no antiphonary has survived containing the *chants for the Mass, and all the books intended for the celebration of the office have been lost. The only exception in this matter is presented by several hymns, probably of Gallican origin, which Caesarius cites in his monastic rule together with the hymns of *Ambrose, and which later survived in the medieval monastic hymnals.

What appears certain is that the Gallican rite, just after having emerged, saw itself menaced first by an invading Frankish cultural influence and later by a suffocating penetration of Roman elements. The political situation did not favor the consolidation of a well-defined autochthonous liturgy. The Provence region, with its two great sees of Marseille and of *Arles, which seems to have been the cradle of the Gallican rite, in a few years passed from the hands of the *Visigoths to those of the *Ostrogoths (ca. 508), and finally was invaded by the *Franks (537).

The most ancient documents we have on Gallican liturgical texts are from the middle of the 7th c. The codifying activity, always heterogeneous, as we have already outlined, extended until the middle of the 8th c. The liturgical books are the great witnesses of the labor of this difficult historic period. On the one hand, there is the Missale Gothicum, which tries to collect the Gallican texts for the Eucharist and make of them a book very similar, externally, to the Roman sacramentaries, but sometimes forcing the original texts, other times interpreting them to assign them to feasts or times of the year for which they were not composed, or even importing prayers from the Roman books to fill in gaps. On the other hand, there is the Missale Bobbiense, which preserves the structure of the Gallican Mass only up to the preface; for the remainder, one assumes that it adopted the Roman canon, and yet the same sacramentary copied at Bobbio amplifies the repertory of the prefaces with inferior Gallican productions. Frontally opposed to the Missale Gothicum and to the Missale Bobbiense is the *palimpsest sacramentary preserved at the Ambrosiana of *Milan, which refuses all Roman influence, and tries to furnish itself with texts coming from Spain, more congenial to the authentic Gallican style.

The movement that pushed those churches united within the kingdom of the Franks toward the Roman rite was therefore prior to the decision of Charlemagne to officially adopt the liturgy of Rome in his entire territory. But there are signs of resistance to such a movement, as the palimpsest of Milan demonstrates.

II. Principal characteristics. The most distinctive particularity of the Gallican rite is its system of composing the Eucharist prayer with varying euchological texts, including those which immediately precede and follow the account of the institution. In this, the Gallican rite differs from the Roman and the Ambrosian, which have a fixed canon. It resembles rather the Hispanic rite. In the Hispanic rite, however, the system of one *anaphora with variable parts is more evolved and perfected. The Gallican rite remained in the first phase of experimentation, i.e., when the variable parts were not yet coordinated among themselves. They were composed of repertories of prefaces, of post sancti and post mysteria, but not in the same number, and without there necessarily being a connection between one part and another of the Eucharist prayer. Probably the first Gallican and Hispanic authors wanted to compose, for the central part of the Eucharistic prayer, a certain number of new texts, which were like variants on the traditional themes of the Eucharistic texts of their ancient heritage.

Imitating from far off that which had happened in the Roman rite, the Gallican authors composed, for the various times and feasts of the liturgical year, formulas for the praefatio missae, for the collectio, for the prayers post nomina and ad pacem, and also for the contestatio, which corresponds to the Roman preface. But remaining excluded from this fusion between the theme of the liturgical year and the specific function of each piece within the global composition of the anaphora were the post sanctus and the post mysterium, i.e., the two texts that, together with the account of the institution, correspond to the part of the canon that goes from the sanctus to the doxology. Sporadically we find a text of post sanctus composed expressly for a feast; but this never happens with the post mysterium. The formulas that could lead one to believe the contrary are all from the period of the codification of the sacramentaries, and almost always it is a matter of arrangements done on the basis of Roman texts. The Hispanic rite, on the other hand, went progressively toward the literary and thematic unity of the entire Eucharistic prayer, even if still composed of variable texts; and it is normal, in the area of the Hispanic rite, that all the texts, including those of the post sanctus and the post pridie, develop the theme of the season or of the feast of the liturgical year.

Another Gallican peculiarity, in the sector of the pontifical ritual, is that of adding before the prayers of benediction an admonition addressed to the assembly that anticipates the contents of the benediction. When it is a matter of conferring ministerial orders, the euchological system is composed of at least three moments: explanation of the mystery, invitation to prayer and the prayer of benediction. This type of euchological complex, which reveals the intention of involving the assembly more intimately in the sacramental act, is nothing other than a systematic and developed application of a very ancient and universal liturgical principle. Consider the exultet (admonition-preface of benediction) and the Roman prayers of Good Friday (invitation to prayer). The method became so congenial to the Gallican and Hispanic rites that one of the variable texts of each Mass assumed this didascalic form: the Gallican praefatio missae, which corresponds to the Hispanic oratio admonitionis. This system of combing didascalias, admonitions and prayers in the composition of the pontifical ritual was later widely used by the liturgists of the Carolingian period. It is above all for this reason that the Carolingian adaptations of the ancient Roman liturgy have been considered a Gallicanized liturgy.

As for the peculiarities of style or content, it is almost impossible to formulate evaluations that define the Gallican rite globally, given the heterogeneity of its collections. Perhaps the most universal note—i.e., that which is found as much in the best ancient texts as in the more recent and inferior ones—is the tendency to integrate in the new texts phrases or locutions coming from the most ancient texts. The phenomenon is not unique—we find it on a smaller scale in the Hispanic rite, and also in the Ambrosian—but it happens with greater frequency in the Gallican. The phrases in question undoubtedly come from anaphoric texts prior to the division of the Eucharistic prayer into variable parts.

Perhaps because of this solicitude to maintain their bond to tradition also literally, the Gallican euchological schools are distinguished from those of all the other rites in the formulation of the *anamnesis. The genuinely Gallican texts of the post mysterium, when the anamnesis is formally expressed, recall only the death of the Lord, basing themselves on the Pauline gloss of 1 Cor 11:26 and, as it seems, on the African Eucharistic texts of the time of St. *Cyprian. This distinguishes the Gallican rite from all other rites, even from the Hispanic, in which the anamnesis has for its object, at the very least, the death and resurrection of Christ.

Sometimes, in describing the literary characteristics of the Gallican rite, it has been asserted that its texts are prolix. Such an evaluation is gratuitous and does not take account of the different origins of its euchological collections. In reality, among the most genuinely Gallican texts there are some of extreme concision and density of content.

DACL 6,473-596; J.B. Thibaut, L'ancienne liturgie gallicane. Son origine et sa formation en Provence aux Ve et VIe siècles, Paris 1929; F. Cabrol, Les origines de la liturgie gallicane: RHE 25 (1930) 951-962; A. Wilmart, La réforme liturgique de Charlemagne: EphLit 45 (1931) 186-207; A.G. Martimort, La liturgie de la messe en Gaule: Compagnie de St. Sulpice. Bulletin du Comité des Études 22 (1949) 204-222; E. Griffe, Aux origines de la liturgie gallicane: BLE 52 (1951) 17-43; W.S. Porter, The Gallican Rite, London 1958; J. Pinell, Legitima Eucharistia. Cuestiones sobre la anámnesis y la epíclesis en el antiguo rito galicano: Mélanges Liturgiques B. Botte, Louvain 1972, 445-460; Id., Anámnesis y epíclesis en el antiguo rito galicano: Didaskalia 4 (1974) 1-130; G. Ramis, Le famiglie liturgiche in Occidente, in Scientia Liturgica, ed. A.J. Chupungco, Casale Monf. 1998, I, 40-47; J. Pinell, Storia delle liturgie occidentali non romane, in ibid., 195-218; G. Ramis, Libri liturgici occidentali non romani, in ibid., 331-343.

J. Pinell

GALLIENUS, emperor (ca. 218–268). Of noble origin, he was born around 218 and died assassinated near Milan in 268 (see among the other evidence, Jer., Chron. s.a. 268; Zos. I, 40; Zon. XII, 25). Raised to power by his father *Valerian from 253, proclaimed Caesar by the senate and Augustus by his own parent, he remained sole emperor for eight years, after the death of Valerian in the East (260). Living in very difficult years for the empire, at first he defended the Rhine border from the attacks of the *Franks and of the Alamanni, then the Danubian lands from the repeated incursions of the *Goths, as well as having to confront internal rebellions. In 260 the situation became even more critical. The Franks spread over Gaul and reached into Spain; the Alamanni pushed into N *Italy, while in the E the Persians, under the leadership of *Shapur I, had got the better of the Romans. In this predicament, Gallienus, practically renouncing the exercise of his direct command of conspicuous parts of the empire, left the task of combating the Persians to Odenathus, prince of *Palmyra, and opposed in vain the usurper Postumus, who established the Roman Empire of the Galliae, extending over Gaul, Spain and *Britain. In the middle of a sometimes desperate situation, the efforts of Gallienus stood out in many areas. He initiated a political reform, with the intention of consolidating his authority and transforming the entire imperial administration to make it more responsive to the demands of his time. He was present in the domain of the arts and culture with a program that privileged Hellenism; he intervened in the organization of the army; he favored *Neoplatonic philosophy.

Toward Christianity he had a realistic and farseeing attitude. In this matter one must mention that the critics do not always agree. According to some, the emperor continued the fight against Christianity, changing only the tactic: from the violent *persecution undertaken by his father he passed to indulgence, intended to make it reenter the orbit of the pagan civitas. The spread of the Eleusinian mysteries, of which Gallienus was himself an initiate, should then be interpreted as one of the means put into place to reduce Christian influence on the people. According to others he demonstrated entirely favorable sentiments toward the new religion. The emperor annulled the edict of persecution put in place by Valerian and restored to the Christians their places of worship, goods and cemeteries: the church was thus de facto acknowledged. Certainly Christian sources present him in a positive light. While he was still alive, around 262, *Dionysius bishop of Alexandria exalted him in a letter and noted that in him "the sovereign authority now flourishes with more splendor, is seen and understood from far off, and it penetrates everywhere" (Eus., HE 7, 23,3). *Eusebius also informs us (ibid. 7, 13) that Gallienus, having adopted a more moderate system of government than Valerian, stopped the persecution with edicts, ordered with a rescript (of which the historian gives the text, translating it from Latin) that those responsible for the churches carry out the duties of their ministry, and restored the cemeteries to the Christians. Certainly from 260 a period of peace began for the Christians that lasted about forty years, disturbed only by sporadic hostile acts; the projected persecution of *Aurelian did not take place because of the death of the emperor himself (275). Only at the end of the 3rd c. would the last grand persecution loom into view.

Historia Augusta, Vita Gallieni; Aur. Vict., Caes. 33; Eus. Caes., Historia eccles. 7, 13; Zos. Historia I, 36-40; Wickert: PWK 13, 350-369; A. Alföldi, Fünfundzwanzig Jahre Römisch-Germanischer Kommission, Berlin-Leipzig 1930, 11-49; L. De Regibus, La monarchia militare di Gallieno, Genoa 1939; J. Vogt: RAC 2, 1188; S. Pezzella, L'imperatore Gallieno e il cristianesimo, Rome 1965; M. Sordi, Il cristianesimo a Roma, Bologna 1965, 306-311 and passim; E.W. Merten, Zwei Herrscherfeste in der Historia Augusta. Untersuchungen zu den pompae der Kaiser Gallienus und Aurelianus, Bonn 1968; E. Manni: RAC 8, 962-984 (cols. 980-984, large bibl. of works later than 1939); S. Mazzarino, L'impero romano, Bari 1973, 526ff.; PLRE, 383-4; L. De Blois, The Policy of the Emperor Gallienus, Leiden 1976; A. Alföldi, Studien zur Geschichte der Weltkrise des 3. Jahrhunderts n.C., Darmstadt 1980; J. Michael: LTK³ 4, 273-274.

P. Siniscalco

GALLONIUS, martyr and companions (d. 303). Until 1996, the year in which the Passio Gallonii martyris (P. Chiesa) was published for the first time, the events of Gallonius and his companions were totally unknown to us. The text contains an account of the arrest and the first trial undergone by Gallonius and a group of 26 Christians of Timidia Regia, then of a second trial undergone by Gallonius alone, to whom a later group of 11 faithful from the colony of Utina joined themselves. Both of the trials ended with the condemnation of all the accused. The 26 Timidenses met their death (Victorinus and Germanus burnt at the stake, the others, who remain anonymous, put to the sword), while the punishment of Gallonius was deferred. The second trial confirmed the condemnation to vivicomburium for Gallonius and destined the 11 of Utina to the sword. The accusations against the martyrs during the interrogations refer to the times of the *Diocletian *persecution, and more exactly to the first persecutory edict (303), which prohibited the participation in liturgical reunions and demanded the surrender of the sacred books.

It has been proposed that the Gallonius protagonist of both the trials is to be identified with a Gallonius (or Gallonus) recorded in the Kalendarium Carthaginenses on 11 June, and further it has been thought that the 26 Christians of the first trial could be linked to a group of martyrs Timidenses, commemorated in that same text on 31 May; meanwhile we possess nothing corresponding to the martyrs of the second group. Furthermore, the minutes from Utina appear, in our Passio, less genuine that those from Timidia Regia, there being obvious differences both on the formal and structural levels. Precisely this realization led the editor to suppose that the delay of the condemnation of Gallonius might be nothing other than an artifice introduced by the hagiographer to establish a link between two originally independent accounts. The union of the two texts would have happened in Africa in any case, in the Diocletian era, given that in Europe there would have been no reason or method for it to happen. The Passio, as it appears today, nevertheless holds a notable importance, whether on the literary plane or on the historic-documentary one. On the one hand, it witnesses to a particular stage in the genre of the Acta Proconsularia; on the other, it attests to the possibilities of liturgical reunions in time of persecution. Finally, it appears as a tangible example of that "Catholic" martyrial literature (or in any case "not Donatist") that had been presented, acc. to the mention in Augustine (Brevic. XVII, 32), to the Carthaginian conference of 411.

P. Chiesa, Un testo agiografico africano ad Aquileia. Gli Acta di Gallonio e dei martiri di Timidia Regia: AB 114 (1996) 241-268 (ed. text pp. 265-268); F. Scorza Barcellona, Agli inizi dell'agiografia occidentale, in Hagiographies. Histoire internationale de la littérature hagiographique latine et vernaculaire en Occident des origines à 1550, ed. G. Philippart (CCHag 3), Turnhout 2001, 17-97 (85-88).

E. Zocca

GAMMADIA. The deeper analysis and correct interpretation of the gammadia, letters that decorate the clothes of masculine personages in paleo-Christian art, was undertaken only in recent times, thanks principally to the efforts of A. Quacquarelli. Before his studies, in fact, different explanations were sought—not always very convincing ones—to explain their significance, considering them to be substantially decorative filler or improbable initials of the names of the represented personages (DACL 6, 1 [1924] 610-613). In reality the gammadia, christological *monograms that are part of the unity of the symbolic language of ancient Christianity, appear often in the earliest Christian *iconography—at least starting from the 3rd c.—principally on the pallium of Christ, or on the clothes of *martyrs, *prophets and *apostles. The meaning, given that their use continued up to the 8th and 9th c.—with some revivals up into the modern era—was lost fairly early, and many scholars in the past maintained that it was a useless enterprise to try to decipher their correct meaning. As has been nevertheless well demonstrated, basing the interpretations principally on patristic *exegesis and on numerology, some of them have revealed a very precise meaning that certainly lies outside chance or pure decorative intent. In this way, relying on the numeric values of the letters of the Greek alphabet and on the interpretation of them offered by key passages contained in the works of the Fathers of the church, it has been possible to understand that I, initial of the name of Jesus both in the Greek and the Latin version, through the numeric value 10 which it represents, refers to the law, the Decalogue given to Moses which Christ came to carry to completion, and at the same time, hinting at a simple arithmetical operation, it would refer also to the gospels (if the components of the number 10, 1 + 2 + 3 + 4, are added, one obtains in fact 10). The gammadion H (numeric value 8) communicates the Christ in the spiritual world of the ogdoad* and reflects a message that all the faithful receive: the presence of Christ in our midst who teaches us to follow his precepts for our salvation. For the Fathers of the church, the OT and the NT form an inescapable unity: if Z is the number 7, the OT, i.e., the Law, H is the incarnation of the Word, the Christ, i.e., the NT. Whoever denies the OT cannot have H, just as whoever denies the NT cannot have the Z necessary to pass from 7 to 8, i.e., to the ogdoad. The gammadion Γ, corresponding to the number 3, would allude, as it is easy to guess, to the *Trinity and would make explicit the unity of *God in three Persons, while the gammadion Λ, not corresponding to the uppercase Latin letter or to reversed Γ, had the symbolic value of a graphic nature, because it would recall the cornerstone, rejected by men but preferred by God (1 Pet 2:5), against which they stumble who do not believe in the Word (1 Pet 2:7-8), and in the same way would recall the idea of a building, understood in the sense that every Christian believer is a temple of God. The term gammadia progressively lost its meaning and original value in the Middle Ages and was extended to different ornamental graphical signs of geometric type. The meaning of some letters, for example the A, the N, the O, the Ϲ (lunate sigma) or the R—which seem to refer back only to the Latin alphabet—has still not been deciphered today.

A. Quacquarelli, La simbologia delle lettere cristologiche nel battistero degli Ariani di Ravenna: RomBarb 2 (1977) 231-246; Id., Il monogramma cristologico (gammadia) Z: VetChr 15 (1978) 5-21; Id., Il monogramma cristologico (gammadia) H: VetChr 16 (1979) 5-20; Id., Catechesi liturgica e iconologia della Trinità nei primi secoli. Gammadia (lettera cristologica) G: VetChr 18 (1981) 5-32; Id., La gammadia pietra angolare L: VetChr 21 (1984) 5-25; Id., La lettera cristologica (gammadia) I nella iconografia dei primi secoli: VetChr 23 (1986) 5-18; D. Mazzoleni, s.v. Gammadia, in TIP, 185-186.

M. Ghilardi

GANGRA

I. The city - II. Council.

I. The city. A city of Paphlagonia, today Çankiri in Turkey, residence of the kings of the region before the Roman occupation (Strab., Geogr. XII, 3,41), Gangra was annexed to the Roman province of *Galatia in 6–5 BC—the year considered the beginning of the era of Gangra—and also belonged to it in ecclesiastical organization until the middle of the 5th c., when it passed under the patriarchate of Constantinople. Gangra was the metropolitan See of Paphlagonia, but never had more than five suffragan sees. We do not know the Christian origins at Gangra, but names of martyrs have reached us: the Novatian Alexander (Socr., HE II, 38: PG 67, 325 BC)—the *Novatian movement was strong in the region—*Callinicus, *Mamas of Caesarea, whose parents, also confessors of the faith, were from Gangra, etc. In the council celebrated there, its bishop *Hypatius was present (Socr., HE II, 43: PG 67, 352-353), who also participated in the Council of *Nicaea and died in 326. During the 5th and 6th c. illustrious personages were relegated to Gangra: *Dioscorus of Alexandria, *Timothy Aelurus. *Philoxenus of Mabbug sojourned in the city, as did the exiled *Macedonius of Constantinople in 515, dying there in 516. The bishops of Paphlagonia depended on the metropolitan of Gangra.

DHGE 19,1091-1103; KLP 2,691; W.M. Ramsay, The Historical Geography of Asia Minor, London 1890, 257-258 and 318-319; P. Magie, Roman Rule in Asia Minor to the End of the Third Century after Christ, Princeton, NJ 1950, passim; A.H.M. Jones, Cities of the Eastern Roman Empire, Oxford [2]1971, 166-167 and 559-60. (bibl.); I. Kaygusuz, Deux inscriptions de Gangra-Germanicopolis (Çankiri): ZPE 49 (1982) 177-183.

A. Di Berardino

II. Council. It was convened in the course of the 4th c., but the date is uncertain: the historian *Socrates locates it after 360, while *Sozomen puts it before the Council of *Antioch of 341. The 340 date seems more likely because it corresponds better to the information furnished by St. *Basil. Presided over by *Eusebius of Nicomedia, the 14 bishops present condemned errors and attitudes of *Eustathius of Sebaste and of his disciples. Eustathius, a proponent of rigorist monasticism, at first had had the esteem of Basil. Later elected bishop of *Sebaste in the extreme E part of Asia Minor, he attracted so much hostility of all kinds for his extravagances that in 348 he was deposed by a synod held at *Melitene in *Armenia. The Council of Gangra stigmatized various attitudes of the Eustathians: their condemnation of marriage and of the family (can. 1, 9, 10, 14-16); refusal to attend worship officiated by a married priest and liturgical separatism (can. 4-8, 11, 20); abstaining from eating meat (can. 2); their particular fasting days (can. 18-19); their unusual dress (can. 12-13, 17); and the fact that they induced slaves to disobey their owners (can. 3). Inspired by a sense of moderation, the canons that defended marriage and the family were accepted by many churches.

Basil, Epist. 288,13; Joannou 1, 2, 83-99; CPG 8553-4; Hfl-Lecl I, 2,1029-1045; F. Loofs, Eustathius von Sebaste und die Chronologie der Basilius Briefe, Halle 1898, 83; Palazzini 2, 100; Simonetti 411; I canoni dei concili della chiesa antica, ed. A. Di Berardino, I, Rome 2006, 289-297.

C. Nardi

GARMENTS of SKINS. (See *anthropology.) The interpretation of Gen 3:21, namely. the biblical text that states that God gave *Adam and Eve some garments of skin at the time he expelled them from the garden of *paradise, was of great importance in the history of the anthropological speculations of ancient Christianity. The Jew *Philo of Alexandria had read in the episode the account of the creation of the human body by God (Quaest. Gen. I, 53), and the *Neoplatonist philosopher *Porphyry, perhaps through the influence of *Numenius of Apamea, called the body "a garment of skin" (De abstin. I, 31,3; II, 46,1). But in Christian *encratite and *Messalian circles, the Philonian identification of the garments of skins with human bodies was reinterpreted in the sense that human corporeality is to be considered, in its material heaviness, sexual and mortal, just as the "garment of shame," which the *soul of the human being puts on as a result of, and as a punishment for, the original fall (see *Julius Cassian in Clem. Alex., Strom. III, 95,2; ps.-Macar., Hom. 47,6; ps.-Epiph., Hom. II in Sabbato Magno: PG 43, 464 B). The prebaptismal rite of the hair shirt probably had an influence on this interpretation (Odes of Solomon 25,8; *Theodore of Mopsuestia, Hom. cath. 12,24-25 and 14,8; *Jerome, Ep. 64,19). Widespread also in gnostic Valentinian circles (see Exc. Theod. 55,1; Pistis Sophia 69; heresiological information provided by Iren., Adv. haer. I, 5,5; Philosoph. X, 13,4; Tertull., Adv. Valent. 24,2-3), the allegorical interpretation of the garments of skins was shared by *Origen acc. to an explicit accusation raised by *Epiphanius of Salamis (Ancor. 54,2ff.; Panar. LXIV, 4,3-11; Ep. ad Joan. Hier. [51,5 inter Hieronym.: CSEL 54, 403]). *Didymus the Blind derived this interpretation from Origen (Com. Gen. ad loc. e Com. Iob 10,11 [from the *papyri of Tura]), *Macarius Magnes (In Gen. hom. 17 [fragm. Pitra]) and *Ambrose of Milan (Ep. 49,4 and Exp. Ps. CXVIII, 11,14).

This allegorical interpretation that identified the garments of skins with mortal and sexually differentiated bodies was soon opposed by the literalist interpretation, which was widespread in Greek patristic texts, from *Irenaeus to the Antiochenes, who understood the tunics of skins as true and proper garments that manifest the merciful attention of God with respect to the sinful first parents. But starting from *Hippolytus (In Gen. fragm. 6) and Origen (Hom. lev. 6,2), a different interpretation began to be imposed which read in the garments a symbol of the body's corruption and mortality, which were merited by the progenitors as a result of their *sin (see the insightful information provided by *Procopius of Gaza: PG 87/1, 220 A ff.). *Gregory of Nyssa wavered between the notions of the animal corporeality and the mortality of the body, and remained substantially undecided between the two traditions of Origen and *Methodius of Olympus (Aglaophon or on the Resurrection). In the West, with *Augustine, there prevailed the identification of the garments of skins with the postlapsarian mortality of the body (see De Gen. Man. II, 21,32, etc.).

J. Quasten, Theodore of Mopsuestia on the Exorcism of the Cilicium: HTR 35 (1942) 209-219; J. Pépin, Saint Augustin et le symbolisme néoplatonicien de la vêture: AugM I, Paris 1954, 293-306; M. Simonetti, Alcune osservazioni sull'interpretazione origeniana di Genesi 2,7 e 3,21: Aevum 36 (1962) 370-381; J.Z. Smith, The Garments of Shame: History of Rel. 5 (1966) 217-238; J.H. Waszink, Porphyrios und Numenios, in Porphyre, Entretiens sur l'antiquité classique 12, Vandoeuvres-Genève 1966, 33-83; G. Quispel, Makarius, das Thomasevangelium und das Lied von der Perle (Supp. NT 15), Leiden 1967; J. Daniélou, L'Être et le temps chez Grégoire de Nysse, Leiden 1970, 154-164; H. Crouzel, Les critiques adressées par Méthode et ses contemporains à la doctrine origénienne du corps ressuscité: Gregorianum 53 (1972) 679-716; P.F. Beatrice, Le tuniche di pelle. Antiche letture di Gen. 3,21, in U. Bianchi (ed.), La tradizione dell'Enkrateia. Motivazioni ontologiche e protologiche, Rome 1985, 433-484 (bibl.); C. Noce, Vestis varia. L'immagine della veste nell'opera di Origene (SEA 79), Rome 2002; H. Tremblay, Job 19,25-27 dans la Septante et chez les Pères grecs, Paris 2002, 314-326.

P.F. Beatrice

GAUDENTIUS of Brescia (d. after 410). The little data on his life is gathered from his Serm. 16 and 21. A pupil of *Filaster and, a few years after 390, proposed as his successor at Brescia, he accepted only through the pleading of *Ambrose and others. In 405 he was sent by *Honorius, together with two other bishops, to *Constantinople to obtain from *Arcadius the reexamination of the question of *John Chrysostom, who had been deposed and exiled, but the mission did not achieve anything. In 410 *Rufinus dedicated the translation of the ps.-*Clementine Recognitiones to him. He was a good preacher. A small corpus of 15 *homilies has reached us from him, which he himself sent to a certain Benevolus who had not been able to hear them in church. Modern scholars have added 6 other homilies to it. From the first group, 10 are on paschal themes and, in deference to the *tradition and to the *liturgy, interpreted some passages of the Exodus taken typologically as figures of the liberation from *sin claimed by Christ for the church with the paschal sacrifice. The other homilies are on various themes: Serm. 13 on Christmas attacks greed for earthly goods; 19 has an anti-Arian theme; the 20th is a brief *panegyric of St. Peter and St. Paul; the 21st is de vita et obitu Filastrii. On every subject, even doctrinal ones, Gaudentius reveals a good education and knows how to express himself at an excellent literary level.

CPL 139-143; PL 20, 827-1006; CSEL 68; Patrologia III, 122-124; G.M. Bruni, Teologia della Storia secondo Gaudenzio di Brescia, Vicenza 1967; C. Truzzi, Zeno, Gaudenzio e Cromazio, testi e contenuti della predicazione cristiana per le chiese di Verona e di Aquileia (360–410 ca.), Brescia 1985, 65-73; BBKL II, 185-186; B. Degórski, Pietro e Paolo martiri a Roma nell'insegnamento di Gaudenzio di Brescia, in Pietro e Paolo. Il loro rapporto con Roma nelle testimonianze antiche, XXXI Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Rome 4-6 maggio 2000, SEA 74, Rome 2001, 233-260.

M. Simonetti

GAUDENTIUS of Novara (d. ca. 418). The first bishop of Novara, he received his first Christian education in the shadow of two other saints: *Lawrence the priest, first apostle and martyr of the city, and Eusebius, first bishop of Vercelli and founder of monastic life in N *Italy. After the martyrdom of Lawrence, he rejoined *Eusebius in his exile in the East. Having returned to Vercelli, he remained in that city until around 398, when he was made bishop of Novara. His bishopric lasted about twenty years. Among the conversions he made were those of Lawrence's murderers. His death dates to around 418.

PCBE 2, 891; F. Savio, Gli antichi vescovi d'Italia. Piemonte, Turin 1898, 243-248; G. Cavigioli, La vita di s. Gaudenzio, Novara 1934; EC 5, 1962-1963; BS 6, 56-57; C.G. Mor, Osservazioni sulla più antica lista episcopale di Novara, Novara 1967; G. Colombo, I santi Gaudenzio, Agabio, Lorenzo nel sacramentario del sec. XI-XII, - cod. 35 (54), della Biblioteca capitolare di S. Maria in Novara: Novarien 6 (1974) 9-50; J.-Ch. Picard, Le souvenir des évêques. Sépultures, listes épiscopales et culte des évêques en Italie du Nord des origines au Xe siècle, Rome 1988, 459-463; 636-640.

L. Dattrino

GAUDENTIUS the Donatist (d. after 422). Donatist bishop of Thamugadi (*Timgad) (398–421). He was the successor of *Optatus, sufficiently eminent to be chosen one of the seven spokesmen (actores) of the *Donatists at the conference of *Carthage in 411. There his specific contribution was the affirmation that Catholicity signifies before all and above all the purity and integrity of the church and only in this context its geographic extension (Coll. Carth. III, 102). Following the condemnation of Donatism, he abandoned Thamugadi temporarily, but returned there and took back possession of the city churches. He took part in the Donatist Council of *Cirta in ca. 414, called by *Petilian of Constantine (Aug., C. Gaud. I, 37,47-48). Toward 420, however, his position was combated by the imperial tribune, the notarius* Dulcitius, who in an edict reminded the Donatists of their condemnation and ordered them to return the churches still in their possession.

Gaudentius wrote twice to Dulcitius refusing and threatening to set himself on fire inside his church (probably the large church built by his predecessor, Optatus) if there was any attempt to enforce the edict (Aug., C. Gaud. I, 1). Dulcitius consulted Augustine, and the latter entered the controversy (C. Gaud. I, 1). Gaudentius replied and Augustine wrote, in 421 probably, the first book of the Contra Gaudentium. Gaudentius justified the threat of suicide with the example of Razis (2 Mac 14:41) and insisted on the Christian duty of martyrdom when faced with *persecution (Gaud., Ep. II ad Dulcitium 14). It is not known if he carried out his threat, but the absence of any trace of destruction in the large church of Thamugadi suggests that he did not. In the debate with Dulcitius and Augustine, Gaudentius revealed his capacity for uniting a literary style derived from a classical education with a total attachment to the Bible. With his refusal of compromises and his defiance of the imperial authority in the name of religion, he faithfully reflected the spirit of Donatism in his time.

Augustine, Contra Gaudentium I-II (CSEL 53,201-274); Monceaux VI, ch. 5; S. Lancel, Actes de la Conférence de Carthage en 411, Paris 1972 (SC 194-195), I, 199-200; PCBE 1, 522-525; L.J. Van der Lof, Gaudentius de Thamugadi: Augustiniana 17 (1967) 5-13; P. Langa, Réplica a Gaudencio obispo donatista. Introducción, bibliografía y notas, BAC 34, Madrid 1994, 615-763.

W.H.C. Frend

GAUL. The first testimony of the *evangelization of Gaul, a "letter of the servants of Christ in pilgrimage at *Vienne and at *Lyons" destined for their brethren of *Asia and of *Phrygia (Eus., HE 5, 1-4), illustrates the difficulties of a small Christian minority, describing the pogrom that occurred in Lyons between 175 and 180, probably in 177, determined by the members of the trade associations more than by the faithful of Eastern religions (Cracco-Ruggini, Les Martyrs de Lyon, 77ff.).

The letter addressed by the survivors of the *persecution illustrates the atmosphere of eschatological tension without any need to look for a *Montanist influence there; it also suggests the composition of this community, whose most important members were faithful adherents of Greek culture; and it attests finally to a ministerial organization whose archaic vocabulary cannot be interpreted acc. to the norms established later. Nothing proves, finally, that the mission to Gallic territory had Asiatic origins, while some indications (the attitude of *Irenaeus in the paschal question: Eus., HE 5, 23,3 and 24,11) underline the links of the Christianity of Lyons with *Rome (Ch. Pietri, Les Martyrs de Lyon, 211ff.). After the persecution, Irenaeus assumed the charge of bishop, but it cannot be said that his refutation of gnosticism was done for local pastoral needs.

Much has been made of this first text of the Christians of Lyons (Duchesne, Fastes, I, 39-47), but neither the amplifications of Irenaeus (Adv. haer. 1,10,2; also Tertull., Adv. Jud. 7) nor the glosses of *Eusebius to the letter (HE V, 23,3) succeed in demonstrating with certainty that Lyons was a metropolitan see. For the 3rd c. it should be mentioned only that *Cyprian (Ep. 68) attests the existence of several bishops in Gaul, including a *Marcian of Arles, accused of being favorable to *Novatian. That does not, however, suffice to establish the progress of evangelization for several reasons:

1. *Epigraphy confirms the presence of Christian communities at Arles. But the inscription of *Pektorios at *Autun is not securely dated before the Constantinian epoch, and one must exclude the epigraphic testimonies invoked for *Marseille, Lyons and *Bordeaux.

2. Duchesne proposed using the testimony of the episcopal lists, considered certain, to date the foundation of the sees of Vienne, *Reims and *Trier from the middle of the 3rd c., and those of Aquitaine, Bourges and Bordeaux from the end of the century, and then those of the regions of Lyons, *Tours, Sens and *Paris, on a par with Metz in the Belgica I. In reality, this analysis, which had at least the merit of denying the legends about apostolic foundations, is based on the premise that the episcopal lists conserve memories of the origins, because they would have been used in the local *liturgy—a hypothesis justly rejected by J. Dubois (Listes, 9-20).

3. Finally, the evidence of the sanctoral acc. to the literary sources (from *Prudentius to *Venantius Fortunatus, to *Gregory of Tours), of the "Hieronymian" *martyrology, of the lives of the saints (CPL 2076-2146) and sometimes of archaeology (Hubert, Architecture; Février: V and VIII Congr. Int. Arch. Crist.) make it possible to reconstruct mainly the development of the cult of the martyrs at the end of the 4th c., rather than the geography and the chronology of the martyrs of the 3rd c. In 250, the persecution of *Decius certainly must have touched Gaul (cf. the attitude of Marcian of Arles), but nothing is known for sure concerning *Valerian or *Aurelian (despite a late cycle of passions), while, acc. to *Lactantius (Mort. Pers. 15), the persecution of Diocletian spared Gaul. In any case, the martyrdom of *Saturninus (Griffe, Gaule, I 395-402) attests the pre-Constantinian origins of the church of *Toulouse; perhaps the martyrdom of *Paul (mentioned by Prudentius; Griffe, Gaule, I, 164) and those of *Narbonne. The cult of *Victor at Marseille, end of the 5th c., does not provide decisive arguments; neither does the legend of the Theban Legion offer them for the Valais (contra Dupraz, D. van Berchem). There remain also too many uncertainties regarding, e.g., Pontius of Cimiez, celebrated in the 5th c. by the bishop *Valerian (CPL 1002), or Symphorian of Autun, whose passion could go back to the 5th c. *Sulpicius Severus (Chron. II, 32) notes that the evangelization of Gaul happened rather late: the church in the 3rd c. was organized in old Narbonensis, in the valley of the Rhone, and perhaps in Germany.

With the conversion of Constantine and the progressive institution of a Christian empire, the evangelization became more rapid: in 314, as the first sign of this new climate, and through the initiative of Constantine, a council united several bishops, a majority of them Gallic. Significantly, they excommunicated the faithful who deserted in pace, the church having then obtained peace after the persecution (can. 3, Munier, CCL 148, 5). Proof of the progress of Christianization is the proliferation of episcopal sees, attested in the subscription lists of the councils: Arles, *Valence (374), Nîmes (394 or 396), Riez (439) (Munier, CCL 148, 14; p. 41; p. 51; p. 71). Another list attributed to an apocryphal Council of *Cologne (Gauthier, Evangélisation, 447) preserves the signatures of the Gallic bishops gathered after the Council of *Serdica (343) in favor of *Athanasius. These indications in the Viennensis and the Narbonensis attest to about 10 sees in the Constantinian epoch, then about 15 at the end of the 4th c., a period when the Alpine provinces were reached. Also at the end of the 4th c. the Lyonese region included about 10 sees, from Rouen and Tours to Autun, including Paris and Sens. More to the N, the network seems less dense around Reims and Trier (Gauthier, Evangélisation, 27ff.). The W maritime region, esp. N of the Loire, is almost untouched: there remain in Aquitaine some sees, among them Bordeaux and the city of Clermont (Alvernia). The absence of a metropolitan organization explains these gaps; a few sees dominate, whose importance depends on the political situation (Trier, residence of the court) or on the prestige of a bishop (*Hilary at Poitiers, *Martin at Tours, *Proculus at Marseille). The councils did not succeed in resolving well the conflicts of jurisdiction between Arles and Vienne and between Arles and Marseille (Council of *Valence in 375; Council of *Turin in 398/399; Munier, CCL 148, 52).

A second element indicates the advances of Christianization: the transformation of the urban landscape. Contrary to a traditional hypothesis, in Gaul the first building employed for worship (ecclesia) was built in the city: meeting point for the liturgy, assistance, asylum; later it was flanked by a baptistery and by a domus ecclesiae, or episcopal residence (Ch. Pietri, Topographie). In funereal zones, on the periphery, appear ever more frequent oratories, provided with imported relics (Ewig, II, 260-371), sometimes buildings (basilicae) consecrated to the rare martyrs of Gaul which hosted, most of the time, tombs of bishops, without forgetting the monasteries (cf. the vicus christianorum of Clermont).

To promote missionary work, a clergy was constituted, a Christian society that entered into a different environment, even to the local aristocracy (Gassmann, Episkopat, 48). The Roman decretals (of *Damasus, *Innocent, *Celestine, *Leo), addressed in response to local appeals, reveal rigorous rules for the recruitment of the clergy (lex continentiae). Although some of the original traits of the *Gallican liturgy are poorly known (Leclercq, DACL, s.v.), and whose affinity with the Eastern Duchesne perhaps exaggerated (Griffe, Gaule, III, 165), we can see the effort of the bishops to organize a *catechesis (Hilary; in the 6th c. *Caesarius of Arles), to spread the veneration of the martyrs (at Rouen, Victricius), to organize assistance, rendered more necessary by the barbarian crisis (*Salvian) and facilitated by the development of an ecclesiastical property (Lesne, Propriété, 1-70). This missionary effort aimed at the aristocracy: the influence of the classical culture impregnates a Christian spirituality still marked, in the 4th c., by archaic *millenarist traditions (Simonetti, Alle origini). From *Ausonius, who owes little to the Bible, came a Christian *poetry (Fontaine, Poésie, 81 and from the same author, the commentary to the Vita Martini). The countryside, on the other hand, resisted the missions longer (Demougeot - Speyer, Gallia, 914ff.), though the foundation of the first rural churches attests to the missionary impetus (Imbart, Églises, 2-53), in particular the activity of Martin in the territory of Tours (L. Pietri, Tours). Martin exemplifies several aspects of Christianity in Gaul. As the founder of a first monastic community at Ligugé, the bishop instituted another at Marmoutier, thus giving the example of a monk-bishop. An *ascetic, rigorist movement, sometimes on the margins of the ecclesiastical institutions (though much less than Babut affirms, Martin), took inspiration also from Eastern and African models, more directly with the arrival of *John Cassian (Marrou, Christiana, 345-372). Martin's example also shows Gaul's sensitivity to the grand problems of Christianity: the episcopate in fact became involved, under Constantius (345–360), in the mid-4th-c. *Arian crisis (Simonetti, Crisi, 220ff.). The execution of *Priscillian at Trier divided the episcopate even more profoundly. At the beginning of the 5th c., immediately after the crisis, the links with Rome were reinforced: Pope *Zosimus (417–418) tried to create, for the benefit of Arles, an institution that would replace Roman influence (Ch. Pietri, Roma, II, 1000-1043).

This vicariate also illustrates the desire to maintain Catholic unity despite the collapse (at the beginning of the 5th c.) of political unity due to the barbarian invasions. These devastated Christian Gaul: in the N several episcopal sees disappeared, sometimes permanently (Bavay), esp. in the areas where evangelization was still weak. The restoration was very late here (6th-7th c.), and limited, mostly using itinerant bishops (Tournai-Noyon; Thérouanne-Boulogne; De Moreau, Histoire de l'Église de Belgique). In the S, however, the network of episcopal sees grew tighter, reaching Upper Provence and all the regions, overlooked for a long time, between the Pyrenees and the Garonne. The founding of monasteries sometimes adapted to the political situation created by the barbarian kingdoms or to the geographic evolution (transfer from Langres to Dijon). Now the bishop occupied more than ever a preeminent position, that of a defensor civitatis, protector of the poor against the assaults of the barbarians and of the powerful (see the inscriptions: Heinzelmann, Bischofsherrschaft). He had at his disposal a domain enriched with donations, even if he had ever greater difficulties in controlling the pious institutions (Lesne, Propriété, 79-195). In the 5th c., certain aristocrats found in the episcopate the possibility of serving an ideal of romanitas, of culture and of faith: *Sidonius Apollinaris, *Ruricius of Limoges (Stroheker, Der senatorische Adel). It is clear that one should not overestimate the quality of these people, who included many ambitious among their ranks (esp. when the Frankish monarchy controlled the elections) or more simply mediocre prelates. On the whole, however, they fulfilled with tenacity their pastoral charge, as attested by the organization of the calendar (see *Perpetuus at Tours; the institution at Vienne of the *rogations through the efforts of Mamertus) and the development, from the 5th c. and above all in the 6th, of the rural churches (Griffe, BLE 1975, 3ff.).

The flowering of monasticism accompanied this mission with the foundation of stable communities, organized acc. to a *rule, which spread throughout Gaul: e.g., that of Caesarius of Arles (315), adopted in 570 at *Poitiers by *Radegund. In the 5th c., the community of Lérins sent out its monks as bishops (Prinz, Mönchtum, 47ff.). From 430, the founding of Romanus, then of Engendius at Condat, in the Jura, illustrates a type of monastery established in the "desert" as a center for mission and assistance (in addition, among the people a whole spiritual movement developed: penitents and conversi; cf. Vogel). Among the centers of the 7th c., that of Luxeuil should be mentioned, founded by the Irishman *Columbanus, whose austere rule became more flexible under Benedictine influence. The consolidation of the barbarian monarchies determined a transformation of the relationships of the church with the political power. In the 5th c., in S Gaul, the Arian Visigothic kings sometimes created difficulties (esp. *Euric, 466–484). The N churches (Tours, Reims) struggled increasingly to achieve the Christianization of the pagan *Franks: the conversion of *Clovis, between 497 and 508 (Tessier), is celebrated as that of a new Constantine. But with the division of the Frankish realm (511), despite some periods of reunification, the bishops and the clergy were implicated increasingly in dynastic conflicts: the assassination of Praetextatus, bishop of Rouen, in 586, and of *Leodegar of Autun in 678. Certainly the episcopate could exercise a political influence, sometimes effective and peaceful: thus King Dagobert (629–639) surrounded himself with counselors, chosen among bishops or future bishops, such as Arnulf of Metz, Dado of S. Oer, *Desiderius of Cahors, *Eligius of Noyon.

These examples reveal a new social type of ecclesiastic, but also attest an interference by the political society among the clergy which issued, esp. in the 7th c., in a detestable simoniac traffic and in the occupation of episcopal sees on the part of laymen. Thus the political power disposed ever more of the goods of the church to the advantage of liege men, whether clerics or lay. Hugo, nephew of Charles Martel, assumed the bishopric of Rouen and at the same time that of Paris and of Bayeux (723–730). Some of the numerous councils of the 6th and 7th c. were preoccupied with stopping this dangerous secularization, to moralize the episcopal elections and to maintain as best they could the authority of the metropolitans; but until the 7th c. this crisis led progressively to the withdrawal of Gaul into itself and the loosening of links with Rome.

In the 5th and 6th c. certain centers of reflection and spirituality were active in the S of Gaul: Marseille (Salvian, Cassian, *Museus, Gennadius), Arles (Caesarius the African, *Julian Pomerius), Vienne (*Avitus and above all *Claudianus Mamertus, nourished by an entire *Neoplatonic tradition), to the N of the Loire, Poitiers (Venantius Fortunatus) and above all Tours. In this city, where by that time the memory of Martin attracted *pilgrimages (L. Pietri, Tours), Gregory, at the end of the 6th c., orchestrated a reflection that recalls, in a synthesis of different traditions, the sending of seven messengers from Rome for the purpose of Gallic conversions and celebrates the Gesta Dei per Francos. After Gregory, the 7th c. appears entirely lifeless, waiting for the Carolingian Renaissance.

Cf. the bibliographies in Fliche-Martin, vols. III, IV and V; in the various vols. of Histoire des Diocèses de France (ed. J.R. Palanque and B. Plongeron), Paris; and of Histoire des Provinces (dir. Ph. Wolff), Toulouse. E. Demougeot - W. Speyer, Gallia: RAC 7, 891-927 and 944-962; J. Fontaine, France: DSp 5, 785-805; Ch. Pietri, Frankreich: TRE 11, 346-353; Id., Les Martyrs de Lyon, Colloque CNRS de Lyon, Paris 1978; P. Imbart de la Tour, Les paroisses rurales du IVe au XIe siècle, Paris 1900; E. Lesne, Histoire de la propriété ecclésiastique en France, Lille 1900; Duchesne, Fastes, I and III; E.Ch. Babut, Saint Martin de Tours, Paris 1912; E. De Moreau, Histoire de l'Église de Belgique, des origines au XIIe siècle, I, Brussels 1940; K. Stroheker, Der senatorische Adel im spätantiken Gallien, Tübingen 1948; J. Hubert, L'architecture religieuse du Haut Moyen-Âge en France, Paris 1952; C. Vogel, La discipline pénitentielle en Gaule, Paris 1952; D. van Berchem, Les Martyrs de la Légion Thébaine. Essai sur la formation d'une légende, Basel 1956; E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne à l'Époque romaine, Paris, I, 1964; II, 1966; III, 1965; G. Tessier, Le baptême de Clovis, Paris 1964; P.A. Février, L'archéologie chrétienne en France de 1954 à 1962: Atti del VI Congr. Int. di Arch. Crist., Vatican City 1965, 57-92; F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum im Frankreich, Vienna 1965; P.A. Février - N. Duval, Les monuments chrétiens de la Gaule transalpine: Actas del VIII Congreso de Arq. Crist., Rome-Barcelona, 1969, 57-106; M. Simonetti, Alle origini di una cultura cristiana in Gallia: MAL Quaderno 158 (1973) 117-131; J. Dubois, Les listes épiscopales, témoins de l'organisation ecclésiastique: RHEF 62 (1975) 9-24; E. Griffe, À travers les paroisses rurales de la Gaule au VIe siècle: BLE 76 (1975) 3-26; Ch. Pietri, Remarques sur la topographie chrétienne des cités entre Loire et Rhin (IVe-VIIe s.): RHEF 62 (1975) 189-204; M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome 1975; M. Heinzelmann, Bischofsherrschaft in Gallien vom IV. bis zum VII. Jhdt.: Beihefte Francia, V, Munich 1976; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana (311–440), Rome 1976; P. Gassmann, Der Episkopat im Gallien in V. Jhdt., Diss., Bonn 1977; H. Marrou, Christiana tempora, Rome 1978; E. Ewig, Spätantikes und Frankisches Gallien: Beihefte Francia III, 1 and 2, Munich 1976–1979; N. Gauthier, L'évangélisation des pays de la Moselle. La province romaine de Première Belgique entre Antiquité et Moyen-Âge, Paris 1980; J. Fontaine, Naissance de la poésie dans l'Occident chrétien, Paris 1981; L. Pietri, La ville de Tours du IVe au VIe siècle, Paris 1983; Ch. Pietri, Remarques sur la christianisation du Nord de la Gaule (IVe-VIe siècles): La Revue du Nord 66 (1984) 58-68; Id., Chiesa e comunità locali nell'Occidente cristiano (IV-VI d.C.). L'esempio della Gallia, in A. Giardina (ed.), Società romana e impero tardoantico. III. Le merci, gli insediamenti, Rome 1986, 761-795, 923-934; P. Saint-Roch, L'utilisation liturgique de l'espace urbain et suburbain. L'exemple de quatre villes de France: Actes du XIe Congrès International d'Archéologie Chrétienne, Lyon-Vienne-Grenoble-Genève-Aoste, 21-28 Septembre 1986, I-III, Vatican City 1989, II, 1103-1115; E. Dàbrowska, La sépulture des évêques et des abbés dans la Gaule du IVe au VIIe siècle, in ibid., 1259-1266; J. Guyon, Baptistères et groupes épiscopaux de Provence. Élaboration, diffusion et devenir d'un type architectural, in ibid., 1427-1449; M. Colardelle, Églises et sépultures dans les Alpes du Nord (Aoste, Genève, Grenoble, Lyon et Vienne), in ibid., 1535-1549; E. Dàbrowska, Les tombes de saints évêques en Gaule en tant que lieux de pèlerinage, Akten des XII. Internationalen Kongresses für Christliche Archäologie, Bonn, 22-28 September 1991, I-II, Vatican City 1995, II, 663-666; Fifth-century Gaul. A Crisis of Identity? ed. J. Drinkwater - H. Elton, Cambridge 1992; L. Pietri, in Histoire du Christianisme des origines à nos jours. II. Naissance d'une chrétienté (250–430), Paris 1995, 832-860; Id., in Histoire du Christianisme des origines à nos jours. III. Les églises d'Orient et d'Occident, Paris 1998, 207-246, 321-386; J.-Ch. Picard, Évêques, saints et cités in Italie et en Gaule. Études d'archéologie et d'histoire, Rome 1998; J. Guyon (éd.), Les premiers chrétiens en Provence, Paris 2001.

Ch. Pietri - M. Ghilardi

GAZA (Heb. 'Azzâh, "the strong," Aram. Ghazzeh, Egyptian Gazatu, Assyrian Hazzatu, Gr. Γάζα). A

city of SW *Palestine on the Mediterranean, Gaza was a center of Hellenistic *paganism around the principal temple, the Marneion. The inhabitants were little inclined to convert to Christianity. Constantine ordered the separation from Gaza of the neighboring city Maiuma, favorable to the new religion, which from then on took the name Constantia, while the emperor *Julian reunited the two cities. The inhabitants of Gaza converted only in the 5th c. under the edict of the emperor *Arcadius, which prohibited pagan worship, and through the zeal of St. *Porphyry, a favorite of the Empress *Eudoxia, who built on the ruins of the Marneion a large basilica, called Eudoxiana. The territory of Gaza had at that time three bishops: one at Gaza, one at Maiuma, one at Anthedon. During the 5th and the 6th c., *Zosimus, *Procopius, *Coricius, Isidore, *Aeneas, Timothy and John distinguished themselves in the famous school of Gaza (cf. K. Seitz, Die Schule von Gaza, Heidelberg 1892). In 541 or 542, a council was called, by order of Emperor Justinian (482–565). Participating in this council were the deacon *Pelagius, *apocrisarius of the Roman Church in Constantinople; *Ephrem, patriarch of Antioch; *Peter, patriarch of Jerusalem; and *Hypatius, bishop of Ephesus. The background of the council was as follows: Paul, patriarch of Alexandria, had wanted to depose the dux of Egypt, the military authority assigned to the defense of the borders, but the deacon Prois, treasurer of the church, had alerted the duke: Paul then had Prois imprisoned by the augustal prefect who had him tortured to death. As the family of the deacon turned to Justinian, the emperor had the augustal prefect beheaded and called a council at Gaza in which, under the presidency of Pelagius, Paul was deposed and a certain *Zoilus was nominated. In the council the *Origenist movement was also denounced to the pope, and the pope entrusted this question to the emperor. Following the battle of Tadun (634–635), Gaza fell into the power of the Arabs, who held it in great esteem for the sepulcher of Hashim, grandfather of Muhammad and fatherland of Ash-Shafi'i, founder of the Sunnite school.

DB 3, 118-124; EC 5, 1971-1972. On the council, see Mansi IX, col. 706; Mansi, Suppl. I, col. 428; A. Peltier, Dictionnaire des Conciles, I, Paris 1847, col. 231; Hfl-Lecl II, 2, 1078-1081; B. Brouria-Ashkelony, The Monastic School of Gaza, Leiden 2005; J. Lee Hevelone-Harper, Disciples of the Desert. Monks, Laity, and Spiritual Authority in the Sixth-century Gaza, Baltimore 2005.

C. Nardi

GELASIUS I, pope (d. 496). We are informed about the life of Gelasius—bishop of Rome from 1 March 492 to 19 November 496—by contemporary sources (Eugippius, Vita Sancti Severini 46, CSEL 9/2, 65,15-19; SC 374, 294; Facundus of Hermiane, Pro defensione Trium Capitulorum 5,4,3, CCL 90A, 154, 252-255; Id., Contra Mocianum, 9, 16, 60, CCL 90A, 403,82-88; 404,136-138; 414,505-518; Victor of Tunnunna, Chronicon 69, CCL 173, 22,355-356; Cassiodorus, De institutione 8, PL 70, 1119C; Dionysius Exiguus, Praefatio in collectione decretorum Pontificum Romanorum ad Iulianum presbyterum, CCL 85, 45-47) and from the Pontiff's epistolary, transmitted to us by the Collectio Britannica and by a second group of three collections: the Avellana, published by Guenther (Coll. Avell., CSEL 35), the Berolinensis and the Veronensis, edited by Schwartz (Publizistische Sammlungen zum Acacianischen Schisma [in successive publs.], Munich 1934). Two other letters by Gelasius have been passed down by the collections of *Dionysius Exiguus (to the bishops per Lucaniam, Brutios et Siciliam) and of *Arles (to the bishop Eonius). The second collection of the letters of Gelasius has suffered damage of various kinds during the course of its transmission. In addition, some letters of *Felix III (483–492) have been attributed to Gelasius: the letter to *Fravitta (PublS 111-113); two fragments entitled De anathematis vinculo (also called Tractatus IV) and De vitanda communione Acacii (PublS 7-15 and ibid., 33-49); two letters to the bishop Honorius of Salona (Coll. Avell. 96, CSEL 35, 398-400; Coll. Avell. 98, CSEL 35, 436-439); the letter to Andromachus against the feast of the Lupercalia (Tractatus VI: Coll. Avell. 100, CSEL 35,453-464; SC 65, 162-189). By style and contents, the Epistola ad Syriae episcopos is evidently spurious (Patrum Nova Bibliotheca, II, Rome 1844, 653-662).

The late portrait of the Liber pontificalis attributes an African origin to Gelasius and gives the name of his father: Gelasius, natione Afer, ex patre Valerio (LP I, 255). Nautin asserts that the notice is unfounded and gives greater credit to the affirmation of Gelasius that, in the letter to the emperor *Anastasius (491–518), he is declared Romanus natus (PublS 19, 27). It is not improbable that the notice has a foundation in truth and that the father of Gelasius and his family were Africans or of African origin. We know nothing of his ecclesiastical career prior to the episcopate. Nautin has called into doubt that Gelasius was secretary of his predecessors *Simplicius (468–483) and Felix III, but it is not improbable that he contributed at the Lateran scrinium.

One of the first problems for Gelasius, after his election, was the war between *Odoacer (ca. 437–493) and *Theodoric (489–526) for possession of Italy, which ended with the taking of *Ravenna on the part of the *Ostrogoths in February of 493 (cf. Excerpta Valesiana 49-57). Despite the *Arian confession of the Ostrogoths, the relations were good between the Roman See and the court of Ravenna during Gelasius's pontificate, and they were marked by—if not collaboration—surely a profound respect. Between 494 and 496 the relations between Gelasius and the Ostrogoths focused mostly on questions of ecclesiastical jurisdiction and the privilege of the forum (Epp. Theodericianae variae, I-VIII, MGH [AA] 12,1,389-391). There is no want of courtesy letters and requests for aid, written to influential ladies at the Ostrogothic court—the inlustris femina Firmina and Ereleuva, mother of Theodoric (Frag. Thiel 36,502). Some letters attest to the intervening rapport between Gelasius and functionaries of the Ostrogothic kingdom: two to the comites Teia and Hostilius, concerning the ecclesiastical forum, and a note to the defensor Duclius on the new prelate Lucera Anastasius (Ep. Thiel 24,390; Frag. Thiel 3,484-485; Ep. ad Mercurium [II], PLS 3,760-761). The epistolary also offers notices regarding his relations with the Italian episcopate, with that of *Gaul, and with the bishops of the Balkan region, whose traditional bonds of communion with the Roman See Gelasius sought to strengthen.

In 493 Gelasius wrote to the bishops of Picenum about the case of *Socrates, an ecclesiastical propagator of *Pelagian ideas, and Gelasius asked the prelates to suppress his activities. Pelagianism was then in a period of new growth in Gaul, Italy and in the Balkans, and to this heresy Gelasius dedicated a tractate (Tractatus V or Dicta aduersus Pelagianam haeresim, Coll. Avell. 97, CSEL 35,400-436; cf. Ep. universis episcopis per Picenum, Coll. Avell. 94, CSEL 35,357-368). The letters attributed to Gelasius on the Pelagian question, written to the bishop Honorius, are actually by Felix III (Coll. Avell. 96 and 98, CSEL 35, 398-400; 436-439). The letters to the Italian bishops deal with numerous matters of the apostolic see in the peninsula: the internal life of ecclesial communities and of all the faithful, ordinations, inquiries, processes, questions regarding ecclesiastical goods, consecrations of churches, crimes and injustices, right to asylum, and testaments. We are informed about the relations with the churches of Gaul by a missive to Aeonius of Arles and from two notices of ps.-Gennadius regarding the professions of faith sent to Gelasius by *Honoratus of Marseille and by one of his clergy, both of whom were accused of heresy (possibly Pelagianism) and Gelasius's response, by which he recognizes their orthodoxy.

Another serious question that Gelasius, only recently elected bishop, had to confront was the Acacian schism, thus called after the bishop of Constantinople, *Acacius, who was excommunicated by Felix III in 484 because he had given his support to the politics of compromise with the monophysites with the Henotikon of the emperor *Zeno (474–491) and with the reintegration of *Peter Mongus of Alexandria, disciple of the monophysite *Timothy Aelurus (457–477). In the ecclesiastical concepts of Rome, the imperial authority could not absolve the Alexandrian bishop of the accusation of heresy and of complicity with Timothy Aelurus, and the shared intervention of Acacius could not constitute a solution, because Alexandria, the second See of Christianity, could not receive reconciliation into the Oikoumenē from an inferior see, Constantinople, but only from the prima sedes, i.e., Rome (PublS, 15,5-13).

Gelasius dedicated several works to the Acacian schism and to the christological controversies: among these, the so-called Tractatus III is, in reality, a letter, the most engaging theological work of Gelasius, the theme being Christ's two natures (PublS 85-106). The text was addressed to the Balkan Peninsula bishops faithful to Rome and to the bishops with whom Gelasius wished to solidify the traditionally privileged relationship which the See of Constantinople, before and during the Acacian schism, had put up for discussion several times with its politics of expansion in that region. The letter was furnished with a *florilegium, and Saltet rightly claims that it depends upon the lost Antiochene document from the Council of *Ephesus in 431; Schwartz and Richard have traced it back to the patristic testimonies of the lost Pentalogus of *Theodoret of Cyrrhus. Another affinity between Gelasius's letter and Antiochene theology is the letter's eucharistic teaching, similar to that of the Eranistes of Theodoret and of the ps.-Chrysostom works (Ep. ad Caesarium monachum, PG 52, 755).

As was usual for the Roman authorities, the works of Gelasius in defense of Chalcedonian Christology are often connected to the defense of the primacy of the Roman See and to the refutation of the privileges conceded to the See of Constantinople by the council in 381 (PublS 17, 31-37). Zeno's intervention in the christological question and the reconciliation of Peter Mongus pushed Gelasius, following the path of Felix III, to hold up the autonomy of the church in the confrontations with the imperial power in the doctrinal and disciplinary spheres: to this theme he dedicated a part of the Tractatus IV and of the celebrated letter of 494 to the emperor Anastasius, this letter being known for the doctrine of the "two powers" (PublS 19-24), which has a long history of effects, beginning with the Middle Ages, particularly with the reform of the 11th c. One of the most solemn acts that consecrated the politics of Gelasius was the Roman Synod of 13 March 495 in which Misenus of Cuma—a papal legate who had adhered to the Acacian schism at Constantinople—made an act of contrition and was acquitted by the pope. Eleven times the synod acclaimed Gelasius Vicarius Christi, a papal appellative that seems to have been used for the first time during his pontificate (Coll. Avell. 103, CSEL 35, 474-487).

The Liber pontificalis attributes to Gelasius some works that have not come down to us: a tractate Adversus Nestorium et Eutychem (which is not the letter on the two natures), two books Adversum Arrium, hymns Ad modum beati Ambrosii, a sacramentary and various orationes. To him the Decretum Gelasianum* and the Sacramentarium Gelasianum have been attributed, though actually they are works compiled after his death. Dionyius Exiguus, who left a beautiful eulogy of Gelasius (Praefatio in collectione decretorum), affirms that he had collected first-hand notices from Roman clerics who had been his students, but that he had never known Gelasius because he arrived in Rome after his death (ca. 500). For this reason it is evident that it was not the pope who inspired the Dionysiana collection, as Peitz holds. Gelasius was immediately venerated as a saint: beatus Gelasius in sanctitate vitae atque scientia per universum mundum celebrioris famae gloria praedicatus (Facundus of Hermiane, Contra Mocianum 16, CCL 90A, 404,136-138). The date of his death (19 November) coincides with an ancient liturgical commemoration, attested by *Bede, by some recensions of Ado's Martyrologium, by the additions to that of Usuardo and by other attestations (Le Martirologe d'Adon. Ses deux familles, ses trois recensions. Texte et commentaire, ed. J. Dubois - G. Renaud, Paris 1984, 387; Usuardo, Martyrologium, PL 124, 713-714). The Martyrologium Romanum fixed the liturgical memorial on the date of his depositio, 21 November (Martyr. rom., Propylaeum ad Acta Sanctorum decembris, ed. H. Delehaye et al., Brussels 1940, 537; 538n.8). *John the Deacon speaks in the 9th c. of the funerary titulus, which faded away and was long ago placed on the sepulcher in the atrium of the basilica of St. Peter's at the Vatican (Gregorii Magni vita IV,68, PL 75,221B).

CPL 1667-1675; Ph. Jaffé, Regesta Pontificum Romanorum. Ab condita Ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum MCXCVIII, I, Leipzig 1885; Epistolae, 1-43, ed. A. Thiel, Epistolae Romanorum Pontificum genuinae et quae ad eos scriptae sunt a S. Hilaro usque ad Pelagium II, ex schedis clar. Petri Coustantii aliisque editis, adibiti praestantissimis codicibus Italiae et Germaniae, I, [Braunsbergae 1867] Hildesheim-New York 1974, 287-483; Fragmenta, 1-49, ed. A. Thiel, Epistolae Romanorum Pontificum, ibid., 483-510; 503-596; Epistulae imperatorum pontificum aliorum inde ab a. CCCLXVII usque ad a. DLIII datae Avellana quae dicitur collectio, ed. O. Guenther, Prague-Vienna-Leipzig 1895 (CSEL 35); Publizistische Sammlungen zum Acacianischen Schisma, ed. E. Schwartz, Munich 1934 (ABAW Neue Folge. Heft 10); ed. A. Hamman, Paris 1963 (PLS 3); Epistolae Pontificum Romanorum ineditae, ed. S. Loewenfeld, Graz [2]1959; P. Ewald, Die Papastbriefe der Britischen Sammlung, Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für Ältere Deutsche Geschichtskunde zur Beförderung einer Gesamtausgabe der Quellen deutscher Geschichte des Mittelalters 5 (1880) 275-414; Lettre contre les Lupercales et dix-huit Messes du Sacramentaire léonien, ed. G. Pommarès, Paris 1959 (SC 65); J.B. Pitra, Spicilegium Solesmense complectens Sanctorum Patrum scriptorumque ecclesiasticorum anecdota hactenus opera, selecta e Graecis orientalibusque et Latinis codicibus, publici juris facta, IV, Paris 1858.

Vita: Duchesne LP 255-257; Gelasius I, BBKL, II, Hamm 1970, 197-199; W. Ullmann, Gelasius I (492–496). Das Papsttum an der Wende der Spätantike zum Mittelalter, Stuttgart 1981; Nautin P., Gélase, DHGE 20,283-294; R. Bratož, Gelasio I, santo, EPapi I,458-462.

Christology and other studies: C. Moeller, Le chalcédonisme et le néo-chalcédonisme en Orient de 451 à la fin du VIe siècle, in Das Konzil von Chalkedon, I, ed. A. Grillmeier - H. Bacht, Würzburg 1951, 637-720; A. Grillmeier, Gesù il Cristo nella fede della Chiesa, 2/1, ed. italiana S. Olivieri, Brescia 1982, esp. 399-416; Gelasio, Lettera sulle due nature. Introduzione, testo, traduzione e commento, ed. R. Ronzani (Biblioteca Patristica, 48), Bologna 2011; H. Koch, Gelasius im kirchenpolitischen Dienste seiner Vorgänger, der Päpste Simplicius (468–483) und Felix III (483–492). Ein Beitrag zur Sprache des Papstes Gelasius I (492–496) und früherer Papstbriefe, Munich 1935; F. Dvornik, Pope Gelasius and Emperor Anastasius, ByzZ 44 (1951) 111-116; J. Gaudemet, Histoire d'un texte. Le chapitres 4 et 27 de la décrétale du pape Gélase du 11 mars 494, in Mélanges d'histoire des religions offert à Henri-Charles Puech, Paris 1974, 289-298; P. Nautin, La lettre de Félix III à André de Thessalonique et sa doctrine sur l'Église et l'empire: RHE 77 (1982) 5-34; Ph. Blaudeau, Condemnation et absolution synodales d'un légat. Le cas de Misène de Cumes (483–495), in I concili della cristianità occidentale, XXX Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Rome 2002 (SEA 78) 503-528; S. Destephen, Une province romaine sortie de l'ombre. La Dardanie d'après la correspondance du pape Gélase: MEFRA 120/1 (2008) 163-181; E. Michaud, Le pape Gélase et le monophysisme eucharistique: Kirchliche Zeitschrift 1899, 303-309; J. Kilmartin - J. Daly, The Eucharistic Theology of Pope Gelasius I. A Nontridentine View, SP 29, 1997, 283-289; M. Maccarrone, Vicarius Christi e vicarius Petri nel periodo patristico, RSCI 1 (1948) 1-32; Ph.V. Bagan, The Syntax of the Letters of Pope Gelasius I, Washington DC 1945; F. Di Capua, Il ritmo prosaico nelle lettere dei papi e nei documenti della cancelleria romana dal IV al XIV secolo, III, Parte I. Il latino letterario medievale e lo stile della curia romana – Parte II. Da Ilaro a Ormisda: Lateranum, n.s. 11-12 (1946) 3-214; A.W.J. Holleman, Pope Gelasius I and Lupercalia, Amsterdam 1974; G. Otranto, Due epistole di papa Gelasio I (492–96) sulla comunità cristiana di Lucera: VetChr 14 (1977) 122-137; Id., Note sul sacerdozio femminile nell'antichità in margine a una testimonianza di Gelasio I: VetChr 19 (1982) 341-360; S. Prete, La lettera di Gelasio I ai vescovi del Picenum sul pelagianesimo: Studia Picena 43 (1976) 9-28; D.J. Chapman, On the "Decretum Gelasianum de libris recipiendis et non recipiendis": RBen 30 (1913) 187-208, 315-333;

Ch. Munier, Gelasianum (decretum): DHGE 20, 303-304; V. Grossi, Il "Decretum Gelasianum." Nota in margine all'autorità della Chiesa di Roma alla fine del V sec.: Augustinianum 41 (2001) 231-255; C. Pietri, D'Alexandrie à Rome. Jean Talaia émule d'Athanase au Ve siècle, in Alexandrina. Hellénisme, judaisme et christianisme à Alexandrie. Mélanges offerts au P. Claude Mondésert, Paris 1987, 277-295; Id., L'hérésie et l'hérétique selon l'Église romaine (IVe-Ve siècles), in Eresia e eresiologia nella Chiesa antica, XII Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Augustinianum 25 (1985) 867-887; Id., La conversion de Rome et la primauté du Pape (IV-VIe S.), in Il primato del Vescovo di Roma nel primo millennio. Ricerche e testimonianze, ed. M. Maccarrone, Vatican City 1991, 219-243; Id., La géographie de l'Illyricum ecclésiastique et ses relation avec l'Église de Rome (Ve-VIe siècles), in Villes et peuplement dans l'Illyricum protobyzantin. Actes du colloque organisé par l'Ecole française de Rome (Rome, 12-14 mai 1982), Rome 1984, 21-59; V. Parlato, Il vicariato di Tessalonica (IV-VII sec.): Studi urbinati di scienze giuridiche 49-50 (1980–1982) 133-150; P.W.M. Peitz, Dionysius Exiguus Studien, Berlin 1960; M. Richard, Les florilèges diphysites du Ve et du VIe siècle, Das Konzil von Chalkedon, I, ed. A. Grillmeier - H. Bacht, Würzburg 1951, 721-748; Id., Opera minora, II-III, ed. E. Dekkers - M. Geerard - A. van Roey - G. Verbeke, Turnholt-Leuven 1977, 3; Id., Notes sur les florilèges dogmatique du V et du VI siècle, Opera Minora, I, ed. E. Dekkers - M. Geerard - A. van Roey - G. Verbeke., Turnholt-Leuven 1976, 2; L. Saltet, Les sources de l'Eranisthés de Théodoret: RHE 5 (1906) 289-303, 513-536, 741-754; E. Stein, Le période byzantine de la papauté: Catholic Historical Review 21 (1935–1936) 129-163; A.K. Ziegler, Pope Gelasius and His Teaching on the Relation of Church and State: Catholic Historical Review 27 (1941–1942) 412-437; G. Soranzo, I precedenti della cosidetta teoria gelasiana: RSCI 1 (1947) 3-21; W. Ensslin, Auctoritas und Potestas. Zur Zweigewaltenlehre des Papstes Gelasius I., "Historisches Jahrbuch" 74 (1955) 661-668; O. Bartolini, La dottrina gelasiana dei due poteri nella polemica per la successione nel regno di Lorena (869–879), in Mélanges Eugène Tisserant, 4, Vatican City 1964 (Studi e Testi, 234), 35-58; Id., Scritti scelti di storia medievale, Livorno 1968, 739-762; A. Cottrell, "Auctoritas" and "potestas." A Reevaluation of the Correspondence of Gelasius I on Papal-Imperial Relations: Mediaeval Studies 55 (1993) 95-109; P. Toubert, La doctine gélasienne des deux puvoirs, in Studi in onore di Giosuè Musca, Bari 2000, 519-540; D. Duffault, Le "De anathematis vinculo" et la réintroduction du schéma gélasien dans l'empire carolingien au IXe siècle, Foi chrétienne et églises dans la société politique de l'Occident du Haut Moyen Âge (IVe-XIIe siècle), ed. J. Hoareau-Dodineau - P. Texier, Limoges 2004, 319-331; Y. Sassier, "Auctoritas pontificum" et "potestas regia." Faut-il tenir pour négligeable l'influence de la doctrine gélasienne aux temps carolingiens? in Le Pouvoir au Moyen Âge. Idéologies, Pratiques, Représentations, ed. C. Carozzi - H. Taviani-Carozzi, Aix-en-Provence 2005, 213-236.

Rocco Ronzani

GELASIUS of Caesarea (ca. 335–395). Born around 335–336 to a sister of *Cyril of Jerusalem, he was raised to the episcopal throne of Caesarea ca. 367, succeeding *Acacius, a disciple of *Eusebius. A convinced asserter of the Nicene Creed, under the emperor *Valens he was chased from his see to make way for the Arian *Euzoius, but returned there definitively in 379, at the arrival of *Theodosius to the throne. He was a writer of a certain talent by *Jerome's judgment, who says he did not publish his works. Nevertheless, various citations that occur in later authors demonstrated that some had had a certain diffusion: in *Theodoret, in *Leontius of Byzantium, in Severus of Antioch and in the compiler of the Doctrina patrum.

He wrote dogmatic treatises, whose fragments have recently increased in number, and, acc. to *Photius, an Ecclesiastical History continuing that of Eusebius on the suggestion of his uncle Cyril. Photius was also familiar with another writing by him, today entirely lost, Against the Anomoians. About the Ecclesiastical History, this too lost, scholarly debate has proposed opposing solutions. The opinion of Photius acc. to which Gelasius, together with his uncle Cyril, had completed a version in Greek of the last part of the work of *Rufinus—in which the latter continued the History of Eusebius from 324 until 395—has been shown to be inconsistent, because Gelasius was already dead when after 401 Rufinus began the translation into Latin of the Eusebian History. Today, there is a common preference for indicating in the work of Gelasius the principal source of the last two books of the Ecclesiastical History of Rufinus (i.e., of that section in which Rufinus continued Eusebius). However other hypotheses have been formulated: they range from the defense of the absolute originality of the last two books of the Rufinian History to the conviction that not only Rufinus but also other historians, such as *Gelasius of Cyzicus, the author of the Vita Metrophanis, *George the Monk and *Socrates, used Gelasius and that, therefore, the History of the latter can largely be reconstructed thanks to the works of such presumed imitators. Nautin maintains that Gelasius, in the narration of the events of the time of Constantine, did nothing other than expand the History of Eusebius.

The Doctrina patrum attributes to Gelasius an Interpretation of the Creed, which, on the basis of fragments that have survived, contained a collection of catechetical instructions of the same type as the work of his uncle Cyril.

CPG 3520-3521; BBKL 2, 199-200; F. Diekamp, Analecta Patristica (OCA 117), Rome 1938, 16-49; A. Glas, Die Kirchengeschichte des Gelasios von Kaisareia, die Vorlage für die beiden letzten Bücher der Kirchengeschichte Rufins (Diss.), Leipzig 1914; P. van den Ven, Fragments de la recension grecque de l'Histoire ecclésiastique de Rufin dans un texte hagiographique: Muséon 2 (1915) 92-115; P. Heseler, Hagiographica I-II. Beiträge zur Kirchengeschichte des Gelasios von Kaisareia (Diss. Philol. Bonn), Atene 1934; F.X. Murphy, Rufinus of Aquileia. His Life and His Works, Washington DC 1945, 160-164; F. Scheidweiler, Die Kirchengeschichte des Gelasios von Kaisareia: ByzZ 46 (1953) 277-301; Id., Die Bedeutung der Vita Metrophanis et Alexandri für die Quellenkritik bei den griechischen Kirchenhistorik- ern: ByzZ 50 (1957) 74-98; F. Winkelmann, Das Problem der Rekonstruktion der Historia Ecclesiastica des Gelasius von Caesarea: Forschungen und Fortschritte 10 (1964) 311-314; Id., Die Quellen der Historia Ecclesiastica des Gelasius von Cyzicus (nach 475). Ein Beitrag zur Rekonstruktion der Kirchengeschichte des Gelasius von Caesarea: Byzantinoslavica 27 (1966) 104-130; Id., Untersuchungen zur Kirchengeschichte des Gelasios von Kaisareia, Berlin 1966; J. Schamp, Gélase ou Rufin. Un fait nouveau sur des fragments oubliés de Gélase de Césarée (CPG 3521): Byzantion 57 (1987) 360-390 (with tr. of the fragments CPG 3521); P. Nautin, La continuation de l'Histoire ecclésiastique d'Eusèbe par Gélase de Césarée: REB 50 (1992) 163-183.

C. Curti

GELASIUS of Cyzicus (d. after 475). What we know of him comes from the preface to his works and from *Photius (cods. 15 and 88). He wrote, toward 475, an Ecclesiastical History in three books to refute the *monophysites and in which he refers to the events of the Eastern church at the time of Constantine. The preserved section, three books, reaches until the Council of *Tyre of 335; we know the length of the lost part through the mention in Photius. It is for the most part a work of compilation that used *Eusebius, *Rufinus, *Theodoret and *Socrates, and, acc. to some, also the lost Ecclesiastical History of *Gelasius of Caesarea. Apart from the latter, all the sources are known, but Gelasius in the praefatio declares to have taken advantage of other documents as well: an ancient MS that his father, a priest of Cyzicus, had received from the bishop of that city and that confirmed the acts and speeches of the Council of *Nicaea; the writings of a certain priest John, of whom nothing is known. The value of these new documents that only Gelasius has preserved has been the object of discussions on the part of scholars. Nevertheless the authenticity of some is almost universally admitted today.

CPG 6034; GCS 28; PG 85, 1191-1360; G. Loeschcke - M. Heinemann, Gelasius, Kirchengeschichte, GCS 28, Leipzig 1918; C.H. Turner, On Gelasius of Cyzicus: JTS 1 (1899) 125ff.; G. Loeschcke, Das Syntagma des Gelasius Cyzicenus, Bonn 1906; A. Glas, Die Kirchengeschichte des Gelasios von Kaisareia, die Vorlage für die beiden letzten Bücher der Kirchengeschichte Rufins (Diss.), Leipzig 1914; G. Mercati, Opere minori, IV, Vatican City 1937, 56ff.; F. Winkelmann, Die Quellen der Historia Ecclesiastica des Gelasius von Cyzicus: ByzS 27 (1966) 104-130 (bibl.); C.T.H.R. Ehrhardt, Constantinian Documents in Gelasius of Cyzicus, Ecclesiastical History: JbAC 23 (1980) 48-57; G.C. Hansen, Eine fingierte Ansprache Konstantins auf dem Konzil von Nikaia: ZAC 2 (1998) 173-198.

C. Curti

GEMINIANUS, saint (342/344–ca. 396). He has been venerated as the protector of Modena at least since the 8th c. Even if the Vita s. Geminiani (10th-11th c.) records him as the predecessor of Teodulo (bishop after 396), Geminianus should perhaps be identified with the bishop—whose see is not mentioned—who had himself represented by his presbyter Aprus at the Council of *Milan presided over by *Ambrose in 392/393 (the synodal letter sent to Pope *Siricius: in Ambr. epist. extra coll. 15,14, CSEL 82,3, 300-1). His feast is celebrated 31 January and the translation 30 April.

PCBE 2/1, 907; BS 6, 97-104; BHL 3296-3302. G. Pistoni, San Geminiano vescovo e protettore di Modena nella vita, nel culto, nell'arte, Modena 1983; W. Montorsi (ed.), Trattati e sermoni di San Geminiano "protettore," vescovo di Modena, Modena 1991; W. Montorsi, Geminiano e Zenone. Due santi per una leggenda, con un cenno sulla Civitas Geminiana, Modena 1993; P. Golinelli, Modena, san Geminiano e san Zeno. A proposito di recenti ipotesi storiografiche: Deput. storia patria prov. modenesi, Atti e memorie 15 (1993) 79-90; Id., Culti comuni su versanti opposti. Venerio, Prospero, Geminiano, in Città e culto dei santi nel Medioevo italiano, Bologna [2]1996, 131-150; E. Anti, Zeno di Verona e Geminiano di Modena. Due "Vitae" a confronto: Annuario storico zenoniano (1996) 27-52; Civitas Geminiana. La Città e il suo Patrono (Modena, dicembre 1997-febbraio 1998), ed. F. Piccinini, Modena 1997.

E. Malaspina

GEMINIUS (4th c.). His name is found only in the catalog of *Jerome (Vir. Ill. 64), who has him as a presbyter of *Antioch and appreciates him as a writer, adding: "he has left us rather few documents of his talent": but of these, we know neither the titles nor the contents.

G. Ladocsi

GENESIS, Patristic Interpretation of

I. The creation of the world - II. The creation of human beings - III. Adam and Eve - IV. Sin and the promise - V. The patriarchs.

Late Judaism, and esp. *Philo, attributed a particular importance to the book of Genesis, of which the OT itself had already given many "rereadings." The NT in turn reread it in relationship with the mystery of the Christ. Patristic literature used these sources, Jewish and Christian, in the most diverse contexts. The story of the origins of the world fixed with clarity first of all the condition of the creature. *God is the sovereign Lord of all things, and there are no others. This point was fundamental in the apologetic intended for the *pagans as also in the polemics that opposed the church to the heterodox *gnosis. The original Fall and the grand patriarchal figures would equally constitute essential themes of Christian reflection. The book of Genesis is one of those most frequently commented upon in the ancient church. The long list of these commentaries can be found in the Indices of Migne (PG, ed. Cavallera, Paris 1912, 144-145; PL 218, 931-938). For the literature of the Christian East, A. Levene, The Early Syriac Fathers on Genesis, London 1951; Institutum Patristicum Augustinianum, Patrologia V (I Padri orientali), Genoa 2000. The notable repertory compiled by Y.-M. Congar in L'homme devant Dieu. Mélanges H. de Lubac, Paris 1963, I, 215ff., should also be consulted.

I. The creation of the world. Every particular of the sacred text evokes different aspects of the mystery. The two first words (ἐν ἀρχῇ) are commonly linked with Pr 8:22 and Jn 1:3. God has made the universe "in the Son." The creation and the work of salvation are therefore in immediate relation. The second verse seems to suppose a formless preexisting material, like that of Timaeus 51a. Numerous explanations have been proposed in order to eliminate the hypothesis of a second coeternal principle. In this area Wis 11:17 and Sir 18:1 in particular have been invoked. The spirit above the waters is assimilated to the *Holy Spirit. A figure of baptism has been seen here. Saying fiat lux in v. 3, God uttered a word. Some have understood this as being the Word. But this risks denying his coeternity with the Father. The formula can also be interpreted as a command directed to the Son, because it is through his mediation that all things have been made. The existence of the light before the creation of the stars posed a difficult question. It could be supposed that it is the light emanating from the Word to illuminate the world.

This command could just as well be a figurative manner of indicating the angelic creation, which would then have been the starting point of the creation (Philo Alex., De op. mundi 31). "The seven days" are analyzed in this way into the details. One exegetical tradition tries to explain the story account in the most literal sense (e.g., the schools of *Edessa and *Antioch); another turns systematically to allegory and to figurative language (e.g., the school of *Alexandria). *Augustine proposed a fairly daring analysis of the whole, largely inspired on the fundamental outlines of *Neoplatonism, in which all the details find a place in a system of relationships. The "first day" represents the angelic nature: this takes shape in its movement of conversio toward the Creator. The evening corresponds to the moment in which this turns toward itself and recognizes its own nature. The morning indicates the stage of the return of the angelic awareness toward its own principle, no longer to be informed but to carry back in praise to this principle that which it has recognized (De Gen. ad litt. 4,22,39). The three stages have nothing to do with a physical time: they designate three phases of a noetic process. Augustine, in short, applies to the hexameron the three stages of the formation of the Plotinian nous. The days after the first apply this triple movement of the awareness to the categories of creatures. At the end of the process, the seventh day begins with the act of praise for the work of the sixth day, but at the end it concludes in the repose of God (see A. Solignac, In principio, 153-171).

II. The creation of human beings. Genesis presents two accounts of the creation of humankind (Gen 1:26-27 and 2:7). In the first, the human is made in the image and likeness of God; in the second, they are modeled with the mud of the earth. Here too *exegesis is divided into two great traditions. According to the Alexandrian school, the first account concerns the creation of the spiritual person who does not proceed from a preexisting material; the second the "exterior" person, molded starting from the dust and into whom a spirit of life has been breathed. Only the first human being was made "in the image of God" (he is not "an image of God," something only true of the Logos). How, furthermore, could it be otherwise, given that God has nothing corporeal? Humans are called to pass from the order of the *image—as they were made on the first day—to the order of the likeness, as they will become when they are participants in the *resurrection of Christ, beyond images and shadows, at the level of the true realities. The participation of the person in the image of God constitutes the essence of one's being. One's terrestrial condition always remains, in fact, something exterior to the person. Contrary to the Alexandrian tradition, the Asiatic tradition maintains that the two accounts of Genesis refer to a single creation. God made human beings, modeling them starting from the mud of the earth, in the image of the risen Christ. Nevertheless, all the time of the economy of salvation will be required in order for them to finish growing in likeness. In this *anthropology, strongly centered on the persons of flesh and blood that we are, it is the whole of human behavior that God wishes to gradually assume into glory. We human beings are not only a *soul linked to corporality as a consequence of *sin, we are a *body and a soul, capax Dei.

III. Adam and Eve. The tradition, taking up Rom 5:14, has seen in the first Adam a figure of the second.

From the beginning God has prearranged all things in view of that which would be completed in the *incarnation and in the resurrection of Christ (the *recapitulation). The union of Christ and the church, signified by the wound in the pierced side of the Lord, was prefigured, acc. to Eph 5:32, by the union of *Adam and Eve. This mystery has often been presented as already completed before the ages. The church has been understood herself as a supertemporal reality, whose origins, earlier than the historic fact of the incarnation, coincide with those of the world in the plan of God. The birth of Eve would recall in particular to St. *Hilary the resurrection of the flesh (Tr. myst. 1,5). The theme of Ecclesia ab Abel underlines the preexistence of the church in the OT.

IV. Sin and the promise. The sin of Adam occupies an important place in the understanding of the human condition. Along the lines of Rom 5:12-17, the original Fall is put in relation with the superabundant redemption achieved in Christ. Christ, working a contrario, repairs in melius that which had been ruined. The Eve-Mary parallel, suggested by the preceding, underlines how the obedience of the second—i.e., her readiness to accept salvation—corresponds to the disobedience of the first. The first part of Gen 3:15 announces the hostility between the woman and the *serpent. This offered itself to an ecclesial or Marian interpretation, as did the second part, provided that it is read, as in the Vulgate, ipsa tuum calcabit caput, and not, like the Septuagint, αὐτός σου τηρήσει κεφαλήν. In this case it is the posterity of the woman (the Christ) who must crush the head of the monster. Hippolytus (De bened. Is. et Jac. 22 [Dan]: PO 27, 90 and 229) put this text in relation with the blessings of Jacob (Gen 49:16-18). The serpent bites the horse on the shank and makes the horseman fall backward (εἰς τὰ ὀπίσω). This is what was accomplished in the passion of Christ. The devil has attacked the humanity of the Word: Christ has "fallen backward" to go and mysteriously seek ἀπὸ τῶν ἐσχάτων the wounded humanity of the first human and to unite it with his resurrection (ἐπὶ τὰ πρῶτα). The efficacy of Easter reverses that of Adam. *Irenaeus (Adv. haer. 4,22,1; 4,40,3; 3,23,7; 5,21,1) points out with even greater insistence this inversion. Christ assumed in his own flesh the hostility of the serpent which has been leading humanity to perdition since the beginning. In his death he wanted to be bitten himself by the serpent, but in order to crush his head. With this, he had to join his resurrection with all humanity, of whom he is the epitome. History is thus formed by a double movement: from the beginning until Christ *death reigned; Christ extends his resurrection to all humanity since its origins. In this way he completes the plan of God at the dawn of the creation, acc. to which humankind had to be conformed to the glorious flesh of the Lord. The exegesis of Gen 3:15 joins here with that of Gen 1:26-27 and 2:7, putting the salus carnis particularly in evidence.

V. The patriarchs. The scene of the flood evokes the judgment of God. But it has also been put in relation with the baptismal waters. In this view *Noah represents every baptized person; the ark, the mystery of the church. Abraham appears as the type of one who receives the Word of God in faith and as the depository of the promise in the covenant, both figures of that which is given us in Christ (Gal 4:21-26), "a high priest acc. to the order of *Melchizedek" (Heb 7:1-28). The miraculous birth of Isaac from a sterile woman prefigures the virginal maternity; his substitution for Ishmael prepares the substitution of the nations for the chosen people. The figure of Isaac recalls above all the sacrifice of Christ, who was not spared by his Father. *Origen (Hom. in Gen. 10,5) and *Ambrose (De Isaac 6 and 7) take up and Christianize the symbolism of the matrimonies of the patriarchs developed by Philo; the wedding of Isaac and Rebekah refers to the union between the soul and the Word and, at the same time, between the Word and the church. Finally, the blessing of Jacob (Gen 49) confirms, at v. 10, that Christ, born of the tribe of Judah, is the Messiah. The sleep and awakening of the lion, at v. 9, are images of the death and resurrection of the Lord. During the era of *Arianism the allegory was pushed even further, linking the mention of the lion cub, associated to that of the lion, with the unity of nature of the Father and the Son. Quickly, as a matter of fact, the whole of chapter 49 was interpreted typologically in the life of Jesus, of the newborn church and of the opposition between Jews and Christians (M. Simonetti, in SC 140, 11-24). God appeared at various times to the patriarchs. These theophanies have often been presented as manifestations of the Word. Apologetic thus established his preexistence and his distinction from the Father. The Father is beyond every form and, as a consequence, invisible and not directly perceptible (Just., Dial. 56,1; 60,2; 127,2). He can, however, be seen through him whom he sent. The OT often distinguished God and his *Angel (Gen 16:7-13; 22:11). The ancient theology would do the same. The formula had a strong *subordinationist flavor: no wonder that Arianism exploited it. Despite everything, severe criticism of this typology would have to wait for St. Augustine (Trin. II, 7,12–18,35).

We have stressed the importance of the Jewish sources, esp. of Philo, in the patristic interpretation of the book of Genesis. The Fathers also owed much, as was natural, to the Hellenistic culture, esp. concerning the explanations of the account of the creation. Their exegesis cannot, however, be reduced to its sources, Greek or Hebraic. This exegesis is, in fact, dominated by the figure of Christ. Since *protology is subordinated to *eschatology, "he who has been initiated into the secret power of the resurrection knows the end in view of which God predisposed the beginning of everything" (Max. Conf., Cap. theol. et oec. Cent. 1,66: PG 90, 1107).

1. General studies: see, first of all Y. Congar, Le thème de Dieu-Créateur dans les explications de l'Hexaméron dans la tradition chrétienne, in L'homme devant Dieu. Mélanges H. de Lubac, I, Paris 1963, 189-222 (important bibl. of patristic texts). See further F.E. Robbins, The Hexaemeral Literature. A Study of the Greek and Latin Commentaries on Genesis, Chicago 1912; Hexaméron: DTC 6, 2335-2339; Pentateuque chez les Pères: DBS 7, 687-708; A. Levene, The Early Syrian Fathers on Genesis, London 1951; T. Jansma, Investigation into the Early Syrian Fathers on Genesis: Oudtestamentische Studien, Leiden 12 (1958) 69-182; G.T. Armstrong, Die Genesis in der Alten Kirche. Die drei Kirchenväter, Tübingen 1962; A. Quacquarelli, La Genesi nella letteratura dei Padri anteniceni: RivBib 15 (1967) 471-495; M. Simonetti, Profilo storico dell'esegesi patristica, Rome 1981; W. Horbury, Old Testament Interpretation in the Writings of the Church Fathers: Mikra 291 (1988–1990) 727-787; M. Simonetti, Lettera e/o allegoria. Un contributo alla storia dell'esegesi patristica, Rome 1985; A. Louth - M. Conti (eds.), Genesis 1–11, ACCS, OT 1, Downers Grove, IL 2001; M. Sheridan, Genesis 12–50, ACCS, OT 2, Downers Grove, IL 2002.

2. The creation: E.W. Moeller, Geschichte der Kosmologie in der Griechischen Kirche bis zu Origenes, Halle 1860; P. Duhem, Le système du monde. Histoire des doctrines cosmologiques de Platon à Copernic, 5 vols., Paris 1913–1917; H. Bietenhard, Die himmlische Welt im Urchristentum und Spätjudentum, Tübingen 1951; C. Tresmontant, La métaphysique du christianisme et la naissance de la philosophie chrétienne. Problèmes de la création et de l'anthropologie des origines à s. Augustin, Paris 1961; L. Scheffczyk, Schöpfung und Vorsehung (HDG II, 2a), Freiburg 1963; H.F. Weiss, Untersuchungen zur Kosmologie des hellenistischen und palästinensischen Judentums, TU 97, Berlin 1966; U. Früchtel, Die kosmologischen Vorstellungen bei Philo von Alexandrien, Leiden 1968; E. Peters, What Was God Doing Before He Created the Heavens and the Earth?: Augustiniana 34 (1984) 53-74; J.C.M. van Winden, Hexaemeron: RAC 14 (1988) 1250-1269; B.W. Anderson (ed.), Creation in the Old Testament (Issues in Religion and Theology, 6), London 1984, 65-73; E. Pagels, The Politics of Paradise. Augustine's Exegesis of Genesis 1–3 versus That of John Chrysostom: HTR 78 (1985) 67-100.

3. Typology of Genesis: J. Daniélou, Sacramentum futuri. Études sur les origines de la typologie biblique, Paris 1950; Id., Bible et liturgie, Paris 1951; Id., Théologie du Judéo-christianisme, Tournai 1957; Id., Message évangélique et culture hellénistique, Tournai 1961; B. Vawter, On Genesis. A New Reading, New York 1977.

4. The account of the beginnings: C.F. Burney, Christ as the ARXH of Creation: JTS 27 (1926) 160-177; A. Orbe, Hacia la primera teología de la procesión del Verbo: Est. Valentinianos 1, Rome 1958; Id., En los albores de la exégesis johannea: Est. Valentinianos 2, Rome 1955; Id., La teología del Espíritu Santo: Est. Valentinianos 4, Rome 1966; J. Pépin, Théologie cosmique et théologie chrétienne (Ambroise, Exam. I,1,1-4), Paris 1964; F. Szabó, Le rôle du Fils dans la création selon s. Ambroise: Augustinianum 7 (1967) 258-305; var. aus., In principio. Interprétations des premiers versets de la Genèse, Paris 1973; J.C.M. van Winden, The Early Christian Exegesis of "Heaven and Earth" in Genesis 1,1, in Studia J.H. Waszink, Amsterdam 1973, 371-382; A. Tarabochia Canavero, Esegesi biblica e cosmologica. Note sull'interpretazione patristica e medievale di Genesi 1,2, Milan 1981; W. Witakowsky, The Idea of Septimana Mundi and the Millenarian Typology of the Creation Week in Syriac Tradition: Symposium Syriacum (1988–1990) 93-110; K.E. Greene-MacCreight, Ad Litteram. How Augustine, Calvin and Barth Read the 'Plain Sense' of Genesis 1–3, Frankfurt am Main 1999.

5. The creation of human beings: DSp 4, 1772-1788; H. Karpp, Probleme altchristlicher Anthropologie. Biblische Anthropologie und philosophische Psychologie bei den Kirchenvätern des dritten Jahrh., Gütersloh 1950; H. Merki, Von der platonischen Ausgleichung an Gott zur Gottähnlichkeit bei Gregor von Nyssa, Freiburg 1952; Y. Congar, Ecclesia ab Abel, in FS Adam, Düsseldorf 1952, 79-108; A. Orbe, Cristo y la Iglesia en su matrimonio anterior a los siglos: Estudios Ecl. 29 (1955) 299-344, H. Crouzel, Théologie de l'image de Dieu chez Origène, Paris 1956; R. McL. Wilson, The Early History of the Exegesis of Gen 1,26: SP 1 (TU 63) (1957) 420-437; E. des Places, Syngeneia. La parenté de l'homme avec Dieu, d'Homère à la patristique, Paris 1964; P. Schwanz, Imago Dei als christologischanthropologisches Problem in der Geschichte der Alten Kirche von Paulus bis Clemens von Alexandrien, Leipzig 1966; A. Orbe, Antropología de San Ireneo, Madrid 1969; G. Visonà, L'uomo a immagine di Dio. L'interpretazione di Genesi 1,26 nel pensiero cristiano dei primi tre secoli: Studia Patavina 27 (1980) 393-430; S. Zincone, Il tema dell'uomo/donna immagine di Dio nei Commenti paolini e a Gn di area antiochena (Diodoro, Crisostomo, Teodoro, Teodoreto): AnSE 2 (1985) 103-113.

6. The sin of Adam: R. Laurentin, L'interprétation de Gen 3,15 dans la tradition jusqu'au début du XIII[e] siècle, Paris 1954; H.G. Leder, Die Auslegung der zentralen theologischen Aussagen der Paradieseserzählung in der ältesten Literatur des Judentums und in der alten Kirche, Greifswald 1960; M. Harl, La prise de conscience de la "nudité" d'Adam. Une interprétation de Gen 3,7 chez les Pères grecs: SP 7 (TU 92) (1966) 486-495; E. Testa, Il peccato di Adamo nella Patristica, Jerusalem 1970; A. Orbe, "Ipse tuum calcabit caput" (S. Ireneo y Gen 3,15): Gregorianum 52 (1971) 95-150, 215-271; P.F. Beatrice, Le tuniche di pelle. Antiche letture di Gen. 3,21, in La tradizione dell'enkrateia, ed. U. Bianchi, Rome 1985, 433-484; E. Pagels, Adam and Eve and the Serpent in Genesis 1–3 (Occasional Papers of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity), Claremont, CA 1988.

7. Augustine: Les Confessions, ed. A. Solignac: BA 13-14 (1962); De Genesi ad litteram, ed. A. Solignac: BA 48-49 (1972); G. Pelland, Cinq études d'Augustin sur le début de la Genèse, Montréal-Tournai-Paris 1972.

8. The patriarchs: H. Moretus, Les bénédictions des Patriarches dans la littérature du IV[e] au VIII[e] siècle: BLE 10 (1909) 398-411; M. Simonetti, Note su antichi commenti alle benedizioni dei Patriarchi, Cagliari 1961. Noah: J.P. Lewis, A Study of the Inter- pretation of Noah and the Flood in Jewish and Christian Literature, Leiden 1968; Y. Frot, L'interprétation ecclésiologique de l'épisode du Déluge chez le Pères des trois premiers siècles: Augustinianum 26 (1986) 335-348;. Melchizedek: J.L. Ska, Melchisedech: DSp 10, 967-972; G. Bardy, Melchisedech dans la tradition patristique: RBi 35 (1926) 496-509; 36 (1927) 25-45; G. Wuttke, Melchisedech der Priesterkönig von Salem. Eine Studie zur Geschichte der Exegese, Giessen 1927; F.L. Horton, The Melchisedech Tradition. A Critical Examination of the Sources to the Fifth Cent. and in the Epist. to the Hebrews, Cambridge-London 1976. Abraham: T. Klauser, Abraham: RAC 1, 21-25. Isaac: J. Daniélou, Typologie d'Isaac: Biblica (1947) 363-393; J. Gribomont, Isaac le Patriarche: DSp 7, 1992-2005; D. Lerch, Isaaks Opferung christlich gedeutet, Eine auslegungsgeschichtliche Untersuchung, Tübingen 1950; M. Harl, La "ligature" d'Isaac (Gen. 22,9) dans la Septante et chez les Pères grecs, in Hellenica et Judaica, Leuven 1986, 457-472. Jacob: P.M. Guillaume, Jacob le Patriarche: DSp 8, 8-14; S. Pricoco, La scala di Giacobbe. L'interpretazione ascetica di Gen. 28,12 da Filone a S. Benedetto: Regulae Benedicti Studia 14/15 (1985–1986) 41-58; G.M. Vian, Interpretazioni giudaiche e cristiane antiche del sogno di Giacobbe (Gen. 28,10-22): Augustinianum 29 (1989) 307-332. Joseph: A.W. Argyle, Joseph the Patriarch in Patristic Teaching: Exp. Times 67 (1955-56) 199-201; M. Dulaey, Joseph le Patriarche, figure du Christ, in Figures de l'AT, Strasbourg 1989, 83-105.

9. The theophanies: B. Kominiak, The Theophanies of the OT in the Writings of St. Justin, Washington DC 1948; L. Thunberg, Early Christian Interpretations of the Three Angels in Gen 18: SP 7 (TU 92) (1966) 560-570; G.T. Armstrong, The Genesis' Theophanies of Hilary of Poitiers: SP 10 (TU 107) (1970) 203-207.

G. Pelland

GENESIUS of Arles (d. 303?). Probably martyred under the reign of *Diocletian, he is mentioned as eaerly as *Prudentius (Perist. 4,35) and *Venantius Fortunatus (Carm. 8,3,157). The Vita of *Apollinaris of Valence (BHL 634) attests *pilgrimages to the tomb of Genesius. According to his oldest Passio (BHL 3304) he was a notarius* who refused to register some edicts of *persecution and therefore was condemned to death. His feast, 25 August, coincides with the feast of the Roman martyr Genesius, an actor, of whom we known nothing: it is probable that at the origin of the cult of the Roman derived from the martyr of Arles, whose popularity caused many duplications and transfers both in *Gaul and elsewhere in W Europe.

BHL 3304-3310; 3315-3326; BS 6, 115-117; 121-124; S. Cavallin, S. Genès le notaire: Eranos 43 (1945) 150-175; A. Amore, I Martiri di Roma, Rome 1975, 102-103.

V. Saxer - S. Samulowitz

GENEVIÈVE of Paris (ca. 422–ca. 502). Born ca. 422 at Nanterre, she was noticed in 429 by *Germanus of Auxerre and, still adolescent, received the virgins' veil from the hands of the bishop Vilicus. She had a basilica built in honor of St. Denis. She was a pilgrim at *Tours to venerate St. *Martin. When Paris was besieged by *Attila (451), she kept the morale of her compatriots high, earning the admiration even of the Frankish kings *Childeric and *Clovis. She died on a 3 January around 502 and was buried in the basilica of Sts. Peter and Paul, which later took her name, in which Clovis and *Clotilde were interred a little later. In 1793 her bones were burnt and her precious reliquary melted by the Revolutionary government. She is the patron of *Paris and is venerated in the church of Saint-Étienne-du-Mont. Her Vita (BHL 3335), composed around 520, exists in three principal recensions, whose historical reliability is much disputed.

BHL 3334-3350; BS 6, 157-164; LCI 6, 361-365; LMA 4, 1237; BBKL 2, 206-207; J. Dubois - L. Beaumont-Maillet, Ste. G. de Paris, Paris 1982; M. Heinzelmann - J.-C. Poulin, Les Vies anciennes de s. G. de Paris, Paris 1986.

V. Saxer - S. Samulowitz

GENNADIUS of Constantinople. Patriarch, 458–471. Before his episcopal consecration, he opposed the *anathemas of *Cyril of Alexandria and supported the decisions of *Chalcedon (451). As patriarch he remained faithful to the council and engaged in the struggle against the *monophysites. An energetic administrator, he united a synod against simoniacs which confirmed the relevant prescriptions (458). He wrote to *Martyrius of Antioch on the reconciliation of *heretics with valuable information on the sects of the time and on canonical discipline of the sacraments of initiation. Few of his works survive: some disciplinary epistles and fragments of catenae (above all on *Genesis and on the Pauline epistles) in which he reveals himself to be a follower of Antiochene literalism, esp. to the positions of *Theodore of Mopsuestia. No trace remains of his commentary on *Daniel and of his *homilies (Gennadius of Marseille, De vir. ill. 91).

CPG 5970-5986; DSp 6, 203-204; BS 6, 132-134; PG 85, 1623-1668; K. Staab, Pauluskommentare aus der griechischen Kirche aus Katenenhandschriften gesammelt und herausgegeben (Neutestamentliche Abhandlungen 15), Münster i.W. 1933, 352-422; F. Diekamp, Analecta Patristica (OCA 117), Rome 1938, 54-108; R. Devreesse, Les anciens commentateurs grecs de l'Octateuque et des Rois (ST 201), Vatican City 1959, 183-185; R. Devreesse, Les anciens commentateurs grecs des Psaumes (ST 264), Vatican City 1970, 318; S.J. Voicu, Gennadio di Costantinopoli. La trasmissione del frammento In Hebr. 9,25: OCP 48 (1982) 435-437.

S.J. Voicu

GENNADIUS of Marseille (d. after 496). The scarce information we have on his life comes from the last chapter of De viris illustribus, modeled on the autobiographical one that closes the homonymous work of *Jerome. Rejected today as spurious, after having been considered for a long time as authentic, this nevertheless appears credibly to have been composed in an environment and time close to Gennadius. From it we learn that Gennadius was a priest of the church of *Marseille (Gennadius is called Massiliensis by *Cassiodorus: Inst. divin. lit. I, 17,2: PL 70, 1134B), still alive at the time of Pope *Gelasius (492–496) and author of a great number of heresiological works: eight books Against All the Heresies, five Against Nestorius, ten Against Eutyches, three Against Pelagius, homilies on the millennium and the *Apocalypse of John and a letter De fide, sent to Gelasius. These have all been lost. Gennadius himself alludes to other writings, likewise lost: a Catalogus haereticorum (perhaps to be identified with the tract Against All the Heresies) and translations of Greek writers, such as the *monophysite bishop of Alexandria *Timothy and *Evagrius of Pontus (Vir. ill. 73,11).

The De viris illustribus is a catalog of Christian writers of the 5th c., composed as a continuation of that of Jerome and divided into 101 chapters, some of which are spurious and include additions of unknown redactors. The profiles are brief and often elusive, but they derive for the most part from direct knowledge and offer a valuable panorama of the intellectual and spiritual life of *Gaul in the 5th c. Despite following Jerome's example in its essential characteristics, Gennadius departs from it in other aspects: by not turning the Greco-Latin culture into either an object of polemic nor an inevitable and spontaneous point of reference, by the greater attention given to monastic culture, by the dominant ecclesiological interest and by his inclination to group the writers acc. to a thematic affinity. The work of Gennadius and that of Jerome immediately circulated together (Cassiodorus, Inst. divin. lit. I, 17,2: PL 70, 1134BC and *Isidore of Seville, Etymologiae VI,6: PL 82, 237B), and in the MS tradition they have also sometimes been transmitted without a break between one and the other. The work was not written in a single burst in a unified way, but by putting together notes and files drafted in many years of study. Three blocks of chapters can be distinguished in it with certainty, composed at a notable interval from one another. The last of these was composed between 474 and 476 (Diekamp, Feder). The accusation of "*semi-Pelagianism" that scholars (from Tillemont to now) have made against Gennadius, to the point of making the De viris a polemical writing composed with a specific anti-*Augustinian intention (Czapla, Feder), is absolutely unfounded.

A Liber ecclesiasticorum dogmatum, at other times attributed to Augustine or Isidore of Seville, has been ascribed to Gennadius with likelihood. The work is a summary of the principal Christian dogmas and refutes rapidly the major heresies. Pelagian deviations are not recognizable in this work either. Gennadius has also been proposed as the author of a small canonical collection which has reached us with the title Statuta ecclesiae antiqua (Munier) (CPL 1776; CCL 148,162-188).

CPL 957-959; PL 58, 979-1120; De viris inlustribus, ed. E.G. Richardson, TU 14, Leipzig 1896; Liber ecclesiasticorum dogmatum, ed. C.H. Turner: JTS 7 (1905) 78-99; Statuta ecclesiae antiqua: PL 56, 103-107 and 879-889; B. Czapla, Gennadius als Literarhistoriker (Kirchengesch. Studien 14,1), Münster i.B. 1898; F. Diekamp, Wann hat Gennadius seinen Schriftstellerkatalog verfasst?: RQA 12 (1898) 411-420; G. Morin, Le Liber Dogmatum de Gennade de Marseille et problèmes qui s'y rattachent: RBen 24 (1907) 445-455; M. Schanz, Gesch. d. röm. Liter., IV, 2, Munich 1920, 552-554; A. Feder, Der Semipelagianismus im Schriftstellerkatalog des Gennadius von Marseille: Scholastik 2 (1927) 481-514; Id., Die Entstehung und Veröffentlichung des gennadianischen Schriftstellerkatalogs: Scholastik 8 (1933) 217-232; Id., Zusätze des gennadianischen Schriftstellerkatalogs: ibid., 380-399; Ch. Munier, Les Statuta ecclesiae antiqua, Paris 1960; Id., Gennade: DSp IV, 205-208; S. Pricoco, Storia letteraria e storia ecclesiastica. Dal "De viris inlustribus" di Girolamo a Gennadio, Catania 1979; C. Riggi, La figura di Niceta di Remesiana secondo la biografia gennadiana: Augustinianum 24 (1984) 189-200; DHGE 20 (1984) 477-479; G.M. Pintus, Eucherio di Lione nella cronologia di Gennadio e Marcellino: Studi Medievali 25 (1984) 795-812; P.J. Galán Sánchez, Evolución del género cristiano De uiris illustribus. De S. Jerónimo a Gennadio de Marsella, in Actas del VIII congreso español de estudios clásicos, II, Madrid 1994, 651-658.

S. Pricoco

GENRES, LITERARY. The characterization of the particular modes in which literary expression is realized brought to light the notion of literary genres; above all the authority of the tradition was decisive for their establishment in Greek and Latin literature. This fixed for oratory three genres: the deliberative, the judicial or forensic, and the demonstrative or epideictic. The encomiastic genre was added later.

Classic texts for the history of the literary genres are the Poetics of Aristotle and the Ars poetica of Horace (Ep. 11,3). In particular Aristotle speaks of epic and of tragedy (but he only offers an ample analysis of the latter) as characteristic genres. The ancient theory is normative and prescriptive, rigidly distinguishing the genres and indicating in a hierarchy that is reflected in a social differentiation as well as an expressive one: in tragedy and in epic the figures of heroes, kings and nobles appear; in comedy the middle classes are represented; satire and farce give voice to the common people and to the facts of daily life. Thus it was in the ancient theater; but at the same time the agreement between content and expression was manifest, and therefore a precise stylistic gradation prevailed. In a later era it became clear that the science of genres has no single tradition and is not inspired by a single teaching. In other words, it is not possible to defend the immutable character of classical genres: every culture in fact has its genres, therefore their number is not limited nor are the canons immutable for the authors. It has been written that the literary genre is an "institution." "One can work through, express oneself through, existing institutions, create new ones, or get on, so far as possible, without sharing in polities or rituals; one can also join, but then reshape, institutions" (R. Wellek - A. Warren, Theory of Literature, 226). These observations are perfectly appropriate to the early Christian writers. In synthesis, it can be said that Christian writers, with the characters, capacities and the gifts that distinguish each one, in part accepted the literary genres spread through the pagan world; in part they renewed them; in part they created new ones in facing the interior and exterior exigencies to which they had to respond. To give just a few examples, think of the profound adaptations that ancient biography underwent to become hagiographic literature, or the classical oratio to become Christian *homily. On another note, consider the substantial novelty constituted by the Acta or by the Passiones of the martyrs, or again by the Acta apostolorum and by the gospels.

As for the stylistic gradations linked to the genres, these also went through a notable transformation. E. Auerbach has remarked on it (Literary Language, 39 and passim) with regard to Augustine: he has a model in Cicero, "but he rejected Cicero's assumption that each level of style corresponded to a class of subject matter. The themes of Christian literature, he held, are all sublime." And yet, given that the character of the doctrine (at the same time sublime and difficult), the audience to whom it is addressed (humans in general), the end on which it was intent (conforming the lives of all to the model of Christ), it was expressed, acc. to necessity, in the "lowly" style, in the "intermediate" and in the "sublime": which is to say that the tripartition of expression has a great practical value for Christian *catechesis and homiletics (E. Auerbach, ibid.). In this vision, a dynamic prospective of the literary phenomenon is proposed, acc. to which the genres are in continual transformation.

Regarding Christian literature, from its earliest writings one is present "at an encounter, or better a mixture of literary genres whether classical or Hebrew." This, in short, aligns with "the Hellenistic norm of the 'Kreuzung der Gattungen': even if—as in archaic Greece—the laws are not expressly formulated" (Alfonsi). See also *commentaries; *exegesis; *hagiography; *letter (epistle); panegyric; parable;* poetry, Christian; *poetry, Syriac; *sayings of Jesus; *sermon.

E. Auerbach, Literatursprache und Publikum in der lateinischen Spätantike und im Mittelalter, Bern 1959 (Eng. tr., Literary Language and Its Public in Late Latin Antiquity and in the Middle Ages, Princeton 1993); R. Wellek - A. Warren, Theory of Literature, New York [3]1956 (1st ed. 1949); H. Lausberg, Handbuch der literarischen Rhetorik. Eine Grundlegung der Literaturwissenschaft, Munich [2]1973; L.E. Rossi, I generi letterari e le loro leggi scritte e non scritte nelle letterature classiche: BICS 18 (1971) 72ff.; var. aus., I generi letterari nella Patristica. Atti del III incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, maggio 1974: Augustinianum 14 (1974) 381-699 (for an orientation, see the introductory speech of L. Alfonsi, ibid., 451-458); J. Fontaine, Unité et diversité du mélange des genres et des tons chez quelques écrivains latins de la fin du IV^e siècle. Ausone, Ambroise, Ammien, in Christianisme et formes littéraires de l'Antiquité Tardive en Occident, Fondation Hardt, Vandoeuvres-Genève 1977, 425-472; Id., Comment doit-on appliquer la notion de genre littéraire à la littérature chrétienne du IV^e siècle?: Philologus 132 (1988) 53-73; F.J. Tovar Paz, Tractatus, sermones atque homiliae. El cultivo del genero del discurso homilético en la Hispania tardoantigua y visigótica (Resumen de la Tesis presentada para la obtención del grado de Doctor), Caceres 1992; J.-C. Fredouille, L'apologétique chrétienne antique. Métamorphose d'un genre polymorphe: REAug 41 (1995) 201-216.

P. Siniscalco

GENSERIC (d. 477). King of the *Vandals from 428 to 477. Son of a slave woman, he succeeded his half brother Gunderic, king of the Vandals and of the Alans. From the Iberian peninsula where he was living, Genseric led his people into *Africa (429) on the invitation of the magister militum Boniface, who in the hope of liberating the territory from the presence of the *Goths, trusted himself to an even more fearful enemy. After having conquered Africa, he succeeded in obtaining the recognition of his reign from the emperor *Valentinian III, who accepted the Vandals as foederati of the empire (435). The siege of the city of *Hippo should be mentioned, which lasted 14 months, during which St. Augustine died (430). A few years later (439), Genseric broke the treaty and conquered Hippo and *Carthage, starting a long war. In 455 he headed in the direction of Rome with a giant army. Pope *Leo the Great (440–461), as he had done before with *Attila (452), parleyed with the Vandal king, obtaining agreement that the inhabitants be spared. The city, however, was sacked, and the empress herself, Licinia Eudoxia, was taken as a hostage with her two daughters. In 468 the emperor *Leo I began a military campaign against the Vandals, which turned out to be useless and disastrous for the Byzantine empire. After the conquest of Sicily, which Genseric ceded to *Odoacer upon payment of an annual tribute, the Vandal kingdom covered an immense territory, including all the N coast of Africa. Of *Arian faith, Genseric persecuted the *Catholics and exiled their bishops. With his death began the decline of his people.

Ch. Courtois, Les Vandales et l'Afrique, Paris 1955; F. Giunta, Genserico e la Sicilia, Palermo 1958; P. Courcelle, Histoire littéraire de grandes invasions germaniques, Paris 1964, 115-139, 183-190; E. Demougeot, La formation de l'Europe et les invasions barbares, 2. De l'avènement de Dioclétien (284) à l'occupation germanique de l'Empire romain d'Occident (début du VI[e] siècle), II, Paris 1979, 508-513, 566-631; M.E. Gil Egea, Piratas o estadistas. La política exterior del reino vandalo durante el reinado de Genserico: Polis. Revista de ideas y formas políticas de la antigüedad clásica 9 (1997) 107-129; L. Gatto, Storia di Roma nel Medioevo, Rome 2000, 73-77; N. Francovich Onesti, I Vandali. Lingua e Storia, Rome 2002; Storia del Cristianesimo 3, 246-273; H.-W. Goetz - F. Farnut - W. Pohl (eds.), Regna and Gentes. The Relationship Between Late Antique and Early Medieval Peoples and Kingdoms in the Transformations of the Roman World, Boston 2003, 55-83.

G. Pilara

GENTILES. A term that acquired a fundamental importance in both the Jewish and Christian religions, designating, originally, populations that had developed from the same stock (Dt 7:6) and, at a later time, the pagan polytheist peoples in opposition to Jewish and Christian monotheism (Ps 2:1.8; 1 Cor 5:1; 12:2; 1 Th 4:5; 1 Pt 2:12, etc.). In the OT, the opposition most often refers to that between Israel (people of God) and pagans (Gentiles) in a racial context that, with the approach to the NT, was absorbed by the religious one. In the prophetic vision, the primacy of Israel and the obligations that derive from it do not preclude the participation of the Gentiles (= the nations) in the construction of the history of all humanity, even if such participation takes on aspects of punishment (Is 8:9; 10:5-16; Jer 24:8-9; Hos 8:10), since there is a single Lord of the one and the others (Jer 3:17; 10:7; Hag 2:6-9; Zech 8:20-23; 14:16, etc.). While the phenomenon of proselytism signals a certain openness toward the Gentiles within the Judaism of the time of Jesus Christ, the community of Qumran used a different language: impious, idolaters (1QpHab 12,13; 13,30); enemies of God (1QM 12,11). Yet they will recognize the faithfulness and the glory of God (1Qh 6,12).

In the NT the racial distinction lost its importance; the distinction founded on primacy in religion, however, remained, but profoundly modified toward a sense of a salvation open to all people (Mt 28:19-20; Mk 16:15-16), acc. to which the Gentiles are no longer strangers without hope and without God in this world (Eph 2:12). In the patristic literature the religious distinction maintained itself in particular among the *Apologists (*Aristides, *Justin). Beyond the usual meaning (2 Clem. 13,2.3; 17; Ign., Trall. 8,2; Smyrn. 1,2; Pol., Philp. 10,2; 11,2.4; very frequent in the Shepherd of *Hermas; Ad Diog. 11,1.3), the term appears in opposition to the Jews (*Heracleon in Orig., Jo 13,16; Hom. Clem. 2,19, Athan., Lit. enc. 3.4) and to the Christians (Hermas, Mand. 10,1,4; Hipp., Ib. 7,19; Clem. Alex., Paed. 3,8; Ib. 2,13; Or., Hom. 1, 7 in Jer., 2 Clem. 17,4). As a substantive (Clem. Alex., Ib. 6,6; Athan., Apol. 2,14, attached to "Arians") and adjective together with "vulgar" it means pagan (Clem., Paed. 2,6,1).

J. Pierron - P. Grelot, Nazioni: Diz. Teol. Bibl., Bologna [2]1967, 660-669; C. Gancho, Gentili: Enc. della Bibbia, III, Turin 1970, 674-677; H. Bietenhard, ἔθνος, κτλ: Diz. Conc. Bibl. NT, Bologna 1976, 1318-1322; Id., λαός: ibid., 1322-1326, M. Simon - A. Benoit, Giudaismo e cristianesimo, Bari 1978, passim; D. Ruiz Bueno, Padres apologetas griegos (II c.), term in index (BAC 116), Madrid 1979; Lampe, 407.

E. Peretto

GEORGE, monk and presbyter (7th c.). Heresiologist and computist who lived in the 1st half of the 7th c. He was unknown, even in name, until his existence was discovered at the end of the 14th c. by Diekamp, who published extracts of two treatises by George, preserved in a MS in the Vatican Library (Gr. 2210), one of which is a computational treatise and the other a brief heresiological treatment. Fifty years later, M. Richard discovered in the Mt. Athos monastery of Vatopedi a more complete MS of the heresiological treatise. These writings reveal nothing of the identity of George, other than his attachment to Chalcedonian orthodoxy. (1) On the Heresies, in fifteen chapters, is dedicated to a certain Epiphanius. The first eight deal with various ancient heresies, from *Manicheism to various forms of *gnosticism up to a heresy of *Melchizedek. The following seven chapters have to do with the various heresies and the most important heretics: *Origenism (ch. 9), *Apollinaris (ch. 10), *Nestorius, *Theodore of Mopsuestia, *Diodore of Tarsus, *Paul of Samosata and *Photinus (ch. 11), *Eutyches and *Dioscorus (ch. 12), the *Severians, *Theodosians, *Jacobites and *tritheists (ch. 13), *Julian of Halicarnassus and *Gaianus of Alexandria, *aphthartodocetists (ch. 14) and *Agnoetae (ch. 15). The longest chapter by far is that on Origenism, so much so that even in the MS of Vatopedi some of its parts have been summarized. George draws on the Panarion of *Epiphanius, on the De sectis of the late 6th c. and on the *anathemas of Origenism approved at the fifth ecumenical council. The absence of any mention of monoenergism or monothelitism suggests a date prior to the promulgation of the Ekthesis in 638. (2) Diekamp has published two extracts of the treatise On the Date of Easter (or two extracts of different but rigidly similar treatises), which deal with the paschal cycle and how it is situated within the succession of years from the foundation of the world. Together with the Computus ecclesiasticus* of *Maximus, it is the first computational treatise to give evidence of the so-called Byzantine epoch. It is dated in the year of indiction 638–639, the year of the promulgation of the Ekthesis on the part of the emperor *Heraclius.

CPG 7820-7822; F. Diekamp, Der Mönch und Presbyter Georgios, ein unbekannter Schriftsteller des 7. Jahrhunderts: ByzZ 9 (1900) 14-51; M. Richard, Le traité de Georges hiéromoine sur les hérésies: REB 28 (1970) 250-269 (= Id., Opera Minora III, Turnhout-Leuven, 1977, n. 62); Id., Les "Chapitres à Épiphane sur les hérésies" de Georges hiéromoine (VII[e] siècle): EHBS 25 (1955) 331-362 (= Id., Opera Minora III, Turnhout-Leuven, 1977, n. 61); V. Grumel, La chronologie, Paris 1958, 111-128; DHGE 20, 622-623.

A. Louth

GEORGE CHOIROBOSKOS (8th c.?). George Choiroboskos (it is uncertain if this nickname ["swineherd"] is a family inheritance or indicates one of his occupations during his youth) is indicated in the MSS as διάκονος, χαρτοφύλαξ, μέγας γραμματικός and οἰκουμενικὸς διδάσκαλος of *Constantinople. In the past he has been placed between the 6th and the 10th c.; in more recent times W. Bühler and Chr. Teodoridis (Johannes von Damaskos terminus post quem für Choiroboskos: ByzZ 69 [1976] 397-401) have maintained that his activity took place between 750 and 825; most recently Chr. Theodoridis (Der Hymnograph Klemens terminus post quem für Choiroboskos: ByzZ 73 [1980] 341-345) supposed that he was a contemporary of *Photius (9th c.). He was the author of lessons on various aspects of grammar, collected and transmitted to us ἀπὸ φωνῆς by his disciples, used by Constantine Laskaris and Urban of Belluno, some having survived in their entirety, others in fragments (Schmid-Stählin, Geschichte VII, 2, 2, 1079-1080). Among these, the Epimerismi in Psalmos should be mentioned, i.e., grammatical explanations (of the Psalms and of the Odes), known by the author of the Etym. Gudian. (PWK 3, 2366) and which show formal ruggedness of style and of argument justified by the form of transmission of the text.

CPG 7955; Th. Gaisford, Georgii Choerobosci dictata in Theodosii canones et epimerismi in Psalmos, III, Oxford 1842, 1-192; L. Cohn, Choiroboskos: PWK 3, 2363-2367; Krumbacher, 583-585; Bardenhewer V, 99; Beck 468; ODB 2, 425; Ch. Theodoridis, Der Hymnograph Klemens terminus post quem für Choiroboskos: ByzZ 73 (1980) 341-345.

A. Labate

GEORGE GRAMMATICUS (6th c.). A writer, very likely of the 6th c., author of an encomium of St. Barnabas in two recensions (or of two different encomia: the MS tradition offers two different incipit), as yet unpublished. The identity of this George with the poet George Grammaticus, disciple of the epic poet *Colluthus, has not been demonstrated.

CPG 7414-7415: BHG 218 a-b; Beck 400.

F. Scorza Barcellona

GEORGE MEGALOMARTYR (d. 303?). His Passio is entirely legendary and romantic. The soldier George of Cappadocia was martyred under Dacian (Diocletian?) at Lydda-Diospoli in Palestine, killed several times and always miraculously resuscitated again (martyr of indelible life). The oldest redaction of the legend is BHG 670, which seems to go back to the end of the 4th or the beginning of the 5th c. and to come from Asia Minor; the most widespread redaction is BHG 671. It is difficult to establish what the authentic nucleus is; some scholars have erroneously hypothesized that George was derived from the pagan cult of Tammuz, Horus, Perseus or Mithras. The veneration of George began in Lydda where, from the 5th c., a Martyrium was built above the tomb of the martyr (CCL 175, 116, 142, 229-233). Already in the 5th c. there were two versions of the legend in Latin, but at the beginning of the 6th c. the Gelasian decree (see *Decretum Gelasianum) forbade reading them. Probably for this reason a "revised" version was composed in Merovingian *Gaul, more respectful of history. In the West the ancient date of the feast was 24 April (Mart. hier.: 25 April); Rome and Naples observed the Byzantine date: 23 April (Sacramentarium Gregorianum; Marble calendar of Naples; Synax. Eccl. CP). *Gregory of Tours mentions the translation of relics to Limoges and Le Mans (Glor. mart. 101). At Rome, *Belisarius entrusted the port of S. Sebastian to the protection of the saint (BS 6, 518); from the 7th c. there are mentions of the church of S. Giorgio in Velabro (CCL 175, 337; MS of Berlin of the Sacramentarium Gelasianum [in the edition of C. Mohlberg of the Sacr. Veronense]; Duchesne LP 1, 360), and the head of George, discovered in the Lateran Patriarchium by Pope Zachary, was transferred there (Duchesne LP 1, 434). In 896 the head was transferred to Reichenau-Oberzell, on Lake Constance. From the 6th-7th c. George appears in art as the killer of a dragon.

BHG 669-691; BHL 3363-3406; BHO 309-322; Verzeichnis 67; LCI 6, 365-390; BS 6, 512-531; BBK 2, 208-209; TRE 12, 380-385; E. Lucius, Die Anfänge des Heiligenkults in der christlichen Kirche, Tübingen 1904, 239-242; E. Donckel, Ausserrömische Heilige in Rom, Luxemburg 1938, 49-51; C. Huelsen, Le chiese di Roma nel medio evo, Florence 1926, repr. Rome 2000; W. Buchowiecki, Handbuch der Kirchen Roms 2, Vienna 1970, 49-63; G. Didi-Huberman et al., Saint Georges et le dragon, Paris 1994; P. Maraval, Lieux saints et pèlerinages d'Orient, Paris 1985; S. Anneser et al. (eds.), Sanct Georg. Der Ritter mit dem Drachen, Lindenberg 2001.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

GEORGE of Alexandria (7th c.). Patriarch of Alexandria, successor of *John the Almsgiver, probably in 620. From him has reached us a Vita of *John Chrysostom, a compilation based principally on the Dialogue on the Life of Saint John Chrysostom of *Palladius.

CPG 7979. P.R. Norton, The Vita S. Chrysostomi by Georgius Alexandrinus: CPh 20 (1925) 69-72; C. Baur, Georgius Alexandrinus: ByzZ 27 (1927) 1-16; F. Halkin, Douze récits byzantins sur S. Jean Chrysostom (Subs. Hag. 60), Brussels 1977, 69-301.

A. Louth

GEORGE of Laodicea (d. 360?). A priest of *Alexandria, an *Arian of radical leanings, he was deposed by *Alexander (ca. 320) and did not succeed in having himself admitted by *Eustathius to the clergy of *Antioch, where he had moved. Back on the scene at the time of the anti-Nicene reaction, he was in line to be elected bishop of Antioch (ca. 328), but *Euphronius was preferred to him. Sometime later he was elected bishop of Laodicea (Syria), where around 342 he excommunicated *Apollinaris, as a Nicene and friend of *Athanasius. The latter would number him many times among his most bitter enemies. The Westerners reunited at *Serdica (343) excommunicated him as an Arian leader, even though he did not participate in the council. At the death of *Leontius he aspired to the cathedra of Antioch, but was supplanted by *Eudoxius. With time George had moderated his initial Arianism a great deal, so that, disturbed by the radical Arian propaganda (*anomoian), which Eudoxius was favoring at Antioch, he wrote to *Basil of Ancyra, inviting him to oppose it. Basil replied with the Council of *Ancyra of 358, whose synodal letter, a political manifesto of the *homoiousian theology, was signed, not only by Basil, but also by George, just as another explanatory document of the next year was. In the Council of *Seleucia he was among the leaders of the homoiousian faction. Nothing is known however of provisions regarding him from the Council of *Constantinople of 360, which saw the deposition of the principal homoiousian exponents. Since *Acacius ordained in 360 another bishop of Laodicea, we must deduce that George was deposed or died precisely at that time. *Theodoret (HE) presents him of Arian tendency in a rhetorical contest that took place at Antioch in 360: but perhaps he has confused George of Laodicea with *George of Alexandria, also called the Cappadocian.

CPG II, 3555-3558; DCB 2, 637-638; Simonetti 590.

M. Simonetti

GEORGE of Pisidia (7th c.). Poet and Byzantine hagiographer of the 1st half of the 7th c. A native of Antioch of Pisidia (Asia Minor), he moved to *Constantinople, where he was deacon and sceuophylax (sacristan) of the "Great Church" (Hagia Sophia) and referendarius or patriarchal nuntius to the emperor *Heraclius at the time of the patriarch *Sergius (610–638), his spiritual master and friend. In 622–623, in his role as imperial counselor, he took part in the first Byzantine expeditions against Persia. He was still alive between 631 and 634. The poetic work of George, only partially preserved, derives from 619/620 through just after 630. The first poems exalt the arrival of Heraclius victorious over Phocas and his victories against the Avars and above all against the Persians with the recovery of the Holy Cross. The more recent poems sing the work of the six days of creation (hexameron) and the *resurrection of Christ, reflect on the vanity of human life, and combat the *monophysitism of the "impious" *Severus (of Antioch). In prose only a Vita survives of the contemporary martyr St. Anastasius or, more precisely, a *panegyric of the heroic virtues of this personage, martyred in Persia in 628.

CPG 7827-7839; BHG 86; PG 92, 1197-1753; EC 9, 1751; A. Pertusi, Giorgio di Pisidia, Poemi. I: Panegirici epici, Ettal 1960; F.

Gonnelli, Giorgio di Pisidia, Esamerone. Intr., critical text, It. tr. and indices, Pisa 1998; Carmi di Giorgio di Pisidia, ed. L. Tartaglia (Classici greci. Autori della tarda antichità e dell'età bizantina), Turin 1998; S. Impellizzeri, La letteratura bizantina da Costantino agli iconoclasti, Bari 1965, 264-268, 363-364; N. Radošević, L'Hexaemeron di Giorgio di Pisidia e la sua traduzione slovena (in Serbian), Belgrade 1979; P. Speck, Zufälliges zum Bellum Avaricum des Georgios Pisides, Munich 1980; Testi mariani del primo millennio, ed. A. Gharib, 2, Rome 1988, 88f.; ODB 2, 838; Patrologia V, 48, 103-105; M. Whitby, Defender of the Cross. George of Pisidia on the Emperor Heraclius and His Deputies, in The Propaganda of Power. The Role of Panegyric in Late Antiquity (Mnemosyne Suppl. 183), ed. M. Whitby, Leiden-Boston 1998, 247-273; Id., George of Pisidia's Presentation of the Emperor Heraclius and His Campaigns. Variety and Development, in The Reign of Heraclius (610–641). Crisis and Confrontation, ed. G.I. Reinink - B.H. Stolte, Leuven 2002, 157-173.

D. Stiernon

GEORGE of Sykeon (Eleusios). Monk and Byzantine hagiographer (6th–7th c.). Eleusios by name, he was born in the obscure village of Adigermara, in *Galatia, to parents previously sterile who had implored the prayer of the nearby St. Theodore of Sykeon. While still a child (nepios), he was entrusted by them to the monastery of St. George of Sykeon (Galatia) founded by St. Theodore. Under the monastic name of George, he was for twelve years (601–613) a disciple of the saint. Having become hegumen of that monastery, he wrote the Vita of the defunct master (d. 613), gathering from eyewitnesses or those worthy of belief the facts prior to his familiarity with the saint. Even if it is not free of hagiographic clichés, the Vita is an important document for the religious history of Asia Minor in the 7th c.

CPG 7973; BHG 1748; BS 12, 263-265; A.-J. Festugière, Vie de Théodore de Sykeôn, Brussels 1970, I, 160-161; II, 160-165; Patrologia V, 151.

D. Stiernon

GEORGE of the Arabs (d. 724). Bishop of the nomadic tribes of Christian Arabs of Mesopotamia from 686, this illustrious imitator of *Jacob of Edessa belongs to that generation of monophysite theologians, literary and philosophical, who cast a critical gaze over their own traditions. George is not only the translator and commentator of Aristotle, the author of scholia on the homilies of *Gregory of Nazianzus, but there is also preserved a correspondence by him with the monks of the region of *Aleppo and other works of an essentially liturgical character; some of these, less important, seem to be of dubious authenticity. The most notable are a metrical *homily on the Myron and an "explanation of the mysteries of the church" (*sacraments). A. Vööbus found another four mēmrē, of which two have been published: On the Life of Severus of Antioch and On Palm Sunday.

Baumstark 257-258; Ortiz de Urbina 183-184; S.P. Brock, Syriac Studies. A Classified Bibliography (1980–1990), Kaslik 1996; Patrologia V, 491-493; A. Vööbus, The Discovery of New Important "Mēmrē" of Giwargi, the Bishop of Arabs: Journal of Semitic Studies 18 (1973) 235-237; K.E. MacVey, The Mēmra on the Life of Severus of Antioch, Composed by George, Bishop of the Arab Tribes, thesis, Cambridge, MA 1977; F. Rilliet, Une homélie métrique sur la fête des hosannas attribuée à Georges évêque des Arabes: OC 74 (1990) 72-102; D. Miller, George, Bishop of the Arabs, on the Philosophy: ARAM 5 (1993) 303-320.

F. Rilliet

GEORGE the Cappadocian. Originally from *Cappadocia and of *Arian leanings, he was seated with force on the episcopal throne of *Alexandria at the beginning of 357, in place of *Athanasius, through the will of the emperor *Constantius. He immediately inaugurated a policy of terror toward the partisans of Athanasius, who were exposed to violence of various kinds. The pagans too suffered harassment and abuses from him, so that an uprising that broke out toward the end of 358 forced him to leave Alexandria. He took part in the Council of *Sirmium of 359, and in those of *Seleucia of 359 and of *Constantinople of 360 as a proponent of Arianism. It was perhaps he, and not *George of Laodicea—as *Theodoret indicates (HE II, 31)—who took part in the rhetorical contest held in 360 at *Antioch on the interpretation of Pr 8:22, together with *Meletius and *Euzoius. Having returned to Alexandria 26 November 361, four days after the announcement of the death of Constantius his protector, he was the victim of another popular uprising in which pagans and Christians participated. Thrown in prison, on 24 December he was pulled by force by the people and lynched, together with two civil servants of the imperial administration.

EC 6, 445; DCB 2, 638-640; Simonetti 590; DHGE 602-610; M. Caltabiano, L'assassinio di Giorgio di Cappadocia (Alessandria, 361 d.C.): Quaderni Catanesi 7 (1985) 17-59; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IVe siècle (328–373), Rome 1996, passim, esp. 518-527.

M. Simonetti

GEORGIA

I. Christian origins - II. Architecture - III. Painting and sculpture.

I. Christian origins. Georgia (Sak'art'vel in Georgian), a region of the Caucasus, corresponds to the two ancient regions of Colchis, to the W, and *Iberia, to the E; it lies between the Black Sea, *Armenia, Azerbaijan and Turkey. The W part had undergone Greek influence starting from the 6th c. BC; in 65–64 BC Iberia became a Roman protectorate. The two regions are separated by mountainous zones (Surami Ridge). The E part, from the 4th c., was under *Sassanid influence and often the scene of combat between Byzantines and Persians; the W part, on the other hand, had greater relations first with the Roman Empire and then with the Byzantine until the 10th c.

*Rufinus's story about the apostolate of Saint Nino and the *evangelization of Iberia, written only a few decades after the event, is today considered a reliable source, partly because the information contained therein was narrated to Rufinus (d. 410) in the first person by the Christian Bacurius (Rufinus, HE 1,10-11), of the royal family of Iberia, between 394 and ca. 397. The narration of Rufinus is confirmed by later sources. Bacurius could have been the Roman tribunus of whom *Ammianus Marcellinus also speaks (31,12, 16) and the governor of *Palestine (PLRE 1, 144; Braund 246ff.): the events took place, as Rufinus himself specifies, at the time of Constantine, when the King Mirian (265–342) sat on the throne of Iberia. Despite the geographic position of the region, traversed by the grand commercial arteries on the route between Europe and Asia, it seems that Christianity penetrated there relatively late. Its origins remain obscure: the reports about its claimed evangelization on the part of the apostle *Andrew, transmitted by late sources (in particular by the "Georgian annals," compiled in the 18th c. on the basis of older documents), are hardly reliable. Legendary likewise is the story of the Tunic of Christ. It is, however, probable that the coastal regions encountered the Christian religion first and were, already at the time of Constantine, organized into dioceses—Patrophilus of Pityus (Bichvinta), at the NW extremity of Abkhazia, was present at the Council of *Nicaea—and from there was propagated to the interior. Similarly, a penetration of Christianity from Armenia and Syria is possible.

In any case, the first Georgian bishop attested in the sources seems to be John (Ioane, ca. 335–363), ordained, acc. to Rufinus, by *Alexander of Constantinople, even if, at least until the 8th c., the time of Bishop Ioane III (744–760), the catholicoi of Iberia were ordained in Antioch. During the reign of Vahtang (446–499) there was already a catholicos* in the capital, Mcxeta; the Georgian church became autocephalous. It seems that the first catholicos of Georgian origin was elected only in the 6th c. He was Saba I (523–552): later, toward the end of the century, the separation occurred between the Armenian and Georgian churches, under the catholicos Kirion II (595–610), with the rejection of *monophysitism and the adherence to the Council of *Chalcedon. In the Council of Dvin (505–506), in Armenia, the bishops of Georgia and Armenia accepted the Henotikon of the emperor *Zeno.

After the siege and sack of Tbilisi at the hands of the Khazars (627), Georgia fell under Byzantine domination. At the same time, the first Arab invasions took place: after brief periods of understanding with the local populations, at the beginning of the 8th c., an emir, with seat at Tbilisi (in 655), was put at the head of the country's administration, while the W regions were at least nominally under Byzantine rule. Under the impulse of the Bagratide dynasty, which reigned for twelve centuries, the unifying movement that developed following these events (the reunification occurred toward 1008 with Bagrat III), was largely based on Georgian monks who had built, in the occupied territories and esp. in the Tao, numerous monasteries, propulsive centers of Georgian culture. Monasticism and Georgian monasteries constitute the most notable aspect of the Georgian civilization of this period: the movement further counted numerous monasteries in all the E, and esp. in Palestine (see in particular the convent of the Holy Cross at *Jerusalem), where the most ancient inscriptions in the Georgian language have been found (430) in the monastery of St. Theodore. One of the leaders of the Georgian monastic movement is considered to be the monophysite Peter the Iberian, or "the Georgian" (413–ca. 489), later bishop of Maiuma (*Gaza), nephew of the Christian king of Iberia Bosmarios. Another Georgian monastic settlement of particular importance was that called Clibanon, having arisen near the monastery of St. *Simeon the Stylite the Younger on the Mons Admirabilis near Antioch, of which there is mention until ca. the 13th c.: the Georgian monastery also included a scriptorium where, acc. to the sources, numerous liturgical and patristic texts were translated into Georgian. Later, Georgian monastic communities were established in Egypt, in the Sinai, at Constantinople, on Olympus of Bithynia and on Athos, where in the 10th c. the famous μονὴ τῶν Ἰβήρων was founded. Saintly Georgian monks such as St. Gregory of Khandzta, St. Serapion of Zarzma, St. Saba of Ishkhan were universally known, and their monasteries still exist. These latter were esp. located in the Tao, a region that was the cradle of the independence and the unification of Georgia, whose first king was a Bagratid of Tao, Ashot I (786–826): with him opens the golden age of unified Georgia.

II. Architecture. From the sources (Rufinus) we know that the same Saint Nino, after having converted the Georgian people and King Mirian to the Christian religion, had a church built in the capital of Iberia, Mcxeta, acc. to her plans. This was probably a building of limited dimensions, as the examination of the surviving constructions of the 4th c. in Georgia permits us to hypothesize: among these, the church of the monastery of Nekressi should be mentioned, a single-aisle structure, with an apse included within a rectilinear wall and a crypt. From the earliest architectural evidence it is possible to identify the use of a building technique that would be peculiar to Georgia, i.e., a screen of stone blocks with an internal conglomerate, a structure of ancient local tradition, whose use would determine those technical and formal solutions specific to this area.

Constructions of modest dimensions still appear at the beginning of the 5th c., such as the church of the monastery of Dzveli-Chouamta and that of the Forty Martyrs of Nokalakevi, and the first significant Georgian basilicas date only to the end of the century. The Sion of Bolnissi should be mentioned in particular. It was begun, as an inscription specifies (one of the most ancient in Georgian, in uppercase letters [Asomtavruli]), in 478–479 and finished in 492–493. The name Sion, widely used in Georgia, is linked to the Sion of Jerusalem, the basilica of the Dormition of the Virgin, and in Georgian it has become a synonym of basilica, in particular one dedicated to the Virgin. The building, with three aisles, divided by pilasters, and a semicircular apse, is surrounded on the sides by a portico and probably should be interpreted as the historical prototype of a typology that became popular in the Caucasus (F.W. Deichmann, Bolnissi, 316–321).

The constructions of the 6th c. are more numerous. In this period, alongside longitudinal plans, numerous buildings on a central plan appear, specifically tetraconchal (e.g., Dzveli-Gavazi) and polylobate (the cathedral of Ninotsminda). The central plan building would thereafter have a widespread diffusion in Georgia, where the local architects created new solutions: it should be underlined that, at least up to the end of the 6th c., the cupola rested on the perimeter walls, and only in the 7th c. would the use of four free pilasters be introduced, on which the weight of the central cupola partially rests, such as in the church of Tsromi (626–634), where this system appears for the first time. Still in the 6th c. appears a particular type of worship building, limited to Georgia only, namely, the "basilica of three churches," a definition suggested by the analysis of the internal structure, not revealed by the exterior, of the buildings belonging to this typology. The central nave is cleanly separated from the side aisles with full walls, so as to define three more or less independent architectural units: consider in this regard the church of Zegani dated to the 7th c. (V. Beridze, Architecture, 77-80). The most important building of this period is the Church of the Holy Cross at Mcxeta-Djvari, built between 586 and 604 on commission for the Prince Stephan on the spot where, acc. to the tradition, a cross desired by Saint Nino had been placed. It is a mature work that is the result of a series of constructive experiences and experiments that had proceeded in the region for more than a century. It is a tetraconch with four protruding rectangular areas, with the E-W axis particularly emphasized; the cupola rests on a drum and its weight is borne on the angle niches and on the perimeter walls: the exterior is well correlated with the interior, of which it announces every articulation. The *iconography of the building, in tetraconch, would later have great popularity in the 7th c. in Georgia (the Sion of Ateni, constructed, as an inscription explains, by the Armenian architect T'odosak') and, later, in the 10th c. Just as for Armenia, this is a tradition originally foreign to the region, probably entering from N Syria, where numerous examples are known, and therefore translated by the local craftsmen who interpreted independent of the prototypes and with numerous variations the original theme of the tetraconch.

Alongside the churches of the Djvari type (G. Čubinašvili, I monumenti del tipo Ǧvari), two examples appear later of a tetraconch with ambulatory, Bana and Ishkhan. The first, originally considered to date to the end of the 9th c., has recently been assigned to the 7th, together with the remains of the second, incorporated into a later building: both should be attributed to the building activity of the Armenian catholicos Nerses III the Builder (641–661), born at Ishkhan. In this regard, however, we are probably dealing with the antecedents of Zvart'noc and not with monuments derived from this key building of Armenian architectural culture, as is commonly held, and in particular Bana, as can be deduced from the analysis of the surviving capitals of the S apse, still in situ: they are basket capitals, a kind widely spread throughout Armenia. In these constructions the correspondence between the lower part in basket-weave and the upper part is not very successful and lacks unity; besides, classicizing decorative motifs prevail, of which, however, it is not easy to discover the archaeological sources in this area. At Zvart'noc, on the other hand, the surviving examples are defined with a greater completion, the parts corresponding perfectly, and the basket motif predominates. The capitals of Bana, an ancient episcopal see, moreover, are therefore more archaic, so much as to allow the proposal of a date earlier than either Zvart'noc or the age of Nerses III: the terms of the question of the provenance of Ishkhan and above all of Bana from Zvart'noc should therefore be reconsidered, even if the hypothesis advanced is later accepted.

From the middle of the 8th to the end of the 10th c. the region was the theater of great battles for political and territorial unity. In this period, as has been seen, the activity of the monasteries, centers of Georgian culture, multiplied, and a great number of monastic edifices rose, some of which exist up to now. Among these, the church of Kvelatsminda should be mentioned, of the type called "of three churches," covered by two cupolas on the axis, the only example in the Caucasus, and perhaps the oldest phase of the church of the monastery of Ikalto, quadrangular, with a cupola on four disengaged pilasters. The variety of the iconography and the coverings, the different types of construction that were explored at this time, however difficult, anticipated the great artistic and cultural flowering of the 10th-13th c., which allowed Georgian architecture to occupy a distinguished position, independent of the contemporaneous Western and Eastern architectural experiments, in the framework of posticonoclastic Byzantine architecture.

III. Painting and sculpture. The study of medieval Georgian *painting is of exceptional interest because of the iconodoule position of the Georgian church, and it is within this optic that the most ancient cycles should be investigated, providing probably useful fragments for the reconstruction, even if only partial, of the difficult problem of the figurative arts in the iconoclast period. It should also be taken into account that precise offshoots from Byzantine art, properly called, emerge from the analysis of the pictorial production, in contrast with the autochthonous and independent position of the architecture. For the period between the 5th and 9th c. the testimonies are scarce. Of particular interest are the surviving fragments of the apsidal *mosaic of Tsromi (7th c.) in which Christ is represented between two *angels, a canonical iconography in the region, of which many examples have been preserved (esp. with regard to the contemporaneous plastic production): from the fleeting remains of the image of Christ can be noted the monumental setting of the figure and his vigorous expressionism, characteristics which also mark the coeval Georgian *sculpture and that will be found in later cycles (e.g., Ošk, 1066), and the generic references to the Sassanid decorative repertory of the *palm cornice that mark the apsidal dome.

The frescoes of the rupestrian convents of the David Gareža and of the cupola church of Dodo are dated to the 9th c.: in the later cycle Christ is represented, in the apse, between two archangels and, below, a cherub and a seraph on flaming wheels, together with the symbols of the evangelists. Here also the entire composition reveals evident conservative traits, a particular fact of Georgian painting. The near-constant presence in the iconographic programs of the representation of the Deisis, a very widespread image in the Caucasus, should be underlined. Often the most hierarchically significant spot is reserved for it, the apsidal semi-dome: one of the most ancient images of the East is the Deisis in enamel of the Cross of Martvili (late 8th-early 9th c.).

This is eminently architectural decoration, never entirely in the round, which develops, from the first meaningful manifestations (e.g., the capitals of the Sion of Bolnissi, late 5th c.), along the lines of an aesthetic discourse always aligned with the local traditions, both from a stylistic and an iconographic point of view. The decorative programs always foresee, as the fulcrum of the composition, the triumph of the cross, a concept of Palestinian origin (see the tympana of Djvari), which also appears in the pictorial cycles. Another particular motif of the Georgian tradition is the nearly constant presence of the donors, from ancient edifices such as Mcxeta (late 6th c.) to finished examples such as Ošk Vank in the Tao (mid 10th c.), where the donors, in a unique example in the Caucasus, Syria and Asia Minor, show the square halo, symbol of a living person.

EAA² 2, 742-747; EAM 6, 540-548 (1995); RAC 17, 12-106; LTK³ 4, 490-493; M. Tamarati, L'église géorgienne des origines jusqu'à nos jours, Rome 1910; P. Peeters, Le début du Christianisme en Géorgie d'après les sources hagiographiques: AB 50 (1932) 5-58; G. Čubinašvili, Tsromi, Moscow 1969 (in Russian); W. Ponomarew, s.v. Georgien, RBK Stuttgart 1971; W. Beridzè, Architecture géorgienne paléochrétienne: CCAB 20 (1973) 63-111; N. Thierry, La peinture médiévale géorgienne: ibid., 409-422; G. Čubinašvili, I monumenti del tipo Ǧvari, Milan ²1974; W.Z. Djobadzè, Materials for the Study of Georgian Monasteries in the Western Environs of Antioch on the Orontes, CSCO 372, Subs. 48, Louvain 1976; F. Gandolfo, Propyläen-Kunstgeschichte; Suppl. 1: Spätantike und frühes Christentum, s.v. Georgien, Berlin 1977; B. Vakhtang, L'architecture religieuse géorgienne des IVᵉ-VIIᵉ siècles: IIᵉ Symposium international sur l'art géor-gien, Tbilisi 1977; W.F. Deichmann, Zur Entwicklung der Pfeilerbasilika. die Basilika von Bolnissi: Bedi Karth 36 (1978) 316-324; M. Falla Castelfranchi, s.v. Georgia, in Enc. Univ. dell'Arte, Rome 1978; K. Salia, Histoire de la nation géorgienne, Paris 1980; O. Lordkipanidze, The Graeco-Roman World and Ancient Georgia (Colchis and Iberia), in Modes de contacts et processus de transformations dans les sociétés anciennes, Rome 1983, 123-142; M. van Esbroeck, RAC, Suppl. 1985, 257-266; H. von Skerst, Der Gralstempel im Kaukasus. Ur-Christentum in Armenien und Georgien, Stuttgart 1986; I. Reissner - B. Coulie, La Géorgie. Histoire, art, culture, Turnhout 1990; O. Lordkipanidze, Archäologie in Georgien von der Altsteinzeit bis zum frühen Mittelalter, Wientheim 1991; D. Braund, Georgia in Antiquity. A History of Colchis and Transcausian Iberia 550–AD 562, Oxford 1994; M. Manana Dzumberovna, Spätantike und frühchristliche Mosaike in Georgien, Vienna 1995; N. Garsoïan, L'église arménienne et le Grand Schisme d'Orient, CSCO 574, Subs. 100, Louvain 1999; Santa Nino e la Georgia. Storia e spiritualità cristiana nel Paese del Vello d'oro, Atti del I Conv. Int. di studi georgiani, ed. G. Shurgaia, Rome 2000; E.M. Synek, Georgia's Conversion to Its Female Apostle, in Christianizing People and Converting, ed. G. Armstrong - I.N. Wood, Turnhout 2000, 3-13.

M. Falla Castelfranchi

GEORGIAN LANGUAGE and LITERATURE. The Georgian language does not belong to the Indo-European family, nor to the Semitic group, nor to the Turanian families. Georgian is the only Caucasian language of which the writing began after the 1st half of the 5th c. The oldest inscription is doubtless that in a mosaic in the desert of Bethlehem; the oldest dated inscription however is that of the church of Bolnissi of 494, 20th year of Peroz. It appears that the same person who created the Armenian script also created the Georgian. The beginnings of Georgian literature are closely linked to Armenian literature. Only when, at the beginning of the 7th c., the Georgian church separated from the Armenian did the literary influence also grow weaker. Georgian literature began with translations, first of all of the Bible. The old translation derives from the old Armenian translation, which itself was also influenced by the readings of the Syriac Diatessaron*. The Georgians translated from Greek, Armenian, Syriac and Arabic. The most important centers of Georgian literary production were far from the homeland, e.g., in the monastery of St. *Sabas near Jerusalem and that of St. *Catherine in the *Sinai peninsula. From 980 the Georgian Church adhered to the Church of Byzantium. During that time original works were written, as well as translations and elaborations of Greek works, revisions of works already translated from the Armenian and now revised based on the Greek originals. The largest centers were a Georgian monastery on Athos and another in *Antioch. (Among the most important original works were secular texts such as The Knight with the Panther's Skin by Šotha Rustaveli [n. 1172], the epic of Sargis and the chivalrous epic Abdulmesia of Giovanni Šatveli.)

An overview of the whole has been presented by M. Tarchnišvili - J. Assfalg, Geschichte der kirchlichen georgischen Literatur (ST 185), Vatican City, 1955. Taken from the History of Literature edited by K. Kekelidze, this work describes different literary genres and about 74 Georgian authors: from the martyrdom of Saint Shushanik by Jacob of Tsurtav in the 6th c., up to Jonas Khelašvili who wrote in 932. There are also numerous anonymous translators. The *Bible, the *apocrypha, *exegesis, dogmatics, polemics, *hagiographies, *ascetic writings, *homilies, *poetry, *liturgy and canon law are all represented. For spiritual literature, significant additional material can be found in DSp 6,244-256 (s.v. Georgia). It is very useful to add to Tarchnišvili the bibliographies of three Georgian specialists who more than any others have studied the ancient Christian literature: K. Kekelidze, Akaki Shanidze and Ilia Abuladze, Muséon 76 (1963) 443-480; 80, 431-474; 82, 405-442. The latter has published a corpus of the Georgian hagiography in Georgian, described in AB 89 (1971) 419-420 and 98 (1980) 409-421. For liturgy and in particular for *hymnography, the works published at Tbilisi are of great importance for rediscovering the existing forms of the ancient rite of Jerusalem, before the Byzantinization of worship in the holy city. For the importance of homiletic, see M. van Esbroeck, Les plus anciens homéliaires géorgiens, Louvain-la-Neuve 1975.

It often happens that texts lost in Greek survive in Georgian. The *palimpsests, often very ancient, help to rediscover the ancient form of texts already altered in Greek. The publication "Bedi Kartlisa," edited in Paris, regularly offers recensions and articles in different fields of scientific activity on ancient Georgian Christian literature. Concerning the authors, difficult to identify, of the great corpus of the Annals of Georgia, in Georgian "Life of Georgia: Kartlis Tskhovreba," a well-done analysis has been provided by Toumanoff, Medieval Georgian Historical Literature (VIIth-XVth Centuries): Traditio 1 (1943) 139-182. The accumulation of old chronicles, their combination to give an appearance of unity, make of such Histories of the kings of Georgia a whole that has still been but little explored, despite the numerous efforts of I. Džavakhišvili and I. Berdzenišvili, many times reprinted and reunited in collections. The art institute of Tbilisi is no less active: the Christian architecture of the old churches of Georgia constitutes a wonder for all the historians of art who have not yet pushed their research so far. Georgian literature has never been touched by Islam. It expresses itself in the epic or poetic categories of Iran prior to Islam. The very ancient diaspora in the *monasteries of *Palestine, then at *Constantinople, at Antioch, in the Sinai and on the Black Mountain near Antioch have preserved MS treasures that are subjects of current study through the Institute of Manuscripts at Tbilisi, and an entire library is being recorded with all the desirable accuracy, giving an inestimable quantity of information. In canon law E. Gabidzašvili has published the Didi Sdžuliskanoni (Tbilisi 1975), a translation of the Greek collection of 14 titles; this is further completed by the map sketched by David the Builder around 1105 (543–559).

In every period the literary activity of the Georgians appears unusual. The life of Saint Nino, the apostle of the Georgians, is a whole of great complexity. Despite certain literary links with the Ecclesiastical History of *Rufinus, who around 400 already narrates the episode, the larger part of the account is completely autonomous. Contemporaneous research has also begun to print in their entirety MSS of great importance, such as the homilary of Mount Sinai of 864, published in full in 1959. There is, further, the Šatberd MS 1141 of the 11th c., a collection reproduced for the most part in PO for the texts attributed to *Hippolytus, and the MS of the British Museum Or. 11281, collected by Vies, written in the 11th c. but translated based on an Arabic model. It is enough, for the moment, to go through the Georgian translations in the CPG to realize the importance of the period covered. Often these texts, translated in antiquity, conserve details that point toward a better comprehension of the reworkings that have occurred in the Greek tradition in the slow march of the centuries. The Georgian church offers the singular circumstance of having followed the henotic movement under Zeno and Anastasius, but not having completely eliminated the documents of that period, documents condemned under *Justinian in all the Greek MSS. Very early they were conformed to Justinian and the prior traditions were rewritten. One should remember such circumstances when one studies ancient Georgian texts.

M. Tarchnišvili - J. Assfalg, Geschichte der kirchlichen georgischen Literatur auf Grund des ersten Bandes der georgischen Literaturgeschichte von K. Kekelidze (Studi e testi 185), Vatican City 1955; G. Garitte, Bibliographie de K. Kekelidze (d. 1962): Muséon 76 (1963) 443-480; Id., Bibliographie du Prof. A. Sanidze: ibid. 80 (1967) 431-474; Id., Bibliographie d'Ilia Abuladze: ibid. 82 (1969) 405-442; Akademija Nauk Gruzinskoj SSR, Russko-Gruzinskij Slovar', Tbilisi 1956; K. Tschenkeli, Einführung in die georgische Sprache, Zürich 1958, I-II; Glossarium Ibericum in Epistolas Paulinas antiquioris versionis, ed. J. Molitor, Louvain 1976, CSCO 373, Subs. 49; T. Shimomiya, Zur Typologie des Georgischen, Tokyo 1978; N.F. Sosiašvili, Korpus gruzinskich nadpisej, Tbilisi 1980; A.C. Harris, Georgian Syntax, Cambridge 1981; E.J. Furnée, Beiträge zur georgischen Etymologie, Leuven 1982; J. Gipperti, Iranica armeno-iberica, Vienna 1993; B. Outtier, Langue et littérature géorgiennes, in M. Albert et al., Christianismes orientaux. introduction à l'étude des langues et des littératures (Initiations au christianisme ancien), Paris 1993, 261-296; J.N. Birdsall, The Old Syriac Gospels and the Georgian Version. The Question of Relationship, in VI Symposium Syriacum, ed. R. Lavenant, Rome 1994, 43-50; H. Fähnrich, Grammatik der altgeorgischen Sprache, Hamburg 1994; B. Outtier, La documentation en patristique géorgienne, in La documentation patristique. Bilan et prospective, ed. J.-C. Fredouille - R.-M. Roberge, Paris 1995, 181-184; M. van Esbroeck, Aux origines de la Dormition de la Vierge. Études historiques sur les traditions orientales, Aldershot 1995; G.B. Hewitt, Georgian. A Structural Reference Grammar, Amsterdam 1995; E. Khintibidze, Georgian-Byzantine Literary Contacts, Amsterdam 1996; B. Outtier, À propos des traductions de l'arabe en arménien et en géorgien: Parole de l'Orient 21 (1996) 57-63; G. Shurgaia, Traduzioni e citazioni dal greco in georgiano, in I Greci. Storia, cultura, arte, società. 3: I greci oltre la Grecia, ed. S. Settis, Turin 2001, 1053-1070; G. Shurgaia, La spiritualità georgiana. Martirio di Abo, santo e beato martire di Cristo di Ioane Sabanisze (La spiritualità cristiana orientale 3), Rome 2003.

M. van Esbroeck - I. Ramelli

GERASENE DEMONIAC (iconography). Among the numerous episodes of the exorcism of demons reported in the gospels, only that performed by Christ in the country of the Gerasenes (Mt 8:28-34; Mk 5:1-20; Lk 8:26-39) was included in ancient Christian iconography. The only example of the theme of the healing of the Gerasene demoniac we have during the formative period of Christian iconographical production may be an early 3rd-c. fresco done in the attic of the mausoleum of M. Clodius Hermes, under the complex of the Basilica Apostolorum at Rome. The composition presents at the center a nude male character, kneeling and clearly turned toward a figure before him in a tunica clavata; on the right of the scene a herd of swine descends headlong toward a stretch of water. Only in the 5th c. did iconography again take up this scriptural theme: we find it in the wall decoration of a church building (Ravenna, S. Apollinare Nuovo, 6th c.), on liturgical objects, as in the ivory pyxes of Darmstadt and of the Hermitage of Leningrad (Volbach, n. 170, pl. 86 and n. 179, pl. 90), and in the diptychs of Murano and of the Louvre (Volbach, n. 125, pl. 66 and n. 144, pl. 76). In these examples, the formulation of the scene reflects the pericopes of Mark and Luke in which only one demoniac is mentioned. Matthew's version, which speaks of duo habentes daemonia (8:28), finds its figurative tradition in a miniature of the codex of Rabbula (6th c.) and in the diptych of Yerevan (Volbach, n. 142, pl. 75, 6th c.). On the iconological level, at least for the 3rd c., the scene of the demoniac may convey an obvious polemical message against the ineffective exorcism rituals practiced by magi and pagan enchanters, perhaps reflecting the exegetical tradition of the Fathers, who always used this evangelical theme in polemical contexts (Feliers). In a later period the theme of the demoniac, like other NT episodes, came to assume a more specifically narrative character, aimed at illustrating Christ's power as a thaumaturge.

W. Artelt, s.v. Besessene: LCI 1, 273-277; C. Cecchelli - G. Furlani - M. Salmi (ed. and comm.), The Rabbula Gospels, Olten-Lausanne 1959, f. 8b, 59-60, J. Feliers, L'exégèse de la péricope des porcs de Gérasa dans la patristique latine: SP 10, Berlin 1970, 225-229; U.M. Fasola, Lavori nelle catacombe: RivAC 54 (1978) 7-13; C. Carletti, Pagani e cristiani nel sepolcreto della "piazzola" sotto la basilica Apostolorum a Roma: VetChr 18 (1981) 287-307.

C. Carletti

GERASIMUS, hermit (d. 475). Born in *Lycia (Asia Minor), he established himself as a hermit in the region of the Dead Sea. Initially he did not accept the decisions of the Council of *Chalcedon, but thanks to *Euthymius, he returned to Chalcedonian orthodoxy, and toward 453 he founded a *laura, a novelty at that time, which would become famous and later carry his name. This was located about 6 km (3.7 mi) S of Jericho and to the N of the Dead Sea (the present locality of Deir Hajla). The monks still lived as hermits in their own cells (or caves) for five days a week and came together Saturday and Sunday for common meals and for the celebration of the Eucharist in the cenobium, which included church, kitchen, refectory, storage, residences for the abbot, the presbyters and other persons, e.g., places for the training of the novices. Gerasimus demanded that on Saturday they bring the fruit of their labor, share food—and wine also—and that they return to their cells Sunday evening carrying food and the material for manual labor. They were not allowed to keep lamps, hot beverages or to cook food; the monks could own a coat, a tunic and little else. The cells had to remain open when the hermits were absent. The monastery of Gerasimus continued until the 12th c.; at the end of the 19th a new one was built in the neighborhood. *John Moschus recounts several episodes of the monastery, including the anecdote that Gerasimus took a thorn out of the paw of a lion, who later remained faithful to him for five years (Spiritual Meadow, ch. 107). Through the similarity of names with Jerome, the episode was later also attributed to *Jerome, who is often represented in *iconography with a lion. The feast of Gerasimus occurs on 5 March both in the West and in the Syriac world (in the Byzantine synaxaria, 4 or 20 March).

BHG 393-396f; 695f-648d; AASS, mart. I, 386-389; BS 6, 199-200; DHGE 20, 828-829; LTK³ 4, 496; LCI 6, 391-393; Y. Hirschfeld, Gerasimus and His Laura in the Jordan Valley: RB 98 (1991) 419-430; Nel deserto accanto ai fratelli. Vite di Gerasimo e di Giorgio di Choziba di Anonimo dell'VIII secolo – Antonio di Choziba, intr., tr. and notes by L. Campagnano Di Segni, Comunità di Bose, Magnano 1991; J. Binns, Ascetics and Ambassadors of Christ. The Monasteries of Palestine 314–631, Oxford 1994; J. Patrich, Sabas, Leader of Palestinian Monasticism. A Comparative Study in Eastern Monasticism, Fourth to Seventh Centuries, Washington DC 1995 (see index).

A. Di Berardino

GERMANUS of Auxerre (ca. 378–448). Born at Auxerre ca. 378, trained as a lawyer at *Autun and at *Rome, he was a high imperial civil servant, but later (7 July 418) was ordained bishop of his native city. He was a defender of the poor oppressed by taxes; he restored and built civil and sacred buildings; and he participated actively in the religious life of his time. He encouraged *Geneviève of Paris in her religious vocation. He also went twice to *Britain (429 and 445) to oppose *Pelagianism there, and he contributed to the education of *Patrick, apostle of *Ireland, whom he consecrated bishop (432). He died on the occasion of a visit to the court of *Ravenna (31 July 448). His body was returned in triumph to Auxerre (1 October 448), where his veneration began immediately. All of his writings have been lost; there remains a Vita composed in 480 by the priest *Constantius of Lyons (BHL 3453).

BHL 3453-3464; BS 6, 232-236; BBKL 2, 225-226; R. Borius, Constance de Lyon. Vie de S. Germain d'Auxerre: SC 112, Paris 1965; G. Le Bras - É. Gilson (eds.), S. Germain d'Auxerre et son temps, Auxerre ²1955; E.A. Thompson, S. Germanus of Auxerre and the End of Roman Britain, Woodbridge 1984.

V. Saxer - S. Samulowitz

GERMANUS of Capua (d. ca. 541). *Gregory the Great records that at the very moment of Germanus's death St. *Benedict saw his soul rise to heaven in a globe of fire (Dialogues II, 35, SC 260, 236-242), while Pope *Hormisdas called him a "most religious man" (Collectio Avellana 149, CSEL 35/2, 598.2-4). Germanus was an authentic pioneer of ecumenism, destined to have a brilliant posthumous fortune in the Cassino area, where in 873 his relics were moved by the will of Emperor Louis II. Son of one Amantius, having been left an orphan, he distributed all his goods to the poor in order to dedicate himself to an *ascetic life (Vita Germani, in B. Mombritius, Sanctuarium seu Vitae sanctorum, Paris ²1910, 583). As bishop of *Capua, in 519–520 he led the pontifical delegation sent to Constantinople concerning the *Acacian schism (LP I, 100-101, 270) and succeeded in brilliantly overcoming the conflicts that for the first time had seen the Church of Rome solidly opposed to that of the East (Collectio Avellana 148, CSEL 35/2, 594), facing with great shrewdness delicate problems such as the *Theopaschite question raised by the Scythian monks (ibid. 216, CSEL 35/2, 675-6), the calculation of the date of *Easter (ibid. 185, CSEL 35/2, 642) and the reintegration of some Chalcedonian bishops deposed by the emperor *Anastasius (ibid. 171, CSEL 35/2, 627-8). He presumably died in 541.

A. Lentini, Due legati papali a Costantinopoli nel secolo VI. Germano di Capua e Sabino di Canosa, in Atti del IV Congr. Naz. di Studi Romani, Rome 1938, 3-11; Id., S. Germano, vescovo di Capua, Montecassino 1963; Id., Germano, vescovo di Capua, santo: BS VI, Rome 1965, 237-239; Id., Il "Libellus" portato a Bisanzio da Germano di Capua, in Il contributo dell'arcidiocesi di Capua alla vita religiosa e culturale nel Meridione, Rome 1967, 343-349; Id., La legazione bizantina di Germano di Capua nel "Sanctuarium Capuanum" di Michele Monaco, in Michele Monaco e il seicento capuano, ed. P. Borraro, Salerno 1980, 47-54; Id., Germain de Capoue: DHGE XXVIII, 905-906; var. aus., Germano di Capua (d. 541 ca.). Ambasciatore ecumenico a Costantinopoli e modello di santità per il Cassinate, ed. F. Carcione, Venafro 1999.

P. Marone

GERMANUS of Constantinople (d. ca. 733). Patriarch of *Constantinople from 715 to 730, he is a saint celebrated by the Byzantine Church and by the Roman *Martyrology 12 May. There is useful information about him in the Vita Germani (BHG 697). The year of his birth is likely between 631 and 649 (BS 6, 243-244). His father, the patrician Justinian, had occupied important posts under *Heraclius and was later condemned to death by Constantine IV Pogonatos. Germanus was made a eunuch at that time and made a member of the clergy of Hagia Sophia of which he later, toward 678, became the primicerius. Metropolitan of Cyzicus in the Hellespont in 705 (but perhaps also before: DTC 6, 1301), he was called in August of 715, under the emperor Anastasius II, to occupy the patriarchal seat of Constantinople (E.W. Brooks, On the Lists of the Patriarchs of Constantinople from 638 to 715: ByzZ 6 [1897] 33-54). Perhaps already in that same year he called a synod of a hundred prelates or so to anathematize the followers of *monothelitism. A firm defender of images, after having assured himself of papal support, he opposed the emperor from 726 (when *Leo III the Isaurian intensified his iconoclastic campaign, perhaps promulgating an edict: Fliche-Martin, Storia della Chiesa, V2, 595-596), and was forced by him to abdicate in January 730. This date is accelerated to 729 by H. Hubert (Observations sur la chronologie de Théophane et de quelques lettres des papes [726–774]: ByzZ 6 [1897] 495-496). He took refuge in the paternal property of Platanion, where he died at a very advanced age toward 733. Buried in the monastery of Cora, he was excommunicated in the iconoclastic synod of 754 and definitively rehabilitated at the Council of *Nicaea II in 787.

We do not have all the works of Germanus: some were destroyed by Leo III and by successive iconoclastic emperors.

1. Epistulae (complete list in CPG): Ad Iohannem episcopum Synadensem (Mansi XIII, 100B-105A), Ad Constantinum episcopum Nacoliae (Mansi XIII, 105B), Ad Thomam episcopum Claudiopoleos (Mansi XIII, 108A-128A), Ad Armenios. The first three letters, in defense of the cult of the images, are of great interest for the reconstruction of the origins of the dispute but of little literary value; the fourth—the Greek original has been lost, but a Latin translation based on an Armenian text has survived—attempts to explain to the monophysite Armenians the decrees of the Council of *Chalcedon and the teaching of the Fathers, esp. of *Cyril of Alexandria, on the two natures of Christ.

2. Homiliae: Numerous homilies have been transmitted under the name Germanus. For the most part they are dedicated to the celebration of the Virgin. Since, however, the homiletic tradition does not usually add the ordinal number of the patriarchs, they could also belong to Germanus II and, less probably, to Germanus III. The following can be considered authentic: In Annuntiationem (BHG 1145n-q); In S. Mariae zonam (BHG 1086); De Praesentatione (BHG 1076w: the first part is lost); De Acathisto (BHG 1130s: despite this attribution, the institution of the feast of the *Acathistus by Germanus is not certain); I and II In Praesentationem (BHG 1103-1104); I, II and III In Dormitionem (BHG 1119, 1135, 1155: they are found united in some codices; the first two were part of a trilogy from which the third seems alien. See G. Chevalier, Les trilogies homilétiques dans l'élaboration des fêtes mariales: Gregorianum 18 [1937] 372-376). Doubts remain about the authenticity of the homilies De Dormitione (BHGa 1146q), De Translatione cinguli Dei Genitricis (BHG 1147: in the codices it also appears under the names of Nicetas Syncellus, Nicetas Paphlagonius and Theodore Graptus, but it is perhaps from George of Nicomedia: Beck 475); In S. Mariae zonam (BHG 1123g: unpublished); In Zachariam (BHG 1881m: unpublished). The following belong to Germanus II: In vivificam crucem (BHG 451; PG 98, 221-244) and In Domini corporis sepulturam (PG 98, 244-290). In the homilies, Germanus seems prolix acc. to the canons of Byzantine rhetoric, and his Mariology is directed toward celebrating the purity of the Virgin and her role of mediation and intercession.

3. Tractatus: De haeresibus et synodis, a text dedicated to the deacon *Anthimus, gives a historical survey of the *heresies, with indication of the protagonists and of the councils that dealt with them, written in the last years of his life after his abdication, without the possibility of consulting books: thus several omissions, which, however, did not prevent Mai from defining it a gemmula. De vitae termino is a dialogue between a rationalist and an orthodox believer on the dogma of the *foreknowledge and the *providence of God: the opinion of *Basil on the limits of human life is discussed. Photius transcribed it in Quaest. CXLIX ad Amphilochium without mentioning the true author. Regarding De vera et legitima retributione, Photius provides us with a summary of this lost work (Bibl., cod. 233). The author, in an attempt to justify *Gregory of Nyssa, who had accepted the Origenian doctrine of the apokatastasis, maintained that the Oratio catechetica and the De anima et resurrectione of Gregory had been interpolated by Origenist heretics (Quasten II, 293–294). The work Historia mystica ecclesiae catholicae, an important commentary on the liturgical symbolism of the Eastern Masses of Basil, of *John Chrysostom and of the Presanctified has reached us in different recensions, suffered numerous interpolations and presents a confused MS tradition. It also appears under the names of *Basil of Caesarea and *Cyril of Jerusalem. It is nevertheless probable that Germanus participated in the compilation, esp. since Anastasius Bibliothecarius, who procured a Latin translation, knew this attribution.

4. Hymns: The name of Germanus is present in the liturgical books (C. Emereau, Hymnographi byzantini: EO 22 [1923] 428-431; E. Follieri, Initia hymnorum ecclesiae graecae, 6 vols., Vatican City 1960-65); his activity as a composer deserves a specialized study.

CPG 8001-8033; PG 98, 39-454; W. Christ - M. Paranikas, Anthologia graeca carminum christianorum, Leipzig 1871, 98-99. Translations: C. Garton - G. Leendert (eds.), On Predestined Terms of Life (Gr. and Eng. text), Buffalo 1979; P. Meyendorff (ed.), On the Divine Liturgy (Gr. and Eng. text), Crestwood, NY 1984; Germano di Costantinopoli, Omelie mariologiche (le omelie mariane e le lettere sulle sacre immagini), ed. V. Fazzo, Rome 1985; F. Carcione, Timoteo e Germano di Costantinopoli, Gli scritti, Rome 1993; G. Pons Pons, Homilías mariológicas, introducción y notas de A. Fazzo, Madrid 1990; V. Grumel, Homélie de saint Germain sur la délivrance de Constantinople: REB 16 (1958) 183-205; A. Wenger, Un nouveau témoin de l'assomption, une homélie attribuée à Saint Germain de Constantinople: REB 16 (1958) 43-58; Analecta hymnica graeca e codicibus eruta Italiae Inferioris, 12 vols., Rome 1966–1980; E.M. Toniolo, Sull'ingresso della Vergine nel santo dei santi. Una finale inedita di omelia bizantina: Marianum 36 (1974) 101-105; F. Combefis, Novam auctarium, II, Paris 1648, 790-802; Krumbacher, 66-67; V. Grumel, L'iconologie de Saint Germain de Constantinople: EO 21 (1922) 165-175; F. Cayré, Germain: DTC 6, 1300-1309; E. Perniola, La mariologia di S. Germano, Rome 1954; Beck, 473-476; BS 6, 243-253, DSp 6, 309-311; E. Lamza, Patriarch Germanos I . . . mit dem griechisch-deutschen Text der "Vita Germani," Würzburg 1975; Patrologia V, 133-4; LACL³ 285-286.; Testi mariani del primo millennio, ed. A. Gharib, 2, Rome 1988, 318-390.

A. Labate

GERMANUS of Paris (Born at Autun, end 5th c.; d. 576). *Venantius Fortunatus, in narrating his life (PL 72, 55-78), presents the integrity and the austerity of Germanus and the numerous extraordinary episodes of his life. Ordained priest by Agrippinus, he was later chosen by *Nectarius to be abbot of the monastery of St. Symphorian. King *Chilperic (561–584) called him to *Paris to succeed the bishop *Libanus and appreciated his advice, despite the despotic and cruel character of the king's reign. A courageous letter has reached us, written by Germanus to the warlike queen Brunhilda (534–ca. 613), which invites her to sentiments of peace, mildness and humility. For many centuries the Expositio brevis antiquae liturgiae gallicanae (PL 72, 88-98) was attributed to Germanus: two letters which inform us on the rites and uses observed in the churches of *Gaul at the beginning of the Middle Ages on the authority of an long-remembered tradition. A deeper examination of these writings leads to the conclusion that the two letters, attributed by the codices to Germanus of Paris, are the work of an anonymous author who composed them in the 7th c. From them it is therefore possible to know the *Gallican liturgy, but elements of *Visigothic (*Isidore of Seville) and Byzantine importation, received in the era in which the letters were written, cannot be ignored.

CPL 1060; PL 72, 77-80, 88-98; DACL 6, 1049-1102; BS 6, 257-259; LTK 4, 533; LMA 4, 1346-1347; ODC 668-669; DHGE 20, 927-929; J. Quasten, Expositio brevis antiquae liturgiae gallicanae Germano Parisiensi ascripta, Münster 1934; R. Cabié, Les lettres attribuées à saint Germain de Paris et les origines de la liturgie gallicane: Bulletin de Littérature Ecclesiastique 73 (1972) 183-192; J. Dubois, La malle de voyage de l'évêque Ger- main de Paris (d. 576): Bullettin de la société nationale des antiquaires de France (1983) 238-249; M. Becher, Neue Überlegungen zum Geburtsdatum Karls des Großen: Francia 19 (1992) 50-54; R. Van Dann, Saints and Their Miracles in Late Antique Gaul, Princeton, NJ 1993, 29-31, 233-234; Y. Hen, Culture and Religion in Merovingian Gaul A.D. 481–751, Leiden 1995, 47-49; Patrologia IV, 302-303 (bibl.); P. Bernard, *Sources de l'*Expositio: EO 13 (1996) 65-73; J. Torsy, Der Große Namenstagskalender, Aktualisierte und erweiterte Neuausgabe, ed. H.J. Kracht, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna [2]1997, 146; LACL (2002) 286-287.

M.G. Bianco

GERMANY

I. Spread of Christianity up to 313 - II. Christian topography in the 4th-7th c. - III. Migration of peoples and continuity of the church - IV. Vestiges of paleo-Christian art.

A panorama of the history of Christianity of the first six centuries in Germany in the modern sense does not embrace geographically the Roman provinces of Germania superior (I) and inferior (II) as they were around AD 90, and still less the borders established at the Diocletian restructuring. Germania I, divided by *Diocletian, included, in the S part, Maxima Sequanorum, with Besançon (Vesontio) as the capital, modern Switzerland, and the French territory bordering to the SW. Germania II was enlarged with the annexation of the civitas Tungrorum (Tongeren in Belgium). On the other hand, great sections of the Diocletian province Belgica belonged to it, including *Trier (Colonia Augusta Treverorum), which was until the 5th c. administrative center of the Praefectura Galliarum, later transferred because of the Germanic invasion in 395–402 to *Arles, matching the territory of the later German Empire, as well as the N part of the Diocletian province Raetia II, with Augsburg (Augusta Vindelicorum) as capital. To the E of the Rhine and N of the Danube, after the renunciation of the conquest of the interior of Germany, only the so-called Agri Decumates were under the control of Rome, i.e., the territory to the S of the limes, functioning as a fortified line that linked the Rhine and the Danube. This began in the N near Rheinbrohl, continued for a stretch along the Main, proceeded to the S to Lorch, then turning E to link up with the Danube near Kehlheim (D. Baatz, Der römische Limes, Berlin 1974, 11-17; 53-64). The border underwent modifications several times following the vicissitudes of war. Since the territory defended by the limes was not incorporated at the time of Roman occupation into the bordering provinces, but remained under military occupation, the formation of Christian centers was not possible.

I. Spread of Christianity up to 313. The first mention of Christians in Germany, a little later than 180, is found in *Irenaeus, Adv. haer. I, 10,2 (SC 264, 159), who, to demonstrate that the faith and tradition of the church were identical in the entire known world, mentions also αἱ ἐν Γερμανίαις ἱδρυμέναι ἐκκλησίαι, i.e., the churches residing in the Germanic provinces. Given that Irenaeus expresses himself in a technically correct manner from the administrative point of view when he speaks of the Germanies in the plural, we should rule out the idea that this might be a simple rhetorical affectation without any geographical value. It is more difficult to determine if he is using the term ἐκκλησίαι thinking of churches governed by *bishops, mentioned as bearers of a genuine tradition of faith, or only to groups of Christians who lived isolated or in little communities. The enumeration of *Tertullian, Adv. Iud. 7,4 (CCL 2, 1354), tells us even less; it should be understood as an extension, motivated by apologetic intentions, of Acts 2:9-11. From the imperial period there are no other literary mentions.

Even from the most ancient archaeological finds and from the various types of burials (position of the cadaver, absence of funeral ornament, direction toward the *East) definite Christian elements cannot be deduced. Objects with representations of *fish, stags, hares or shepherds carrying a lamb on their shoulders, even cross ornaments, are not unequivocal Christian symbols without the corresponding context. The memoria under the cathedral of Bonn should not be dated to 260–300 (H. Lehner - W. Bader, Baugeschichtliche Untersuchungen am Bonner Münster: Bonner Jahrbücher 136/137 [1932] 3-216), but rather to the middle of the 4th c. (H. v. Petrikovits, Die Zeitstellung der ältesten frühchristlichen Kultanlage unter dem Bonner Münster, in Id., Beiträge zur römischen Geschichte und Archäologie, Bonn 1976, 463-472), and the presence of Christians in the Roman army has not been proved with certainty.

All the other sources on the origins of Christianity in the first three centuries date to the period of peace, and their historical accuracy requires verification. The account of the martyrdom of St. Afra at Augusta under Diocletian appears worthy of belief, transmitted by the Mart. hier. (MGH [SRM] 7, 200-204) and the poet *Venantius Fortunatus (Vita S. Martini 4, 640-643: MGH [AA] 4/1, 368), which suggests the presence of a Christian community in this city at the time of the last *persecutions (B. Schimmelpfennig, War die hl. Afra eine Römerin? in Vera lex historiae. Festschrift D. Kurze, ed. St. Jenks, Cologne 1993, 277-303). For *Cologne also the existence of a Christian community can be presumed by the end of the 3rd c.

At Xanten (Colonia Ulpia Traiana; in the Middle Ages: Ad Sanctos) the most ancient mention of the martyr Victor, together with a mention of the rediscovery of the bones of the martyr Mallosus of Birten (oppidum Bertunensium), goes back to *Gregory of Tours, Liber in gloria martyrum 61 (MGH [SRM] /2, 530). The excavations at Xanten in a necropolis of the 4th c. have brought to light the skeletons of two men who died violently, between roughly 30 and 40 years of age, whose burial would have been, acc. to the coins found inside, between 346 and 350; whether the two were soldiers executed legally because of their faith or rather fallen in a riot cannot be determined. The memory of the place of their burial was in any case preserved, as shown by a memoria with a mensa, placed on their tombs a little after 383–388. After the destruction of the memoria in the middle of the 5th c. because of a fire, a hall 7.7 x 5.5 m (25.3 x 18 ft) was built, leveling the space surrounding the two tombs, with attendant destruction of various sepulchers around it (Th. Otten, Die Ausgrabungen unter St. Viktor zu Xanten, Mainz 2003). In later legends all these episodes of martyrdom were linked to the fate of the *Theban legion, about which the Passio Acaunensium martyrum of the bishop *Eucherius (d. ca. 450) (MGH [SRM] 3, 20-41) informs us. Probably a legend of Eastern origin, which spoke of the martyrdom of soldiers of a Theban legion, it was brought to the West and linked with the discovery of local relics, perhaps following the episode of *Gervasius and Protasius at *Milan. The legendary character of the story, as well as the gaps in the archaeological research, do not at all exclude the martyrdom of the soldiers; rather, a particular attention could have been turned toward the Christians in the Roman army that *Constantius Chlorus, Caesar of the West, did not pay the civil population (D. van Berchem, Le martyre de la Légion Thébaine, Basel 1956; J. Helgeland, Christians and the Roman Army from Marcus Aurelius to Constantine: ANRW II, 23.1 [1979] 774-777).

II. Christian topography in the 4th-7th c. To the S and W of the Danube and Rhine there were already Christians in various places in the 3rd c. Even in the Agri Decumates their presence should not be excluded categorically, even if no historic value can be attributed to the testimony of *Sozomen, HE II, 6,1 (GCS 50, 58; SC 306, 254), acc. to which "tribes from both shores of the Rhine passed over to the Christian faith" already before Constantine, or to the observation of Arnobius, Adv. nat. I, 16 (CSEL 4, 12) on the spread of Christianity in the tribe of the Alamanni. Only after the Edict of Constantine, when the church, within a framework of ever more pro-Christian legislation, was able to develop its organization and send missionaries to more distant regions, does evidence of Christians multiply. The communities remained largely outside the *Arian disorders. *Paganism, however, did not disappear quickly; the cult of the temples, the sanctuaries of Mithras and of Isis, and esp. the places of worship of the indigenous divinities, partially Romanized, survived in different places.

a. The most important city of the Diocletian Raetia II was Augusta (Augsburg), which under *Hadrian (117–138) was raised to a municipium. The presence of a first Christian community, attested by the uninterrupted veneration for Afra, has already been mentioned. There is no bishops' list from the Roman era, but there is mention, through more recent versions of the legend of the martyrdom of Afra, of a Zosimus (or Dionysius), who around 400 must have been bishop of Augusta. The sanctus Valentinus mentioned as bishop in Raetia in the biography of *Severinus of Noricum, edited by *Eugippius (41,1: CSEL 9/2, 58), concerns Passau rather than Augusta, from which he must have departed in the direction of Säben (Sabiona), before the invasion of the Alamanni. Monumental paleo-Christian remains are found only under the church of St. Stephen: a basilica with three aisles from the end of the 4th to the beginning of the 5th c.

Whether Regensburg (Regina Castra), whose church of St. George rises above a necropolis and dates to the 1st half of the 5th c., and Passau (Celt.: Boiodurum, Lat.: Batavis), which developed above two Roman castles, were then episcopal sees cannot be determined (Kleine deutsche Kirchengeschichte 14; Bauerreiss, 5-11, declares favorably). We have, however, at Regensburg a stone from a feminine burial of the end of the 4th c. with a christological *monogram and the inscription "martiribus sociatae," which suggest a burial retro sanctos (CIL III 5972; G. Waldherr, Martiribus sociata. Überlegungen zur "ältesten" christlichen Inschrift Rätiens, in K. Dietz [ed.], Klassisches Altertum, Spätantike und frühes Christentum. Festschrift A. Lippold, Würzburg 1993, 553-577), and from the 16th c. a report of a bishop named Lupus hypothetically martyred ca. 490.

For Passau the Vita Severini of Eugippius (22,5: CSEL 9/2, 41) attests a baptistery, and under the church of the monastery of Holy Cross was excavated a building with single aisle 21 m (69 ft) in length, probably datable to the paleo-Christian period (R. Christlein, Die Ausgrabungen unter der Klosterkirche Hl. Kreuz zu Passau: Mitteilungen der Freunde der bayerischen Vor- und Frühgeschichte 11, Mai 1979). For the castle Boiotro (Beiderwies) on the other side of the Inn River (belonging to the province Noricum ripense), the Vita Severini 22,1 (CSEL 9/2, 39) speaks of a monastery founded by Severinus and of a martyrial church. In fact, the excavations there discovered a small church with narthex and apse under the church of St. Severinus, which contained a paleo-Christian reliquary (W. Sage, Die Ausgrabungen in der Severinskirche zu Passau-Innstadt 1976: Ostbairische Grenzmarken 21 [1979] 5-48; R. Christlein, Das spätrömische Kastell Boiotro zu Passau-Innstadt, in J. Werner - E. Ewig [eds.], Von der Spätantike zum frühen Mittelalter, Sigmaringen 1979, 91-123; Severin zwischen Römerzeit und Völkerwanderung. Katalog, Linz 1982).

In the castle Quintanis (Künzing) on the Danube between Passau and Regensburg, Eugippius (Vita Severini 15-16; 24,2: CSEL 9/2, 32-3; 42) mentions priests, deacons, a subdeacon, *doorkeepers and porters and a church built outside the castle. On the ridge of S. Lorenz in the district of Schongau near Epfach (Abodiacum) a church building has been found with an apse of 15.50 x 9.50 m (50.9 x 31.2 ft) which, acc. to the coins found there, should be dated to between 364 and 394. A terracotta lamp of the 4th c. with Christogram confirms the existence of a paleo-Christian community (G. Pohl, Die Ausgrabungen auf dem Lorenzberg bei Epfach, Mainz 1975).

b. The capital of the province Belgica I was *Trier, of which rich historic information and numerous monuments have been preserved. Although an extensive mission into the rural zones cannot be supposed before the conversion of *Clovis in 498–499, the bishop Maximinus sent Castor and Lubentius as missionaries to the Roman forts built along the principal roads (N. Kyll, Die Einführung des Christentums bei der Landbevölkerung des Trierer Landes: Pastor Bonus 48 [1937] 245-249). Even though the bishops Nicetius and Magnentius continued this missionary effort in the 6th c., relatively few monumental remains have been conserved.

In the S cemetery of Bitburg (Castellum Bedonis) tombs starting from the end of the 6th c. have been found, and among these also the church of S. Maria, perhaps dated to the Late Antique period (K.-H. Gilles, Zur spätrömischen und frühmittelalterlichen Topographie von Bitburg und Neumagen: Trierer Zeitschrift 45 [1982] 293-308). In Fort Pachten, S of Trier, an inscription indicates the existence of a paleo-Christian church. The church of S. Maurice at Tholey, situated near the road between Metz and Mainz, should be dated to the end of the 6th c. In addition, at Neumagen (Noviomagus Treverorum) a Christian funeral inscription suggests the existence of an antique Christian community (already in the 2nd half of the 4th c.?; F.X. Kraus, Die christlichen Inschriften der Rheinlande, Freiburg 1890, no. 73). Saint Castor took up residence as a hermit at Karden (Cartadomus) and is said to have built a church dedicated to the Madonna, near or in which he was buried. For Potentius and his sons Felicius and Simplicius, missionaries sent by the bishop Maximinus, a memorial ecclesiola was supposedly built. In fact, in the funeral area surrounding the church of S. Maria, the remains of a Late Antique hall have been excavated (J. Wagner, Zur Siedlungsgeschichte des mittleren Mosellandes durch die ersten christlichen Glaubensboten: Pastor Bonus 48 [1937] 350-358; F. Pauly, Das Stift St. Kastor in Karden an der Mosel, Berlin 1986; L. Schwinden, Zu den frühchristlichen Inschriften von Karden an der Mosel: Trierer Zeitschrift 54 [1991] 267-274). It cannot be determined whether the church St. Martin at Münstermaifeld was built by the bishop Magnerich (after 561) or by Modoald (after 626). Cruciform burial stones are found also at Moselkern, Nittel, Nickenich, Ochtendung, Plaid, Lehmen and Mayen.

c. The information regarding the German territory of the province Germania I are rather more scarce. It should be added that the metropolis of Mainz (Moguntiacum) and other cities that were episcopal sees, such as Strasbourg (Argentorate), Speyer (Noviomagus) and Worms (Civitas Vangionum, later Borbetomagus), suffered gravely through the invasions of the Germans who crossed the Rhine after the limes were no longer defended. *Ammianus Marcellinus (21,10,1-2) informs us of the raid of Rando, the prince of the Alamanni, at Mainz in 368, perhaps on Easter Day, the surveillance being less strict on this day: this suggests that, at the middle of the 4th c., the Christian community of this city was very conspicuous. Jerome recounts other tribulations suffered at the beginning of the 5th c. (Ep. 123,16; CSEL 56, 93-4). The lists of bishops that have reached us from the other cities mentioned are uncertain and incomplete. The names of the first bishops of Mainz (Mar[t]inus), Speyer (Iessis), Worms (Victor) and Strasbourg (Amandus) are known through their participation in a synod at Cologne (346), and nevertheless their historicity is doubtful (Concilia Galliae 314–506: CCL 148, 27-29). For Mainz, the bishops Aureus, Maximus and Sophronius are also mentioned; with Sidonius, in the 6th c., the reconstruction of the city began under Frankish dominion.

Archaeological finds are also scarce. Around 25

funeral inscriptions of the 4th-6th c.—the great majority from the area around St. Alban—attest the continuity of a Christian population not only for Mainz but also for Bingen, Boppard, Wiesbaden and Worms, from which, even if only incomplete information can be gathered on the density and social composition of the Christian population, some light can nevertheless be cast on the transformation of the political class, thanks to the replacement of Roman names with Germanic ones.

In the area of the E cemetery of Mainz, which goes back to the 1st c., a cemeterial church (29.6 x 14.6 m [97.1 x 47.9 ft]) was built probably in the 5th-6th c., which should date to the era of the death of the priest Albanus, likely in the course of an Alamannic incursion in 406.

The ancient cathedral of Mainz, not datable archaeologically, has been conjecturally located in the present (Protestant) church of St. John. This is probably in the location of St. Martin (ancient), near which, acc. to Venantius Fortunatus (Carmen IX, 9: MGH [AA] 4/1, 215-6), the bishop Sidonius built the ancient baptismal church of St. John. The dedication to St. Martin suggests a date not earlier than the end of the 5th c., when his veneration began to spread.

From Worms and from Speyer there are no known paleo-Christian remains. Traces of paleo-Christian churches have been found, however, in the Roman forts of Alzey (between 357 and 370), Kreuznach, Boppard (Boudobriga; a church of 33 x 9 m [108.3 x 29.5 ft], built next to a pool, with sanctuary and baptismal font; perhaps not earlier than the 6th c.), and Koblenz (Confluentes) (after 406). Also at Kobern/Gondorf funeral inscriptions attest a Late Antique Christian population (M. Schulze-Dörlamm, Die spätrömischen und frühmittelalterlichen Gräberfelder von Gondorf, Stuttgart 1990).

d. The capital and ecclesiastical center of Germania inferior was *Cologne. Not much is known of the other episcopal sees of Germania II. The Notitia Galliarum and the other sources only know Tongeren (Atuatuca). Among the bishops of Tongeren, beyond the claimed founder Maternus, there are historic mentions of a Servatius, also present at *Serdica in 342–343. It should not be excluded that also the important center Xanten (Colonia Ulpia Traiana) was—even if only temporarily—an episcopal see. Few other remains of churches of the Roman era in the vast Low Germanic area are worthy of note, beyond the already mentioned memoria dedicated to the martyrs at Xanten.

At Bonn (Castrum Bonna) two locations of possible paleo-Christian worship have been discovered. Beneath the crypt of the Münster, a Roman cemetery was present, in which a small cult edifice was built in the 4th c. Excavations discovered a room of 13.77 x 8.8 m (45.2 x 28.9 ft), built above a cella memoriae of 3.55 x 2.55 m (11.6 x 8.4 ft) furnished with a walled bench along three walls and two tables. For structural reasons it was not possible to excavate below the cella to determine if a tomb was being venerated. Terminus post quem of the building are the years from 260 to 300. The second religious building was found below the Dietkirche (St. Peter), about 1 km (.6 mi) N of the cella, in the legionary camp. The remains are preserved of a church of ca. 20 x 10 m (65.6 x 32.8 ft), going back to the 4th c., which for some would have been an oratory, for others even the parish or episcopal church of Bonn.

At Aachen (Aquae Granni) various funeral stones attest the existence of a Christian cemetery in the 5th c. (H. Cüppers, Aquae Granni. Beiträge zur Archäologie von Aachen, Cologne 1982). At Remagen (Rigomagus), fragments of an enclosure adorned with a Christogram have been discovered, which indicate the existence of a church, as well as the funerary inscription of Meteriola of the 5th c. (H. Hemgesberg, Die ersten Remagener Kirchen im Lichte eines früchristlichen Schrankenfragments: Annalen des hist. Vereins vom Niederrhein 189 [1986] 9-34; Id., Die frühchristliche Meteriola-Inschrift aus Remagen: Bonner Jahrbücher 186 [1986] 299-314). At Neuss (Novaesium) a rectangular room from 400–450 was discovered under the crypt of St. *Quirinus, without however any hint of its function (H. Borger, Bemerkungen zur Frühgeschichte der Stadt Neuss im Mittelalter: Das Rheinische Landesmuseum, Bonn 1969, 29-31).

III. Migration of peoples and continuity of the church. The very fact that only the list of bishops of Trier has reached us complete, while the others show serious gaps in the 4th-6th c., shows how precarious the Roman dominion was over the territory of the Rhine and the Danube. Raetia was the first to fall. After repeated attempts, the Alamanni in 260 finally broke down the limes and invaded the Agri Decumates. Toward the middle of the 4th c., the threat also hung over the confines of the Rhine (351: temporary incursion in the territory on the left bank of the Rhine, from Basil to Mainz; 368: raid against the inhabitants of Mainz gathered in the church), but the Romans succeeded in expelling the assailants; in 406 the Rhine borders were further weakened by the invasion of the Alans and Vandals, with whom the Alamanni joined; in 407 the Burgundians followed, chased out in their turn by Huns. In 440 Mainz was destroyed; in 455 much of Maxima Se- quanorum (Alsace, part of German Switzerland) and of Raetia (territory of Augusta) were already in the hands of Alamanni.

At the beginning of the 5th c. the Franks pressed on the Rhine. Already in 420 Trier fell for a brief time into their hands. A little later they occupied Cologne. The Salian Franks headed for Brabant, pushing along the Somme to the Seine and the Loire, and putting an end in 486 to what had remained of the Roman Empire under *Syagrius. The Ripuarian Franks invaded the upper basin of the Meuse and the Moselle and broke out toward the S up to the territory of Worms and Speyer, where they confronted the Alamanni. The decisive battle between the two Germanic peoples in 496 was fundamental for the later development of the church. It was won by the Frank Clovis, whose baptism into the Nicene faith followed, administered on Christmas Day of 498 or 499 by Bishop Remy of Reims.

The fate of the Christian communities in the period that runs from the dismantling of the Roman administration and the successive withdrawal of the Roman troops until the reconstruction of the ecclesiastical organization, now under Germanic, esp. Frankish, domination, cannot be clearly delineated; a variety of situations arose. The transfer of the Rhaetian episcopal sees from Windisch, beyond Kaiseraugust-Basilea, toward Lausanne suggests a retreat before Germanic pressure. The transfer of the bishopric of Tongeren, for which a bishop is attested again around 500, to Maastricht, before 535, could be attributed to the fact that the *evangelization of the Franks, after the baptism of Clovis, proceeded slowly, so that the ecclesiastical center in Germania II needed to be located in a territory with a more pronounced support within the Roman population. At Augusta it seems that the series of bishops was interrupted in the 5th c. to be renewed by the Frankish king Dagobert I (d. 639) only toward the beginning of 7th c. Visible gaps are found in the lists of the bishops of Cologne (400–after 650), Mainz (440–ca. 540), Strasbourg (ca. 360–mid 6th c.), Speyer and Worms (likewise of 150 years, starting from the middle of the 4th c.) so as to give the impression that the government of the Rhine dioceses was restricted, in that period, to Trier and W Sequania.

*Salvian of Marseille informs us about the destruction of the Rhine cities and the difficulties affecting the surviving Christian population (De gubern. Dei 6,13-15: CSEL 8, 145-150). Even if the Christian communities do not seem to have been completely destroyed, one observes nevertheless a drastic reduction of the influence of Christianity and a concomitant "repaganization," characterized by the renewal of Germanic religious practices in the territories on the left bank of the Rhine. A syncretism of pagan Roman cults with Germanic religious traditions and with surviving practices of Gallic-Celtic origin was created; typical for the Rhine area was the cult of the Matrons, for example.

The evangelization of the Germans took place slowly in the Frankish domains, after the conversion of Clovis. Childebert I (511–558), son of Clovis, forced the dominant class of property owners to suppress the pagan cults; at the same time the hermit St. Goar was evangelizing the middle Rhineland. Other hermits, such as Ingbert, Disibod and Wendelin, in the 2nd half of the 6th c., evangelized the territory of the Rhineland Palatinate. Their Germanic names show that the Frankish area was already beginning to play a role in the missionary activity. Nevertheless, Frankish Christianity gave the impetus to a vast expansion beyond the borders of the Romanized territory only in 7th c., in the footsteps of the monastic movement that had developed from the Irish-Scottish evangelization, which had conquered the nobility and the bishopric of the Merovingian kingdom. At the Synod of Paris of 614, Speyer, Worms and Strasbourg are newly represented by bishops now mostly of Frankish origin (Concilia Galliae 511–695: CCL 148A, 280-282). The Irish missionary *Colombanus and his companion Gallus encountered, even at the beginning of the 7th c., paganism deeply rooted in the territory of Alamanni. Nevertheless, the Pactus Alamanorum, the oldest Alamannic legal codex, transmitted from the 1st half of the 7th c., shows Christian influence. The bishopric of Augusta, in Raetia II, could be rebuilt with all likelihood only in the times of Dagobert, while the inner Swabian-Bavarian territory acquired a durable ecclesiastical organization only later, in the Carolingian era, through the efforts of St. Boniface.

IV. Vestiges of paleo-Christian art. Monumental testimonies are completely absent, other than the remains of the religious, which have already been discussed. The great majority of the objects of the minor arts (*statues, *mosaics, *sarcophagi, glassware, boxes, ironware, ivories, pyxes) come from the zones of Trier and Cologne. Naturally it cannot be determined with certainty if the recovered artifacts come, entirely or in part, from local workshops.

For the persons and places cited, see AB, ASS, BBKL, BHL, BS, DHGE, LCI, LMA, LTK, DNP, TRE passim.

L. Duchesne, Fastes, 3, Paris 1915; W. Neuss, Die Anfänge des

Christentums im Rheinlande, Bonn ²1933; L. Stamer, Kirchengeschichte der Pfalz bis zur Vollendung des Kaiserdomes in Speyer, Speyer 1936; R. Bauerreis, Kirchengeschichte Bayerns. I. Von den Anfängen bis zu den Ungarneinfällen, St. Ottilien 1949; H. Tüchle, Kirchengeschichte Schwabens, I, Stuttgart 1950; R. de Maeyer, Belgien: RAC 2 (1954) 118-125; F. Zoepfl, Das Bistum Augsburg und seine Bischöfe im Mittelalter, Munich-Augsburg 1955; E. Klebel, Zur Geschichte der christlichen Mission im schwäbischen Stammesgebiet: Zeitschr. für Württembergische Landesgeschichte 17 (1958) 145-218; E. Hegel, Die Rheinische Kirche in römischer und frühfränkischer Zeit. Das erste Jahrtausend, Textband I, Düsseldorf ²1963, 93-113; W. Boppert, Die frühchristlichen Inschriften des Mittelrheingebietes, Mainz 1971; Frühchristliche Zeugnisse im Einzugsgebiet von Rhein und Mosel, ed. Th.K. Kempf - W. Reusch, Trier 1965; W. Söltner, Die Bonner Ausgrabungen 1971: Das Rheinische Landesmuseum 6 (1971) 81-84; ANRW II 4-5, 2 (1975–1976); Rheinisches Landesmuseum Bonn. Führer durch die Sammlungen: Kunst und Altertum am Rhein 79, Cologne-Bonn 1977; H. v. Petrikovits, Germania (Romana): RAC 10 (1978) 548-654; Rheinische Geschichte, ed. F. Petri - G. Droege, vol. I,1: H. v. Petrikovits, Altertum, Düsseldorf 1978; K. Schäferdiek, Germanenmission: RAC 10 (1978) 492-548; J. Werner - E. Ewig (eds.), Von der Spätantike zum frühen Mittelalter, Sigmaringen 1979; N. Gauthier, L'évangélisation des pays de la Moselle. La province romaine de Première Belgique entre Antiquité et Moyen-Age (IIIᵉ-VIIIᵉ siècles), Paris 1980; Kleine deutsche Kirchengeschichte, ed. B. Kötting, Freiburg 1980, 9-25; P. Stockmeier, Die Vita Severini im Lichte der Archäologie: Oberösterreichische Heimatblätter 36 (1982) 16-27; J.G. Deckers, Neue Funde und Befunde zur Spätantike in den römischen Provinzen Raetia, Germania superior und Germania inferior sowie Belgica: Actes du Xᵉ Congrès International d'Archéologie Chrétienne II (Studi di Antichità Cristiana 37/2), Vatican City 1984, 59-70; K. Hausberger, Geschichte des Bistums Regensburg I, Regensburg 1989; M. Weidemann, Die kirchliche Organisation der Provinzen Belgica und Germania vom 4. bis zum 7. Jahrhundert: Willibrord, zijn wereld en zijn werk, ed. P. Bange - A.G. Weiler, Nijmegen 1990, 286-316; A. Angenendt, Das Frühmittelalter. Die abendländische Christenheit von 400 bis 900, Stuttgart 1990; E. Dassmann, Die Anfänge der Kirche in Deutschland von der Spätantike bis zur frühfränkischen Zeit, Stuttgart 1993; J. Kremer, Studien zum frühen Christentum in Niedergermanien, Bonn 1993; F. Brink, Die Anfänge des Christentums in Trier, Köln und Mainz: Trierer Zeitschrift 60 (1997) 229-254; Y. Freigang, Die Grabdenkmäler der gallo-römischen Kultur im Moselland: Jahrbuch des Röm.-German. Zentralmuseums Mainz 44/1 (1997) 277-440; E. Dassmann: Handbuch der Mainzer Kirchengeschichte I, ed. F. Jürgensmeier, Würzburg 2000, 19-86; N. Gauthier, Topographie chrétienne des cités de la Gaule des origines au milieu du VIIIᵉ siècle, XI. Province ecclésiastique de Mayence (Germania prima), Paris 2000; E. Dassmann, Augsburg: RAC, Suppl. 1 (2001) 693-718.

H.R. Drobner

GERMINIUS of Sirmium (d. ca. 374). Native to Cyzicus (Hellespont), in 351 he was elected bishop of *Sirmium, imperial residence, replacing the deposed *Photinus, and from then on he collaborated tightly with the pro-*Arian policy of *Valens of Mursa and *Ursacius of Singidunum: he was present both at the drawing up of the Sirmian Formula of 357 and at the Council of *Rimini (359). He had some sort of interaction with *Hilary and Eusebius of Vercelli who, coming back at different times from the East to the West, passed through Sirmium (361–363). On 13 January 366 he had a public discussion with the layman Heraclianus, of Nicene faith: on this occasion Germinius defended the Formula of Rimini and a theological position with pro-Arian tendencies, but demonstrated a great deal of moderation with regard to his rival. In the same year he reached the decision to abandon the Formula of Rimini in favor of one more decisively anti-Arian, despite its not being aligned with the Nicene Creed and therefore not containing the homoousios; on this occasion he rejected the protests of Valens and Ursacius.

CPL 655-657; Simonetti 590; Id., Osservazioni sull'"altercatio Heracliani cum Germinio": VChr 21 (1967) 39-58; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IVᵉ siècle (328–373), Rome 1996, passim; DHGE 20,984-985; D. Harrison Williams, Another Exception to Later Fourth-Century "Arian" Typologies. The Case of Germinius of Sirmium: JECS 4 (1996) 335-357.

M. Simonetti

GERONA. Archaeological evidence indicates the presence of Christianity starting from the 4th c. From the decretal of *Innocent I to the bishops present at the Council of *Toledo (400), we learn of the irregular consecration of a bishop of Huesca. In the year 517, while Frontinianus was bishop, a council was held there. The acts bear the signatures of seven bishops, including that of the metropolitan John of Tarragona, whose signature is in front of the others; it is presumed that he presided at the council. With the exception of Orontius, bishop of Granada (Iliberis), all the other bishops belonged to the province of *Tarragona. The council issued ten canons: four aimed at regulating liturgical matters, two concerning the discipline of *baptism and four directed to the clergy.

Mansilla, Geografía I, 156-158; Hfl-Lecl II, 2, 1029-1030; Palazzini 2, 116-117; Vives, Concilios, 39-41; Martínez Díez, Hispana IV, 283-290; Orlandís, Concilios 109-114; J. Boswell, The Council of Gerona of 517: Classical Folia 32 (1978) 131-134.

P. de Luis

GERONTIUS (ca. 395–ca. 480). A Palestinian monk, linked with *Melania the Younger, whose Vita he probably wrote (ca. 440; ed. D. Gorce, Vie de s. Mélanie: SC 90, Paris 1962). Later he became archimandrite of the *cenobites of *Palestine, but placed himself at the head of the resistance against the Council of *Chalcedon (cf. his adversary *Cyril of Scythopolis: ed. Schwartz, TU 49/2, index p. 261; and the *monophysite John Rufus, Plerophoria: PO 8, Paris 1912, and Vita Petri Iberici, ed. R. Raabe, Leipzig 1895). The reconciliation of the patriarch *Juvenal with his colleague *Elpidius and his protectress, the empress *Eudoxia, in 456, as likewise that of the patriarch *Martyrius with the dissidents, toward 479, left him impenitent in schism (L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980, 103–139).

BHG 1241; A. Giardina, Carità eversiva. Le donazioni di Melania la Giovane e gli equilibri della società tardoromana, in Studi Calderone, Messina 1986, II, 77-102; E.A. Clark, The Life of Melania the Younger. Introduction, Translation and Commentary, New York 1984; Id., Piety, Propaganda, and Politics in the Life of Melania the Younger: SP 18/2, 167-183; L. Patrick, Gérontios et la "Vie de sainte Mélanie," in Les personnages du roman grec, ed. B. Pouderon, Lyon 2001, 309-327.

J. Gribomont

GERONTIUS of Nicomedia (d. after 400/401). According to *Sozomen (HE VIII, 6) he was a deacon at *Milan during the episcopate of *Ambrose, whose order to remain temporarily withdrawn at home, in penitence, for having spread the story of a specter that had supposedly attacked him at night, he disobeyed by going to *Constantinople. There he acquired fame for his medical arts and was consecrated bishop of *Nicomedia in Bithynia. On hearing of this, Ambrose requested his deposition from the bishop of Constantinople *Nectarius, who did not succeed in this enterprise because of the opposition of the people. *John Chrysostom, having become bishop of Constantinople, deposed Gerontius in his voyage across *Asia Minor and did not yield to the popular manifestations of protest in response, whether at Nicomedia or Constantinople, but the deposition of Gerontius was one of the subjects of accusation turned against him in the Synod of the *Oak (Photius, Bibl., cod. 59).

DCB 2, 662; PCBE 1, 926.

A. Pollastri

GERVASIUS and PROTASIUS, martyrs (d. ca. 303). These Milanese martyrs were unknown until *Ambrose discovered their bodies 17 June 386 in the cemetery at the Porta di Vercelli, excavating in front of the chapel of Sts. *Nabor and Felix (Ep. 22,2: PL 16, 1020), where an urn was found with their remains, of which the memory had been lost; in the evening the remains were transferred to the basilica Fausta. On 19 June he had them solemnly transferred into the recently completed basilica at the Porta Romana (later: St. Ambrose), where they were placed under the altar (Ambr., Ep. 22). For the occasion Ambrose gave two sermons, one in the basilica Fausta and the other in the new church. This translatio served as a model for the introduction of relics into a newly built basilica, a practice incorporated into the rite for the dedication of churches. It was also at the origin of a series of discoveries and translations of saints in N Italy. The veneration of Sts. Gervasius and Protasius spread immediately throughout the West (*Ravenna, Brescia, *Rome, *Vienne, Rouen, Carmona, *Africa). In the ancient martyrologies—Mart. hier., Cal. Carth., Cal. di Carmona—their names appear on 19 June. Their Passion has no historic value.

DACL 6, 1232-1239; LTK² 6, 765; Cath 6, 1899; BS 6, 298-304; Vies des SS. 6, 308-310; BBKL 7, 1004-1007; V. Zangara, L'inventio dei corpi di Gervasio e Protasio: Augustinianum 21 (1981) 119-133; A. Isola, L'esegesi biblica del sermo 286 di Agostino: VetChr 23 (1986) 267-281; G. Nauroy, Le fouet et le miel. Le combat d'Ambroise en 386 contre l'arianisme milanais: RecAug 23 (1988) 5-86; J. den Boeft, Milaan 386. Protasius en Gervasius, in A. Hilhorst (ed.), De heiligenverering in de eerste eeuwen van het christendom, Nijmegen 1988, 167-177.

V. Saxer

GESTA APUD ZENOPHILUM. The MS of the Bibliothèque Nationale Parisinus 1711 preserves the proceedings of the trial that took place at *Cirta (and not at Thamugadi, *Numidia) on 8 December 320, brought by the deacon Nundinarius against his bishop, *Silvanus of Cirta, before the consular governor Zenophilus. The trial concerns struggles among *Donatists, during which the minutes were read of the confiscation of the goods and sacred books at Cirta, in accordance with the first edict, in 303, of *Diocletian's *persecution against the Christians. The edict imposed, among other things, the surrender of the holy books and the other sacred objects kept in churches (Acta Munati Felicis). Silvanus, still a deacon when he had surrendered the goods and books, was accused of having been elected bishop of Cirta after the persecution through misappropriations and violence. Connected with the Silvanus affair is the Protocol of Cirta, an account of a reunion, presided over by Secundus of Tigisis, on the occasion of the election of Silvanus, from which it is clear that all of those bishops had been traditores during the persecution. The document, beyond being useful for knowledge of the origins of Donatism, is very important for its information on the organization of a Christian community at the beginning of the 4th c. and for a slice of Christian life. Furthermore, the document was used a great deal by the *Catholics in the Donatist polemic, esp. by *Augustine (C. Cresc. 3,26,29; 3,27,30, and elsewhere).

CPL 244; CSEL 26, 185-197; P.W. Hooterp, Deux procès verbaux donatistes: ALMA 15 (1940) 39-112; S. Lancel, Les débuts du Donatisme. La date du "Protocole de Cirta" et l'élection épiscopale de Silvanus: REAug 25 (1979) 217-229; Y. Duval, Les Gesta apud Zenophilum et la "paix de Maxence" (Gesta f 22b): Ant. Tardive 3 (1995) 55-63; M.A. Tilley, The Bible in Christian North Africa, The Donatist Church, Minneapolis 1997; Y. Duval, Chrétiens d'Afrique à l'aube de la paix constantinienne. Les premiers échos de la grande persécution, Paris 2000 (rev.: Simonetti: RSLR 2002, 367-370).

A. Di Berardino

GESTA PURGATIONIS CAECILIANI ET FELICIS. This is a collection of documents compiled by a *Catholic between 330 and 347 that has reached us in a very incomplete state in a MS of the De schismate donatistarum of *Optatus of Milevis. It was used by him in his works. Its title is taken from the conclusion: Gesta purgationis Caeciliani episcopi et Felicis (CSEL 26, 216). The collection was used extensively on the Catholic side in the polemics with the Donatists. It intended, directly or indirectly, to defend the legitimacy of *Caecilian as bishop of Carthage. It can be divided into three parts.

The first consists of the Purgatio Caeciliani, which includes, in addition to the Gesta apud Zenophilum* (CSEL 26, 185-197), other documents to demonstrate the innocence of Caecilian. The tenor of these documents is known through references by Optatus, by *Augustine and by the conference of Carthage of 411 (Monceaux V, 269-70). The Gesta apud Zenophilum is the incomplete summary of the trial that took place at *Cirta on 8 December 320, brought by the deacon Nundinarius against his bishop, *Silvanus of Cirta, before the consularis of Numidia, Zenophilus, and it was at the beginning of the Purgatio Caeciliani. Although the trial was an internal affair for the Donatist movement, it was used a great deal by the Catholics in later polemics (e.g., Opt., De schism. I, 13-14; Aug., Ep. 43,6,7; 53,2,4; C. Cresc. III, 27,30-31; III, 28,32-3). Nundinarius presented to the consularis oral and written evidence against Silvanus, from which it appeared that the latter had been a traditor* in the *persecutions of 303, had been elected bishop in 304/305 by the rabble, had robbed the temple of Serapis and was a simoniac. The text throws a very sinister light on the origins of Donatism and its first protagonists. Also included are the original minutes of the search by Roman officials carried out in the church of Cirta in 303, acc. to the directives of the edict of *Diocletian.

The second part, very incomplete, concerns the Purgatio Felicis (CSEL 26, 197-204) with three documents: a letter of the proconsul Helianus, who, after the inquiry was complete, reported to the emperor Constantine on the innocence of Felix; a letter of the emperor to the proconsul Probianus; and finally the Acta purgationis Felicis, full of gaps, with reports of the trial hearings and references to earlier documents. In these the innocence of Felix is demonstrated with the sentence of 15 February 314.

The third part of the collection includes eight letters, most of which are from the emperor Constantine. This third part was probably added later to the original dossier.

CPL 244; CSEL 26, 185-216; L. Duchesne, Le dossier du Donatisme: MEFR Ant. 10 (1890) 589-650; Monceaux III, 93-102; IV, 210-239; V, 3-34, 269-274; Ch. Turner, Notes on the Anti-Donatist Dossier and on Optatus: JTS 27 (1926) 283-296; P.W. Hoogterp, Deux procès-verbaux donatistes: ALMA 15 (1940) 39-112; S. Lancel, Les débuts du Donatisme. La date du "Protocole de Cirta" et de l'élection épiscopale de Silvanus: REAug 25 (1979) 217-229; PCBE 1, 175-6; 1, 409-10; 1, 788-9; 1, 1078-1080; M.A. Tilley, The Bible in Christian North Africa, The Donatist Church, Minneapolis 1997; Y. Duval, Les Gesta apud Zenophilum et la "paix de Maxence" (Gesta f 22b): Ant. Tardive 3 (1995) 55-63; Y. Duval, Chrétiens d'Afrique à l'aube de la paix constantinienne. Les premiers échos de la grande persécution, Paris 2000.

A. Di Berardino

GESTURES (iconography). The examination of the gestures made by individual personages in a scene reveals a means of expression of fundamental importance for the figurative language of Christian art. Gestures, like attributes or the typology of clothing, contribute effectively to the understanding of the concepts meant to be expressed. For this reason we will indicate the most meaningful among them.

Dextrarum iunctio. This is the gesture of spouses, taken from classical art and repeated in Christian art. Sometimes, in the place of the Lord, there appears behind the Christian couple the image of Iuno Pronuba, a simple symbol of Concord once its attribute of divinity had been lost (Ws, 156).

Impositio manus or manuum. This can be interpreted as a sacred gesture to transmit supernatural powers or gifts or to perform miracles (e.g., scenes of the multiplication of bread or of baptism); but it could also be interpreted as a gesture of blessing (e.g., scenes of *Noah, Isaac or *Jacob), or of accusation (scenes of Susanna and the elders) (Ws, pls. 65,5; 211,2; Wp, pls. 14; 96; 196,1; 208).

Adlocutio and acclamatio. These gestures are expressed with the right arm extended and raised. The middle and index fingers are likewise extended. The thumb can be down. The hand can also be completely open, as it always is in gestures of acclamation (Ws, pls. 42,3; 154,4).

Manibus expansis. This gesture mostly indicates a state of beatitude. The figures are shown standing, with the arms and hands open and raised: their salvation has therefore already taken place, and a celestial life has begun for them. Such a gesture also indicates a praying person (Ws, pls. 178,2).

Veiled hands. Carrying or receiving something with veiled hands indicates a great deference with respect to those res sacrae that one is receiving or carrying (e.g., scenes of the traditio legis, or of the Elders offering chalices or crowns [Ws, pls. 121,2-4]). The gesture of the Elders in particular, with hands veiled and raised, also indicates homage and acclamation. The offering of crowns later also represents the symbol of martyrdom. (There are in addition numerous examples of the gesture of the imposition of crowns on the heads of the martyrs, as a recognition of their sacrifice, on the part of the Divinity, who in this case does not have veiled hands.)

Hand on the shoulder. If the gesture in question concerns a soldier, he is almost always placed within a representation of an arrest (e.g., scenes of the arrest of Peter; Ws, pl. 91).

Hand below the chin. This is the gesture of someone who is sad, thoughtful, afraid or seriously troubled (e.g., scenes of *Job afflicted by boils, or the "repose of Jonas"; Wp, pls. 6; 100).

Kneeling personages. People in this posture have the expression particular to the supplicant or someone performing an act of adoration (Wp, pl. 172,1).

In additon to the works of Wilpert—Ws; Wp; WMM (analytical index of the text at the entries: Act and Gesture)—L. De Bruyne, L'imposition des mains dans l'art chrétien ancien: RivAC 20 (1943) 113-114; Temi di iconografia paleocristiana, ed. and intr. by F. Bisconti, Vatican City 2000.

M. Cecchelli

GESTURES, LITURGICAL. "Jesus did not preach a false and absolute interiority. For him, gesture was never empty of meaning nor reprehensible. Authentically human and authentically Christian prayer is that in which both *body and *soul participate" (Th. Ohm, Jesus Christus, 209). With this attitude, Jesus adhered to the manner of prayer in the OT. The apostles preserved this attitude unchanged. Thus, in the NT we know of standing for *prayer, kneeling for prayer, lifting up the eyes, spreading the hands, prostration for adoration, listening to the Word of God while seated and a reader standing up to proclaim the Holy Scripture. The postapostolic era faithfully preserved this reverent and spiritually profound attitude in prayer and every other liturgical action. Certainly, excessive attention is not paid to this. Authenticity and sincerity of the exterior forms, which should be the expression of an interior and spiritual adoration of God, are emphasized.

In this regard, Tertullian, in one of the first treatises on posture in prayer, the De oratione (CSEL 20, 180-200; CCL 1, 257-274), criticizing exaggerations, observes: cum modestia et humilitate adorantes magis commendabimus deo preces nostras ne ipsis quidem manibus sublimius elevatis, sed temperate ac probe elatis, ne vultu quidem in audaciam erecto (ch. 17, p. 190). He gives instructions on the correct exterior attitude: de genu ponendo; one should pray kneeling, other than on the day of the Lord and for the whole time of the 50 days of *Easter (ch. 23, p. 196). Furthermore, omni die quis dubitet prosternere se deo vel prima saltem oratione qua lucem ingredimur? (ibid., p. 197). The custom established among the faithful is confirmed by the tradition. Thus, he accurately specifies in the De corona (CSEL 70, 153-188): Hanc si nulla scriptura determinavit, certe consuetudo corroboravit, quae sine dubio de traditione manavit (ch. 3, p. 157). Certain customs occurring in the course of the baptismal celebrations have a direct relationship with this tradition: it is not appropriate de geniculis adorare on the day of the Lord and in paschal time. And further: Ad omnem progressum atque promotum, ad omnem aditum et exitum, ad vestitum, ad calciatum, ad lavacra, ad mensas, ad lumina, ad cubilia, ad sedilia, quacumque nos conversatio exercet, frontem signaculo terimus (ch. 3, p. 158). "The way in which Tertullian places the sign of the cross within the heritage of the tradition of the church demonstrates that the gesture was not for him a tradition typical of Africa or of the Latin West, but, above all, an attitude of the popular Christian religiosity" (F.J. Dölger, JbAC, 1,12-13). The same is valid for posture in prayer, of which Tertullian says casually: Illuc sursum suspicientes christiani manibus expansis, quia innocuis, capite nudato, quia non erubescimus, . . . precantes sumus (Apol. 30, 4: CCL 1, 141).

We find an analogous situation in the East. *Clement of Alexandria strongly emphasizes, for his "gnostics," the interior attitude and spirituality; but he also prescribes "lifting the head and raising the hands toward Heaven," "standing" during the final public prayer pronounced out loud, in order to express in this way the yearning of all spiritual people toward the *Good and the Holy (Strom. VII, 40,1: GCS 17,30,19-25). On this issue *Origen is even more profound: in ecclesiasticis observationibus sunt nonnulla huiusmodi, quae omnibus quidem facere necesse est. . . . Nam quod v. gr. genua flectimus orantes et quod ex omnibus coeli plagis ad solam Orientis partem conversi orationem fundimus, non facile cuiquam puto ratione compertam. . . . Et omnia haec operta licet et velata portamus . . . , ut a magno pontifice atque eius filiis tradita et commendata suscepimus (In Num. hom. V, 1: GCS 30,26,14-24). In the De orat. he prescribes the necessity of genuflection when one accuses oneself of sins in the presence of God. The genuflection "at the name of Jesus" later grew common as an act of humiliation before God (31,3: GCS, Orig. II, 396,21-397,4). These gestures are in any case only occasional events: they demonstrate nevertheless in an impressive manner how much such exterior attitudes constitute a true and proper heritage of the believers' faith, even if they have not always been rightly understood.

The Apostolic Tradition offers a general overview, almost systematic, in the context of a treatment of ecclesiastical discipline. Normally one prays standing (ch. 25, Botte LQF 39, p. 65). Before the morning prayer it is necessary to wash one's hands (ch. 41, p. 88). At the third hour, if one is not at home, one may pray in silence: ora in corde tuo Deum (ibid., p. 90). The midnight prayer also should be preceded by the ablution of the hands: this is a prayer that should be recited together with one's wife. In this circumstance one makes a gesture with a sign of the cross and a bit of saliva: Per consignationem cum udo flatu et per manum sputum amplectens, corpus tuum . . . sanctificatum est (ibid., p. 94). After the mention of this infrequent and strange custom, we find an entire chapter (42, p. 98) de signo crucis: at any time it is good to sign one's forehead with the sign of the cross as a defense against the devil: frontem et oculos per manum consignantes (p. 100), to avoid damnation.

Between the 2nd and the 4th c. certain gestures spread widely, under the guidance of tradition, among pious habits. By these gestures the body, sanctified in the bath of *baptism and filled, through unction, with the *Holy Spirit, favors prayer, expressing the interior states of the soul, indeed supporting and strengthening them. The gaze turns toward heaven with the head; with the mouth one exchanges the holy *kiss of peace; the fingers of the hand effect a meaningful gesture in the sign of the cross; the hands are lifted up in prayer. One stands for prayer, kneels on determined days and in certain penitential occasions and for adoration. There is also a silent and vigilant prayer, which is done seated. In Ep. 130 ad Probam, Augustine, without dwelling for long on the meaning of exterior gestures, offers teachings on prayer (CSEL 44, 40-77; PL 33, 494-507). He speaks of ejaculatory prayers: crebras . . . orationes, sed eas tamen brevissimas et raptim quodam modo iaculatas (ch. 20, p. 62); plerumque hoc negotium plus gemitibus quam sermonibus agitur, plus fletu quam afflatu (pp. 62-63). Hoc tamen late patet, ut homo Christianus in qualibet tribulatione constitutus in hoc gemitus edat, in hoc lacrimas fundat (ch. 21, p. 64). In the conclusion he asks *Proba to pray for him and admonishes: in ieiuniis et vigiliis et omni castigatione corporis, qua plurimum adiuvatur oratio, facitat quoque vestrum quod poterit (ch. 31, p. 76).

That which has thus been handed down by the Fathers has remained alive in all the liturgical forms of the centuries. The Christian puts oneself before God, in front of the altar, with the hands raised, the eyes lifted up, kneeling during the supplications and during penitential time, decisively avoiding genuflections during the feasts and Eastertide, exchanging the kiss of peace, always ready to sign oneself with the cross to strengthen oneself against the attacks of the Evil One, and thereby to confess Jesus the Crucified and Risen. Though overly charged with ceremony in certain verses (M. Andrieu, Les Ordines Romani, II, Louvain 1960, 65-108; cf. J.A. Jungmann, Missarum Solemnia, Freiburg [5]1962, I, 96-97), the Ordo Romanus I offers a witness to this attitude of piety and devotion during liturgical functions.

Various entries in DACL 4, 2662-2670; 6, 1017-1021; 7, 391-413; LTK[3] 4, 536-537; RAC 8, 1134-1258 (passim); 10, 895-902; Th. Ohm, Jesus Christus und die Gebetsgebärde: Benedikt. Monatsschrift 23 (1947) 198-209; Id., Die Gebetsgebärden der Völker und das Christentum, Leiden 1948; F.J. Dölger, Beiträge zur Geschichte des Kreuzzeichens: JbAC 1 (1958) 5-19, with continuation in the following vols. from 2 to 10; H. Michalowicz, Ritus genuflexionis (proskynesis) in celebratione eucharistica Liturgiae Romanae primi millenii. Investigatio liturgica, Diss. S. Anselmo, Rome 1972; M. Paternoster, L'imposizione delle mani nella Chiesa primitiva: EphLit 91 (1977) 203-234; 332-349; B. Neunheuser, Les gestes de la prière à genoux et de la génuflexion dans les Églises de rite romain, in Gestes et paroles dans les diverses familles liturgiques, Rome 1978, 153-165; E. Fiala, L'imposition des mains come signe de la communication de l'Esprit Saint dans les rites latins, in Le Saint-Esprit dans la liturgie (Conférences Saint-Serge XVI[e] semaine d'études liturgiques Paris, 1-4 Juillet 1969), Rome 1977, 87-103; V. Saxer, "Il étendit les mains à l'heure de sa Passion." Le thème de l'orant/-te dans la littérature chrétienne des II[e] et III[e] siècles: Augustinianum 20 (1980) 335-365; C. Vogel, Handauflegung: RAC 13, 482-494; J.C. Schmitt, La raison des gestes dans l'Occident médiéval, Paris 1990; G. Freyburger - L. Pernot, Bibliographie analytique de la prière grecque et romaine (1898–1998), Turnhout 2000.

B. Neunheuser - P. de Navascués

GIFT. In Greco-Roman antiquity the exchange of gifts, an expression of mutual ties, occupied a place of prime importance in social life both public and private. By them, rulers and the rich demonstrated εὐεργεσία and liberalitas toward their subjects and clients. Equally important was the custom of making gifts on the occasion of great feasts (Saturnalia, New Year) or family events (birth, betrothal, marriage). During the first three centuries, and even later to some degree, Christians opposed these customs, judging them *pagan and connected with *idolatry (Tertull., Idol. 10,3; 13-14). According to Lactantius, there is no true benevolence other than *alms given to the needy (Inst. 6,11,26; cf. Ambr., Off. 2,25). The Constantinian era changed the situation here. Constantine and his family and others showed liberalitas also to the church and clergy, who didn't hesitate to accept it, although not without provoking bitter criticism, both pagan (*Ammianus Marcellinus against *Damasus) and Christian (*Jerome). At the same time there began in Christian circles the custom of exchanging letters on the great feasts, Easter and Christmas (see the correspondence of *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Basil and *Theodoret). Nonetheless, as in early times bishops recommended alms above all, connected with the *Eucharist and esp. with the major seasons of the liturgical year (*Lent, etc.) (Aug., Serm. 193,3). Also noteworthy is the exchange of eulogia, esp. in monastic settings. Two final observations will help us understand better the rather negative position toward these ancient customs. The requirement that the gift must express an inner openness to one's neighbor, not a do ut des, corresponds to the demands of the gospel (Mt 6:2ff., etc.). On the other hand, for Christians the true gift is that of the *Holy Spirit, which *God communicates to believers through the risen Christ, and by which he gives life to his church (see also *grace, *charisms).

RAC 10,685-703; H. Mürmel - O. Bayer, Gabe: RGG[4] 3, 445-446 (bibl.).

B. Studer

GILDAS the Wise (d. 570). The first *Celtic writer working in Latin after the abandonment of *Britain by the Romans. Born probably at the beginning of the 6th c. in W Britain, he passed most of his life there. He visited *Ireland and (although this is not completely certain) also *Rome and *Gaul, where he founded the monastery of Gildas-de-Rhuys. He died in 570. Under his name a brief penitential has reached us, Praefatio de paenitentia, and fragments of letters of disciplinary content. But his fundamental work is the De excidio Britanniae, written a little before 547. The work, which aims to show the reader the drama of Roman Britain, abandoned by the legions at the end of the 4th c. and successively devastated by Picts, Scots, Angles and Saxons, is divided into two parts: The first (chs. 3-26) tells the history of Britain from the origins until the invasions of the barbarians, finally defeated by Ambrose Aurelian near Mount Badon (beginning of the 6th c.). The second part (chs. 27-110) presents and reproves the vices of the Britons who, forgetful of the past calamities, have subverted and put aside every norm of *truth and *justice. The continual comparison with biblical paradigms serves to reveal the baseness of the Christianity of the Britons of his time. Gildas is not ignorant of letters: the very mixture of genres that is found in his works (history, epistolography, exhortation) can be explained in the context of a literary tradition that did not disdain combinations of this kind; and if his Latin is heavy, it also savors of an accurate elaboration.

CPL 1319-1324; PL 69, 329-392; MGH (AA) 13,25-85; B. Bischoff, Das Reisegebet des Gildas (Spätes siebentes Jahrhundert?): Anecdota Novissima: Texte des vierten bis sechzehnten Jahrhunderts, Stuttgart 1984, 154-161; BBKL II, 246-247; N.J. Higham, Old Light on the Dark Age Landscape. The Description of Britain in the De Excidio Britanniae of Gildas: Journal of Historical Geography 17 (1991) 363-372; N. Wright, "Gildas" Reading. A Survey: SE 32 (1991) 121-162; Patrologia IV, 436-439.

M. Simonetti

GILDO (d. 398). Son of Nubel, a powerful chieftain of the Kabyles of *Mauretania Caesariensis, and brother of Firmus, who rebelled in 372 against the Roman authorities. Gildo, however, served the Romans with honor against his brother (Amm. Marc., Rerum gestarum libri XXIX, 5,6 e 21.24). He was rewarded with the nomination as comes et magister utriusque militiae per Africam in 386 (CTh IX, 7,9 of 30 December 393, for the title). He gradually grew disappointed with regard to *Theodosius I, and did not send him aid during the revolt of *Eugenius (392–394). He had by this point become a supporter of the *Donatists and formed a solid friendship with the Donatist bishop *Optatus of Thamugadi (Aug., C. epist. Parmeniani II, 4,8; 15,34; C. litteras Petiliani II, 92,209; 101,232; Ep. 87,5). In the autumn of 397 he revolted against the Western government and proclaimed his fidelity to that of the East, but was defeated and killed by an army led by his brother Mascezel, whose son Gildo had assassinated; his ally the bishop Optatus was also executed with him (Oros., VII, 36,4-11; Prosp. of Aq., Epit. Chr. sub anno 398; Claud., De bello Gildonico). Gildo possessed enormous properties in N Africa, so large that at his death a special commissioner was named to take care of them (Notit. Dig. occ. XII, 5. Cf. CTh VII, 8,7 [June 400], IX, 42,16 [December 399] and 19 [April 405]). His family, however, maintained links with the Roman aristocracy; thus his daughter Salvinia (Jer., Ep. 123,17) married *Nebridius, nephew of the empress *Flaccilla (Jer., Ep. 70). Gildo was a powerful and unscrupulous indigenous chieftain, whose ambitions, had they been realized, could have led to results of great importance for the destinies of Donatism and Catholicism in N Africa.

The sources are those indicated in the article; O. Seeck, Gildus: PWK 7 (1910) 1360-1363; PLRE 1,395-396; W.H.C. Frend, The Donatist Church, Oxford ²1971, ch. 4; PCBE I, 539; P. Langa, La rebelión de Gildon, in Notas complementarias, BAC 32, Madrid 1988, 862-863.

W.H.C. Frend

GIRK' T'GHT'OTS' (The Book of Letters). An extensive medieval Armenian collection of works primarily of dogmatic character, of notable historical and textual interest. Until now it has been studied and translated in a very partial manner, yet despite the insufficiencies of the first edition, it has not yet been replaced.

Girkʿ tŁėtʿocʿ [Book of Letters] (Sahak Mesropean Matenadaran 5), Tʿiflis 1901; M. Tallon, Livre des lettres (Girk tʿltʿoç / Ier groupe. Documents concernant les relations avec les grecs: Mélanges de l'Université Saint Joseph 32,1 (1955) 1-146; L. Frivold, The Incarnation. A Study of the Doctrine of the Incarnation in the Armenian Church in the 5th and 6th Centuries According to the Book of Letters, Oslo 1981; S.S. Arevšatyan, Le "Livre des êtres" et la question de l'appartenance de deux lettres dogmatiques anciennes: Revue des études Arméniennes n.s. 18 (1984) 23-32; M.G. Grigorian [Grigorean], Apołinarean hatakotorkʿ hay astowacabanakan grakanowtʿean mej [Fragments of Apollinaris in Armenian theological literature]: HA 101 (1987) 243-277; N. Garsoïan, L'Église arménienne et le grand schisme d'Orient (CSCO 574, subs. 100), Louvain 1999, 412-583; A. Schmidt, Das armenische "Buch der Briefe." Seine Bedeutung als quellenkundliche Sammlung für die christologischen Streitigkeiten in Armenien im 6./7. Jh., in Logos. Festschrift für Luise Abramowski zum 8. Juli 1993, ed. H.C. Brennecke . . . (BZNW 67), Berlin-New York 1993, 511-533 (526ff., structure of the Tiflis ed.).

S.J. Voicu

GLORIA. Beyond the meanings of celebrity, fame, honor, the word gloria, in patristic Latin, took on, through its Greek equivalent δόξα, the biblical sense of manifestation of the divine power (kabod), of acknowledgment of *God on the part of human beings and of *eschatological salvation communicated by the risen Christ. It is notable, however, that the Latins translated δόξα—ignoring, incidentally, the meaning of "opinion"—not only with gloria, but also with maiestas, claritas and honor. Given the importance of the biblical theme of gloria, it is not surprising that it occupies a considerable place in Latin theology (*Hilary, *Ambrose) and *liturgy.

M. Steinheimer, Die δόξα τοῦ θεοῦ in der römischen Liturgie, Munich 1951; A.J. Vermeulen, The Semantic Development of Gloria in Early-Christian Latin, Nijmegen 1956; A. Fierro, Sobre la Gloria en San Hilario, Rome 1964; B. Studer, Gott und unsere Erlösung im Glauben der Alten Kirche, Düsseldorf 1985, passim.

B. Studer

GLORIA IN EXCELSIS DEO. Composed in the manner of the psalms, this work belongs to the most ancient *liturgical forms. It opens with the song of the angels at the annunciation of the birth of Christ to the shepherds (Lk 2:14). Acclamations to *God follow, closed with an indication of his glory and his omnipotence. This first part is directed to the Father and constitutes the oldest part of the hymn. The second part passes from praise to supplication and is directed to the Son: the allusions to Christ, only-begotten of the Father, to his redemption, to his glory (seated at the right hand of the Father), show an insistence that underlines the indubitable influences of an opposition to contemporary and erroneous christological theories, above all *Arian. The hymn has reached us in two redactions: one, in the so-called Codex Alexandrinus (A), is thought to be older and more authentic; the other, included in the Constitutiones Apostolicae (C), reveals interpolations from a hand not always orthodox. There is no mention, in the adopted form, of the *Holy Spirit: the third Person, however, was explicitly called upon in the conclusion of the first part (cod. A): Domine Fili unigenite et Sancte Spiritus.

DACL 6,1528-1540; RAC 11,196-225; LTK³ 4,751-752; B. Capelle, Le texte du "Gloria in excelsis": RHE 44 (1949) 439-457; W. Stapelmann, Der Hymnus angelicus. Geschichte und Erklärung des Gloria, Heidelberg 1948; EC 6,868-869; ODC 681-682.

L. Dattrino

GLOSS – GLOSSARY. Initially a gloss indicate that an explanation for an obscure word was needed; later it indicated the explanation itself. Aristotle used it in the latter sense, specifying that it is a very ancient method of teaching (Rhet. III, 3,2). Glossary was also applied to the collections of words explained; and glossators, the authors who compiled the glossaries. The habit of glossing texts and laws dates back to Alexander the Great and continued throughout the entire Middle Ages, with the exception of the Justinian period, when any commentary on the imperial laws was forbidden. In Late Antiquity and the early Middle Ages the custom spread of gathering the commentaries of different authors on biblical or legal terms, creating the so-called catenae, which rise to major importance for following the development of ideas or for reconstructing partially lost texts. The most frequently glossed books are the Bible, the Corpus iuris civilis or the Corpus iuris canonici.

The biblical glossary gave rise to the singular phenomena known by the name of glossa ordinaria (= a continuous commentary on the whole Bible put in the side margins of the text) (cf. PL 113-114) and of glossa interlinearis (= short explanatory notes put between the lines of the text). The most important kinds of glosses are the corrective, intended to rectify readings held to be inexact or difficult; explicative, aimed at explaining little-known or archaic terms; integrative, trying to complete a text missing one or more words. The oldest glossary is that of *Hesychius of Alexandria (5th-6th c.), who wrote a vast Greek philological lexicon of the classical authors and of dialectic, taking the most important material from Diogenianus of Heraclea or from Apollonius Sophist of the era of Hadrian and from various collections of sayings. Biblical glosses were introduced into the glossary before the 8th c. Other glossaries were compiled by *Theodoret, *Photius, Ecumenius, Zonara and *Suidas (ca. 976).

In the Western Middle Ages, biblical commentaries known as "the glossary" are attributed to Anselm of Laon (1050–1117) and to his school. Among the disciples and collaborators of Anselm there was the magister Gilbertus Universalis, who glossed a good number of biblical texts in continuous form; some were widespread; Peter Lombard enriched the glossary of Anselm of Laon. In this period the glossaries were called "glossaria magna"; that of Peter Lombard, "glossaria media"; that of Gilbert and that of Anselm, "glossaria parva." From 1180 each gloss was signaled with a symbol. *Isidore of Seville, in his 20 books of the Etymologies, had elaborated a theological-alphabetical glossary. The glosses to civil and canon law took the form of scholia, the most important of which are the commentaries on the Libri Basilicorum. Famous glossators of the Corpus iuris civilis were the Bolognese jurists, with Pepo and his school at their head. A similar path was taken by the canonists who glossed the Decretum of *Gratian and then the Decretales, and were called decretists and decretalists. In the legal field the glosses tended to resolve the problems that were posed by laws contrasting with one other (quaestiones; solutiones contrariorum), relying on parallel texts; they also served to mark the difference between the legal sources and traditions.

EI 17, 427-429; EC 6, 870-873; Enc. della Bibbia, Turin 1970, 3, 1305-1307; B. Smalley, Lo studio della Bibbia nel Medioevo, Bologna 1972, 85-107; H. de Lubac, Exégèse médiévale, Paris 1959–1964, passim; E. Bertola, La Glossa ordinaria biblica ed i suoi problemi: Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 45 (1978) 34-78; R. Wielcockx, Autour de la Glossa ordinaria: Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 49 (1982) 222-228; TRE 13, 452-457; R. Weigand, Die Glossen zum Dekret Gratians. Studien zu den frühen Glossen und Glossenkompositionen, Rome 1991.

E. Peretto

GLOSSA PSALMORUM. A kind of Latin catena* on the *Psalms, published by H. Boese, in which every verse includes a short commentary, of unknown author and a 7th-c. context, since it refers to the Regula Benedicti and *Gregory the Great is cited (Boese, 1982, 66-67). The terminology indicates a monastic provenance. The text is transmitted by eleven codices, a sign of its dissemination, but in only one is the title found: Incipiunt glose psalmorum ex traditione seniorum. The oldest witness is a fragment of the beginning of the 8th c., and the author might be a certain Iohannes Romanus Diaconus. The text of the Psalms is an important witness for the reconstruction of the Latin Psalter prior to *Jerome. The praefatio had already been published by De Bruyne and is found in numerous MSS. The compiler drew on multiple sources (ibid., 48-49), esp. and abundantly from the Enarrationes of St. *Augustine, but also from Jerome, *Hilary of Poitiers (for Psalm 118) and Gregory the Great. The author, in explaining individual verses, practices a simple *exegesis related to the demands of a monastic spirituality, even if he sometimes refers to a historical explanation, as he does, e.g., at Psalm 113.

CPL 1167c; Stegmüller 9165; 9900; 11193; H. Boese, Die alte "Glosa Psalmorum ex traditione seniorum." Untersuchungen, Materialien, Texte, Freiburg 1982 (ed. of about twenty psalms); Id., Anonymi glosa Psalmorum ex traditione seniorum, Teil I: Praefatio und Psalmen 1–100, Freiburg 1992 (for the observations on the ed., see J. Doignon: REL 71 [1993] 381-2); Teil II: Psalmen 101–150, Freiburg 1994.

A. Di Berardino

GNOSIS – GNOSTICISM. The term gnosis, from the Greek γνῶσις, indicates the "knowledge" of the divine mysteries, conceived in general as extremely elitist and present in different religious and philosophical directions, ancient and modern (M. Tardieu, Histoire du mot "gnostique," in Id. - J.D. Dubois, Introduction à la littérature gnostique, I, Paris 1986, 21-37). More circumscribed, however, is gnosticism (R.McL. Wilson, From Gnosis to Gnosticism, in Mélanges d'Histoire des Religions offerts à H.C. Puech, Paris 1974, 423-436; Gnosis and Gnosticism: Eighth International Conference on Patristic Studies: Oxford, Sept. 3-8 1979, ed. M. Krause, Leiden 1981, NHS 17), a religious phenomenon born probably in the 1st c. AD that flowered during the 2nd c., aimed at obtaining true knowledge of divine and human spiritual reality, on which our documentation, until the middle of the 20th c., was furnished essentially by Christian *heresiologists; today we make use also of the valuable Coptic texts of the library of *Nag Hammadi. For the designation, see M. Smith, The History of the Term "Gnosticism," in The Rediscovery of Gnosticism, II, ed. B. Layton, Leiden 1981, 796-807. A rich collection of the following indirect and direct sources was already furnished by W. Foerster, Die Gnosis. I. Die Zeugnisse der Kirchenväter, Zürich 1969, II. Koptische und mandäische Quellen, Zürich 1971, Eng. tr. Oxford 1972–1974. In Italian there is, e.g., Testi gnostici, ed. L. Moraldi, Turin 1982; M. Simonetti, Testi gnostici cristiani, Bari 1970; Id., Testi gnostici in lingua greca e latina, Vicenza 1993; Rome-Milan ³2001.

The very definition of gnosticism, given multiple times and in different ways in the history of the studies of this phenomenon, in particular at an important congress at Messina (Le origini dello Gnosticismo, Colloquio di Messina, 13-18 April 1966, Leiden 1967, ed. U. Bianchi: Studies in History of Religion 12), gave rise to many reflections, among which notable examples are those of N. Brox, Γνωστικοί als häresiologischer Terminus: ZNTW 57 (1966) 105-114; M.J. Edwards, Gnostics and the Valentinians in the Church Fathers: JTS 40 (1989) 26-47, or the studies of R.McL. Wilson, The Gnostic Problem, London 1958, ²1964; Id., Slippery Words, II: Gnosis, Gnostic, Gnosticism: Expository Times 89 (1978) 296-301; Id., Gnosis and Gnosticism. The Messina Definition, in Agathê elpis. Studi storico-religiosi in onore di U. Bianchi, ed. G. Sfameni Gasparro, Rome 1994, 539-551. Recently, in particular, gnosticism has been the subject of considerable debate that has questioned the legitimacy of the category of gnosticism itself. E.g., acc. to K.L. King (What Is Gnosticism? Cambridge, MA-London 2003), gnosticism would be a mere rhetorical term, originally intended to define orthodoxy by contrast, and confused with a historical entity; she, however, does not propose its abolition, favored by some, nor put it between quotation marks; she continues to employ the term, recalling however that in her opinion it is a modern category created on the model of the ancient heresiologists. In the 19th and 20th c. there were efforts to define gnosticism by determining its genealogy and fixing its essential characteristics. It is described as a Christian heresy in the accounts of the Fathers, such as *Irenaeus, whom we can consider the principal source, but also *Justin, *Clement, *Origen, *Tertullian, *Hippolytus, *Epiphanius. In particular many studies have been directed to the attestations and the polemic of Irenaeus, such as G. Vallée, A Study in Anti-Gnostic Polemics. Irenaeus, Hippolytus, and Epiphanius, Waterloo 1981; G. Filoramo, Antropologie in conflitto. Il caso di Ireneo e degli gnostici: Humanitas 1 (1996) 52-67; J. Holzhausen, Irenäus und die valentinianische Gnosis: VChr 55/4 (2001) 341-355; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Eretici e maghi in Ireneo. L'accusa di magia come strumento di polemica antignostica, in Munera amicitiae, ed. R. Barcellona - T. Sardella, Soveria Mannelli 2003, 471-472.

Already A. von Harnack, in Dogmengeschichte (1885), defined gnosticism, identified by him through a series of typical traits, as an "acute Hellenization of Christianity," with the application to the latter of *Platonic, Pythagorean and Stoic *philosophy. Hellenization in general had supposedly affected the *dogma and not the essence of Christianity, characterized by evangelical enthusiasm which Protestantism had recovered. Next, the school of history of religions brought, also through philology, linguistics and the historical and typological method and thanks to interest in the East, a notable contribution to the study of gnosticism, whose origins were traced no longer to a heretical Christianity, but rather to the pre-Christian Eastern religiosity. Gnosticism was followed from its presumed origins even up to the syncretistic developments, thanks also to the discoveries of gnostic, *Manichean and *Mandean texts. The qualification of *syncretism has in fact often been associated with gnosticism; see in particular A. Böhlig, Gnosis und Synkretismus, I-II, Tübingen 1989. R. Reitzenstein thought to reconstruct the myth of the Iranian gnostic Savior and traced Jesus' epithet Ναζωραῖος to the *Nazarenes, seen as ancient Mandeans. W. Bousset (Hauptprobleme der Gnosis, Göttingen 1907, ²1973) studied the πρῶτος ἄνθρωπος and δεύτερος θεός of gnosticism, of which he furnished a series of typological traits, as an "acute Easternization of Christianity," seen as pre-Christian, un-Hellenic and anti-Judaic, in reaction to which Catholicism supposedly defined itself; in contrast to Harnack, he put importance also on Christian theology and worship. R. Bultmann observed in the Johannine gospel a knowledge of gnosticism and criticism of it, and in its Logos an influence of the Wisdom of the OT and of Philo. He accepted the Iranian derivation of the myth of the Savior and showed how Christianity and gnosticism shared the conception of humanity's critical situation in the world, differing in identifying the cause: fate for gnosticism and *sin for Christianity. W. Bauer in Rechtgläubigkeit und Ketzerei im ältesten Christentum (1934) maintained that heresy, and in particular the gnostic one, should not be considered a secondary development of orthodoxy and that the origins of Christianity should not be read with the lenses of the latter ecclesiastical authors; he also dedicated special attention to the particular forms of Christianity that had developed, e.g., in *Egypt or at *Edessa.

In the same year, H. Jonas wrote vol. 1 of Gnosis und spätantiker Geist (titled Die Mythologische Gnosis, Göttingen 1934; vol. 2 would be Von der Mythologie zur mystischen Philosophie, Göttingen 1954; see Id., Lo Gnosticismo, It. tr. Turin 1973, ²1992). Jonas considered gnosticism in its originality and unity and in its context, not just as an assimilation of preceding ideas, nor as a Hellenization or Easternization of Christianity, but rather as independent. The characteristics of gnosticism acc. to Jonas were knowledge, dynamism and pathomorphic crisis, myth, cosmological *dualism, which includes a weakening of *ethics into *asceticism or libertinism, impiety and difficulty in understanding the incarnation and the cross, artificiality in creation of myths. This reconstruction has been subjected to various criticisms, e.g., by M. Waldstein, Hans Jonas' Construct 'Gnosticism'. Analysis and Critique: JECS 8 (2002) 341-372, and by King (What Is Gnosticism?). In addition, for Jonas, Christianity and gnosticism respond to the same situation without being interdependent: they are two species in the same genre. The new discoveries of sources esp. of Mandeans (fixed only to the 2nd-3rd c. AD, a date confirmed by E. Lupieri, I Mandei. Gli ultimi gnostici, Brescia 1993; Eng. tr. The Mandaeans. The Last Gnostics, Grand Rapids, MI 2001) do not support the thesis of a pre-Christian origin of gnosticism; even the pre-Christian myth of the Savior has been refuted by C. Colpe.

The contributions of the Coptic library of Nag Hammadi on the categories, origins and typology of gnosticism have been of inestimable value. King (What Is . . . ?, ch. 6) criticizes the classification of the texts of Nag Hammadi (on which there is an important essay Les textes de Nag Hammadi et le problème de leur classification, in Actes du colloque, Québec 15-19 septembre 1993, ed. L. Painchaud - A. Pasquier, Québec-Louvain-Paris 1995) into *Valentinian, *Sethian, *Hermetic (on the relations between gnosticism and hermeticism, see Gnosis and Hermeticism from Antiquity to Modern Times, ed. R. van den Broek - W.J. Hanegraaff, Albany 1997) and "Thomist," or connected with the tradition of the apostle *Thomas, from which classification Christian apocrypha escape, such as the Gospel of Mary and Gospel of the Savior or the Apocryphon of James, which belong to the corpus of the gnostic Christian apocrypha, and other Greek texts such as a passage from Plato, all included in the Coptic library. These documents, containing much Judaizing material, have led to supposing a Jewish origin of gnosticism already proposed by Friedländer; the relationship between gnosticism and Judaism has been investigated by R. Wilson, Jewish Gnosis and Gnostic Origins. A Survey: Hebrew Union College Annual 45 (1974) 179-189; Altes Testament-Frühjudentum-Gnosis, ed. K.W. Tröger, Gütersloh 1980; A. Magris, Riflessioni sul rapporto fra Giudaismo e Gnosticismo: Cassiodorus 1 (1995) 207-211; Id., Trasformazioni del modello biblico di Dio nello Gnosticismo: AnSE 12 (1995) 233-251; it is not for nothing that we also have Jewish sources on gnosticism: A. Segal, Two Powers in Heaven. Early Rabbinic Reports about Christianity and Gnosticism, Leiden 1977; B. Pearson, Jewish Sources in Gnostic Literature, in Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period, ed. M.A. Stone, Assen-Philadelphia 1984, 443-481. However, the Jewish gnostic texts that we possess are Christianized, and S. Petrément (Le Dieu séparé. Les origines du gnosticisme, Paris 1984; Eng. tr. San Francisco 1990) and A.H.B. Logan (Gnostic Truth and Christian Heresy, Edinburgh 1996), e.g., hypothesize a birth of gnosticism from Judaism through Christianity, and some, such as P. Perkins (Gnosticism and the New Testament, Minneapolis 1993), suppose a Samaritan origin, the possibility of which has been investigated also by J. Fossum (The Name of God and the Angel of the Lord. Samaritan and Jewish Concepts and the Origin of Gnosticism, Tübingen 1985).

For Jonas, gnosticism does not have proper origins, even if it has these antecedents. King (What Is . . . ?, ch. 7) holds that gnosticism does not have a single origin and is not monolithic, so that it is difficult to define it univocally, and tries to demonstrate, referring to many documents, how it is not possible to apply to all the gnostic texts in our possession, e.g., the three characteristics of gnosticism often defined as such: anticosmic dualism, incompatibility with ethics and the consequent ascetic or libertine escapes, and christological docetism. The positions of M.A. Williams appear more extreme (Rethinking Gnosticism. An Argument for Dismantling a Dubious Category, Princeton, NJ 1996), who tries to destroy the category of gnosticism itself, considered an invention of the ancient heresiologists and modern critics. Other scholars of gnosticism, on the other hand, such as Giulia Sfameni Gasparro, observe that similar attempts at deconstruction run into a hard knot of sources that are difficult to eliminate completely (e.g., G. Sfameni Gasparrro, Temi apocalittici nello Gnosticismo, in Millennium, ed. R. Uglione, Turin 2002, 101-141: 103-104; Id., Tempo della storia e tempo della salvezza nello Gnosticismo, in Theoretical Frameworks for the Study of Graeco-Roman Religions, Thessaloniki 2003, 171-207 n. 3).

Gnosticism is therefore a movement of sometimes elusive outlines, but it does not seem impossible to describe it at least in general lines, always remaining aware of its notable complexity both in the mythological variants of the various systems, traditionally divided into Valentinian, *Ophite and Sethian, and in their different positions on problems of ethics, *anthropology, *soteriology, which can be gleaned from direct and indirect sources. Furthermore, the multiple influences frequently exercised on different gnostic currents by Greek philosophy, above all Platonic, should also be kept in mind (on the relationships between gnosticism and late Platonism, see R.T. Wallis - J. Bregman, eds., Neoplatonism and Gnosticism, Albany 1992; J.D. Turner - R. Majercik, eds., Gnosticism and Later Platonism, Atlanta 2000; J.D. Turner, Sethian Gnosticism and the Platonic Tradition, Québec-Louvain-Paris 2001), but also by Jewish tradition, e.g., evident in many texts of Nag Hammadi. We have seen the relationship between gnosticism and Christianity discussed for some time and at length by critics. On this subject we can further mention some important studies such as that of G. Quispel, Gnosticism and the New Testament, in The Bible in Modern Scholarship, ed. J.P. Hyatt, Nashville, TN 1965, 252-271; R.M. Grant, Gnosticism and Early Christianity, New York ²1966; Id., Heresy and Criticism, Louisville-Westminster 1993; R. Wilson, Gnosis and the New Testament, Philadelphia 1968; Gnosis und Neues Testament, ed. K.W. Tröger, Berlin 1973; J. Magne, From Christianity to Gnosis and from Gnosis to Christianity, Atlanta 1993.

The image of gnosticism as a Christian heresy today appears rather reductive, because various gnostic texts of Nag Hammadi offer no trace of Christian influence. For some texts it has been suggested that Christianization occurred at a later date (cf. e.g., M. Krause, Das literarische Verhältnis des Eugnostosbriefes zur Sophia Jesu Christi, in Mullus. Festschrift Th. Klauser, Münster 1964, 215-223). There exist therefore both non-Christian gnostic writings, or only secondarily and superficially Christianized, and certainly Christian gnostic texts such as those typical of the gnosticism of *Basilides, of Valentinus and the Valentinians, aimed at *exegesis of the gospel and christological reflection, studied, e.g., by A. Orbe, Christlogía gnóstica, I-II, Madrid 1976; P. Perkins, The Gnostic Dialogue. The Early Church and the Christ of Gnosticism, New York 1980; Id., Logos Christologies in the Nag Hammadi Codices: VChr 35 (1981) 379-396; Id., Gnostic Christologies and the New Testament: CBQ 43 (1981) 590-606; Nag-Hammadi, Gnosticism and Early Christianity, ed. C.W. Hedrick - R. Hodgson, Peabody, MA 1986; D. Voorgang, Die Passion Jesu und Christi in der Gnosis, Frankfurt a.M. etc. 1991; and G. Sfameni Gasparro, Gesù il Christ nello Gnosticismo: Dizionario di spiritualità biblico-patristica 24, Rome 2000, 128-199. However, in particular for Valentinian gnosticism (already the specific object of the important studies of F. Sagnard, La gnose valentinienne et le témoignage de St. Irénée, Paris 1947; A. Orbe, Estudios Valentinianos, I-V, Rome 1955–1966; The Rediscovery of Gnosticism, ed. B. Layton, The Rediscovery of Gnosticism, I, The School of Valentinus, Leiden 1980; A. McGuire, Valentinus and the "Gnostikê Hairesis," Ph.D. Diss., Yale 1983; G. Quispel, The Original Doctrine of Valentinus the Gnostic: VChr 50 [1996] 327-352), the doubt, not unanimously received, regarding the actual gnosticism of Valentinus raised by C. Markschies (Valentinus Gnosticus? Tübingen 1992; Id., Nochmals. Valentinus und die Gnostikoi: VChr 51 [1997] 179-187; Valentinian Gnosticism, in The Nag-Hammadi Library After Fifty Years, ed. D. Turner - A. McGuire, Leiden 1997, 401-438) should be remembered, but see the observations of M. Simonetti (Valentinus Gnosticus: Cassiodorus 1 [1995] 197-205), and earlier of U. Bianchi (À propos de quelques discussions récentes sur la terminologie, la définition et la méthode de l'étude du gnosticisme, in Proceedings of the International Colloquium on Gnosticism, Stockholm 1973, Leiden 1977, 16-26). Also important are the investigations of M.J. Edwards, Gnostics and the Valentinians in the Church Fathers: JTS 40 (1989) 26-47; G. Quispel, Valentinus and the Gnostikoi: VChr 50 (1996) 327-352; F. Bermejo, La escisión imposible. Lectura del Gnosticismo Valentiniano, Salamanca 1998; A. Magris, L'escatologia valentiniana: AnSE 16 (1999) 133-139. The polemical aspect of gnosticism with respect to orthodox Christianity has been investigated by K. Koschorke, Die Polemik der Gnostiker gegen das kirchliche Christentum, Leiden 1978.

In gnosticism, knowledge, which is directly salvific, is revealed by a Savior—a complex and elusive figure, often intersecting with that of Jesus Christ and studied recently by A. Magris (Testi gnostici sulla vicenda del Salvatore: Fil&Teol 13 [1999] 84-99)—and transmitted by an esoteric tradition. For gnostic initiation, which is not called διδασκαλία, "instruction," by chance, generally consists in the revelation of a mythic account aimed at clarifying "who we are, what we have become; where we are, from where we have been precipitated; where we are headed, how we are purified; what generation is, what regeneration is" (Exc. ex Theod. 78,2). If, as has been seen, the historical origins of gnosticism are debated, it seems to be possible to trace the psychological and religious motivations to a condition of existential insecurity and malaise widespread in the 1st-2nd c. AD both in the pagan and in the Christian world, which in gnosticism expresses a sense of alienation and sometimes also aversion to the world, such that in the extreme gnostic expressions this is identified with *evil, from which gnostics, since they are pneumatics and not carnal beings, must flee. For their true home is the divine πλήρωμα (*pleroma), the fullness of divinity: the pneumatic beings are opposed to the hylics and psychic beings (see *psychici) and are indicated differently, by the Ophites and Sethians as the "sons of the Light" or the "race that does not waver," by Basilides as the "Third Filiation," and by Valentinus as "the church of the spiritual": for the Valentinian category of the "psychici," see M. Simonetti, Psyche e Psychikos nella gnosi valentiniana: RSLR 2 (1966) 1-47; as for the light, linked to the pneumatics, generally opposed to the darkness connected with matter, its symbolism is esp. important in gnosticism and has been studied by G. Filoramo (Luce e gnosi. Saggio sull' illuminazione nello Gnosticismo, Rome 1980).

The ontological dualism between the material principle and the spiritual one is a characteristic frequently present in gnostic texts. In general a cosmological dualism derives from it that is also reflected in the refusal of the unity of the principal divine creator, exactly contrary to Christianity and, still earlier, Judaism and the Greek tradition of the "cosmic god," as already *Plotinus observed (Enn. II, 9). Gnosticism tends on the contrary to identify two principal creators, one for the material world, often identified with the God of the OT, and another for the spiritual world, considered the true God, unknowable and ineffable, acc. to the principles of apophatic theology: this is an aspect particularly underlined in many texts, both of the direct and of the indirect tradition. For example, in Hippolytus (Ref. VII, 21,1), Basilides puts as the principle of everything a God "who does not exist," οὐκ ὤν, "free from thought, sensibility, will, etc." Starting from this totally transcendent divinity, the πλήρωμα, composed of *aeons, manifests itself (on which, most recently, see G. Zuntz, Αἰών in der Literatur der Kaiserzeit, Vienna 1992; G. Casadio, From Hellenistic Αἰών to Gnostic Αἰῶνες, in Religion im Wandel der Kosmologien, ed. D. Zeller, Bern 1999, 175-190; Id., s.v. Aion, in Encyclopedia of Religion, I², Detroit-New York 2005, 207-210).

The known God, distinct from the unknowable Father, appears androgynous, with a feminine component called from time to time Σιωπή, Πρόνοια, Ἔννοια, or, respectively, Silence, Providence, Thought, so that the reflection of this God on itself is generative and manifests its true reality (the feminine principles of gnosticism have been studied recently by K.L. King, Images of the Feminine in Gnosticism, Philadelphia 1988). This generative act has multiple successive developments: first the production of a son, named *Barbelo or Νοῦς, from the original couple, who manifests its image externally; then a series of emanations that constitute the πλήρωμα—conceived generally as circular—namely, the aeons, the last of which is Σοφία, Wisdom, to whom is attributed a sin variously configured as a presumptuous longing for knowledge, or desire for the Father, or will to imitate his productive activity (on the delineation of this mythic figure in the Coptic gnostic texts, see C. Scholten, Martyrium und Sophiamythos im Gnostizismus nach den Texten des N.H., Münster 1987). This sin, whatever it is, explains the origin of evil and, finally, the material world (G. Filoramo, Il tema della caduta nello gnosticismo: Annuario Filosofico 9 [1999] 95-110). For Wisdom, or one of her *hypostases—for the Valentinians Sophia Achamoth—is cut off from the pleromatic world, and the foundations are laid for the work of the Demiurge, often called Jaldabaoth, who creates the world from a preexisting matter, shadow, appearance and absence of being, inspired by models, the τύποι transmitted to him by Sophia Achamoth, acc. to the Valentinians of Irenaeus (Adv. haer. I, 5,3); he reigns over the entire universe with the seven archons who are identified with the seven planetary spheres and who were also created by him. On the gnostic conception of the archons, see I.S. Gilhus, The Nature of the Archons, Wiesbaden 1985.

The account of human creation as well is often inspired by the biblical narrative, distinguishing, however, the formation of the material part, made by the Demiuge in his own image, and the insuffla-tion of the pneumatic principle which assimilated Adam to God (J. Jervell, Imago Dei, Göttingen 1960, esp. 127-128) and which has a salvific function. The general lines of the gnostic conceptions of the genesis of the world and of humankind are traced by G. Sfameni Gasparro, Creazione e antropologia nello Gnosticismo: Dizionario di Spiritualità Biblico-Patristica 11, 2, Rome 1995, 61-81.

Other gnostic currents, such as the Sethian, at least acc. to the account of Hippolytus (Ref. VI, 19,2), rather than conceiving of evil as a result of the progressive fragmentation and attenuation of the divine world, postulate already at the beginning a principle of *good and one of evil, which are accompanied by an intermediate divine principle, Πνεῦμα or Λόγος, useful for the creation of the world, through the mixture of the two principles effected by it, and for its salvation, owed however to the spiritual principle. (See W. Wink, Cracking the Gnostic Code. The Powers in Gnosticism, Atlanta 1993, SBL Monograph Series 46, and, on the Sethians, at least H.M. Schenke, Das sethianische System nach Nag Hammadi Handschriften, in Studia Coptica, ed. P. Nagel, Berlin 1974, 165-172; A. Klijn, Seth in Jewish, Christian, and Gnostic Literature, Leiden 1977; G.W. MacRae, Seth in Gnostic Texts and Traditions, Missoula, MT 1977; The Rediscovery of Gnosticism, II. Sethian Gnosticism, ed. B. Layton, Leiden 1981; Le deuxième traité du Grand Seth: NH 7, 2, ed. tr. L. Painchaud, Québec 1982, Bibliothèque copte de NH 6; J.D. Turner, Sethian Gnosticism. A Literary History, in W. Hedrick - R. Hodgson, Nag Hammadi, Gnosticism and Early Christianity, Peabody 1986, 55-86.)

The doctrine of salvation of the various gnostic currents does not appear monolithic. In some texts, the salvation acquired through gnosis during life seems to be considered definitive, as the true *resurrection: so, e.g., in the Valentinian treatise On the Resurrection (NHC I, 4, p. 46, 21-22). Otherwise, this salvation is seen as an anticipation of the definitive one that can only be had after *death, with the liberation of the spirit from the *body, when the *soul will progressively traverse the already mentioned *archontic spheres (from these a late gnostic sect, of the 4th c., takes its name). Only then will the punishment of the wicked take place (Gospel of Truth: NHC I, 3, p. 21, 34-37), on the day of judgment, and there can be *metempsychosis. In some texts of Nag Hammadi, as in the Paraphrase of Shem (NHC VII, 1, p. 43, 28-45, 31), impressive descriptions of the end of the world appear (on gnostic apocalyptic: I. Gruenwald, From Apocalypticism to Gnosticism, Frankfurt a.M. 1988; Apocalittica e Gnosticismo, Atti del Colloquio internazionale, Rome, 18-19 June 1993, ed. M.V. Cerutti, Rome 1995; H.W. Attridge, Valentinian and Sethian Apocalyptic Tradition: JECS 8 [2000] 173-211; Sfameni, Temi apocalittici). One gnostic apocalyptic scenario was already known to Irenaeus, acc. to the Valentinian vision of a cosmic conflagration that will be followed by the apokatastasis*, on the basis of an eschatological theory shared by Origen and *Gregory of Nyssa, with the reestablishment of the original situation, which this time will be definitive and immutable, since the spiritual principle will then have defeated evil.

According to the presentation of the heresiologists, gnostic ethics tends inevitably to abolish itself either into asceticism or into libertinism, since the gnostic—privileged since already saved—is superior to laws. Above all, Epiphanius (Pan. 26) emphasizes the libertine practices of certain gnostic groups. The texts of Nag Hammadi, however, point much more clearly in the other direction, the ascetic, with more or less extreme positions, derived from contempt for the body and the world in general and from the refusal of concupiscence: this tendency had moreover already been identified by Irenaeus (Adv. haer. I, 24,2). The radical alternation between asceticism and libertinism, supported on the basis of the heresiologists, e.g., by Jonas, Gnosis und spätantiker Geist, I, in a rather emphatic fashion, is today contested, and at least restricted, by several parties. We have pointed out above all the criticism of King (What Is Gnostisism? 191-217) of this and other stylizations of gnostic thought: she also observes that in the Nag Hammadi texts there is no tendency toward libertinism, expressly condemned on the contrary in the Witness of Truth and in general limited, as it seems, to some groups, while an ascetical tendency is notable, which is moreover often present in the Christian church as well. As for a tendency to minimize the value of ethics in gnosticism, K. Rudolph shows the importance of ethical endeavor also within gnosticism (Die Gnosis. Wesen und Geschichte einer spätantiken Religion, Leipzig 1977, [2]1980, Eng. tr. San Francisco 1983).

Gnostic liturgy and cultural practices appear to be relatively poorly attested. Some gnostic movements, esp. Valentinian, preferred a purely spiritual worship that fled from every exterior manifestation, since, as Irenaeus attests (Adv. haer. I, 21,4), the mystery of the invisible and ineffable power should not be celebrated by means of visible and corruptible objects; cult practices are not salvific, but rather the knowledge of this ineffable principle. However, both the heresiologists and the Nag Hammadi texts attest gnostic prayers, hymns and psalms, such as that of Valentinus preserved by Hippolytus (Ref. VI, 37,6-8).

Some gnostics, like the *Simonians or the *Carpocratians (Iren., Adv. haer. I, 23,4; 25,6), also venerated images; individual places of gnostic worship have been discovered, like the Hypogeum of the Aurelii. Of some gnostic sects, such as the Ophites, we know that they venerated the *serpent. And the role taken on by the *sacraments in the Valentinian gnosticism should not be forgotten, which the Coptic contributions have helped to clarify (J.É. Ménard, L'exposé valentinien. Les fragments sur le baptême et sur l'eucharistie: NH XI, 2, Bibliothèque copte de NH Textes 14, Québec 1985; J.-M. Sevrin, Le dossier baptismal séthien. Études sur la sacramentaire gnostique, Bibiothèque copte de NH Études 2, Québec 1986). In particular on the sacrament of the nuptial chamber among the Valentinians we are informed mostly by the Gospel of Philip—a text of obviously Valentinian tone, containing concepts typical of gnostic experience and ritual, whose identification with the homonymous gospel mentioned by Epiphanius is debated. It contains exhortations and explanations from individuals who present themselves as Jews converted to Christian gnosticism, aimed at one or more listeners and focused on the meaning of the names of Jesus Christ, on the destiny and the liberation of the soul in the world, on the heavenly bread brought by Christ as a spiritual nourishment. Particularly important is the theme of the distinction of the genders as a symbol of the rending of the original unity which is destined to be reestablished in the spirituali, and it is the central theme of the sacraments, including giving much importantce to what is typically gnostic, the bridal chamber, which symbolizes the union of the "pneumatic" with his own angel and the restoration of the original unity (see A. Orbe, Los Valentinianos y el matrimonio espiritual: Gregorianum 58 [1977] 5-53).

The origins and the first manifestations of gnosticism constitute a problem that, as we have seen, is highly debated among critics and seems not to have been resolved yet with any certainty. The Simonians, in particular, would be connected with Simon Magus who, in Acts 8:9-25, is presented as a man who, toward the middle of the 1st c., in Samaria, was called "the great power," and, according to the heresiologists, was at the origins of the gnostic movement. The historicity of this figure, present later in the tradition of the apocryphal Acts of the Apostles, is controversial (K. Rudolph, Simon-Magus oder Gnosticus? Zur Stand der Debatte: ThRu 42 [1977] 279-359); in any case, the heresiological reports concerning the *Simonians, *Menander and *Satornilus (respectively Iren., Adv. haer. I, 23,5; 24,1-2) indicate the 1st half of the 2nd c., when *Carpocrates and, above all, Basilides seem to have been active, of whose works, and those of his son *Isidore, relatively little remains for us, unfortunately; we have better documentation concerning Valentinian gnosticism (on Basilides, see W.A. Löhr, Basilides und seine Schule, Tübingen 1996, with bibl. 338-382; and more recently B.A. Pearson, Basilides the Gnostic, in A Companion to Second-Century Christian "Heretics," ed. A. Marjanen - P. Luomanen, Leiden-Boston 2008). The greatest flowering of gnosticism seems to have taken place from the middle of the 2nd c., by which time it was present in Palestine, Syria, Egypt and Rome. From *Marcion, whose characterization as a gnostic is debated, but whose cosmic and theological dualism—with the creator God of the OT considered distinct and inferior compared to the supreme God of the NT—must, it seems, be traced to gnostic roots, the gnosticism of this mature period is articulated into Valentinian, Ophitic and Sethian, where the most important movement appears clearly to be the Valentinian. Of Valentinus himself, an Egyptian active at Alexandria and later Rome in the middle of the 2nd c., we know relatively little, and his works have reached us in fragments: letters, sermons, psalms. The identification of his Gospel of Truth with that found at Nag Hammadi, maintained by the first editor of the Coptic text, G. Quispel, is uncertain: it is a speech held by the Master to his "pneumatic" disciples to communicate to them the message of truth, the acquisition of awareness of their own true nature and reaching the fullness of being. We have more information, also thanks to Irenaeus, concerning the school of Valentinus, divided acc. to Hippolytus into two great branches: one Eastern, represented by Ardesianes (perhaps *Bardesanes of Edessa, whose thought is gleaned from heresiological fragments and from the Liber Legum Regionum, a work of his school) and by Assionicus; and one Western, better documented, with *Ptolemy the Gnostic and *Heracleon.

Ptolemy (on whom see C. Markschies, New Research on Ptolemaeus Gnosticus: Zeitschrift für Antikes Christentum 4 [2000] 225-254), a student of Valentinus together with Heracleon and Marcus, who lived in the 2nd half of the 2nd c. AD, in the Letter to Flora given in its entirety by Epiphanius in Adv. haer., dwells on the interpretation of the OT, of which only the Ten Commandments are of divine origin, due to the Demiurge creator of the universe; the rest comes partly from Moses and partly from the elders of the Jewish people. The savior, as earlier for Valentinus, is identified with Jesus Christ, the only one to fulfill the Decalogue, perfecting it, while he abolished all the other laws, of which the ritual ones should be read as symbols of the "spiritual and transcendent world": circumcision is that of the heart, fasting is abstention from evil, etc. Ptolemy, who in the Letter proclaims the scriptural and apostolic foundation of his own doctrines, also wrote a commentary to the Prologue of John, whose contents have been reported by Epiphanius and by Irenaeus (on the Johannine gospel and gnosticism, see H. Koester, The History-of-Religions School, Gnosis, and the Gospel of John: Studia Theologica 40 [1986] 115-136; G. Iacopino, Il Vangelo di John nei testi gnostici copti, SEA 49, Rome 1995). He interprets the Prologue allegorically as referring to the origin of the first *Ogdoad (on which see A. Quacquarelli, L'ogdoade patristica, Bari 1973), i.e., the first eight aeons of the Valentinian pleroma—the latter ones are produced from the Logos emitted from the Only-Begotten Son—composed of 30 aeons formed by the unfolding of the first principle, Bythos or abyss; then Sophia produced the extrapleromatic reality, hylic, psychic and pneumatic. From Irenaeus (Adv. haer. I, 12) we know that the followers of Ptolemy theorized two consorts of Bythos, Ennoia (Thought) and Thelesis (Will), who generated, respectively, Aletheia (Truth) and Monogenes (Only-Begotten) in their image. According to others, the first Ogdoad did not emerge progressively, one aeon from another, but all at once, from the Pre-Father—who, when he wanted to create, took the name Father—and from his Ennoia. In general, the line of Ptolemy seems to attenuate the Valentinian dualism and evaluate more positively both the OT, whose Demiurge is at least called "just," and the psychic element, acknowledged as present in Christ and having returned into the Hebdomad with the Demiurge after the crucifixion, while the pneumatic element returned into the superior Ogdoad, so that salvation could also be extended to the psychici, beyond the few pneumatici. Furthermore, acc. to Tertullian. (Adv. Val. 4), the Ptolemaic aeons are personal substances considered as external to the divinity, while Valentinus had conceived of them as sentiments and affections of the divinity.

Of the other disciple of Valentinus, Heracleon, many fragments of the commentary on John's gospel have reached us thanks to the refutation of it that Origen, showing respect and admiration for his adversary, made in his own homonymous work, even if the loss of many books of the Origenian commentary has also led to the reduction of the preserved fragments of Heracleon, who in this work addressed not just the initiates but also the grand public, excluding therefore, as it seems, the mythological superstructure and confirming rather the same principles as Ptolemy: distinction of people into hylic, psychic and pneumatic and of the OT God from the NT one. The exegesis of the gospel of John is eminently allegorical, attentive to detail even if concise: the words and works of Christ are interpreted as symbols of the spiritual realities, of the three kinds of people and of the relationships between the pneumatici and their angels. For example, John the Baptist, as a prophet, is considered the symbol of the "psychic" person, linked to the economy of the OT; as more than prophet, acc. to the definition of Mt 11:9, he represents the "pneumatic" person, symbolized also by the Samaritan woman: while the material envelope in which he is enclosed induces him to evil, he progressively becomes aware of his true nature and the Savior purifies him and leads him to gnosis.

The Valentinian school, even in its ramifications, presents nonetheless a fairly unitary and typical attitude, with the already recorded doctrine of the pleroma of 30 aeons and the importance of the first Ogdoad within it; with the centrality of Sophia; and with notable appreciation for the psychic element, whose most direct representative, the Demiurge, is evaluated in a positive enough way and appears destined to a happy fate (Iren., Adv. haer. I, 7,1). With this soteriological optimism, the Western Valentinian school approaches in a certain way the positions of the Great Church. It is interesting to study the influence of Valentinian gnosticism on Origen, who was also a friend of one of its followers and whom we have seen treat Heracleon with respect, even in criticism (H. Strutwolf, Gnosis als System. Zur Rezeption der valentinianischen Gnosis bei Origenes, Göttingen 1993; cf. D. Dawson, Allegorical Readers and Cultural Revision in Ancient Alexandria, Berkeley, CA 1992; R. van den Broek, Studies in Gnosticism and Alexandrian Christianity, Leiden 1996; I. Ramelli, La coerenza della soteriologia origeniana, in Pagani e Cristiani in cerca della Salvezza (secoli I-III). Atti del XXXIV Incontro di studiosi dell'Antichità Cristiana, Rome, Augustinianum, 5-7 May 2005, Rome 2006, 661-688).

A similar tendency seems to reinforce itself in some gnostic systems of the 3rd c.: e.g., in the four books of the Pistis Sophia, the savior, who is Jesus and who gives revelations to his disciples after the resurrection, makes all the souls who desire him participants in gnosis and the mysteries: "all men who will receive the mysteries in the Ineffable will become kings with me and sit at my right hand and at my left in my kingdom" (ch. 96). These declarations of soteriological universalism on the one hand anticipate the Manichean message (on the relations between gnosticism and Manicheism, see A. Böhlig - C. Markschies, Gnosis und Manichäismus, Berlin-New York 1994), and on the other hand, they depart from the perfectionist demands of the gnostic elect of the 2nd c., approaching more closely the Christianity of the Great Church.

Bibliographical collections: D.M. Scholer, Nag Hammadi Bibliography. 1948–1969; vol. 2: 1970–1994; vol. 3: 1995–2006, Leiden 1971, 1997, 2009; K. Rudolph, Gnosis und Gnostizismus, ein Forschungsbericht: ThRu 34 (1969) 121-175; 181-231; 358-361; ThRu 36 (1971) 1-61; 89-124; ThRu 37 (1972) 289-360; ThRu 38 (1973) 1-25.

H. Schenke, Der Gott "Mensch" in der Gnosis, Göttingen 1962; W. Eltester, Christentum und Gnosis, Berlin 1969; M. Krause - P. Labib, Gnostische und hermetische Schriften aus Codex II und Codex VI, Glückstadt 1971; J. Doresse, La Gnose, in H.-Ch. Puech, Histoire des religions, II, Paris 1972, 364-429; G. Quispel, Gnosis als Weltreligion, Zürich [2]1972; Id., Gnostic Studies, I-II, Leiden 1974–1975; E. Yamauchi, Pre-Christian Gnosticism, Grand Rapids, MI 1973; Gnosis und Gnostizismus, ed. K. Rudolph, Darmstadt 1975; Proc. of the Intern. Colloquium on Gnosticism. Stockholm, Aug. 20-25 1973, Leiden 1977; H. Green, Gnosis and Gnosticism: Numen 24 (1977) 95-134; B. Pearson, The Pneumatikos-Psychikos Terminology in 1 Corinthians. A Study in the Theology of the Corinthian Opponents of Paul and Its Relation to Gnosticism, Missoula, MT 1976; Gnosis. Festschrift H. Jonas, ed. B. Aland, Göttingen 1978; H.-Ch. Puech, En Quête de la Gnose, I-II, Paris 1978; Tertullien, Contre les valentiniens, éd. tr. comm. J.-C. Fredouille, Paris 1980–1981; Studies in Gnosticism and Hellenistic Religions Presented to G. Quispel, ed. R. van den Broek - M. Vermaseren, Leiden 1981; The New Testament and Gnosis, ed. A. Logan - A. Wedderburn, Edinburgh 1983; H.M. Schenke, The Problem of Gnosis: The Second Century 3, 2 (1983) 73-87; Religionstheorie und politische Theologie, II, Gnosis und Politik, ed. J. Taubes, Munich 1984; G. Stroumsa, Another Seed. Studies in Gnostic Mythology, Leiden 1984; H.A. Green, The Economic and Social Origins of Gnosticism, Atlanta 1985; G. Sfameni Gasparro, I Padri Apostolici di fronte ai movimenti ereticali di tipo encratita e gnostico: Parola Spirito Vita 12 (1985) 228-244; M. Tardieu - J.D. Dubois, Introduction à la littérature gnostique, Paris 1986; H. Koester, La tradition apostolique et les origines du Gnosticisme: RThPh 119 (1987) 1-16; G. MacRae, Studies in the New Testament and Gnosticism, ed. D.J. Harrington - S.B. Marrow, Wilmington 1987; M. Marcovich, Studies in Graeco-Roman Religions and Gnosticism, Leiden 1988; J.A. Williams, Biblical Interpretation in the Gnostic Gospel of Truth from N.H., Atlanta 1988; J.P. Couliano, Les gnoses dualistes d'Occident, Paris [2]1989 (It. tr. Milan 1989); T. Onuki, Gnosis und Stoa. Eine Untersuchung zum Apokryphon des Johannes, Freiburg-Göttingen 1989; J. Bergman et al., eds., Gnostica, mandaica, liturgica. Festschrift E. Segelberg, Uppsala 1990; B. Pearson, Gnosticism, Judaism, and Egyptian Christianity, Minneapolis 1990; C. Gianotto, ed., La Testimonianza veritiera, Brescia 1990; Gnostikerne og bibelen, intr. tr. M. Müller, København 1991; K. Rudolph, Gnosticism, in Early Christianity . . . In Honour of W.H.C. Frend, ed. I. Hazlett, London 1991, 186-197; M. Scopello, Les Gnostiques, Paris 1991; M. Brumlik, Die Gnostiker, Frankfurt 1992; G. Filoramo, Sulle origini dello Gnosticismo: RSLR (1993) 493-510; Id., Il problema del tempo nello Gnosticismo, in Id., Figure del sacro, Brescia 1993, 29-45; Id., L'attesa della fine. Storia della Gnosi, Bari 1987 (Eng. tr. Oxford 1990); D.L. Hoffman, The Status of Women and Gnosticism in Irenaeus and Tertullian, Ann Arbor, MI 1994; J. Iwersen, Gnosis und Geschichte, Hamburg 1994; Lo Gnosticismo, in Storia delle religioni, ed. G. Filoramo, III, Rome-Bari 1995, 5-26; R. Segal, ed., The Allure of Gnosticism, Chicago-La Salle 1995; A. Magris, Riflessioni sul rapporto fra giudaismo e gnosticismo: Cassiodorus 1 (1995) 207-211; U. Bianchi, L'uomo gnostico di fronte al divino e al mondo, in J. Ries (ed.), Crisi, rottura e cambiamenti, Milan 1995, 143-161; N. Deutsch, The Gnostic Imagination, Leiden 1995; C. Colpe, Kleine Schriften, 6 vols., Berlin 1996; K. Rudolph, Gnosis und spätantike Religionsgeschichte, Leiden 1996; G. Casadio, Vie gnostiche all'immortalità, Brescia 1997; G. Hanratty, Studies in Gnosticism and in the Philosophy of Religion, Dublin 1997; A. Magris, La logica del pensiero gnostico, Brescia 1997; C. Scholten, Probleme der Gnosisforschung: Communio 26 (1997) 481-501; Destino e salvezza. Tra culti pagani e gnosi cristiana, ed. G. Sfameni Gasparro, Cosenza 1998; C. Colpe, Weltdeutungen im Widerstreit, Berlin-New York 1999; Th. Lechner, Ignatius adversus Valentinianos? Leiden 1999, VC Suppl. 47; I. Ramelli, Linee generali per una presentazione e per un commento del Liber legum regionum: RIL 133 (1999) 311-355; Id., Bardesane e la sua scuola tra la cultura occidentale e quella orientale. Il lessico della libertà nel Liber Legum Regionum, in Pensiero e istituzioni del mondo classico nelle culture del Vicino Oriente, ed. R.B. Finazzi - A. Valvo, Alessandria 2001, 237-255; J. Iwersen, Gnosis zur Einführung, Hamburg 2001; C. Markschies, Die Gnosis, Munich 2001; R. Roukema, Gnosis and Faith in Early Christianity. An Introduction to Gnosticism, Eng. tr., Harrisburg 1999; G. Sfameni Gasparro, La fede nello Gnosticismo: Dizionario di Spiritualità Biblico-Patristica 16, Rome 1999, 86-133; Id., Gesù il Cristo nello Gnosticismo, ibid. 128-199; Id., Grazia divina e divinizzazione dell'uomo nello Gnosticismo, ibid., 31, Rome 2002, 48-84; Id., La notion grecque du destin et la sotériologie gnostique, in The Nag Hammadi Texts in the History of Religion, ed. S. Giversen - T. Petersen - J. Pödemann, Copenhagen 2002, 105-124; La gnose, une question philosophique: colloque 16-17 octobre 1997 Un. Paris IV-Sorbonne, ed. N. Depraz - J.F. Marquet, Paris 2000; M.G. Lancellotti, The Naassenes. A Gnostic Identity, Münster 2000; G. Filoramo, Veggenti, profeti, gnostici, Brescia 2005; A. Marjanen (ed.), Was There a Gnostic Religion? Göttingen 2005; R. van der Broek, Gnosticism, in Dictionary of Gnosis and Western Esotericism, I, ed. W.J. Hannegraaff et al., Leiden-Boston 2005, 412; E. Albrile, Wisdom and Metempsychosis. A Gnostic Myth: Teresianum 57 (2006) 185-202.

I. Ramelli

GOD

I. Patristic doctrine on God. - II. Knowledge of God.

I. Patristic doctrine on God. Who is God, acc. to the Fathers of the church? How does he act in the world, and what are his nature and qualities? The answers to these questions are very complex. As with the Jewish religion, Christian "theological" thought was based on the *liturgy and the practices of everyday life: the Christian novelty was that it was linked to faith in Jesus Christ, the one savior of the whole human race (RGG[4] 3, 1114). Discourse about God, therefore, varies not only acc. to periods and authors, but also acc. to the character of individual works: apologetic, catechetical, dogmatic or homi-letic. In a particular way it depends on the reception of the *Bible, the authoritative source of God's *revelation, and thus the key to the explanation of the world. In any case, it is obvious that the God of religious practices (invocations, *doxologies) and the God of theological reflection are one and the same (Werbick). For a correct appraisal, therefore, of the Fathers' overall response to the question "who is God?" one must start from their biblical perspective. From the beginning the Christian faith took up the Jewish confession, the shema: "Hear, O Israel: Yahweh is our God, Yahweh is one" (Dt 6:4), modifying it in a Christian sense, i.e., adding the Son and the *Holy Spirit. In line with the baptismal command (Mt 28:19; Did. 7,1), this confession is clearly attested by the *Apostles' Creed, which goes back to 2nd-c. formulae: "Credo in Deum Patrem omnipotentem, et in Iesum Christum, Filium eius unicum Dominum nostrum . . . et in Spiritum Sanctum" (DS 10-30).

All this means that, when the Fathers speak of God, they do so principally in the NT sense (cf. Rahner), referring, i.e., to the first article of the Credo, to God the Father almighty, creator of all things, though extending the divine titling to the Son and even to the Holy Spirit. Only in later periods did Christian authors, esp. in philosophically oriented texts, mean by the term God the entire *Trinity—the one and eternal deity—or at times just Christ. The first article of the Christian faith was thus continually reinterpreted acc. to the ever-changing situations of the churches: modern research sees these developments in the context of the so-called Hellenization of the gospel. While recognizing that this centuries-long process had its roots in the Greek versions of the OT, and in a certain Hellenistic orientation of its later books and of the NT writings (esp. the Pauline and Johannine), it must also be admitted that it was fully fostered only by the 2nd-c. encounter with non-Christians, both Jewish and *pagan. Indeed at that point Christian intellectuals claimed to possess the "true *philosophy," which allowed them to choose from among the valid ideas of outside philosophers (RGG[4] 3, 1114).

Against the Jews of the Diaspora, *Justin's Dialogue with Trypho stresses that God is the Father of Jesus Christ, demonstrating, by means of OT testimonia* but also with philosophical categories, the distinction between the Father, first and invisible God, and the Word, second and visible God. Defending the Christian religion against the objections of atheism and promoting it in intellectual circles, Justin and the other *apologists, following Jewish apologetic but also making use of some Hellenistic monotheistic tendencies, highlight the unicity of the true God, wholly transcendent (in line with *Middle Platonism) but also immanent (in line with *Stoicism). In the same antipagan perspective they began to develop proofs of God's existence, deduced from the perfections and order of the universe, his work (Athenag., Leg. 4-5; Theoph. Ant., Autol. I, 2-4). Doubtless such concerns included the tension between the incomprehensible God and his manifestation, between the divine reality in itself and divine action in the world.

No less decisive was the confrontation with *heretics—the so-called *gnostics of the 2nd c.—and with too-simple believers. Against the latter, Christian authors sought to exclude anthropomorphic ideas of God, particularly opposing an exaggerated understanding of the divine monarchia, taking up and augmenting the by-then traditional arguments for the distinction between Father, Son and Holy Spirit (Tertull., Prax. 2-3; Orig., Dial. 1-4). In the antimonarchian polemic, however, *Tertullian, taking up Stoic "materialism," presented God as substantia, formless mass, from which derived the portiones of the Son and the Holy Spirit (TRE 654-655). Against the gnostics, on the other hand—who, in view of Christian faith in a wholly providential and omnipresent God were esp. concerned with the question of the origin of *evil, and thus defended an aggravated dualism (distinguishing the good God from the just one, the God of the gospel from that of the Law)—the theologians of the Great Church, beginning with *Irenaeus, defended the one God, both in a historical sense (the unity of the two Testaments) and in a philosophical sense (author of all things, including matter). This confrontation clarified the distinction between God and the world, between ἀγέν(ν)ητος and γένητα (Prestige, Dieu, 54-64), although it risked compromising their position with the Middle Platonist concept of the Logos, intermediary between God and the world. All these reflections were brought together in *Origen's De principiis (see esp. I praef. 4), and later in *Augustine's works against the *Manicheans, survivors of 2nd-c. gnosticism.

The 4th-c. controversies on the divinity of the Son and then on that of the Holy Spirit led the Fathers to a further reinterpretation of the Christian credo. Against primitive *Arianism, the defenders of Nicene faith showed that the authentically Christian concept of God the Creator (creatio ex nihilo) did not exclude that Christ, the Father's true—not adopted—Son, was equally God. In later discussions, on the other hand, the Cappadocians and others rejected the identification of ἀγέννησία with the divine οὐσία (*ousia), referring it only to the relation between the Father and the Son (Basil., Adv. Eun. I,15). In the same period, the new political-cultural situation of the churches allowed Christian theology to draw inspiration more than ever from Greco-Roman political ideas. In comparing the divine monarchy with the imperial monarch *Constantine the Great, *Eusebius of Caesarea and others did not for this reason call into question the Trinity, as some scholars claim (see Beskow, 314-325, who refers to Peterson and others). Political ideas came into play in the West even before the birth of the imperial church: influenced by Roman legal views, Tertullian and, following him, *Cyprian, presented God above all as legislator and therefore as judge. In particular they introduced the Latin idea of the auctoritas divina (HWP 3,739-740).

These continual confrontations undoubtedly provoked a rather more metaphysical and legal reinterpretation of the biblical tradition's essentially historical concept of God. Instead of beginning from *Scripture, in which God in himself, the divine nature, is conceived of in light of salvation history, Christian scholars inserted themselves into the philosophical traditions in which one rises dialectically from the visible, mutable world to the immutable, invisible origin of all things. Faced with intellectual audiences and personally interested in Greek philosophy, esp. *Platonism, Christian authors from the 2nd c. on had recourse to philosophical categories and models, among them the traditional etymologies of θεός (Prestige, Dieu, 25-26), when they had to clarify their thought on the one God, creator and ruler of the world. This is evident in *Clement of Alexandria, who receives the biblical idea of education from Irenaeus, but gives it a much more Greek coloring (HWPh 3,738). The encounter with philosophical views appears even more clearly, however, in the increasingly frequent use of God's negative attributes. Already clearly proclaimed in the Apostolic *Fathers (Ign., Eph. 7,2), the negative description of the divine nature was stressed in the apologists under the influence of Middle Platonist philosophy (Daniélou, Histoire, II, 297-316); it took heterodox forms in Arius (Grillmeier, Jesus, 368) and reached its perfection in *Gregory of Nyssa and ps.-*Dionysius. The negative attribute of divine immutability, moreover, asserted from the 2nd c. on, became the focal point of Christian theology. Though well-suited to emphasizing the distinction between the ingenerate God and generated creatures, this fundamental "dogma" of Greek philosophy clashed with the historical concept of God, leading in particular to the debates on the eternal generation of the Son, the true incarnation of the true God and the absolute gratuity of divine *grace. The elaboration of negative theology was not without progress and regress. Whereas Clement of Alexandria denied any quality in God (ἄποιος), Origen, in view of the knowledge that God has of himself, admitted certain limits in him (DTC 4,1052-1053). The Cappadocians and later theologians—under the manifest influence of *Plotinus—recognized in God a simplicity of plenitude: God was considered as the sum of every perfection, and esp. as summum bonum. Finally, God's supreme perfection was reduced to his full and simple essence. We see this clearly in *exegesis of Ex 3:14 and esp. in the more arduous reflections of *Marius Victorinus, Gregory of Nyssa, Augustine and ps.-Dionysius. Especially noteworthy is the fact that Augustine preferred the concept of essentia to that of substantia, considering the former to be closer to Moses's vision in the desert.

There is no question that this evolution of thought on God continually risked compromising the biblical traditions. Not only did it include a significant transformation of certain biblical attributes of God—such as *eternity, goodness and *justice (RGG[3] 2, 1719-20)—but it led to a strong prevalence of the ontological approach to the doctrine of God. Indeed it is clear that Christian authors were not wholly successful in avoiding the risks of the confrontation between the "God of the Fathers" and the "God of the philosophers" (RGG[3] 2, 1718), a fact that was also largely true of Augustine. Perceiving the tension between the historical vision and the philosophical approach to God, he did, however, develop the distinction between the name of substance and that of mercy, between the idipsum esse and the God of the Fathers (Studer, Gratia Christi), and in the polemic against *Porphyry, he not only corrected the natural theology of the Platonists (Civ. Dei VIII-X), but also defended the cognitio historialis, thanks to which all people, and not only philosophers, know God through his historical action (Civ. Dei XI-XXII; cf. Studer, Cognitio historialis).

The extent to which it would be an exaggeration to claim that the Christian authors sacrificed the God of the Bible to that of the philosophers becomes clear from the personalistic approach of their theology. In fact, leaving aside the positive aspects of the philosophical framework, such as its universalism, they never substituted an impersonal deity for the personal God of the Bible. Even the most Platonist among them—such as Origen, who taught an eternal creation, and ps.-Dionysius, who insisted on hierarchical causality in the universe—maintained the freedom of God's creative act. Though employing the philosophical schema of origin and return, they did not confuse God, beginning and end, with an eternal world. Origen's disciple *Gregory Thaumaturgus did not hesitate to say that God could exclude ἀπάθεια itself by his will (RGG³ 2, 1721). The Latin tradition, so interested in God's moral attributes, was even more biblical. Tertullian not only too-categorically affirmed that God could do what he wills (Prax. 10) but, distinguishing between Deus and Dominus, clearly indicated the distance that separates God from the world (Adv. Hermog. 2-3)—something perhaps not always respected in deducing the divine existence from creatures. *Lactantius even defended divine wrath (ira). Finally, Augustine insisted so much on God's freedom, the only source of grace, as to give the impression of an unyielding *predestinationism (Lettieri). Precisely in the context of his voluntarism, however, presenting God as *love with all clarity, he extended the essentially biblical views of Irenaeus, Origen, *Athanasius and *Ambrose (Studer, Christusbild).

The voluntaristic and thus personalistic orientation of patristic "theology" is confirmed by the Ambrosian spirituality of the Christus omnia. Without ignoring trinitarian faith, *Ambrose stresses his personal relationship with Christ, the Lord and Savior. Following Ambrose and thus Origen (Studer, Christusbild), Augustine develops the wholly personal biblical theme of the quaerere faciem Dei (Conf.; Trin. IX). "The more certainly," he says, "we love the face of Christ, and in it the face of God that we desire to see, the more we discover in the 'back' the greatness of the love with which Christ first loved us" (Trin. II, 17,28, with Ex 33:18-23. Cf. Trin. XV, 27,49; Qu. diu. 69).

How mistaken it is to try to attribute to early Christian authors an impersonal understanding of God may also be seen from Christian liturgy and *spirituality. In worship, the biblical doxologies addressed to God the Father were always preserved, at least in the church's official prayers (Orig., Dial. 4). The memory of God's great saving actions was celebrated in the *Eucharist, and esp. at the great feasts. Finally, the baptismal liturgy shows that Christians understood their relationship with God as conversion to the personal God (Augustine, Conf. XIII). The spiritual aspirations of Christians likewise presuppose a personalist vision of God. The imitation of God, though yielding to the imitation of Christ, never ceased to be emphasized. Even those who gave great importance to deification, a seemingly abstract concept, clearly identified it with the biblical ideal of divine sonship. For them, thanks to the incarnation of the Son of God, Christians were truly brothers and sisters of Christ and, as such, children of the one God (Heb 1:12ff. in Cyril). Even communal relations with God, i.e., between him and the church, were described using the personalist imagery of the Bible: house of God, bride of the Word, temple of the Holy Spirit.

DTC 4,1023-1152; K. Rahner, Theos im NT, Schriften I, Einsiedeln 1954, 91-167; G.L. Prestige, Dieu dans la pensée patristique, Paris 1955; J. Daniélou, Histoire des doctrines chrétiennes avant Nicée, 3 vols., Paris 1958, 1961, 1978; RGG³ 2, 1717-1722; P. Beskow, Rex gloriae, Uppsala 1962; R. Braun, Deus christianorum. Recherches sur le vocabulaire doctrinal de Tertullien, Paris 1962; F. Mühlenberg, Die Unendlichkeit Gottes bei Gregor von Nyssa, Göttingen 1966; R. Farina, L'impero e l'imperatore cristiano in Eusebio di Cesarea, Zürich 1966; W. Maas, Unveränderlichkeit Gottes, Munich 1974; B. Kötting, Gott, V. Patristik: HWP 3 (1974) 735-742; A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche, Freiburg 1979; R. Hübner, Der Gott der Kirchenväter und der Gott der Bibel, Munich 1979; G.C. Stead, Gott, V, Alte Kirche: TRE 13 (1984) 652-657; B. Studer, Gratia Christi – gratia Dei bei Augustinus von Hippo, Rome 1993; Id., La cognitio historialis di Porfirio nel De civitate Dei di Agostino: SEA 50, Rome 1995, 520-553; Id., Das Christusbild des Origenes und des Ambrosius, Origen. Sept., Louvain 1999, 571-590; J. Werbick, Gott: LTK³ 4, 863-866; G. Madec, Deus: AugL II/1-2 (1996) 314-319; II/3-4 (1999) 321-365; L. Ayres - M.R. Barnes, God, in Augustine Through the Ages, ed. A.Q. Fitzgerald, Grand Rapids, MI 1999, 384-390 (bibl.); RGG⁴ 3, 1113-1127, esp. 1114-15; G. Lettieri, L'altro Agostino, Brescia 2001.

II. Knowledge of God. Christianity presents itself fundamentally as a religion of divine *revelation. This consists of the action that God, creator of the universe, initiated in the history of Israel, explaining its significance through the *prophets, and that he fulfilled in the historical existence of Jesus Christ, his Son, who was then proclaimed by the *apostles. In a Christian sense, therefore, revelation is the prophetic word of Jesus and of the apostles regarding God's saving intentions. Human beings are called to respond to that word with faith in the historical presence of God the Savior. This faith, though principally obedience and fidelity to the one true God, is not possible without a certain knowledge of God and of his will. The extent to which the encounter between God and human beings also includes intellectual elements, even in the biblical context, appears esp. in the OT *theophany accounts, which reflect the keen desire to see God; the common veneration for the Law, as a book entrusted to the interpretation of the priests and scribes; the aspiration to wisdom in later Judaism; apocalyptic tendencies, with desires to know the mysteries of God; the teaching of Jesus, both prophet and teacher; the apostolic *preaching of the word; the gnostic movements in certain primitive communities, such as at *Corinth. Religious experience, which in the first Christian communities was strongly centered on fides ex auditu, on gnosis and on instruction, later assumed an even more clearly cognitive orientation, to the point where the question of the possibility and the way of knowing God became a central theme of Christian theology. This growing value assigned to the knowledge of God can be explained by the following factors: The Jewish confession of the name of God, adapted to the major moments of the Christian liturgy, required a more exact formulation and a fuller explanation of faith in God (Just., 1 Apol. 61-67, Cyr. of Jer., Catech. 6-9). *Parenesis supposed a similarly thematized justification (see for the Apostolic Fathers, DTC 4,1027). Above all, the encounter with Hellenistic culture—already prepared in the *synagogue—so imbued with the desire to know God in his relation to the world, necessarily reinforced the intellectual elements of the Christian religion. Obliged to defend the Christian religious attitude on a scientific level and to propagate the faith even in intellectual circles, the apologists not only contrasted the worship of the true and only God with pagan *idolatry, but also presented Christianity as a true philosophy (DTC 4,1032-1035). There were even those who, following the Platonic tradition, had recourse to mystery language to describe this Christian gnosis (Clem., Prot. XII, 119-121; Strom. VII, 57).

At about the same time, the 2nd-c. gnostic movement, which touched Christian circles, imposed the gnostic idea of salvation. We see this esp. in *Irenaeus, who tended to reduce salvation history to the manifestation and vision of God (Tremblay). Also resulting from the confrontation with the gnostics was the development of theodicy (the question of the origin of evil) and of the question of the one God, creator and redeemer. In the gnostic line, represented by Irenaeus, Clement and Origen, the later Fathers developed two spiritual ideals of knowledge of God: knowledge per amorem and knowledge per contemplationem (DSp 3,886-890). The Arian controversy also concerned the knowledge of God, since, while *Arius had excluded all positive knowledge of God, *Eunomius, identifying ἀγέννησία with God's οὐσία, supposed a comprehensive knowledge of God. Against him, Gregory of Nyssa measured God's incomprehensibility by his infinity, understanding the latter as infinite fullness that reveals itself in complete freedom (LTK[3] 3,782). In the late 4th c., disputes with the *Audiani and with certain overly simple monks obliged *Epiphanius (Haer. 70), *Theophilus and others to revisit the question of anthropomorphism, discussed so many times before. The confrontation with *Neoplatonism finally led Augustine to deepen, more than the Alexandrians, the difference between faith ex auditu and the rational knowledge of God. In these very complex conditions, Christian authors never ceased to take the knowledge of God into more or less reflective consideration. Even if they did not elaborate a complete doctrine on the question—except ps.-Dionysius who, in De div. nominibus and De myst. theologia, achieved a notable synthesis (DTC 4,1118-1127)—they explored one or another aspect which, taken together, made up the essentials of a theology of the knowledge of God.

This patristic vision was dominated by the thesis, accepted everywhere, that God is completely transcendent, while being immanent in creation and esp. in the human soul. Transcending all creatures, he remains incomprehensible to them (this aspect was repeated esp. by the Fathers who opposed Eunomius's positions) (DTC 4,1088-1097). Human beings, unable at least in this life to grasp God in his intimate nature, are also incapable of speaking congruently of him (Just., 2 Apol. 6.12; Aug., Serm. 341,79). At the same time, God, being wholly spiritual, is also invisible, unless he wishes to reveal himself (Iren., Adv. haer. IV,20,1). While the authors of the first centuries radically excluded the visibility of the "first God," conceding it only to the Word, the "second God," following the Arian controversy Augustine defended an equal invisibility for all three of the divine persons (Ep. 147; Trin. III,11,21).
